is not inactive in other men. The metamorphosis excites in the beholder an emotion of joy. The use of symbols has a certain power of emancipation and exhilaration for all men. We seem to be touched by a wand, which makes us dance and run about happily, like children. We are like persons who come out of a cave or cellar into the open air. This is the effect on us of tropes, fables, oracles, and all poetic forms. Poets are thus liberating gods. Men have really got a new sense, and found within their world another world, or nest of worlds, for, the metamorphosis once seen, we divine that it does not stop. I will not now consider how much this makes the charm of algebra and the mathematics, which also have their tropes, but it is felt in every definition, as when Aristotle defines space to be an immovable vessel, in which things are contained, or when Plato defines a line to be a flowing point, or figure to be a bound of solid, and many the like. What a joyful sense of freedom we have, when Vitruvius announces the old opinion of artists that no architect can build any house well who does not know something of anatomy. When Socrates, in Charmides, tells us that the soul is cured of its maladies by certain incantations, and that these incantations are beautiful reasons, from which temperance is generated in souls, when Plato calls the world an animal, and Timæus affirms that the plants also are animals, or affirms a man to be a heavenly tree, growing with his root, which is his head, upward, and, as George Chapman, following him, writes,—

‘So in our tree of man, whose nervie root Springs in his top’, when Orpheus speaks of hoariness as ‘that white flower which marks extreme old age’, when Proclus calls the universe the statue of the intellect, when Chaucer, in his praise of ‘Gentilesse,’ compares good blood in mean condition to fire, which, though carried to the darkest house betwixt this and the mount of Caucasus, will yet hold its natural office, and burn as bright as if twenty thousand men did it behold, when John saw, in the Apocalypse, the ruin of the world through evil, and the stars fall from heaven, as the figtree casteth her untimely fruit, when Æsop reports the whole catalogue of common daily relations through the masquerade of birds and beasts,—we take the cheerful hint of the immortality of our essence, and its versatile habits and escapes, as when the gypsies say of themselves ‘it is in vain to hang them, they cannot die.’

The poets are thus liberating gods. The ancient British bards had for the title of their order, ‘Those who are free throughout the world.’ They are free, and they make free. An imaginative book renders us much more service at first, by stimulating us through its tropes, than afterward, when we arrive at the precise sense of the author. I think nothing is of any value in books, excepting the transcendental and extraordinary. If a man is inflamed and carried away by his thought, to that degree that he forgets the authors and the public, and heeds only this one dream, which holds him like an insanity, let me read his paper, and you may have all the arguments and histories and criticism. All the value which attaches to Pythagoras, Paracelsus, Cornelius Agrippa, Cardan, Kepler, Swedenborg, Schelling, Oken, or any other who introduces questionable facts into his cosmogony, as angels, devils, magic, astrology, palmistry, mesmerism, and so on, is the certificate we have of departure from routine, and that here is a new witness. That also is the best success in conversation, the magic of liberty, which puts the world, like a ball, in our hands. How cheap even the liberty then seems, how mean to study, when an emotion communicates to the intellect the power to sap and upheave nature. How great the perspective! nations, times, systems, enter and disappear, like threads in tapestry of large figure and many colors, dream delivers us to dream, and, while the drunkenness lasts, we will sell our bed, our philosophy, our religion, in our opulence.

There is good reason why we should prize this liberation. The fate of the poor shepherd, who, blinded and lost in the snowstorm, perishes in a drift within a few feet of his cottage door, is an emblem of the state of man. On the brink of the waters of life and truth, we are miserably dying. The inaccessibility of every thought but that we are in, is wonderful. What if you come near to it,—you are as remote when you are nearest as when you are farthest Every thought is also a prison, every heaven is also a prison Therefore we love the poet, the inventor, who in any form, whether in an ode, or in an action, or in looks and behavior, has yielded us a new thought He unlocks our chains, and admits us to a new scene

This emancipation is dear to all men, and the power to impart it, as it must come from greater depth and scope of thought, is a measure of intellect Therefore all books of the imagination endure, all which ascend to that truth, that the writer sees nature beneath him, and uses it as his exponent Every verse or sentence, possessing this virtue, will take care of its own immortality The religions of the world are the ejaculations of a few imaginative men

But the quality of the imagination is to flow, and not to freeze The poet did not stop at the color, or the form, but read their meaning, neither may he rest in this meaning, but he makes the same objects exponents of his new thought Here is the difference between the poet and the mystic, that the last nails a symbol to one sense, which was a true sense for a moment, but soon becomes old and false For all symbols are fluxional, all language is vehicular and transitive, and is good, as ferries and horses are, for conveyance, not as farms and houses are, for homestead. Mysticism consists in the mistake of an accidental and individual symbol for an universal one The morning-redness happens to be the favorite meteor to the eyes of Jacob Behmen, and comes to stand to him for truth and faith, and, he believes, it should stand for the same realities to every reader But the first reader prefers as naturally the symbol of a mother and child, or a gardener and his bulb, or a jeweller polishing a gem Either of these, or of a myriad more, are equally good to the person to whom they are significant Only they must be held lightly, and be very willingly translated into the equivalent terms which others use And the mystic must be steadily told,—All that you say is just as true without the tedious use of that symbol as with it Let us have a little algebra, instead of this trite rhetoric,—universal signs, instead of these village symbols,—and we shall both be gainers The history of hierarchies seems to show that all religious error consisted in making the symbol too stark and solid, and, at last, nothing but an excess of the organ of language.

Swedenborg, of all men in the recent ages, stands eminently for the translator of nature into thought I do not know the man in history to whom things stood so uniformly for words. Before him the metamorphosis continually plays Every thing on which his eye rests, obeys the impulses of moral nature. The figs become grapes whilst he eats them When some of his angels affirmed a truth, the laurel twigs which they held blossomed in their hands The noise which at a distance appeared like gnashing and thumping, on coming nearer was found to be the voice of disputants. The men, in one of his visions, seen in heavenly light, appeared like dragons, and seemed in darkness, but to each other they appeared as men, and, when the light from heaven shone into their cabin, they complained of the darkness, and were compelled to shut the window that they might see

There was this perception in him, which makes the poet or seer an object of awe and terror, namely, that the same man, or society of men, may wear one aspect to themselves and their companions, and a different aspect to higher intelligences Certain priests, whom he describes as conversing very learnedly together, appeared to the children, who were at some distance, like dead horses, and many the like misappearances And instantly the mind inquires, whether these fishes under the bridge, yonder oxen in the pasture, those dogs in the yard, are immutably fishes, oxen, and dogs, or only so appear to me, and perchance to themselves appear upright men, and whether I appear as a man to all eyes The Brahmins and Pythagoras propounded the same question, and if any poet has witnessed the transformation, he doubtless found it in harmony with various experiences We have all seen changes as considerable in wheat and caterpillars He is the poet, and shall draw us with love and terror, who sees, through the flowing vest, the firm nature, and can declare it

I look in vain for the poet whom I describe We do not with sufficient plainness, or sufficient profoundness, address ourselves to life, nor dare we chaunt our own times and social circumstance. If we filled the day with bravery, we should not shrink from celebrating it. Time and nature yield us many gifts, but not yet the timely man, the new religion, the reconciler, whom all things await. Dante's praise is, that he dared to write his autobiography in colossal cipher, or into universality. We have yet had no genius in America, with tyrannous eye, which knew the value of our incomparable materials, and saw, in the barbarism and materialism of the times, another carnival of the same gods whose picture he so much admires in Homer, then in the middle age, then in Calvinism. Banks and tariffs, the newspaper and caucus, Methodism and Unitarianism, are flat and dull to dull people, but rest on the same foundations of wonder as the town of Troy and the temple of Delphos, and are as swiftly passing away. Our logrolling, our stumps and their politics, our fisheries, our Negroes and Indians, our boats, and our repudiations, the wrath of rogues, and the pusillanimity of honest men, the northern trade, the southern planting, the western clearing, Oregon and Texas, are yet unsung. Yet America is a poem in our eyes, its ample geography dazzles the imagination, and it will not wait long for metres. If I have not found that excellent combination of gifts in my countrymen which I seek, neither could I aid myself to fix the idea of the poet by reading now and then in Chalmers's collection of five centuries of English poets. These are wits, more than poets, though there have been poets among them. But when we adhere to the ideal of the poet, we have our difficulties even with Milton and Homer. Milton is too literary, and Homer too literal and historical.

But I am not wise enough for a national criticism, and must use the old largeness a little longer, to discharge my errand from the muse to the poet concerning his art.

Art is the path of the creator to his work. The paths, or methods, are ideal and eternal, though few men ever see them,—not the artist himself for years, or for a lifetime, unless he come into the conditions. The painter, the sculptor, the composer, the epic rhapsodist, the orator, all partake one desire, namely, to express themselves symmetrically and abundantly, not dwarfishly and fragmentarily. They found or put themselves in certain conditions, as, the painter and sculptor before some impressive human figures, the orator, into the assembly of the people; and the others, in such scenes as each has found exciting to his intellect, and each presently feels the new desire. He hears a voice, he sees a beckoning. Then he is apprised, with wonder, what herds of daemons hem him in. He can no more rest, he says, with the old painter, 'By God, it is in me, and must go forth of me.' He pursues a beauty, half seen, which flies before him. The poet pours out verses in every solitude. Most of the things he says are conventional, no doubt, but by and by he says something which is original and beautiful. That charms him. He would say nothing else but such things. In our way of talking, we say, 'That is yours, this is mine', but the poet knows well that it is not his, that it is as strange and beautiful to him as to you, he would fain hear the like eloquence at length. Once having tasted this immortal ichor, he cannot have enough of it, and, as an admirable creative power exists in these intellects, it is of the last importance that these things get spoken. What a little of all we know is said! What drops of all the sea of our science are baled up! and by what accident it is that these are exposed, when so many secrets sleep in nature! Hence the necessity of speech and song, hence these throbs and heart-beatings in the orator, at the door of the assembly, to the end, namely, that thought may be ejaculated as Logos, or Word.

Doubt not, O poet, but persist. Say, 'It is in me, and shall out.' Stand there, balked and dumb, stuttering and stammering, hissed and hooted, stand and strive, until, at last, rage draw out of thee that dream-power which every night shows thee is thine own, a power transcending all limit and privacy, and by virtue of which a man is the conductor of the whole river of electricity. Nothing walks, or creeps, or grows, or exists, which must not in turn arise and walk before him as exponent of his meaning. Comes he to that power, his genius is no longer exhaustible. All the creatures, by pairs and by tribes, pour into his mind as into a Noah's ark, to come forth again to people a new world. This is like the stock of air for our respiration, or for the combustion of our fireplace, not a measure of gallons, but the entire atmosphere if wanted. And therefore the rich poets, as Homer, Chaucer, Shakspeare, and Raphael, have obviously no limits to their works, except the limits of their lifetime, and resemble a murmur carried through the street, ready to render an image of every created thing.

O poet! a new nobility is conferred in groves and pastures, and not in castles, or by the sword-blade, any longer. The conditions are hard, but equal. Thou shalt leave the world, and know the muse only. Thou shalt not know any longer the time, customs, graces, politics, or opinions of men, but shalt take all from the muse. For the time of towns is tolled from the world by funeral chimes, but in nature the universal hours are counted by succeeding tribes of animals and plants, and by growth of joy on joy. God wills also that thou abdicate a manifold and duplex life, and that thou be content that others speak for thee. Others shall be thy gentlemen, and shall represent all courtesy and worldly life for thee, others shall do the great and resounding actions also. Thou shalt lie close hid with nature, and canst not be afforded to the Capitol or the Exchange. The world is full of renunciations and apprenticeships, and this is thine, thou must pass for a fool and a churl for a long season. This is the screen and sheath in which Pan has protected his well-beloved flower, and thou shalt be known only to thine own, and they shall console thee with tenderest love. And thou shalt not be able to rehearse the names of thy friends in thy verse, for an old shame before the holy ideal. And this is the reward that the ideal shall be real to thee, and the impressions of the actual world shall fall like summer rain, copious, but not troublesome, to thy invulnerable essence. Thou shalt have the whole land for thy park and manor, the sea for thy bath and navigation, without tax and without envy, the woods and the rivers thou shalt own, and thou shalt possess that wherein others are only tenants and boarders. Thou true land-lord! sea-lord! air-lord! Wherever snow falls, or water flows, or birds fly, wherever day and night meet in twilight, wherever the blue heaven is hung by clouds, or sown with stars, wherever are forms with transparent boundaries, wherever are outlets into celestial space, wherever is danger, and awe, and love, there is Beauty, plenteous as rain, shed for thee, and though thou shouldst walk the world over, thou shalt not be able to find a condition inopportune or ignoble

NAPOLEON, OR, THE MAN OF THE WORLD

AMONG the eminent persons of the nineteenth century, Bonaparte is far the best known and the most powerful, and owes his predominance to the fidelity with which he expresses the tone of thought and belief, the aims of the masses of active and cultivated men. It is Swedenborg's theory that every organ is made up of homogeneous particles, or as it is sometimes expressed, every whole is made of similars, that is, the lungs are composed of infinitely small lungs, the liver, of infinitely small livers, the kidney, of little kidneys, &c. Following this analogy, if any man is found to carry with him the power and affections of vast numbers, if Napoleon is France, if Napoleon is Europe, it is because the people whom he sways are little Napoleons.

In our society there is a standing antagonism between the conservative and the democratic classes, between those who have made their fortunes, and the young and the poor who have fortunes to make, between the interests of dead labor,—that is, the labor of hands long ago stilled in the grave, which labor is now entombed in money stocks, or in land and buildings owned by idle capitalists,—and the interests of living labor, which seeks to possess itself of land and buildings, and money stocks. The first class is timid, selfish, illiberal, hating innovation, and continually losing numbers by death. The second class is selfish also, encroaching, bold, self-relying, always outnumbering the other and recruiting its numbers every hour by births. It desires to keep open every avenue to the competition of all, and to multiply avenues, the class of business men in America, in England, in France, and throughout Europe; the class of industry and skill. Napoleon is its representative. The instinct of active, brave, able men, throughout the middle class every where, has pointed out Napoleon as the incarnate Democrat. He had their virtues and their vices, above all, he had their spirit or aim. That tendency is material, pointing at a sensual success and employing the richest and most various means to that end, conversant with mechanical powers, highly intellectual, widely and accurately learned and skilful, but subordinating all intellectual and spiritual forces into means to a material success. To be the rich man, is the end 'God has granted,' says the Koran, 'to every people a prophet in its own tongue.' Paris and London, and New York, the spirit of commerce, of money and material power, were also to have their prophet, and Bonaparte was qualified and sent.

Every one of the million readers of anecdotes or memoirs or lives of Napoleon, delights in the page, because he studies in it his own history. Napoleon is thoroughly modern, and, at the highest point of his fortunes, has the very spirit of the newspapers. He is no saint,—to use his own word, 'no capuchin,' and he is no hero, in the high sense. The man in the street finds in him the qualities and powers of other men in the street. He finds him, like himself, by birth a citizen, who, by very intelligible merits, arrived at such a commanding position that he could indulge all those tastes which the common man possesses but is obliged to conceal and deny: good society, good books, fast travelling, dress, dinners, servants without number, personal weight, the execution of his ideas, the standing in the attitude of a benefactor to all persons about him, the refined enjoyments of pictures, statues, music, palaces and conventional honors,—precisely what is agreeable to the heart of every man in the nineteenth century,—thus powerful man possessed.

It is true that a man of Napoleon's truth of adaptation to the mind of the masses around him, becomes not merely representative but actually a monopolizer and usurper of other minds. Thus Mirabeau plagiarized every good thought, every good word that was spoken in France. Dumont relates that he sat in the gallery of the Convention and heard Mirabeau make a speech. It struck Dumont that he could fit it with a peroration, which he wrote in pencil immediately, and showed it to Lord Elgin, who sat by him. Lord Elgin approved it, and Dumont, in the evening, showed it to Mirabeau. Mirabeau read it, pronounced it admirable, and declared he would incorporate it into his harangue to-morrow, to the Assembly. 'It is impossible,' said Dumont, 'as, unfortunately, I have shown it to Lord Elgin.' 'If you have shown it to Lord Elgin and to fifty persons beside, I shall still speak it to-morrow' and he did speak it, with much effect, at the next day's session. For Mirabeau, with his overpowering personality, felt that these things which his presence inspired were as much his own as if he had said them, and that his adoption of them gave them their weight. Much more absolute and centralizing was the successor to Mirabeau's popularity, and to much more than his predominance in France. Indeed, a man of Napoleon's stamp almost ceases to have a private speech and opinion. He is so largely receptive, and is so placed, that he comes to be a bureau for all the intelligence, wit and power of the age and country. He gains the battle, he makes the code, he makes the system of weights and measures, he levels the Alps, he builds the road. All distinguished engineers, savans, statistes, report to him so likewise do all good heads in every kind. He adopts the best measures, sets his stamp on them, and not these alone, but on every happy and memorable expression. Every sentence spoken by Napoleon and every line of his writing, deserves reading, as it is the sense of France.

Bonaparte was the idol of common men because he had in transcendent degree the qualities and powers of common men. There is a certain satisfaction in coming down to the lowest ground of politics, for we get rid of cant and hypocrisy. Bonaparte wrought, in common with that great class he represented, for power and wealth,—but Bonaparte, specially, without any scruple as to the means. All the sentiments which embarrass men's pursuit of these objects, he set aside. The sentiments were for women and children. Fontanes, in 1804, expressed Napoleon's own sense, when in behalf of the Senate he addressed him,—'Sire, the desire of perfection is the worst disease that ever afflicted the human mind.'

The advocates of liberty and of progress are 'ideologists',—a word of contempt often in his mouth,—'Necker is an ideologist' 'Lafayette is an ideologist'

An Italian proverb, too well known, declares that 'if you would succeed, you must not be too good' It is an advantage, within certain limits, to have renounced the dominion of the sentiments of piety, gratitude and generosity, since, what was an impassable bar to us, and still is to others, becomes a convenient weapon for our purposes, just as the river which was a formidable barrier, winter transforms into the smoothest of roads

Napoleon renounced, once for all, sentiments and affections, and would help himself with his hands and his head With him is no miracle and no magic He is a worker in brass, in iron, in wood, in earth, in roads, in buildings, in money and in troops, and a very consistent and wise master-workman He is never weak and literary, but acts with the solidity and the precision of natural agents He has not lost his native sense and sympathy with things Men give way before such a man, as before natural events To be sure there are men enough who are immersed in things, as farmers, smiths, sailors and mechanics generally, and we know how real and solid such men appear in the presence of scholars and grammarians but these men ordinarily lack the power of arrangement, and are like hands without a head But Bonaparte superadded to this mineral and animal force, insight and generalization, so that men saw in him combined the natural and the intellectual power, as if the sea and land had taken flesh and begun to cipher Therefore the land and sea seem to presuppose him He came unto his own and they received him This ciphering operative knows what he is working with and what is the product He knew the properties of gold and iron, of wheels and ships, of troops and diplomatists, and required that each should do after its kind

The art of war was the game in which he exerted his arithmetic It consisted, according to him, in having always more forces than the enemy, on the point where the enemy is attacked, or where he attacks and his whole talent is strained by endless manœuvre and evolution, to march always on the enemy at an angle, and destroy his forces in detail It is obvious that a very small force, skilfully and rapidly manœuvring so as always to bring two men against one at the point of engagement, will be an overmatch for a much larger body of men

The times, his constitution and his early circumstances combined to develop this pattern democrat He had the virtues of his class and the conditions for their activity That common-sense which no sooner respects any end than it finds the means to effect it, the delight in the use of means, in the choice, simplification and combining of means, the directness and thoroughness of his work, the prudence with which all was seen and the energy with which all was done, make him the natural organ and head of what I may almost call, from its extent, the modern party

Nature must have far the greatest share in every success, and so in his Such a man was wanted, and such a man was born, a man of stone and iron, capable of sitting on horseback sixteen or seventeen hours, of going many days together without rest or food except by snatches, and with the speed and spring of a tiger in action, a man not embarrassed by any scruples, compact, instant, selfish, prudent, and of a perception which did not suffer itself to be balked or misled by any pretences of others, or any superstition or any heat or haste of his own 'My hand of iron' he said, 'was not at the extremity of my arm, it was immediately connected with my head' He respected the power of nature and fortune, and ascribed to it his superiority, instead of valuing himself, like inferior men, on his opinionativeness, and waging war with nature His favorite rhetoric lay in allusion to his star, and he pleased himself, as well as the people, when he styled himself the 'Child of Destiny' 'They charge me,' he said, 'with the commission of great crimes men of my stamp do not commit crimes Nothing has been more simple than my elevation, 'tis in vain to ascribe it to intrigue or crime it was owing to the peculiarity of the times and to my reputation of having fought well against the enemies of my country I have always marched with the opinion of great masses and with events Of what use then would crimes be to me?' Again he said, speaking of his son, 'My son can not replace me, I could not replace myself I am the creature of circumstances.'

He had a directness of action never before combined with so much comprehension. He is a realist, terrific to all talkers and confused truth-obscuring persons. He sees where the matter hinges, throws himself on the precise point of resistance, and slights all other considerations. He is strong in the right manner, namely, by insight. He never blundered into victory, but won his battles in his head before he won them on the field. His principal means are in himself. He asks counsel of no other. In 1796 he writes to the Directory 'I have conducted the campaign without consulting any one. I should have done no good if I had been under the necessity of conforming to the notions of another person. I have gained some advantages over superior forces and when totally destitute of every thing, because, in the persuasion that your confidence was reposed in me, my actions were as prompt as my thoughts.'

History is full, down to this day, of the imbecility of kings and governors. They are a class of persons much to be pitied, for they know not what they should do. The weavers strike for bread, and the king and his ministers, knowing not what to do, meet them with bayonets. But Napoleon understood his business. Here was a man who in each moment and emergency knew what to do next. It is an immense comfort and refreshment to the spirits, not only of kings, but of citizens. Few men have any next, they live from hand to mouth, without plan, and are ever at the end of their line, and after each action wait for an impulse from abroad. Napoleon had been the first man of the world, if his ends had been purely public. As he is, he inspires confidence and vigor by the extraordinary unity of his action. He is firm, sure, self-denying, self-postponing, sacrificing every thing,—money, troops, generals, and his own safety also, to his aim, not misled, like common adventurers, by the splendor of his own means. 'Incidents ought not to govern policy,' he said, 'but policy, incidents.' 'To be hurried away by every event is to have no political system at all.' His victories were only so many doors, and he never for a moment lost sight of his way onward, in the dazzle and uproar of the present circumstance. He knew what to do, and he flew to his mark. He would shorten a straight line to come at his object. Horrible anecdotes may no doubt be collected from his history, of the price at which he bought his successes, but he must not therefore be set down as cruel, but only as one who knew no impediment to his will, not bloodthirsty, not cruel,—but woe to what thing or person stood in his way! Not bloodthirsty, but not sparing of blood,—and pitiless. He saw only the object the obstacle must give way. 'Sire, General Clarke can not combine with General Junot, for the dreadful fire of the Austrian battery'—'Let him carry the battery'—'Sire, every regiment that approaches the heavy artillery is sacrificed. Sire, what orders?'—'Forward, forward!' Seruzier, a colonel of artillery, gives, in his Military Memoirs, the following sketch of a scene after the battle of Austerlitz.—'At the moment in which the Russian army was making its retreat, painfully, but in good order, on the ice of the lake, the Emperor Napoleon came riding at full speed toward the artillery. "You are losing time," he cried, "fire upon those masses, they must be engulfed fire upon the ice!" The order remained unexecuted for ten minutes. In vain several officers and myself were placed on the slope of a hill to produce the effect their balls and mine rolled upon the ice without breaking it up. Seeing that, I tried a simple method of elevating light howitzers. The almost perpendicular fall of the heavy projectiles produced the desired effect. My method was immediately followed by the adjoining batteries, and in less than no time we buried' some 'thousands of Russians and Austrians under the waters of the lake.'

In the plenitude of his resources, every obstacle seemed to vanish. 'There shall be no Alps,' he said, and he built his perfect roads, climbing by graded galleries their steepest precipices, until Italy was as open to Paris as any town in France. He laid his bones to, and wrought for his crown. Having decided what was to be done, he did that with might and main. He put out all his strength. He risked every thing, and spared nothing, neither ammunition, nor money, nor troops, nor generals, nor himself.

We like to see every thing do its office after its kind, whether it be a mulch-cow or a rattle-snake, and if fighting be the best mode of adjusting national differences, (as large majorities of men seem to agree,) certainly Bonaparte was right in making it thorough. The grand principle of war, he said, was that an army ought always to be ready, by day and by night and at all hours, to make all the resistance it is capable of making. He never economized his ammunition, but, on a hostile position, rained a torrent of iron,—shells, balls, grapeshot,—to annihilate all defence. On any point of resistance he concentrated squadron on squadron in overwhelming numbers until it was swept out of existence. To a regiment of horse-chasseurs at Lobenstein, two days before the battle of Jena, Napoleon said, 'My lads, you must not fear death, when soldiers brave death, they drive him into the enemy's ranks.' In the fury of assault, he no more spared himself. He went to the edge of his possibility. It is plain that in Italy he did what he could, and all that he could. He came, several times, within an inch of ruin, and his own person was all but lost. He was flung into the marsh at Arcola. The Austrians were between him and his troops, in the mêlée, and he was brought off with desperate efforts. At Lonato, and at other places, he was on the point of being taken prisoner. He fought sixty battles. He had never enough. Each victory was a new weapon. 'My power would fall, were I not to support it by new achievements. Conquest has made me what I am, and conquest must maintain me.' He felt, with every wise man, that as much life is needed for conservation as for creation. We are always in peril, always in a bad plight, just on the edge of destruction and only to be saved by invention and courage.

This vigor was guarded and tempered by the coldest prudence and punctuality. A thunderbolt in the attack, he was found invulnerable in his intrenchments. His very attack was never the inspiration of courage, but the result of calculation. His idea of the best defence consists in being still the attacking party. 'My ambition,' he says, 'was great, but was of a cold nature.' In one of his conversations with Las Casas, he remarked, 'As to moral courage, I have rarely met with the two-o'clock-in-the-morning kind. I mean unprepared courage; that which is necessary on an unexpected occasion, and which, in spite of the most unforeseen events, leaves full freedom of judgment and decision' and he did not hesitate to declare that he was himself eminently endowed with this two-o'clock-in-the-morning courage, and that he had met with few persons equal to himself in this respect.

Every thing depended on the nicety of his combinations, and the stars were not more punctual than his arithmetic. His personal attention descended to the smallest particulars. 'At Montebello, I ordered Kellermann to attack with eight hundred horse, and with these he separated the six thousand Hungarian grenadiers, before the very eyes of the Austrian cavalry. This cavalry was half a league off and required a quarter of an hour to arrive on the field of action, and I have observed that it is always these quarters of an hour that decide the fate of a battle.' 'Before he fought a battle, Bonaparte thought little about what he should do in case of success, but a great deal about what he should do in case of a reverse of fortune.' The same prudence and good sense mark all his behavior. His instructions to his secretary at the Tuileries are worth remembering. 'During the night, enter my chamber as seldom as possible. Do not awake me when you have any good news to communicate, with that there is no hurry. But when you bring bad news, rouse me instantly, for then there is not a moment to be lost.' It was a whimsical economy of the same kind which dictated his practice, when general in Italy, in regard to his burdensome correspondence. He directed Bourrienne to leave all letters unopened for three weeks, and then observed with satisfaction how large a part of the correspondence had thus disposed of itself and no longer required an answer. His achievement of business was immense, and enlarges the known powers of man. There have been many working kings, from Ulysses to William of Orange, but none who accomplished a tithe of this man's performance.

To these gifts of nature, Napoleon added the advantage of having been born to a private and humble fortune. In his later days he had the weakness of wishing to add to his crowns and badges the prescription of aristocracy, but he knew his debt to his austere education, and made no secret of his contempt for the born kings, and for 'the hereditary asses,' as he coarsely styled the Bourbons. He said that 'in their exile they had learned nothing, and forgot nothing.' Bonaparte had passed through all the degrees of military service, but also was citizen before he was emperor, and so has the key to citizenship. His remarks and estimates discover the information and justness of measurement of the middle class. Those who had to deal with him found that he was not to be imposed upon, but could cipher as well as another man. This appears in all parts of his Memoirs, dictated at St. Helena. When the expenses of the empress, of his household, of his palaces, had accumulated great debts, Napoleon examined the bills of the creditors himself, detected overcharges and errors, and reduced the claims by considerable sums.

His grand weapon, namely the millions whom he directed, he owed to the representative character which clothed him. He interests us as he stands for France and for Europe, and he exists as captain and king only as far as the Revolution, or the interest of the industrious masses, found an organ and a leader in him. In the social interests, he knew the meaning and value of labor, and threw himself naturally on that side. I like an incident mentioned by one of his biographers at St. Helena. 'When walking with Mrs. Balcombe, some servants, carrying heavy boxes, passed by on the road, and Mrs. Balcombe desired them, in rather an angry tone, to keep back. Napoleon interfered, saying, "Respect the burden, Madam."' In the time of the empire he directed attention to the improvement and embellishment of the markets of the capital. 'The market-place,' he said, 'is the Louvre of the common people.' The principal works that have survived him are his magnificent roads. He filled the troops with his spirit, and a sort of freedom and companionship grew up between him and them, which the forms of his court never permitted between the officers and himself. They performed, under his eye, that which no others could do. The best document of his relation to his troops is the order of the day on the morning of the battle of Austerlitz, in which Napoleon promises the troops that he will keep his person out of reach of fire. This declaration, which is the reverse of that ordinarily made by generals and sovereigns on the eve of a battle, sufficiently explains the devotion of the army to their leader.

But though there is in particulars this identity between Napoleon and the mass of the people, his real strength lay in their conviction that he was their representative in his genius and aims, not only when he courted, but when he controlled, and even when he decimated them by his conscriptions. He knew, as well as any Jacobin in France, how to philosophize on liberty and equality, and when allusion was made to the precious blood of centuries, which was spilled by the killing of the Duc d'Enghien, he suggested, 'Neither is my blood ditch-water.' The people felt that no longer the throne was occupied and the land sucked of its nourishment, by a small class of legitimates, secluded from all community with the children of the soil, and holding the ideas and superstitions of a long-forgotten state of society. Instead of that vampire, a man of themselves held, in the Tuileries, knowledge and ideas like their own, opening of course to them and their children all places of power and trust. The day of sleepy, selfish policy, ever narrowing the means and opportunities of young men, was ended, and a day of expansion and demand was come. A market for all the powers and productions of man was opened, brilliant prizes glittered in the eyes of youth and talent. The old, iron-bound, feudal France was changed into a young Ohio or New York, and those who smarted under the immediate rigors of the new monarch, pardoned them as the necessary severities of the military system which had driven out the oppressor. And even when the majority of the people had begun to ask whether they had really gained any thing under the exhausting levies of men and money of the new master, the whole talent of the country, in every rank and kindred, took his part and defended him as its natural patron. In 1814, when advised to rely on the higher classes, Napoleon said to those around him, 'Gentlemen, in the situation in which I stand, my only nobility is the rabble of the Faubourgs.'

Napoleon met this natural expectation.

The necessity of his position required a hospitality to every sort of talent, and its appointment to trusts, and his feeling went along with this policy. Like every superior person, he undoubtedly felt a desire for men and compeers, and a wish to measure his power with other masters, and an impatience of fools and underlings. In Italy, he sought for men and found none. 'Good God!' he said, 'how rare men are! There are eighteen millions in Italy, and I have with difficulty found two,—Dandolo and Melzi.' In later years, with larger experience, his respect for mankind was not increased. In a moment of bitterness, he said to one of his oldest friends, 'Men deserve the contempt with which they inspire me. I have only to put some gold-lace on the coat of my virtuous republicans, and they immediately become just what I wish them.' This impatience at levity was, however, an oblique tribute of respect to those able persons who commanded his regard not only when he found them friends and coadjutors but also when they resisted his will. He could not confound Fox and Pitt, Carnot, Lafayette and Bernadotte, with the dangles of his court, and in spite of the detraction which his systematic egotism dictated toward the great captains who conquered with and for him, ample acknowledgments are made by him to Lannes, Duroc, Kleber, Dessaix, Massena, Murat, Ney, and Augereau. If he felt himself their patron and the founder of their fortunes, as when he said, 'I made my generals out of mud,'—he could not hide his satisfaction in receiving from them a seconding and support commensurate with the grandeur of his enterprise. In the Russian campaign he was so much impressed by the courage and resources of Marshal Ney, that he said, 'I have two hundred millions in my coffers, and I would give them all for Ney.' The characters which he has drawn of several of his marshals are discriminating, and though they did not content the insatiable vanity of French officers, are no doubt substantially just. And in fact every species of merit was sought and advanced under his government. 'I know,' he said, 'the depth and draught of water of every one of my generals.' Natural power was sure to be well received at his court. Seventeen men in his time were raised from common soldiers to the rank of king, marshal, duke, or general, and the crosses of his Legion of Honor were given to personal valor, and not to family connexion. 'When soldiers have been baptized in the fire of a battle-field, they have all one rank in my eyes.'

When a natural king becomes a titular king, every body is pleased and satisfied. The Revolution entitled the strong populace of the Faubourg St. Antoine, and every horse-boy and powder-monkey in the army, to look on Napoleon as flesh of his flesh and the creature of his party; but there is something in the success of grand talent which enlists an universal sympathy. For in the prevalence of sense and spirit over stupidity and malversation, all reasonable men have an interest, and as intellectual beings, we feel the air purified by the electric shock, when material force is overthrown by intellectual energies. As soon as we are removed out of the reach of local and accidental partialities, man feels that Napoleon fights for him, these are honest victories, this strong steam-engine does our work. Whatever appeals to the imagination, by transcending the ordinary limits of human ability, wonderfully encourages and liberates us. This capacious head, revolving and disposing sovereignly trains of affairs, and animating such multitudes of agents, this eye, which looked through Europe, this prompt invention, this inexhaustible resource—what events! what romantic pictures! what strange situations!—when spying the Alps, by a sunset in the Sicilian sea, drawing up his army for battle in sight of the Pyramids, and saying to his troops, 'From the tops of those pyramids, forty centuries look down on you', fording the Red Sea, wading in the gulf of the Isthmus of Suez. On the shore of Ptolemais, gigantic projects agitated him. 'Had Acre fallen, I should have changed the face of the world.' His army, on the night of the battle of Austerlitz, which was the anniversary of his inauguration as Emperor, presented him with a bouquet of forty standards taken in the fight. Perhaps it is a little puerile, the pleasure he took in making these contrasts glaring, as when he pleased himself with making kings wait in his antechambers, at Tilsit, at Paris and at Erfurt.

We cannot, in the universal imbecility, indecision, and indolence of men, sufficiently congratulate ourselves on this strong and ready actor, who took occasion by the beard, and showed us how much may be accomplished by the mere force of such virtues as all men possess in less degrees, namely, by punctuality, by personal attention, by courage, and thoroughness 'The Austrians,' he said, 'do not know the value of time' I should cite him, in his earlier years, as a model of prudence His power does not consist in any wild or extravagant force, in any enthusiasm like Mahomet's, or singular power of persuasion, but in the exercise of common-sense on each emergency, instead of abiding by rules and customs The lesson he teaches is that which vigor always teaches,—that there is always room for it To what heaps of cowardly doubts is not that man's life an answer When he appeared it was the belief of all military men that there could be nothing new in war, as it is the belief of men to-day that nothing new can be undertaken in politics, or in church, or in letters, or in trade, or in farming, or in our social manners and customs, and as it is at all times the belief of society that the world is used up But Bonaparte knew better than society, and moreover knew that he knew better I think all men know better than they do, know that the institutions we so volubly commend are go-carts and baubles, but they dare not trust their presentiments Bonaparte relied on his own sense, and did not care a bean for other people's The world treated his novelties just as it treats everybody's novelties,—made infinite objection, mustered all the impediments, but he snapped his finger at their objections 'What creates great difficulty,' he remarks, 'in the profession of the land-commander, is the necessity of feeding so many men and animals If he allows himself to be guided by the commissaries, he will never stir, and all his expeditions will fail' An example of his common-sense is what he says of the passage of the Alps in winter, which all writers, one repeating after the other, had described as impracticable 'The winter,' says Napoleon, 'is not the most unfavorable season for the passage of lofty mountains The snow is then firm, the weather settled, and there is nothing to fear from avalanches, the real and only danger to be apprehended in the Alps. On those high mountains, there are often very fine days in December, of a dry cold, with extreme calmness in the air.' Read his account, too, of the way in which battles are gained 'In all battles, a moment occurs when the bravest troops, after having made the greatest efforts, feel inclined to run. That terror proceeds from a want of confidence in their own courage, and it only requires a slight opportunity, a pretence, to restore confidence to them The art is, to give rise to the opportunity and to invent the pretence At Arcola I won the battle with twenty-five horsemen I seized that moment of lassitude, gave every man a trumpet, and gained the day with this handful You see that two armies are two bodies which meet and endeavor to frighten each other, a moment of panic occurs, and that moment must be turned to advantage. When a man has been present in many actions, he distinguishes that moment without difficulty it is as easy as casting up an addition'

This deputy of the nineteenth century added to his gifts a capacity for speculation on general topics He delighted in running through the range of practical, of literary, and of abstract questions His opinion is always original, and to the purpose On the voyage to Egypt, he liked, after dinner, to fix on three or four persons to support a proposition, and as many to oppose it He gave a subject, and the discussions turned on questions of religion, the different kinds of government and the art of war One day he asked whether the planets were inhabited? On another, what was the age of the world? Then he proposed to consider the probability of the destruction of the globe, either by water or by fire at another time, the truth or fallacy of presentiments, and the interpretation of dreams He was very fond of talking of religion In 1806 he conversed with Fournier, bishop of Montpellier, on matters of theology There were two points on which they could not agree, viz that of hell, and that of salvation out of the pale of the church The Emperor told Josephine that he disputed like a devil on these two points, on which the bishop was inexorable To the philosophers he readily yielded all that was proved against religion as the work of men and time, but he would not hear of materialism. One fine night, on deck, amid a clatter of materialism, Bonaparte pointed to the stars, and said, 'You may talk as long as you please, gentlemen, but who made all that?' He delighted in the conversation of men of science, particularly of Monge and Berthollet, but the men of letters he slighted, they were 'manufacturers of phrases.' Of medicine too he was fond of talking, and with those of its practitioners whom he most esteemed,—with Corvisart at Paris, and with Antonomarchi at St Helena 'Believe me,' he said to the last, 'we had better leave off all these remedies: life is a fortress which neither you nor I know anything about. Why throw obstacles in the way of its defence? Its own means are superior to all the apparatus of your laboratories. Corvisart candidly agreed with me that all your filthy mixtures are good for nothing. Medicine is a collection of uncertain prescriptions, the results of which, taken collectively, are more fatal than useful to mankind. Water, air and cleanliness are the chief articles in my pharmacopœia.'

His memoirs, dictated to Count Montholon and General Gourgaud at St Helena, have great value, after all the deduction that it seems to be made from them on account of his known disingenuousness. He has the good-nature of strength and conscious superiority. I admire his simple, clear narrative of his battles,—good as Caesar's, his good-natured and sufficiently respectful account of Marshal Wurmser and his other antagonists, and his own equality as a writer to his varying subject. The most agreeable portion is the Campaign in Egypt.

He had hours of thought and wisdom. In intervals of leisure, either in the camp or the palace, Napoleon appears as a man of genius directing on abstract questions the native appetite for truth and the impatience of words he was wont to show in war. He could enjoy every play of invention, a romance, a bon mot, as well as a stratagem in a campaign. He delighted to fascinate Josephine and her ladies, in a dim-lighted apartment, by the terrors of a fiction to which his voice and dramatic power lent every addition.

I call Napoleon the agent or attorney of the middle class of modern society, of the throng who fill the markets, shops, counting-houses, manufactories, ships, of the modern world, aiming to be rich. He was the agitator, the destroyer of prescription, the internal improver, the liberal, the radical, the inventor of means, the opener of doors and markets, the subverter of monopoly and abuse. Of course the rich and aristocratic did not like him. England, the centre of capital, and Rome and Austria, centres of tradition and genealogy, opposed him. The consternation of the dull and conservative classes, the terror of the foolish old men and old women of the Roman conclave, who in their despair took hold of any thing, and would cling to red-hot iron,—the vain attempts of statistes to amuse and deceive him, of the emperor of Austria to bribe him, and the instinct of the young, ardent, and active men every where, which pointed him out as the giant of the middle class, make his history bright and commanding. He had the virtues of the masses of his constituents: he had also their vices. I am sorry that the brilliant picture has its reverse. But that is the fatal quality which we discover in our pursuit of wealth, that it is treacherous, and is bought by the breaking or weakening of the sentiments, and it is inevitable that we should find the same fact in the history of this champion, who proposed to himself simply a brilliant career, without any stipulation or scruple concerning the means.

Bonaparte was singularly destitute of generous sentiments. The highest-placed individual in the most cultivated age and population of the world,—he has not the merit of common truth and honesty. He is unjust to his generals, egotistic and monopolizing, meanly stealing the credit of their great actions from Kellermann, from Bernadotte, intriguing to involve his faithful Junot in hopeless bankruptcy, in order to drive him to a distance from Paris, because the familiarity of his manners offends the new pride of his throne. He is a boundless liar. The official paper, his Momteur, and all his bulletins, are proverbs for saying what he wished to be believed, and worse,—he sat, in his premature old age, in his lonely island, coldly falsifying facts and dates and characters, and giving to history a theatrical éclat. Like all Frenchmen he has a passion for stage effect Every action that breathes of generosity is poisoned by this calculation His star, his love of glory, his doctrine of the immortality of the soul, are all French 'I must dazzle and astonish If I were to give the liberty of the press, my power could not last three days' To make a great noise is his favorite design. 'A great reputation is a great noise the more there is made, the farther off it is heard Laws, institutions, monuments, nations, all fall, but the noise continues, and resounds in after ages' His doctrine of immortality is simply fame His theory of influence is not flattering 'There are two levers for moving men,—interest and fear Love is a silly infatuation, depend upon it Friendship is but a name I love nobody I do not even love my brothers perhaps Joseph a little, from habit, and because he is my elder; and Duroc, I love him too, but why?—because his character pleases me he is stern and resolute, and I believe the fellow never shed a tear For my part I know very well that I have no true friends As long as I continue to be what I am, I may have as many pretended friends as I please Leave sensibility to women; but men should be firm in heart and purpose, or they should have nothing to do with war and government' He was thoroughly unscrupulous He would steal, slander, assassinate, drown and poison, as his interest dictated. He had no generosity, but mere vulgar hatred, he was intensely selfish, he was perfidious, he cheated at cards, he was a prodigious gossip, and opened letters, and delighted in his infamous police, and rubbed his hands with joy when he had intercepted some morsel of intelligence concerning the men and women about him, boasting that 'he knew every thing', and interfered with the cutting the dresses of the women, and listened after the hurrahs and the compliments of the street, incognito. His manners were coarse He treated women with low familiarity He had the habit of pulling their ears and pinching their cheeks when he was in good humor, and of pulling the ears and whiskers of men, and of striking and horse-play with them, to his last days It does not appear that he listened at key-holes, or at least that he was caught at it. In short, when you have penetrated through all the circles of power and splendor, you were not dealing with a gentleman, at last, but with an impostor and a rogue; and he fully deserves the epithet of Jupiter Scapin, or a sort of Scamp Jupiter.

In describing the two parties into which modern society divides itself,—the democrat and the conservative,—I said, Bonaparte represents the democrat, or the party of men of business, against the stationary or conservative party. I omitted then to say, what is material to the statement, namely that these two parties differ only as young and old The democrat is a young conservative, the conservative is an old democrat The aristocrat is the democrat ripe and gone to seed,—because both parties stand on the one ground of the supreme value of property, which one endeavors to get, and the other to keep. Bonaparte may be said to represent the whole history of this party, its youth and its age, yes, and with poetic justice, its fate, in his own The counter-revolution, the counter-party, still waits for its organ and representative, in a lover and a man of truly public and universal aims.

Here was an experiment, under the most favorable conditions, of the powers of intellect without conscience Never was such a leader so endowed and so weaponed, never leader found such aids and followers. And what was the result of this vast talent and power, of these immense armies, burned cities, squandered treasures, immolated millions of men, of this demoralized Europe? It came to no result. All passed away like the smoke of his artillery, and left no trace. He left France smaller, poorer, feebler, than he found it, and the whole contest for freedom was to be begun again The attempt was in principle suicidal France served him with life and limb and estate, as long as it could identify its interest with him, but when men saw that after victory was another war, after the destruction of armies, new conscriptions; and they who had toiled so desperately were never nearer to the reward,—they could not spend what they had earned, nor repose on their down-beds, nor strut in their chateaux,—they deserted him Men found that his absorbing egotism was deadly to all other men. It resembled the torpedo, which inflicts a succession of shocks on any one who takes hold of it, producing spasms which contract the muscles of the hand, so that the man can not open his fingers, and the animal inflicts new and more violent shocks, until he paralyzes and kills his victim. So this exorbitant egotist narrowed, impoverished, and absorbed the power and existence of those who served him, and the universal cry of France and of Europe in 1814 was, 'Enough of him', 'Assez de Bonaparte.'

It was not Bonaparte's fault. He did all that in him lay to live and thrive without moral principle. It was the nature of things, the eternal law of man and of the world, which balked and ruined him, and the result, in a million experiments, will be the same. Every experiment, by multitudes or by individuals, that has a sensual and selfish aim, will fail. The pacific Fourier will be as inefficient as the pernicious Napoleon. As long as our civilization is essentially one of property, of fences, of exclusiveness, it will be mocked by delusions. Our riches will leave us sick, there will be bitterness in our laughter, and our wine will burn our mouth. Only that good profits which we can taste with all doors open, and which serves all men.

GOOD-BYE

GOOD-BYE, proud world! I'm going home
Thou art not my friend, and I'm not thine Long through thy weary crowds I roam,
A river-ark on the ocean brine,
Long I've been tossed like the driven foam,
But now, proud world! I'm going home

Good-bye to Flattery's fawning face,
To Grandeur with his wise grimace,
To upstart Wealth's averted eye,
To supple Office, low and high, 10
To crowded halls, to court and street,
To frozen hearts and hasting feet,
To those who go, and those who come,
Good-bye, proud world! I'm going home.

I am going to my own hearth-stone, Bosomed in yon green hills alone,—
A secret nook in a pleasant land,
Whose groves the frolic fairies planned;

Where arches green, the livelong day,
Echo the blackbird's roundelay, 20
And vulgar feet have never trod
A spot that is sacred to thought and God.

O, when I am safe in my sylvan home,
I tread on the pride of Greece and Rome;
And when I am stretched beneath the pines,

10 Where the evening star so holy shines,
I laugh at the lore and the pride of man,
At the sophist schools and the learned clan;
For what are they all, in their high conceit, When man in the bush with God may meet? 30

EACH AND ALL<sup>1</sup>

20 LITTLE thinks, in the field, yon red-cloaked clown

Of thee from the hill-top looking down,
The heifer that lows in the upland farm,
Far-heard, lows not thine ear to charm,
The sexton, tolling his bell at noon,
Deems not that great Napoleon
Stops his horse, and lists with delight, Whilst his files sweep round yon Alpine height, 30

Nor knowest thou what argument
Thy life to thy neighbor's creed has lent 10
All are needed by each one,
Nothing is fair or good alone
I thought the sparrow's note from heaven, Singing at dawn on the alder bough,
I brought him home, in his nest, at even,
He sings the song, but it cheers not now,
For I did not bring home the river and sky,—

He sang to my ear,—they sang to my eye.
The delicate shells lay on the shore,
The bubbles of the latest wave 20 Fresh pearls to their enamel gave,
And the bellowing of the savage sea Greeted their safe escape to me.

<sup>1</sup> In his journal for 16 May 1834, Emerson wrote 'I remember when I was a boy going upon the beach and being charmed with the colors and forms of the shells. I picked up many and put them in my pocket. When I got home I could find nothing that I gathered—nothing but some dry, ugly mussel and snail shells. Thence I learned that composition was more important than the beauty of individual forms to effect.' Emerson and Forbes, eds, Journals of Ralph Waldo Emerson (Boston, 1909), III, 298

I wiped away the weeds and foam,
 I fished my sea-born treasures home,
 But the poor, unsightly, noisome things
 Had left their beauty on the shore With the sun and the sand and the wild uproar
 The lover watched his graceful maid,
 As 'mid the virgin train she strayed, 30
 Nor knew her beauty's best attire
 Was woven still by the snow-white choir
 At last she came to his hermitage, Like the bird from the woodlands to the cage,—
 The gay enchantment was undone,
 A gentle wife, but fairy none
 Then I said, 'I covet truth, Beauty is unripe childhood's cheat, I leave it behind with the games of youth '—
 As I spoke, beneath my feet 40
 The ground-pine curled its pretty wreath,
 Running over the club-moss burrs,
 I inhaled the violet's breath,
 Around me stood the oaks and firs,
 Pine-cones and acorns lay on the ground,
 Over me soared the eternal sky,
 Full of light and of deity,
 Again I saw, again I heard,
 The rolling river, the morning bird,— Beauty through my senses stole, 50
 I yielded myself to the perfect whole

THE PROBLEM <sup>1</sup>

I LIKE a church, I like a cowl,
 I love a prophet of the soul,
 And on my heart monastic aisles
 Fall like sweet strains, or pensive smiles, Yet not for all his faith can see Would I that cowl'd churchman be <sup>1</sup> In his journal for 28 August 1838, Emerson wrote 'It is very grateful to my feelings to go into a Roman cathedral, yet I look as my countrymen do at the Roman priesthood. It is very grateful to me to go into an English church and hear the liturgy read. Yet nothing would induce me to be the English priest. I find an unpleasant dilemma in this nearer home. I dislike to be a clergyman and refuse to be one. Yet how rich a music would be to me a holy clergyman in my town. It seems to me he cannot be a man, quite and whole, yet how plain is the need of one, and how high, yes, highest, is the function. Here is a division of labor that I like not. A man must sacrifice his manhood for the social good. Something is wrong, I see not what.' Ibid., V, 29-30

Why should the vest on him allure,
 Which I could not on me endure?
 Not from a vain or shallow thought His awful Jove young Phidias brought, 10
 Never from lips of cunning fell
 The thrilling Delphic oracle,
 Out from the heart of nature rolled
 The burdens of the Bible old,
 The litanies of nations came,
 Like the volcano's tongue of flame,
 Up from the burning core below,—
 The canticles of love and woe
 The hand that rounded Peter's dome
 And groined the aisles of Christian Rome Wrought in a sad sincerity, 21
 Himself from God he could not free,
 He builded better than he knew,—
 The conscious stone to beauty grew

Know'st thou what wove yon woodbird's nest
 Of leaves, and feathers from her breast?
 Or how the fish outbuilt her shell,
 Painting with morn each annual cell?
 Or how the sacred pine-tree adds 30
 To her old leaves new myriads?
 Such and so grew these holy piles,
 Whilst love and terror laid the tiles
 Earth proudly wears the Parthenon,
 As the best gem upon her zone,
 And Morning opes with haste her lids
 To gaze upon the Pyramids, O'er England's abbey bends the sky,
 As on its friends, with kindred eye,
 For out of Thought's interior sphere
 These wonders rose to upper air, 40
 And Nature gladly gave them place, Adopted them into her race,
 And granted them an equal date
 With Andes and with Ararat

These temples grew as grows the grass;
 Art might obey, but not surpass
 The passive Master lent his hand
 To the vast soul that o'er him planned,
 And the same power that reared the shrine Bestrode the tribes that knelt within 50
 Ever the fiery Pentecost Girds with one flame the countless host, Trances the heart through chanting choirs,
 And through the priest the mind inspires
 The word unto the prophet spoken
 Was writ on tables yet unbroken,

The word by seers or sibyls told,
 In groves of oak, or fanes of gold,
 Still floats upon the morning wind,
 Still whispers to the willing mind 60
 One accent of the Holy Ghost
 The heedless world hath never lost.

I know what say the fathers wise,—
 The Book itself before me lies,
 Old Chrysostom, best Augustine,
 And he who blent both in his line,
 The younger Golden Lips or mines,
 Taylor, the Shakspeare of divines,
 His words are music in my ear,
 I see his cowl'd portrait dear, 70
 And yet, for all his faith could see,
 I would not the good bishop be.

URIEL

It fell in the ancient periods
 Which the brooding soul surveys,
 Or ever the wild Time coined itself Into calendar months and days

This was the lapse of Uriel,
 Which in Paradise befell
 Once, among the Pleiads walking,
 Seyd<sup>1</sup> overheard the young gods talking,
 And the treason, too long pent,
 To his ears was evident 10
 The young deities discussed Laws of form, and metre just,
 Orb, quintessence, and sunbeams,
 What subsisteth, and what seems.
 One, with low tones that decide,
 And doubt and reverend use defied,
 With a look that solved the sphere,
 And stur'd the devils everywhere,
 Gave his sentiment divine Against the being of a line 20
 'Line in nature is not found,
 Unit and universe are round,
 In vain produced, all rays return,
 Evil will bless, and ice will burn'
 As Uriel spoke with piercing eye,
 A shudder ran around the sky,
 The stern old war-gods shook their heads,
 The seraphs frowned from myrtle-beds,

<sup>1</sup> 'Seyd' and 'Saadi' are Emerson's names for the ideal poet Saadi (1184–1291), a Persian, was one of the first of the Oriental poets with whose translated works Emerson became familiar

Seemed to the holy festival
 The rash word boded ill to all, 30
 The balance-beam of Fate was bent,
 The bounds of good and ill were rent,
 Strong Hades could not keep his own,
 But all slid to confusion

A sad self-knowledge, withering, fell On the beauty of Uriel,
 In heaven once eminent, the god
 Withdrew, that hour, into his cloud, Whether doomed to long gyration
 In the sea of generation, 40
 Or by knowledge grown too bright
 To hit the nerve of feebler sight Straightway, a forgetting wind Stole over the celestial kind,
 And their lips the secret kept,
 If in ashes the fire-seed slept
 But now and then, truth-speaking things Shamed the angels' veiling wings,
 And, shrilling from the solar course,
 Or from fruit of chemic force, 50
 Procession of a soul in matter,
 Or the speeding change of water,
 Or out of the good of evil born,
 Came Uriel's voice of cherub scorn,
 And a blush tinged the upper sky,
 And the gods shook, they knew not why

THE SPHINX<sup>2</sup>

THE Sphinx is drowsy,
 Her wings are furled
 Her ear is heavy,
 She broods on the world
 'Who'll tell me my secret,
 The ages have kept?—
 I awaited the seer
 While they slumbered and slept.—

'The fate of the man-child,
 The meaning of man, 10
 Known fruit of the unknown, Dædalian plan,

<sup>2</sup> In his journal for 1859, Emerson wrote 'I have often been asked the meaning of the "Sphinx" It is this,—The perception of identity unites all things and explains one by another, and the most rare and strange is equally facile as the most common But if the mind live only in particulars, and see only differences (wanting the power to see the whole—all in each), then the world addresses to this mind a question it cannot answer, and each new fact tears it in pieces, and it is vanquished by the distracting variety' Edward Emerson, ed., Poems by Ralph Waldo Emerson (Boston, 1904), 412

Out of sleeping a waking,
 Out of waking a sleep,
 Life death overtaking,
 Deep underneath deep?

'Erect as a sunbeam, Upspringeth the palm,
 The elephant browses, Undaunted and calm,
 In beautiful motion
 The thrush plies his wings,
 Kind leaves of his covert,
 Your silence he sings

'The waves, unashamed,
 In difference sweet,
 Play glad with the breezes,
 Old playfellows meet,
 The journeying atoms, Primordial wholes,
 Firmly draw, firmly drive,
 By their animate poles

'Sea, earth, air, sound, silence, Plant, quadruped, bird,
 By one music enchanted,
 One deity stirred,—
 Each the other adorning, Accompany still,
 Night veileth the morning,
 The vapor the hill

'The babe by its mother Lies bathed in joy, Glide its hours uncounted,—
 The sun is its toy, Shines the peace of all being,
 Without cloud, in its eyes,
 And the sum of the world In soft miniature lies

'But man crouches and blushes,
 Absconds and conceals,
 He creepeth and peepeth,
 He palters and steals,
 Infirm, melancholy,
 Jealous glancing around,
 An oaf, an accomplice,
 He poisons the ground

'Out spoke the great mother, Beholding his fear,—
 At the sound of her accents Cold shuddered the sphere —

"Who has drugged my boy's cup?
 Who has mixed my boy's bread?
 Who, with sadness and madness,
 Has turned my child's head?"

I heard a poet answer Aloud and cheerfully,
 'Say on, sweet Sphinx! thy dirges Are pleasant songs to me.
 Deep love lieth under These pictures of time,
 They fade in the light of Their meaning sublime.

'The fiend that man harries Is love of the Best,
 Yawns the pit of the Dragon,
 Lit by rays from the Blest.
 The Lethe of Nature
 Can't trance him again,
 Whose soul sees the perfect,
 Which his eyes seek in vain.

'To vision profounder, Man's spirit must dive,
 His aye-rolling orb
 At no goal will arrive,
 The heavens that now draw him
 With sweetness untold,
 Once found,—for new heavens
 He spurneth the old

'Pride ruined the angels,
 Their shame them restores,
 Lurks the joy that is sweetest
 In stings of remorse
 Have I a lover
 Who is noble and free?—
 I would he were nobler
 Than to love me

'Eterne alternation
 Now follows, now flies,
 And under pain, pleasure,— Under pleasure, pain lies Love works at the centre,
 Heart-heaving away, Forth speed the strong pulses
 To the borders of day.

'Dull Sphinx, Jove keep thy five wits;
 Thy sight is growing blear, Rue, myrrh and cummin for the Sphinx,
 Her muddy eyes to clear!

The old Sphinx bit her thick lip,—
 Said, 'Who taught thee me to name?' 110
 I am thy spirit, yoke-fellow,
 Of thine eye I am eyebeam

'Thou art the unanswered question; Couldst see thy proper eye,
 Always it asketh, asketh,
 And each answer is a lie
 So take thy quest through nature,
 It through thousand natures ply,
 Ask on, thou clothed eternity,
 Time is the false reply ' 120

Uprose the merry Sphinx,
 And crouched no more in stone;
 She melted into purple cloud,
 She silvered in the moon,
 She spired into a yellow flame,
 She flowered in blossoms red,
 She flowed into a foaming wave
 She stood Monadnoc's head

Thorough a thousand voices Spoke the universal dame, 130
 'Who telleth one of my meanings Is master of all I am ' 1847

MITHRIDATES

I CANNOT spare water or wine,
 Tobacco-leaf, or poppy, or rose,
 From the earth-poles to the Line,
 All between that works or grows,
 Every thing is kin of mine

Give me agates for my meat,
 Give me cantharids to eat,
 From air and ocean bring me foods,
 From all zones and altitudes,—

From all natures, sharp and slimy, 10
 Salt and basalt, wild and tame Tree and lichen, ape, sea-lion, Bird, and reptile, be my game

Ivy for my fillet band,
 Blinding dog-wood in my hand,
 Hemlock for my sherbet cull me,
 And the prussic juice to lull me,
 Swing me in the upas boughs, Vampyre-fanned, when I carouse

Too long shut in strait and few, 20
 Thinly dieted on dew,

I will use the world, and sift it,
 To a thousand humors shift it,
 As you spin a cherry
 O doleful ghosts, and goblins merry!
 O all you virtues, methods, mights,
 Means, appliances, delights,
 Reputed wrongs and braggart rights,
 Smug routine, and things allowed,
 Minorities, things under cloud! 30
 Hither! take me, use me, fill me, Vein and artery, though ye kill me!

DESTINY

THAT you are fair or wise is vain,
 Or strong, or rich, or generous,
 You must add the untaught strain
 That sheds beauty on the rose
 There's a melody born of melody,
 Which melts the world into a sea
 Toil could never compass it,
 Art its height could never hit,
 It came never out of wit,
 But a music music-born 10
 Well may Jove and Juno scorn.
 Thy beauty, if it lack the fire Which drives me mad with sweet desire,
 What boots it? What the soldier's mail,
 Unless he conquer and prevail?
 What all the goods thy pride which lift,
 If thou pine for another's gift?
 Alas! that one is born in blight,
 Victim of perpetual slight
 When thou lookest on his face, 20
 Thy heart saith, 'Brother, go thy ways!
 None shall ask thee what thou doest,
 Or care a rush for what thou knowest,
 Or listen when thou repliest,
 Or remember where thou liest,
 Or how thy supper is sodden,'
 And another is born
 To make the sun forgotten
 Surely he carries a talisman
 Under his tongue, 30
 Broad his shoulders are and strong;
 And his eye is scornful, Threatening and young
 I hold it of little matter Whether your jewel be of pure water,
 A rose diamond or a white,
 But whether it dazzle me with light.
 I care not how you are dressed,
 In coarsest weeds or in the best,

Nor whether your name is base or brave. 40
 Nor for the fashion of your behavior,
 But whether you charm me,
 Bid my bread feed and my fire warm me
 And dress up Nature in your favor.
 One thing is forever good,
 That one thing is Success,— Dear to the Eumenides,
 And to all the heavenly brood.
 Who bides at home, nor looks abroad, 49
 Carries the eagles, and masters the sword

BULKELEY, Hunt, Willard, Hosmer, Meriam, Flint,
 Possessed the land which rendered to their toil
 Hay, corn, roots, hemp, flax, apples, wool, and wood
 Each of these landlords walked amidst his farm, Saying, 'Tis mine, my children's and my name's
 How sweet the west wind sounds in my own trees!
 How graceful climb those shadows on my hill!
 I fancy these pure waters and the flags
 Know me, as does my dog we sympathize,
 And, I affirm, my actions smack of the soil '

 Where are these men? Asleep beneath their grounds 11
 And strangers, fond as they, their furrows plough Earth laughs in flowers, to see her boastful boys Earth-proud, proud of the earth which is not theirs,
 Who steer the plough, but cannot steer their feet
 Clear of the grave
 They added ridge to valley, brook to pond,
 And sighed for all that bounded their domain,

1 'Hamatreya' is an adaptation of a passage from the Vishnu Purana, oldest of the sacred scriptures of Vishnu, which Emerson copied into his journal for 1845. The passage ends 'These were the verses, Maitreya, which Earth recited and by listening to which ambition fades away like snow before the wind.' Emerson and Forbes, eds., Journals of Ralph Waldo Emerson (Boston, 1909), VII, 127-30. The title is a variation of 'Maitreya.'

'This suits me for a pasture; that's my park,
 We must have clay, lime, gravel, granite-ledge, 20
 And misty lowland, where to go for peat
 The land is well,—lies fairly to the south
 'Tis good, when you have crossed the sea and back,
 To find the sitfast acres where you left them '
 Ah! the hot owner sees not Death, who adds
 Him to his land, a lump of mould the more.
 Hear what the Earth says —

Earth-Song

'Mine and yours,
 Mine, not yours
 Earth endures, 30 Stars abide—Shine down in the old sea,
 Old are the shores,
 But where are old men?
 I who have seen much,
 Such have I never seen

'The lawyer's deed
 Ran sure,
 In tail,
 To them and to their heirs 40
 Who shall succeed,
 Without fail,
 Forevermore

'Here is the land,
 Shaggy with wood,
 With its old valley,
 Mound and flood
 But the heritors?—
 Fled like the flood's foam
 The lawyer, and the laws, 50
 And the kingdom,
 Clean swept herefrom

'They called me theirs,
 Who so controlled me,
 Yet every one
 Wished to stay, and is gone,
 How am I theirs,
 If they cannot hold me,
 But I hold them?'

When I heard the Earth-song 60
 I was no longer brave,
 My avarice cooled
 Like lust in the chill of the grave

THE RHODORA

ON BEING ASKED, WHENCE IS THE FLOWER?

IN May, when sea-winds pierced our solitudes,
I found the fresh Rhodora in the woods, Spreading its leafless blooms in a damp nook,
To please the desert and the sluggish brook
The purple petals, fallen in the pool,
Made the black water with their beauty gay; Here might the red-bird come his plumes to cool,
And court the flower that cheapens his array Rhodora! if the sages ask thee why
This charm is wasted on the earth and sky, 10 Tell them, dear, that if eyes were made for seeing,
Then Beauty is its own excuse for being Why thou wert there, O rival of the rose!
I never thought to ask, I never knew
But, in my simple ignorance, suppose The self-same Power that brought me there brought you

THE HUMBLE-BEE<sup>1</sup>

BURLY, dozing humble-bee,
Where thou art is clime for me.
Let them sail for Porto Rique, Far-off heats through seas to seek,
I will follow thee alone,
Thou animated torrid-zone!
Zigzag steerer, desert cheerer,
Let me chase thy waving lines,
Keep me nearer, me thy hearer,
Singing over shrubs and vines 10

Insect lover of the sun,
Joy of thy dominion!
Sailor of the atmosphere;
Swimmer through the waves of air, Voyager of light and noon,
Epicurean of June,
Wait, I prithee, till I come Within earshot of thy hum,—
All without is martyrdom

<sup>1</sup> Emerson wrote in his journal for 9 May 1827 'Yesterday in the woods I followed the fine humble-bee with rhymes and fancies fine' On the next page he wrote 'The humble-bee and pine-warbler seem to me the proper objects of attention in these disastrous times.' Edward Emerson, ed., Poems by Ralph Waldo Emerson (Boston, 1904), 418

When the south wind, in May days, 20
With a net of shining haze Silters the horizon wall,
And with softness touching all,
Tints the human countenance
With the color of romance,
And infusing subtle heats, Turns the sod to violets,
Thou, in sunny solitudes,
Rover of the underwoods,
The green silence dost displace 30
With thy mellow, breezy bass

Hot midsummer's petted crone, Sweet to me thy drowsy tone
Tells of countless sunny hours,
Long days, and solid banks of flowers,
Of gulfs of sweetness without bound In Indian wildernesses found,
Of Syrian peace, immortal leisure, Firmest cheer, and bird-like pleasure

Aught unsavory or unclean 40
Hath my insect never seen,
But violets and bilberry bells,
Maple-sap and daffodils,
Grass with green flag half-mast high,
Succory to match the sky,
Columbine with horn of honey,
Scented fern, and agrimony, Clover, catchfly, adder's-tongue
And brier-roses, dwelt among,
All beside was unknown waste, 50
All was picture as he passed

Wiser far than human seer, Yellow-breeched philosopher!
Seeing only what is fair,
Sipping only what is sweet,
Thou dost mock at fate and care,
Leave the chaff and take the wheat
When the fierce northwestern blast Cools sea and lands so far and fast, Thou already slumberest deep, 60
Woe and want thou canst outsleep, Want and woe, which torture us,
Thy sleep makes ridiculous

THE SNOW-STORM<sup>2</sup>

ANNOUNCED by all the trumpets of the sky, Arrives the snow, and, driving o'er the fields,

Seems nowhere to alight the whited air Hides hills and woods, the river, and the heaven,
 And veils the farm-house at the garden's end.
 The sled and traveller stopped, the courier's feet Delayed, all friends shut out, the housemates sit Around the radiant fireplace, enclosed
 In a tumultuous privacy of storm

Come see the north wind's masonry. 10
 Out of an unseen quarry evermore
 Furnished with tile, the fierce artificer Curves his white bastions with projected roof
 Round every windward stake, or tree, or door
 Speeding, the myriad-handed, his wild work
 So fanciful, so savage, nought cares he
 For number or proportion Mockingly, On coop or kennel he hangs Parian wreaths,
 A swan-like form invests the hidden thorn,
 Fills up the farmer's lane from wall to wall, Maugre the farmer's sighs, and at the gate
 A tapering turret overtops the work 22
 And when his hours are numbered, and the world
 Is all his own, retiring, as he were not, Leaves, when the sun appears, astonished
     Art
 To mimic in slow structures, stone by stone,
 Built in an age, the mad wind's night-work,
 The frolic architecture of the snow.

THE BOHEMIAN HYMN

In many forms we try To utter God's infinity,
 But the boundless hath no form,
 And the Universal Friend
 Doth as far transcend
 An angel as a worm

'Instead of lectures on Architecture, I will make a lecture on God's architecture, one of his beautiful works, a Day I will draw a sketch of a winter's day I will trace as I can a rude outline of the far-assembled influences, the contribution of the universe wherein this magical structure rises like an exhalation, the wonder and charm of the immeasurable deep' Ibid., 419

The great Idea baffles wit, Language falters under it,
 It leaves the learned in the lurch,
 Nor art, nor power, nor toil can find 10
 The measure of the eternal Mind, Nor hymn, nor prayer, nor church.

FABLE

THE mountain and the squirrel
 Had a quarrel,
 And the former called the latter 'Little Prig',
 Bun replied,
 'You are doubtless very big,
 But all sorts of things and weather
 Must be taken in together,
 To make up a year
 And a sphere
 And I think it no disgrace 10
 To occupy my place
 If I'm not so large as you,
 You are not so small as I,
 And not half so spry I'll not deny you make A very pretty squirrel track, Talents differ, all is well and wisely put;
 If I cannot carry forests on my back, Neither can you crack a nut '

EXPERIENCE

THE lords of life, the lords of life,—
 I saw them pass
 In their own guise, Like and unlike,
 Portly and grim,— Use and Surprise, Surface and Dream,
 Succession swift, and spectral Wrong,
 Temperament without a tongue,
 And the inventor of the game 10
 Omnipresent without name,—
 Some to see, some to be guessed,
 They marched from east to west:
 Little man, least of all,
 Among the legs of his guardians tall,
 Walked about with puzzled look.
 Him by the hand dear Nature took,
 Dearest Nature, strong and kind,
 Whispered, 'Darling, never mind!
 To-morrow they will wear another face, 20
 The founder thou, these are thy race!'

CHARACTER

THE sun set, but set not his hope:
 Stars rose, his faith was earlier up:
 Fixed on the enormous galaxy,
 Deeper and older seemed his eye;
 And matched his sufferance sublime
 The taciturnity of time
 He spoke, and words more soft than rain Brought the Age of Gold again.
 His action won such reverence sweet
 As had all measure of the feat.

FRIENDSHIP

A RUDDY drop of manly blood
 The surging sea outweighs,
 The world uncertain comes and goes;
 The lover rooted stays
 I fancied he was fled,—
 And, after many a year,
 Glowed unexhausted kindness,
 Like daily sunrise there
 My careful heart was free again,
 O friend, my bosom said,
 Through thee alone the sky is arched,
 Through thee the rose is red,
 All things through thee take nobler form,
 And look beyond the earth,
 The mill-round of our fate appears
 A sun-path in thy worth Me too thy nobleness has taught To master my despair,
 The fountains of my hidden life
 Are through thy friendship fair.

COMPENSATION

WHY should I keep holiday
 When other men have none?
 Why but because, when these are gay,
 I sit and mourn alone?

And why, when mirth unseals all tongues,
 Should mine alone be dumb?
 Ah! late I spoke to silent throngs,
 And now their hour is come

HAST thou named all the birds without a gun?
 Loved the wood-rose, and left it on its stalk?

1 If it is thought that the poem refers to Thoreau

At rich men's tables eaten bread and pulse?
 Unarmed, faced danger with a heart of trust?
 And loved so well a high behavior,
 In man or maid, that thou from speech refrained,
 Nobility more nobly to repay?
 O, be my friend, and teach me to be thine!

THE PARK

THE prosperous and beautiful
 To me seem not to wear
 The yoke of conscience masterful,
 Which galls me everywhere

I cannot shake off the god,
 On my neck he makes his seat,
 I look at my face in the glass,—
 My eyes his eyeballs meet Enchanters! Enchantresses!

 Your gold makes you seem wise,
 The morning mist within your grounds
 More proudly rolls, more softly lies

Yet spake yon purple mountain,
 Yet said yon ancient wood,
 That Night or Day, that Love or Crime, Leads all souls to the Good

GIVE ALL TO LOVE

GIVE all to love,
 Obey thy heart,
 Friends, kindred, days,
 Estate, good-fame,
 Plans, credit and the Muse,— Nothing refuse

'Tis a brave master,
 Let it have scope
 Follow it utterly,
 Hope beyond hope

High and more high
 It dives into noon,
 With wing unspent,
 Untold intent,
 But it is a god,
 Knows its own path
 And the outlets of the sky

10

It was never for the mean,
 It requireth courage stout.
 Souls above doubt, 20
 Valor unbending,
 It will reward,—
 They shall return
 More than they were,
 And ever ascending.

Leave <sup>it</sup> for love,
 Yet, hear me, yet,
 One word more thy heart behoved,
 One pulse more of firm endeavor,— Keep thee to-day, 30
 To-morrow, forever, Free as an Arab
 Of thy beloved.

Cling with life to the maid,
 But when the surprise,
 First vague shadow of surmise Flits across her bosom young,
 Of a joy apart from thee,
 Free be she, fancy-free,
 Nor thou detain her vesture's hem, 40
 Nor the palest rose she flung From her summer diadem

Though thou loved her as thyself,
 As a self of purer clay,
 Though her parting dims the day,
 Stealing grace from all alive,
 Heartily know,
 When half-gods go,
 The gods arrive 1847

THE APOLOGY

THINK me not unkind and rude
 That I walk alone in grove and glen,
 I go to the god of the wood
 To fetch his word to men.

Tax not my sloth that I Fold my arms beside the brook,
 Each cloud that floated in the sky Writes a letter in my book.

Chide me not, laborious band,
 For the idle flowers I brought, 10
 Every aster in my hand Goes home loaded with a thought.

There was never mystery
 But 'us figured in the flowers,

Was never secret history
 But birds tell it in the bowers

One harvest from thy field Homeward brought the oxen strong,
 A second crop thine acres yield,
 Which I gather in a song. 20

BACCHUS <sup>1</sup>

BRING me wine, but wine which never grew
 In the belly of the grape, Or grew on vine whose tap-roots, reaching through
 Under the Andes to the Cape, Suffered no savor of the earth to scape.

Let its grapes the morn salute
 From a nocturnal root,
 Which feels the acrid juice
 Of Styx and Erebus,
 And turns the woe of Night, 10
 By its own craft, to a more rich delight.

We buy ashes for bread,
 We buy diluted wine,
 Give me of the true,—
 Whose ample leaves and tendrils curled Among the silver hills of heaven Draw everlasting dew, Wine of wine,
 Blood of the world,
 Form of forms, and mould of statures, 20
 That I intoxicated,
 And by the draught assimilated,
 May float at pleasure through all natures,
 The bird-language rightly spell,
 And that which roses say so well.

Wine that is shed
 Like the torrents of the sun
 Up the horizon walls,
 Or like the Atlantic streams, which run
 When the South Sea calls 30

<sup>1</sup> Emerson wrote, July 1846, to Elizabeth Hoar, 'whom he always considered a sister and confidante. He had been working on some poems which he felt impatient to show her, "especially some verses called Bacchus—not, however, translated from Hafiz." Such a confession of conscious similarity in method is revealing. Wine in the symbolism of the Sufis stood for the intoxication of God. Thus untaxed, both Emerson and Hafiz write of their mystical sense of oneness with the worlds and divine omnipotence.' Christy, The Orient in American Transcendentalism (N Y., 1932), 147-48.

Water and bread,
Food which needs no transmuting,
Rainbow-flowering, wisdom-fruited, Wine which is already man,
Food which teach and reason can.

Wine which Music is,— Music and wine are one,—
That I, drinking this,
Shall hear far Chaos talk with me;
Kings unborn shall walk with me, 40
And the poor grass shall plot and plan
What it will do when it is man Quickened so, will I unlock Every crypt of every rock

I thank the joyful juice
For all I know,— Winds of remembering
Of the ancient being blow,
And seeming-solid walls of use
Open and flow 50

Pour, Bacchus! the remembering wine, Retrieve the loss of me and mine!
Vine for vine be antidote,
And the grape requite the lot!
Haste to cure the old despair,— Reason in Nature's lotus drenched,
The memory of ages quenched,
Give them again to shine,
Let wine repair what this undid,
And where the infection slid, 60
A dazzling memory revive,
Refresh the faded tints,
Recut the aged prints,
And write my old adventures with the pen
Which on the first day drew,
Upon the tablets blue,
The dancing Pleiads and eternal men

CONCORD HYMN

SUNG AT THE COMPLETION OF THE BATTLE MONUMENT, JULY 4, 1837

By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfurled, Here once the embattled farmers stood And fired the shot heard round the

The foe long since in silence slept, Alike the conqueror silent sleeps,

And Time the ruined bridge has swept Down the dark stream which seaward creeps

On this green bank, by this soft stream,
We set to-day a votive stone, 10
That memory may their deed redeem,
When, like our sires, our sons are gone

Spirit, that made those heroes dare
To die, and leave their children free, Bid Time and Nature gently spare
The shaft we raise to them and thee

BRAHMA<sup>1</sup>

If the red slayer think he slays,
Or if the slain think he is slain,
They know not well the subtle ways
I keep, and pass, and turn again

Far or forgot to me is near;
Shadow and sunlight are the same,
The vanished gods to me appear,
And one to me are shame and fame

They reckon ill who leave me out,
When me they fly, I am the wings, 10
I am the doubter and the doubt,
And I the hymn the Brahmin sings

The strong gods pine for my abode,
And pine in vain the sacred Seven,
But thou, meek lover of the good!
Find me, and turn thy back on heaven

FATE

DEEP in the man sits fast his fate
To mould his fortunes, mean or great Unknown to Cromwell as to me
Was Cromwell's measure or degree, Unknown to him as to his horse,
If he than his groom be better or worse

He works, plots, fights, in rude affairs,
 With squires, lords, kings, his craft compares,
 Till late he learned, through doubt and fear,
 Broad England harbored not his peer' 10
 Obeying time, the last to own
 The Genius from its cloudy throne
 For the prevision is allied Unto the thing so signified,
 Or say, the foresight that awaits
 Is the same Genius that creates

BOSTON HYMN <sup>1</sup>

READ IN MUSIC HALL, JANUARY 1, 1863

THE word of the Lord by night
 To the watching Pilgrims came,
 As they sat by the seaside,
 And filled their hearts with flame

God said, I am tired of kings,
 I suffer them no more,
 Up to my ear the morning brings
 The outrage of the poor.

Think ye I made this ball 10
 A field of havoc and war, Where tyrants great and tyrants small Might harry the weak and poor?

My angel,—his name is Freedom,— Choose him to be your king,
 He shall cut pathways east and west
 And fend you with his wing

Lo! I uncover the land
 Which I hid of old time in the West,
 As the sculptor uncovers the statue
 When he has wrought his best, 20

I show Columbia, of the rocks
 Which dip their foot in the seas,
 And soar to the air-borne flocks
 Of clouds and the boreal fleece.

I will divide my goods,
 Call in the wretch and slave None shall rule but the humble,
 And none but Toil shall have

I will have never a noble,
 No lineage counted great; 30
 Fishers and choppers and ploughmen Shall constitute a state

Go, cut down trees in the forest
 And trim the straightest boughs;
 Cut down trees in the forest
 And build me a wooden house.

Call the people together,
 The young men and the sires,
 The digger in the harvest-field,
 Hireling and him that hires, 40

And here in a pine state-house
 They shall choose men to rule
 In every needful faculty,
 In church, and state, and school

Lo, now! if these poor men
 Can govern the land and sea
 And make just laws below the sun, As planets faithful be

And ye shall succor men,
 'Tis nobleness to serve, 50
 Help them who cannot help again
 Beware from right to swerve

I break your bonds and masterships,
 And I unchain the slave Free be his heart and hand henceforth
 As wind and wandering wave.

I cause from every creature
 His proper good to flow
 As much as he is and doeth,
 So much he shall bestow 60

But, laying hands on another
 To coin his labor and sweat,
 He goes in pawn to his victim
 For eternal years in debt

To-day unbind the captive,
 So only are ye unbound,
 Lift up a people from the dust,
 Trump of their rescue, sound!

Pay ransom to the owner
 And fill the bag to the brim 70
 Who is the owner? The slave is owner,
 And ever was Pay him

<sup>1</sup> The poem was read at celebration of Lincoln's proclamation freeing the slaves

O North! give him beauty for rags,
And honor, O South! for his shame, Nevada! coin thy golden crags
With Freedom's image and name

Up! and the dusky race
That sat in darkness long,—
Be swift their feet as antelopes,
And as behemoth strong

80

Come, East and West and North,
By races, as snow-flakes,
And carry my purpose forth,
Which neither halts nor shakes.

My will fulfilled shall be,
For, in daylight or in dark,
My thunderbolt has eyes to see His way home to the mark

I

Low and mournful be the strain,
Haughty thought be far from me,
Tones of penitence and pain,
Moanings of the tropic sea,
Low and tender in the cell
Where a captive sits in chains, Crooning ditties treasured well
From his Afric's torrid plains
Sole estate his sire bequeathed,— Hapless sire to hapless son,—
Was the wailing song he breathed,
And his chain when life was done

10

What his fault, or what his crime?
Or what ill planet crossed his prime?
Heart too soft and will too weak To front the fate that crouches near,— Dove beneath the vulture's beak,—
Will song dissuade the thirsty spear?
Dragged from his mother's arms and breast,
Displaced, disfurnished here,
His wistful toil to do his best Chilled by a ribald jeer

Great men in the Senate sate, Sage and hero, side by side,
Building for their sons the State,
Which they shall rule with pride.
They forbore to break the chain
Which bound the dusky tribe,
Checked by the owners' fierce disdain, Lured by 'Union' as the bribe Destiny sat by, and said, 'Pang for pang your seed shall pay,
Hide in false peace your coward head,
I bring round the harvest-day'

2

Freedom all winged expands,
Nor perches in a narrow place,
Her broad van seeks unplanted lands,
She loves a poor and virtuous race
Clinging to a colder zone Whose dark sky sheds the snowflake
down,
The snowflake is her banner's star,
Her stripes the boreal streamers are Long she loved the Northman well,
Now the iron age is done,
She will not refuse to dwell
With the offspring of the Sun, Foundling of the desert far,
Where palms plume, siroccos blaze,
He roves unhurt the burning ways
In climates of the summer star
He has avenues to God Hid from men of Northern brain,
Far beholding, without cloud,
What these with slowest steps attain
If once the generous chief arrive
To lead him willing to be led,
For freedom he will strike and strive,
And drain his heart till he be dead

3

In an age of fops and toys,
Wanting wisdom, void of right,
Who shall nerve heroic boys
To hazard all in Freedom's fight,— Break sharply off their jolly games, Forsake their comrades gay
And quit proud homes and youthful dames
For famine, toil and fray?
Yet on the nimble air benign
Speed numbler messages,
That waft the breath of grace divine
To hearts in sloth and ease
So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
So near is God to man,

When Duty whispers low, Thou must,
The youth replies, I can

Speak it firmly, these are gods,
All are ghosts beside.

O, well for the fortunate soul
Which Music's wings infold, Stealing away the memory
Of sorrows new and old!
Yet happier he whose inward sight,
Stayed on his subtle thought,
Shuts his sense on toys of time,
To vacant bosoms brought But best befriended of the God
He who, in evil times,
Warned by an inward voice,
Heeds not the darkness and the dread,
Biding by his rule and choice,
Feeling only the fiery thread
Leading over heroic ground,
Walled with mortal terror round,
To the aim which him allures,
And the sweet heaven his deed secures.
Peril around, all else appalling,
Cannon in front and leaden rain
Him duly through the clarion calling
To the van called not in vain

90

Stainless soldier on the walls, Knowing this,—and knows no more,— Whoever fights, whoever falls, Justice conquers evermore,
Justice after as before,—
And he who battles on her side,
God, though he were ten times slain,
Crowns him victor glorified, Victor over death and pain

5

Blooms the laurel which belongs To the valiant chief who fights,
I see the wreath, I hear the songs Lauding the Eternal Rights, Victors over daily wrongs Awful victors, they misguide Whom they will destroy,
And their coming triumph hide
In our downfall, or our joy.
They reach no term, they never sleep,
In equal strength through space abide,
Though, feigning dwarfs, they crouch and creep,
The strong they slay, the swift outstride Fate's grass grows rank in valley clods,
And rankly on the castled steep,—

LETTERS

EVERY day brings a ship,
Every ship brings a word,
Well for those who have no fear,
Looking seaward well assured That the word the vessel brings
Is the word they wish to hear.

THE ROMANY GIRL <sup>1</sup>

THE sun goes down, and with him takes The coarseness of my poor attire,
The fair moon mounts, and aye the flame
Of Gypsy beauty blazes higher

Pale Northern girls! you scorn our race,
You captives of your air-tight halls,
Wear out indoors your sickly days,
But leave us the horizon walls.

And if I take you, dames, to task,
And say it frankly without guile,
Then you are Gypsies in a mask,
And I the lady all the while 10

If, on the heath, below the moon,
I court and play with paler blood,
Me false to mine dare whisper none,—
One sallow horseman knows me good

Go, keep your cheek's rose from the rain,
For teeth and hair with shopmen deal,
My swarthy tint is in the grain,
The rocks and forest know it real 20

The wild air bloweth in our lungs,
The keen stars twinkle in our eyes,
The birds gave us our wily tongues,
The panther in our dances flies

You doubt we read the stars on high,
Nathless we read your fortunes true,
The stars may hide in the upper sky,
But without glass we fathom you

DAYS

DAUGHTERS of Time, the hypocritic Days,
 Muffled and dumb like barefoot dervishes,
 And marching single in an endless file,
 Bring diadems and fagots in their hands
 To each they offer gifts after his will, Bread, kingdoms, stars, and sky that holds them all
 I, in my pleached garden, watched the pomp,
 Forgot my morning wishes, hastily Took a few herbs and apples, and the Day Turned and departed silent I, too late, 10 Under her solemn fillet saw the scorn

TWO RIVERS <sup>1</sup>

THY summer voice, Musketaquit, Repeats the music of the rain,
 But sweeter rivers pulsing flit
 Through thee, as thou through Concord
     Plain
 Thou in thy narrow banks art pent
 The stream I love unbounded goes Through flood and sea and firmament, Through light, through life, it forward flows
 I see the inundation sweet,
 I hear the spending of the stream 10
 Through years, through men, through Nature fleet,
 Through love and thought, through power and dream
 Musketaquit, a goblin strong,
 Of shard and flint makes jewels gay,
 They lose their grief who hear his song,
 And where he winds is the day of day
 So forth and brighter fares my stream,—
 Who drink it shall not thirst again,

<sup>1</sup> In his journal for the early summer of 1856, Emerson wrote of the stream near his home 'Thy voice is sweet, Musketaquit, and repeats the music of the rain, but sweeter is the silent stream which flows even through thee, as thou through the land Thou art shut in thy banks, but the stream I love flows in thy water, and flows through rocks and through the air and through rays of light as well, and through darkness, and through men and women I hear and see the inundation and the eternal spending of the stream in winter and in summer, in men and animals, in passion and thought Happy are they who can hear it' Ibid. 487

No darkness stains its equal gleam,
 And ages drop in it like rain. 20

WALDEINSAMKEIT <sup>2</sup>

I DO not count the hours I spend In wandering by the sea,
 The forest is my loyal friend,
 Like God it useth me
 In plains that room for shadows make
 Of skirting hills to lie, Bound in by streams which give and take Their colors from the sky,

Or on the mountain-crest sublime,
 Or down the oaken glade, 10
 O what have I to do with time?
 For thus the day was made

Cities of mortals woe-begone Fantastic care derides,
 But in the serious landscape lone Stern benefit abides

Sheen will tarnish, honey cloy,
 And merry is only a mask of sad,
 But, sober on a fund of joy,
 The woods at heart are glad 20

There the great Planter plants
 Of fruitful worlds the grain,
 And with a million spells enchants
 The souls that walk in pain

Still on the seeds of all he made
 The rose of beauty burns, Through times that wear and forms that fade,
 Immortal youth returns

The black ducks mounting from the lake,
 The pigeon in the pines, 30
 The bittern's boom, a desert make Which no false art refines

Down in yon watery nook,
 Where bearded mists divide,
 The gray old gods whom Chaos knew,
 The sires of Nature, hude

Aloft, in secret veins of air, Blows the sweet breath of song,

<sup>2</sup> 'Forest Solitude'

O, few to scale those uplands dare,
Though they to all belong! 40

See thou bring not to field or stone
The fancies found in books,
Leave authors' eyes, and fetch your own,
To brave the landscape's looks

Oblivion here thy wisdom is,
Thy thrift, the sleep of cares,
For a proud idleness like this Crowns all thy mean affairs.

THE PAST

THE debt is paid,
The verdict said,
The Furies laid,
The plague is stayed,
All fortunes made,
Turn the key and bolt the door,
Sweet is death forevermore
Nor haughty hope, nor swart chagrin, Nor murdering hate, can enter in.
All is now secure and fast, 10
Not the gods can shake the Past, Flies-to the adamant door Bolted down forevermore None can reenter there,—
No thief so politic,
No Satan with a royal trick Steal in by window, chunk, or hole,
To bind or unbind, add what lacked,
Insert a leaf, or forge a name,
New-face or finish what is packed, 20
Alter or mend eternal Fact

TERMINUS

It is time to be old,
To take in sail —

The god of bounds,
Who sets to seas a shore,
Came to me in his fatal rounds,
And said 'No more!
No farther shoot Thy broad ambitious branches, and thy root

Fancy departs. no more invent;
Contract thy firmament 10
To compass of a tent.

There's not enough for this and that,
Make thy option which of two,
Economize the failing river,
Not the less revere the Giver,
Leave the many and hold the few.

Timely wise accept the terms,
Soften the fall with wary foot,
A little while Still plan and smile, 20

And,—fault of novel germs,— Mature the unfallen fruit Curse, if thou wilt, thy sires,
Bad husbands of their fires,
Who, when they gave thee breath,
Failed to bequeath
The needful sinew stark as once,
The Baresark marrow to thy bones,
But left a legacy of ebbing veins, Inconstant heat and nerveless reins,— 30
Amid the Muses, left thee deaf and dumb, Amid the gladiators, halt and numb.'

As the bird trims her to the gale,
I trim myself to the storm of time,
I man the rudder, reef the sail, Obey the voice at eve obeyed at prime 'Lowly faithful, banish fear, Right onward drive unharmed,
The port, well worth the cruise, is near,
And every wave is charmed.' 40

FROM WALDEN

WHERE I LIVED, AND WHAT I LIVED FOR

AT a certain season of our life we are accustomed to consider every spot as the possible site of a house. I have thus surveyed the country on every side within a dozen miles of where I live. In imagination I have bought all the farms in succession, for all were to be bought, and I knew their price. I walked over each farmer's premises, tasted his wild apples, discoursed on husbandry with him, took his farm at his price, at any price, mortgaging it to him in my mind, even put a higher price on it—took everything but a deed of it—took his word for his deed, for I dearly love to talk—cultivated it, and him too to some extent, I trust, and withdrew when I had enjoyed it long enough, leaving him to carry it on. This experience entitled me to be regarded as a sort of real-estate broker by my friends. Wherever I sat, there I might live, and the landscape radiated from me accordingly. What is a house but a sedes, a seat?—better if a country seat. I discovered many a site for a house not likely to be soon improved, which some might have thought too far from the village, but to my eyes the village was too far from it. Well, there I might live, I said, and there I did live, for an hour, a summer and a winter life, saw how I could let the years run off, buffet the winter through, and see the spring come in. The future inhabitants of this region, wherever they may place their houses, may be sure that they have been anticipated. An afternoon sufficed to lay out the land into orchard, wood-lot, and pasture, and to decide what fine oaks or pines should be left to stand before the door, and whence each blasted tree could be seen to the best advantage, and then I let it lie, fallow perchance, for a man is rich in proportion to the number of things which he can afford to let alone.

My imagination carried me so far that I even had the refusal of several farms—the refusal was all I wanted—but I never got my fingers burned by actual possession. The nearest that I came to actual possession was when I bought the Hollowell place, and had begun to sort my seeds, and collected materials with which to make a wheelbarrow to carry it on or off with, but before the owner gave me a deed of it, his wife—every man has such a wife—changed her mind and wished to keep it, and he offered me ten dollars to release him. Now, to speak the truth, I had but ten cents in the world, and it surpassed my arithmetic to tell, if I was that man who had ten cents, or who had a farm, or ten dollars, or all together. However, I let him keep the ten dollars and the farm too, for I had carried it far enough, or rather, to be generous, I sold him the farm for just what I gave for it, and, as he was not a rich man, made him a present of ten dollars, and still had my ten cents, and seeds, and materials for a wheelbarrow left. I found thus that I had been a rich man without any damage to my poverty. But I retained the landscape, and I have since annually carried off what it yielded without a wheelbarrow. With respect to landscapes—

‘I am monarch of all I survey,
My right there is none to dispute.’

10 I have frequently seen a poet withdraw, having enjoyed the most valuable part of a farm, while the crusty farmer supposed that he had got a few wild apples only. Why, the owner does not know it for many years when a poet has put his farm in rhyme, the most admirable kind of invisible fence, has fairly impounded it, milked it, skimmed it, and got all the cream, and left the farmer only the skimmed milk.

20 The real attractions of the Hollowell farm, to me, were its complete retirement, being about two miles from the village, half a mile from the nearest neighbor, and separated from the highway by a broad field, its bounding on the river, which the owner said protected it by its fogs from frosts in the spring, though that was nothing to me, the gray color and ruinous state of the house and barn, and the dilapidated fences, which 30 put such an interval between me and the last occupant, the hollow and lichen-covered apple trees, gnawed by rabbits, showing what kind of neighbors I should have, but above all, the recollection I had of it from my earliest voyages up the river, when the house was concealed behind a dense grove of red maples, through which I heard the house-dog bark. I was in haste to buy it, before the proprietor finished 40 getting out some rocks, cutting down the hollow apple trees, and grubbing up some young birches which had sprung up in the pasture, or, in short, had made any more of his improvements. To enjoy these advantages I was ready to carry it on, like Atlas, to take the world on my shoulders—I never heard what compensation he received for that—and do all those things which had no other motive or excuse but that I might 50 pay for it and be unmolested in my possession of it; for I knew all the while that it would yield the most abundant crop of the kind I wanted, if I could only afford to let it alone. But it turned out as I have said.

All that I could say, then, with respect to farming on a large scale—I have always cultivated a garden—was, that I had had my seeds ready. Many think that seeds improve with age. I have no doubt that time discriminates between the good and the bad, and when at last I shall plant, I shall be less likely to be disappointed. But I would say to my fellows, once for all, As long as possible live free and uncommitted. It makes but little difference whether you are committed to a farm or the county jail.

Old Cato, whose De Re Rusticâ is my Cultivator, says—and the only translation I have seen makes sheer nonsense of the passage—‘When you think of getting a farm turn it thus in your mind, not to buy greedily, nor spare your pains to look at it, and do not think it enough to go round it once. The oftener you go there the more it will please you, if it is good.’ I think I shall not buy greedily, but go round and round it as long as I live, and be buried in it first, that it may please me the more at last.

The present was my next experiment of this kind, which I purpose to describe more at length, for convenience putting the experience of two years into one. As I have said, I do not propose to write an ode to dejection, but to brag as lustily as chanticleer in the morning, standing on his roost, if only to wake my neighbors up.

When first I took up my abode in the woods, that is, began to spend my nights as well as days there, which, by accident, was on Independence Day, or the Fourth of July, 1845, my house was not finished for winter, but was merely a defence against the rain, without plastering or chimney, the walls being of rough, weather-stained boards, with wide chinks, which made it cool at night. The upright white hewn studs and freshly planed door and window casings gave it a clean and airy look, especially in the morning, when its timbers were saturated with dew, so that I fancied that by noon some sweet gum would exude from them. To my imagination it retained throughout the day more or less of this auroral character, reminding me of a certain house on a mountain which I had visited a year before. This was an airy and unplastered cabin, fit to entertain a travelling god, and where a goddess might trail her garments. The winds which passed over my dwelling were such as sweep over the ridges of mountains, bearing the broken strains, or celestial parts only, of terrestrial music. The morning wind forever blows, the poem of creation is uninterrupted, but few are the ears that hear it. Olympus is but the outside of the earth everywhere.

The only house I had been the owner of before, if I except a boat, was a tent, which I used occasionally when making excursions in the summer, and this is still rolled up in my garret, but the boat, after passing from hand to hand, has gone down the stream of time. With this more substantial shelter about me, I had made some progress toward settling in the world. This frame, so slightly clad, was a sort of crystallization around me, and reacted on the builder. It was suggestive somewhat as a picture in outlines. I did not need to go outdoors to take the air, for the atmosphere within had lost none of its freshness. It was not so much within-doors as behind a door where I sat, even in the rainiest weather. The Harivansa says, ‘An abode without birds is like a meat without seasoning.’ Such was not my abode, for I found myself suddenly neighbor to the birds, not by having imprisoned one, but having caged myself near them. I was not only nearer to some of those which commonly frequent the garden and the orchard, but to those wilder and more thrilling songsters of the forest which never, or rarely, serenade a villager—the wood thrush, the veery, the scarlet tanager, the field sparrow, the whippoorwill, and many others.

I was seated by the shore of a small pond, about a mile and a half south of the village of Concord and somewhat higher than it, in the midst of an extensive wood between that town and Lincoln, and about two miles south of that our only field known to fame, Concord Battle Ground, but I was so low in the woods that the opposite shore, half a mile off, like the rest, covered with wood, was my most distant horizon. For the first week, whenever I looked out on the pond it impressed me like a tarn high up on the side of a mountain, its bottom far above the surface of other lakes, and, as the sun arose, I saw it throwing off its nightly clothing of mist, and here and there, by degrees, its soft ripples or its smooth reflecting surface was revealed, while the mists, like ghosts, were stealthily withdrawing in every direction into the woods, as at the breaking up of some nocturnal conventicle. The very dew seemed to hang upon the trees later into the day than usual, as on the sides of mountains.

This small lake was of most value as a neighbor in the intervals of a gentle rain-storm in August, when, both air and water being perfectly still, but the sky overcast, mid-afternoon had all the serenity of evening, and the wood thrush sang around, and was heard from shore to shore. A lake like this is never smoother than at such a time, and the clear portion of the air above it being shallow and darkened by clouds, the water, full of light and reflections, becomes a lower heaven itself so much the more important. From a hill-top near by, where the wood had been recently cut off, there was a pleasing vista southward across the pond, through a wide indentation in the hills which form the shore there, where their opposite sides sloping toward each other suggested a stream flowing out in that direction through a wooded valley, but stream there was none. That way I looked between and over the near green hills to some distant and higher ones in the horizon, tinged with blue. Indeed, by standing on tiptoe I could catch a glimpse of some of the peaks of the still bluer and more distant mountain ranges in the northwest, those true-blue coins from heaven's own mint, and also of some portion of the village. But in other directions, even from this point, I could not see over or beyond the woods which surrounded me. It is well to have some water in your neighborhood, to give buoyancy to and float the earth. One value even of the smallest well is, that when you look into it you see that earth is not continent but insular. This is as important as that it keeps butter cool. When I looked across the pond from this peak toward the Sudbury meadows, which in time of flood I distinguished elevated perhaps by a mirage in their seething valley, like a coin in a basin, all the earth beyond the pond appeared like a thin crust insulated and floated even by this small sheet of intervening water, and I was reminded that this on which I dwelt was but dry land.

Though the view from my door was still more contracted, I did not feel crowded or confined in the least. There was pasture enough for my imagination. The low shrub oak plateau to which the opposite shore arose stretched away toward the prairies of the West and the steppes of Tartary, affording ample room for all the roving families of men. 'There are none happy in the world but beings who enjoy freely a vast horizon,' —said Damodara, when his herds required new and larger pastures.

Both place and time were changed, and I dwelt nearer to those parts of the universe and to those eras in history which had most attracted me. Where I lived was as far off as many a region viewed nightly by astronomers. We are wont to imagine rare and delectable places in some remote and more celestial corner of the system, behind the constellation of Cassiopeia's Chair, far from noise and disturbance. I discovered that my house actually had its site in such a withdrawn, but forever new and unprofaned, part of the universe. If it were worth the while to settle in those parts near to the Pleiades or the Hyades, to Aldebaran or Altair, then I was really there, or at an equal remoteness from the life which I had left behind, dwindled and twinkling with as fine a ray to my nearest neighbor, and to be seen only in moonless nights by him. Such was that part of creation where I had squatted—

'There was a shepherd that did live,
And held his thoughts as high As were the mounts whereon his flocks Did hourly feed him by'

What should we think of the shepherd's life if his flocks always wandered to higher pastures than his thoughts?

Every morning was a cheerful invitation to make my life of equal simplicity, and I may say innocence, with Nature herself. I have been as sincere a worshipper of Aurora as the Greeks. I got up early and bathed in the pond, that was a religious exercise, and one of the best things which I did. They say that characters were engraven on the bathing tub of King Tchung-thang to this effect: 'Renew thyself completely each day, do it again, and again, and forever again.' I can understand that. Morning brings back the heroic ages. I was as much affected by the faint hum of a mosquito making its invisible and unimaginable tour through my apartment at earliest dawn, when I was sitting with door and windows open, as I could be by any trumpet that ever sang of fame. It was Homer's requiem; itself an Iliad and Odyssey in the air, singing its own wrath and wanderings. There was something cosmical about it, a standing advertisement, till forbidden, of the everlasting vigor and fertility of the world. The morning, which is the most memorable season of the day, is the awakening hour. Then there is least somnolence in us, and for an hour, at least, some part of us awakes which slumbers all the rest of the day and night. Little is to be expected of that day, if it can be called a day, to which we are not awakened by our Genius, but by the mechanical nudgings of some servitor, are not awakened by our own newly acquired force and aspirations from within, accompanied by the undulations of celestial music, instead of factory bells, and a fragrance filling the the air—to a higher life than we fell asleep from, and thus the darkness bear its fruit, and prove itself to be good, no less than the light. That man who does not believe that each day contains an earlier, more sacred, and auroral hour than he has yet profaned, has despaired of life, and is pursuing a descending and darkening way. After a partial cessation of his sensuous life, the soul of man, or its organs rather, are reinvigorated each day, and his Genius tries again what noble life it can make. All memorable events, I should say, transpire in morning time and in a morning atmosphere. The Vedas say, 'All intelligences awake with the morning.' Poetry and art, and the fairest and most memorable of the actions of men, date from such an hour. All poets and heroes, like Memnon, are the children of Aurora, and emit their music at sunrise. To him whose elastic and vigorous thought keeps pace with the sun, the day is a perpetual morning. It matters not what the clocks say or the attitudes and labors of men. Morning is when I am awake and there is a dawn in me. Moral reform is the effort to throw off sleep. Why is it that men give so poor an account of their day if they have not been slumbering? They are not such poor calculators. If they had not been overcome with drowsiness, they would have performed something. The millions are awake enough for physical labor, but only one in a million is awake enough for effective intellectual exertion, only one in a hundred millions to a poetic or divine life. To be awake is to be alive. I have never yet met a man who was quite awake. How could I have looked him in the face?

10 We must learn to reawaken and keep ourselves awake, not by mechanical aids, but by an infinite expectation of the dawn, which does not forsake us in our soundest sleep. I know of no more encouraging fact than the unquestionable ability of man to elevate his life by a conscious endeavor. It is something to be able to paint a particular picture, or to carve a statue, and so to make a few objects beautiful, but it is far more glorious to carve and paint the very atmosphere and medium through which we look, which morally we can do. To affect the quality of the day, that is the highest of arts. Every man is tasked to make his life, even in its details, worthy of the contemplation of his most elevated and critical hour. If we refused, or rather used up, such paltry information as we get, the oracles would distinctly inform us how this might be done.

30 I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately, to front only the essential facts of life, and see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived. I did not wish to live what was not life, living is so dear, nor did I wish to practise resignation, unless it was quite necessary. I wanted to live deep and suck out all the marrow of life, to live so sturdily and Spartan-like as to put to rout all that was not life, to cut a broad swath and shave close, to drive life into a corner, and reduce it to its lowest terms, and, if it proved to be mean, why then to get the whole and genuine meanness of it, and publish its meanness to the world, or if it were sublime, to know it by experience, and be able to give a true account of it in my next excursion. For most men, it appears to me, are in a strange uncertainty about it, whether it is of the devil or of God, and have somewhat hastily concluded that it is the chief end of man here to 'glorify God and enjoy him forever.'

Still we live meanly, like ants, though the fable tells us that we were long ago changed into men, like pygmies we fight with cranes, it is error upon error, and clout upon clout, and our best virtue has for its occasion a superfluous and evitable wretchedness. Our life is frittered away by detail. An honest man has hardly need to count more than his ten fingers, or in extreme cases he may add his ten toes, and lump the rest. Simplicity, simplicity, simplicity! I say, let your affairs be as two or three, and not a hundred or a thousand, instead of a million count half a dozen, and keep your accounts on your thumb-nail. In the midst of this chopping sea of civilized life, such are the clouds and storms and quicksands and thousand-and-one items to be allowed for, that a man has to live, if he would not founder and go to the bottom and not make his port at all, by dead reckoning, and he must be a great calculator indeed who succeeds. Simplify, simplify. Instead of three meals a day, if it be necessary eat but one, instead of a hundred dishes, five, and reduce other things in proportion. Our life is like a German Confederacy, made up of petty states, with its boundary forever fluctuating, so that even a German cannot tell you how it is bounded at any moment. The nation itself, with all its so-called internal improvements, which, by the way, are all external and superficial, is just such an unwieldy and overgrown establishment, cluttered with furniture and tripped up by its own traps, ruined by luxury and heedless expense, by want of calculation and a worthy aim, as the million households in the land, and the only cure for it, as for them, is in a rigid economy, a stern and more than Spartan simplicity of life and elevation of purpose. It lives too fast. Men think that it is essential that the Nation have commerce, and export ice, and talk through a telegraph, and ride thirty miles an hour, without a doubt, whether they do or not, but whether we should live like baboons or like men, is a little uncertain. If we do not get out sleepers, and forge rails, and devote days and nights to the work, but go to tinkering upon our lives to improve them, who will build railroads? And if railroads are not built, how shall we get to heaven in season? But if we stay at home and mind our business, who will want railroads? We do not ride on the railroad, it rides upon us. Did you ever think what those sleepers are that underlie the railroad? Each one is a man, an Irishman, or a Yankee man. The rails are laid on them, and they are covered with sand, and the cars run smoothly over them. They are sound sleepers, I assure you. And every few years a new lot is laid down and run over, so that, if some have the pleasure of riding on a rail, others have the misfortune to be ridden upon. And when they run over a man that is walking in his sleep, a supernumerary sleeper in the wrong position, and wake him up, they suddenly stop the cars, and make a hue and cry about it, as if this were an exception. I am glad to know that it takes a gang of men for every five miles to keep the sleepers down and level in their beds as it is, for this is a sign that they may sometime get up again.

Why should we live with such hurry and waste of life? We are determined to be starved before we are hungry. Men say that a stitch in time saves nine, and so they take a thousand stitches to-day to save nine to-morrow. As for work, we haven't any of any consequence. We have the Saint Vitus' dance, and cannot possibly keep our heads still. If I should only give a few pulls at the parish bell-rope, as for a fire, that is, without setting the bell, there is hardly a man on his farm in the outskirts of Concord, notwithstanding that press of engagements which was his excuse so many times this morning, nor a boy, nor a woman, I might almost say, but would forsake all and follow that sound, not mainly to save property from the flames, but, if we will confess the truth, much more to see it burn, since burn it must, and we, be it known, did not set it on fire—or to see it put out, and have a hand in it, if that is done as handsomely, yes, even if it were the parish church itself. Hardly a man takes a half-hour's nap after dinner, but when he wakes he holds up his head and asks, 'What's the news?' as if the rest of mankind had stood his sentinels. Some give directions to be waked every half-hour, doubtless for no other purpose, and then, to pay for it, they tell what they have dreamed. After a night's sleep the news is as indispensable as the breakfast. 'Pray tell me anything new that has happened to a man anywhere on this globe'—and he reads it over his coffee and rolls, that a man has had his eyes gouged out this morning on the Wachuto River, never dreaming the while that he lives in the dark unfathomed mammoth cave of this world, and has but the rudiment of an eye himself

For my part, I could easily do without the post-office. I think that there are very few important communications made through it. To speak critically, I never received more than one or two letters in my life—I wrote this some years ago—that were worth the postage. The penny-post is, commonly, an institution through which you seriously offer a man that penny for his thoughts which is so often safely offered in jest. And I am sure that I never read any memorable news in a newspaper. If we read of one man robbed, or murdered, or killed by accident, or one house burned, or one vessel wrecked, or one steamboat blown up, or one cow run over on the Western Railroad, or one mad dog killed, or one lot of grasshoppers in the winter—we never need read of another. One is enough. If you are acquainted with the principle, what do you care for a myriad instances and applications? To a philosopher all news, as it is called, is gossip, and they who edit and read it are old women over their tea. Yet not a few are greedy after this gossip. There was such a rush, as I hear, the other day at one of the offices to learn the foreign news by the last arrival, that several large squares of plate glass belonging to the establishment were broken by the pressure—news which I seriously think a ready wit might write a twelvemonth, or twelve years, beforehand with sufficient accuracy. As for Spain, for instance, if you know how to throw in Don Carlos and the Infanta, and Don Pedro and Seville and Granada, from time to time in the right proportions—they may have changed the names a little since I saw the papers—and serve up a bull-fight when other entertainments fail, it will be true to the letter, and give us as good an idea of the exact state or ruin of things in Spain as the most succinct and lucid reports under this head in the newspapers. And as for England, almost the last significant scrap of news from that quarter was the revolution of 1649, and if you have learned the history of her crops for an average year, you never need attend to that thing again, unless your speculations are of a merely pecuniary character. If one may judge who rarely looks into the newspapers, nothing new does ever happen in foreign parts, a French revolution not excepted.

What news! how much more important to know what that is which was never old! 'Kieou-he-yu (great dignitary of the state of Wei) sent a man to Khoung-tseu to know his news. Khoung-tseu caused the messenger to be seated near him, and questioned him in these terms: What is your master doing? The messenger answered with respect: My master desires to diminish the number of his faults, but he cannot come to the end of them. The messenger being gone, the philosopher remarked: What a worthy messenger! What a worthy messenger!' The preacher, instead of vexing the ears of drowsy farmers on their day of rest at the end of the week—for Sunday is the fit conclusion of an ill-spent week, and not the fresh and brave beginning of a new one—with this one other draggle-tail of a sermon, should shout with thundering voice, 'Pause! Avast! Why so seeming fast, but deadly slow?'

Shams and delusions are esteemed for soundest truths, while reality is fabulous. If men would steadily observe realities only, and not allow themselves to be deluded, life, to compare it with such things as we know, would be like a fairy tale and the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. If we respected only what is inevitable and has a right to be, music and poetry would resound along the streets. When we are unhurried and wise, we perceive that only great and worthy things have any permanent and absolute existence, that petty fears and petty pleasures are but the shadow of the reality. This is always exhilarating and sublime. By closing the eyes and slumbering, and consenting to be deceived by shows, men establish and confirm their daily life of routine and habit everywhere, which still is built on purely illusory foundations. Children, who play life, discern its true law and relations more clearly than men, who fail to live it worthily, but who think that they are wiser by experience, that is, by failure. I have read in a Hindoo book, that 'there was a king's son, who, being expelled in infancy from his native city, was brought up by a forester, and, growing up to maturity in that state, imagined himself to belong to the barbarous race with which he lived. One of his father's ministers having discovered him, revealed to him what he was, and the misconception of his character was removed, and he knew himself to be a prince. So soul,' continues the Hindoo philosopher, 'from the circumstances in which it is placed, mistakes its own character, until the truth is revealed to it by some holy teacher, and then it knows itself to be Brahme.' I perceive that we inhabitants of New England live this mean life that we do because our vision does not penetrate the surface of things. We think that that is which appears to be. If a man should walk through this town and see only the reality, where, think you, would the 'Mill-dam' go to? If he should give us an account of the realities he beheld there, we should not recognize the place in his description. Look at a meeting-house, or a court-house, or a jail, or a shop, or a dwelling-house, and say what that thing really is before a true gaze, and they would all go to pieces in your account of them. Men esteem truth remote, in the outskirts of the system, behind the farthest star, before Adam and after the last man. In eternity there is indeed something true and sublime. But all these times and places and occasions are now and here. God himself culminates in the present moment, and will never be more divine in the lapse of all the ages. And we are enabled to apprehend at all what is sublime and noble only by the perpetual instilling and drenching of the reality that surrounds us. The universe constantly and obediently answers to our conceptions, whether we travel fast or slow, the track is laid for us. Let us spend our lives in conceiving then. The poet or the artist never yet had so fair and noble a design but some of his posterity at least could accomplish it.

Let us spend one day as deliberately as Nature, and not be thrown off the track by every nutshell and mosquito's wing that falls on the rails. Let us rise early and fast, or break fast, gently and without perturbation, let company come and let company go, let the bells ring and the children cry—determined to make a day of it. Why should we knock under and go with the stream? Let us not be upset and overwhelmed in that terrible rapid and whirlpool called a dinner, situated in the meridian shallows. Weather this danger and you are safe, for the rest of the way is down hill. With unrelaxed nerves, with morning vigor, sail by it, looking another way, tied to the mast like Ulysses. If the engine whistles, let it whistle till it is hoarse for its pains. If the bell rings, why should we run? We will consider what kind of music they are like. Let us settle ourselves, and work and wedge our feet downward through the mud and slush of opinion, and prejudice, and tradition, and delusion, and appearance, that alluvion which covers the globe, through Paris and London, through New York and Boston and Concord, through Church and State, through poetry and philosophy and religion, till we come to a hard bottom and rocks in place, which we can call reality, and say, This is, and no mistake, and then begin, having a point d'appui, below freshet and frost and fire, a place where you might found a wall or a state, or set a lamp-post safely, or perhaps a gauge, not a Nilometer, but a Realometer, that future ages might know how deep a freshet of shams and appearances had gathered from time to time. If you stand right fronting and face to face to a fact, you will see the sun glimmer on both its surfaces, as if it were a cimeter, and feel its sweet edge dividing you through the heart and marrow, and so you will happily conclude your mortal career. Be it life or death, we crave only reality. If we are really dying, let us hear the rattle in our throats and feel cold in the extremities, if we are alive, let us go about our business.

Time is but the stream I go a-fishing in. I drink at it, but while I drink I see the sandy bottom and detect how shallow it is. Its thin current slides away, but eternity remains. I would drink deeper, fish in the sky, whose bottom is pebbly with stars. I cannot count one. I know not the first letter of the alphabet. I have always been regretting that I was not as wise as the day I was born. The intellect is a cleaver, it discerns and rifts its way into the secret of things. I do not wish to be any more busy with my hands than is necessary. My head is hands and feet. I feel all my best faculties concentrated in it. My instinct tells me that my head is an organ for burrowing, as some creatures use their snout and fore paws, and with it I would mine and burrow my way through these hills I think that the richest vein is somewhere hereabouts, so by the divining-rod and thin rising vapors I judge, and here I will begin to mine

SOUNDS

BUT while we are confined to books, though the most select and classic, and read only particular written languages, which are themselves but dialects and provincial, we are in danger of forgetting the language which all things and events speak without metaphor, which alone is copious and standard Much is published, but little printed The rays which stream through the shutter will be no longer remembered when the shutter is wholly removed No method nor discipline can supersede the necessity of being forever on the alert What is a course of history or philosophy, or poetry, no matter how well selected, or the best society, or the most admirable routine of life, compared with the discipline of looking always at what is to be seen? Will you be a reader, a student merely, or a seer? Read your fate, see what is before you, and walk on into futurity

I did not read books the first summer, I hoed beans Nay, I often did better than this There were times when I could not afford to sacrifice the bloom of the present moment to any work, whether of the head or hands I love a broad margin to my life. Sometimes, in a summer morning, having taken my accustomed bath, I sat in my sunny doorway from sunrise till noon, rapt in a revery, amidst the pines and hickories and sumachs, in undisturbed solitude and stillness, while the birds sang around or flitted noiseless through the house, until by the sun falling in at my west window, or the noise of some traveller's wagon on the distant highway, I was reminded of the lapse of time I grew in those seasons like corn in the night, and they were far better than any work of the hands would have been They were not time subtracted from my life, but so much over and above my usual allowance I realized what the Orientals mean by contemplation and the forsaking of works For the most part, I munded not how the hours went. The day advanced as if to light some work of mine, it was morning, and lo, now it is evening, and nothing memorable is accomplished Instead of singing like the birds, I silently smiled at my incessant good fortune As the sparrow had its trill, sitting on the hickory before my door, so had I my chuckle or suppressed warble which he might hear out of my nest My days were not days of the week, bearing the stamp of any heathen deity, nor were they minced into hours and fretted by the ticking of a clock, for I lived like the Puri Indians, of whom it is said that 'for yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow they have only one word, and they express the variety of meaning by pointing backward for yesterday, forward for to-morrow, and overhead for the passing day.' This was sheer idleness to my fellow-townsmen, no doubt, but if the birds and flowers had tried me by their standard, I should not have been found wanting A man must find his occasions in himself, it is true The natural day is very calm, and will hardly reprove his indolence

I had this advantage, at least, in my mode of life, over those who were obliged to look abroad for amusement, to society and the theatre, that my life itself was become my amusement and never ceased to be novel. It was a drama of many scenes and without an end If we were always indeed getting our living, and regulating our lives according to the last and best mode we had learned, we should never be troubled with ennui Follow your genius closely enough, and it will not fail to show you a fresh prospect every hour Housework was a pleasant pastime When my floor was dirty, I rose early, and, setting all my furniture out of doors on the grass, bed and bedstead making but one budget, dashed water on the floor, and sprinkled white sand from the pond on it, and then with a broom scrubbed it clean and white, and by the time the villagers had broken their fast the morning sun had dried my house sufficiently to allow me to move in again, and my meditations were almost uninterrupted It was pleasant to see my whole household effects out on the grass, making a little pile like a gypsy's pack, and my three-legged table, from which I did not remove the books and pen and ink, standing amid the pines and hickories They seemed glad to get out themselves, and as if unwilling to be brought in. I was sometimes tempted to stretch an awning over them and take my seat there. It was worth the while to see the sun shine on these things, and hear the free wind blow on them, so much more interesting most familiar objects look out of doors than in the house. A bird sits on the next bough, life-everlasting grows under the table, and blackberry vines run round its legs, pine cones, chestnut burrs, and strawberry leaves are strewn about. It looked as if this was the way these forms came to be transferred to our furniture, to tables, chairs, and bedsteads—because they once stood in their midst.

My house was on the side of a hill, immediately on the edge of the larger wood, in the midst of a young forest of pitch pines and hickories, and half a dozen rods from the pond, to which a narrow footpath led down the hill. In my front yard grew the strawberry, blackberry, and life-everlasting, johnswort and goldenrod, shrub-oaks and sand-cherry, blueberry and groundnut. Near the end of May, the sand-cherry (cerasus pumila), adorned the sides of the path with its delicate flowers arranged in umbels cylindrically about its short stems, which last, in the fall, weighed down with good-sized and handsome cherries, fell over in wreaths like rays on every side. I tasted them out of compliment to Nature, though they were scarcely palatable. The sumach (rhus glabra) grew luxuriantly about the house, pushing up through the embankment which I had made, and growing five or six feet the first season. Its broad pinnate tropical leaf was pleasant though strange to look on. The large buds, suddenly pushing out late in the spring from dry sticks which had seemed to be dead, developed themselves as by magic into graceful green and tender boughs, an inch in diameter, and sometimes, as I sat at my window, so heedlessly did they grow and tax their weak joints, I heard a fresh and tender bough suddenly fall like a fan to the ground, when there was not a breath of air stirring, broken off by its own weight. In August, the large masses of berries, which, when in flower, had attracted many wild bees, gradually assumed their bright velvety crimson hue, and by their weight again bent down and broke the tender limbs.

As I sit at my window this summer afternoon, hawks are circling about my clearing; the tantivy of wild pigeons, flying by twos and threes athwart my view, or perching restless on the white pine boughs behind my house, gives a voice to the air, a fish-hawk dimples the glassy surface of the pond and brings up a fish, a mink steals out of the marsh before my door and seizes a frog by the shore, the sedge is bending under the weight of the reed-birds flitting hither and thither, and for the last half hour I have heard the rattle of railroad cars, now dying away and then reviving like the beat of a partridge, conveying travellers from Boston to the country. For I did not live so out of the world as that boy, who, as I hear, was put out to a farmer in the east part of the town, but ere long ran away and came home again, quite down at the heel and homesick. He had never seen such a dull and out-of-the-way place, the folks were all gone off, why, you couldn't even hear the whistle! I doubt if there is such a place in Massachusetts now—

'In truth, our village has become a butt For one of those fleet railroad shafts, and o'er
Our peaceful plain its soothing sound is—Concord.'

The Fitchburg Railroad touches the pond about a hundred rods south of where I dwell. I usually go to the village along its causeway, and am, as it were, related to society by this link. The men on the freight trains, who go over the whole length of the road, bow to me as to an old acquaintance, they pass me so often, and apparently they take me for an employee, and so I am. I too would fain be a track-repairer somewhere in the orbit of the earth.

The whistle of the locomotive penetrates my woods summer and winter, sounding like the scream of a hawk sailing over some farmer's yard, informing me that many restless city merchants are arriving within the circle of the town, or adventurous country traders from the other side. As they come under one horizon, they shout their warning to get off the track to the other, heard sometimes through the circles of two towns Here come your groceries, country, your rations, countrymen! Nor is there any man so independent on his farm that he can say them nay And here's your pay for them! screams the countryman's whistle, timber like long battering-rams going twenty miles an hour against the city's walls, and chairs enough to seat all the weary and heavy-laden that dwell within them With 10 such huge and lumbering civility the country hands a chair to the city All the Indian huckleberry hills are stripped, all the cranberry meadows are raked into the city Up comes the cotton, down goes the woven cloth, up comes the silk, down goes the woollen, up come the books, but down goes the wit that writes them

When I meet the engine with its train of cars moving off with planetary motion— or, rather, like a comet, for the beholder 20 knows not if with that velocity and with that direction it will ever revisit this system, since its orbit does not look like a returning curve—with its steam cloud like a banner streaming behind in golden and silver wreaths, like many a downy cloud which I have seen, high in the heavens, unfolding its masses to the light—as if this travelling demigod, this cloud-compeller, would ere 30 long take the sunset sky for the livery of his train, when I hear the iron horse make the hills echo with his snort like thunder, shaking the earth with his feet, and breathing fire and smoke from his nostrils (what kind of winged horse or fiery dragon they will put into the new Mythology I don't know), it seems as if the earth had got a race now worthy to inhabit it If all were as it seems, and men made the elements their servants 40 for noble ends! If the cloud that hangs over the engine were the perspiration of heroic deeds, or as beneficent as that which floats over the farmer's fields, then the elements and Nature herself would cheerfully accompany men on their errands and be their escort.

I watch the passage of the morning cars with the same feeling that I do the rising of the sun, which is hardly more regular 50 Their train of clouds stretching far behind and rising higher and higher, going to heaven while the cars are going to Boston, conceals the sun for a minute and casts my distant field into the shade, a celestial train beside which the petty train of cars which hugs the earth is but the barb of the spear The stabler of the iron horse was up early this winter morning by the light of the stars amid the mountains, to fodder and harness his steed Fire, too, was awakened thus early to put the vital heat in him and get him off If the enterprise were as innocent as it is early! If the snow lies deep, they 10 strap on his snow-shoes, and with the giant plough plough a furrow from the mountains to the sea-board, in which the cars, like a following drill-barrow, sprinkle all the restless men and floating merchandise in the country for seed All day the fire-steed flies over the country, stopping only that his master may rest, and I am awakened by his tramp and defiant snort at midnight, when in some remote glen in the woods he 20 fronts the elements incased in ice and snow, and he will reach his stall only with the morning star, to start once more on his travels without rest or slumber Or perchance, at evening, I hear him in his stable blowing off the superfluous energy of the day, that he may calm his nerves and cool his liver and brain for a few hours of iron slumber If the enterprise were as heroic and commanding as it is protracted and 30 unwearied!

Far through unfrequented woods on the confines of towns, where once only the hunter penetrated by day, in the darkest night dart these bright saloons without the knowledge of their inhabitants, this moment stopping at some brilliant station-house in town or city, where a social crowd is gathered, the next in the Dismal Swamp, scaring the owl and fox The startings and arrivals of the cars are now the epochs in the village day They go and come with such 40 regularity and precision, and their whistle can be heard so far, that the farmers set their clocks by them, and thus one well-conducted institution regulates a whole country Have not men improved somewhat in punctuality since the railroad was invented? Do they not talk and think faster in the depot than they did in the stage-50 office? There is something electrifying in the atmosphere of the former place I have been astonished at the miracles it has wrought; that some of my neighbors, who, I should have prophesied, once for all, would never get to Boston by so prompt a conveyance, are on hand when the bell rings. To do things 'railroad fashion' is now the by-word, and it is worth the while to be warned so often and so sincerely by any power to get off its track. There is no stopping to read the riot act, no firing over the heads of the mob, in this case. We have constructed a fate, an Atropos, that never turns aside. (Let that be the name of your engine.) Men are advertised that at a certain hour and minute these bolts will be shot toward particular points of the compass, yet it interferes with no man's business, and the children go to school on the other track. We live the steadier for it. We are all educated thus to be sons of Tell. The air is full of invisible bolts. Every path but your own is the path of fate. Keep on your own track, then.

What recommends commerce to me is its enterprise and bravery. It does not clasp its hands and pray to Jupiter. I see these men every day go about their business with more or less courage and content, doing more even than they suspect, and perchance better employed than they could have consciously devised. I am less affected by their heroism who stood up for half an hour in the front line at Buena Vista, than by the steady and cheerful valor of the men who inhabit the snow-plough for their winter quarters, who have not merely the three-o'clock in the morning courage, which Bonaparte thought was the rarest, but whose courage does not go to rest so early, who go to sleep only when the storm sleeps or the sinews of their iron steed are frozen. On this morning of the Great Snow, perchance, which is still raging and chilling men's blood, I hear the muffled tone of their engine bell from out the fog bank of their chilled breath, which announces that the cars are coming, without long delay, notwithstanding the veto of a New England north-east snow-storm, and I behold the ploughmen covered with snow and rime, their heads peering above the mould-board which is turning down other than daisies and the nests of field-mice, like boulders of the Sierra Nevada, that occupy an outside place in the universe.

Commerce is unexpectedly confident and serene, alert, adventurous, and unwearied. It is very natural in its methods withal, far more so than many fantastic enterprises and sentimental experiments, and hence its singular success. I am refreshed and expanded when the freight train rattles past me, and I smell the stores which go dispensing their odors all the way from Long Wharf to Lake Champlain, reminding me of foreign parts, of coral reefs, and Indian oceans, and tropical climes, and the extent of the globe. I feel more like a citizen of the world at the sight of the palm-leaf which will cover so many flaxen New England heads the next summer, the Manilla hemp and cocoa-nut husks, the old junk, gunny bags, scrap iron, and rusty nails. This carload of torn sails is more legible and interesting now than if they should be wrought into paper and printed books. Who can write so graphically the history of the storms they have weathered as these rents have done? They are proof-sheets which need no correction. Here goes lumber from the Maine woods, which did not go out to sea in the last freshet, risen four dollars on the thousand because of what did go out or was split up, pine, spruce, cedar—first, second, third, and fourth qualities, so lately all of one quality, to wave over the bear, and moose, and caribou. Next rolls Thomaston lime, a prime lot, which will get far among the hills before it gets slacked. These rags in bales, of all hues and qualities, the lowest condition to which cotton and linen descend, the final result of dress—of patterns which are now no longer cried up, unless it be in Milwaukee, as those splendid articles, English, French, or American prints, gingham, muslins, etc.—gathered from all quarters both of fashion and poverty, going to become paper of one color or a few shades only, on which, forsooth, will be written tales of real life, high and low, and founded on fact! This closed car smells of salt fish, the strong New England and commercial scent, reminding me of the Grand Banks and the fisheries. Who has not seen a salt fish, thoroughly cured for this world, so that nothing can spoil it, and putting the perseverance of the saints to the blush? with which you may sweep or pave the streets, and split your kindlings, and the teamster shelter himself and his lading against sun, wind, and rain behind it—and the trader, as a Concord trader once did, hang it up by his door for a sign when he commences business, until at last his oldest customer cannot tell surely whether it be animal, vegetable, or mineral, and yet it shall be as pure as a snowflake, and if it be put into a pot and boiled, will come out an excellent dun fish for a Saturday's dinner. Next Spanish hudes, with the tails still preserving their twist and the angle of elevation they had when the oxen that wore them were careering over the pampas of the Spanish main—a type of all obstinacy, and evincing how almost hopeless and incurable are all constitutional vices. I confess, that practically speaking, when I have learned a man's real disposition, I have no hopes of changing it for the better or worse in this state of existence. As the Orientals say, 'A cur's tail may be warmed, and pressed, and bound round with ligatures, and after a twelve years' labor bestowed upon it, still it will retain its natural form.' The only effectual cure for such inveteracies as these tails exhibit is to make glue of them, which I believe is what is usually done with them, and then they will stay put and stick. Here is a hog-head of molasses or of brandy directed to John Smith, Cuttunsville, Vermont, some trader among the Green Mountains, who imports for the farmers near his clearing, and now perchance stands over his bulk-head and thinks of the last arrivals on the coast, how they may affect the price for him, telling his customers this moment, as he has told them twenty times before this morning, that he expects some by the next train of prime quality. It is advertised in the Cuttunsville Times.

While these things go up other things come down. Warned by the whizzing sound, I look up from my book and see some tall pine, hewn on far northern hills, which has winged its way over the Green Mountains and the Connecticut, shot like an arrow through the township within ten minutes, and scarce another eye beholds it, going 'to be the mast

Of some great ammiral'

And hark! here comes the cattle-train bearing the cattle of a thousand hills, sheepcots, stables, and cow-yards in the air, drovers with their sticks, and shepherd boys in the midst of their flocks, all but the mountain pastures, whirled along like leaves blown from the mountains by the September gales. The air is filled with the bleating of calves and sheep, and the hustling of oxen, as if a pastoral valley were going by. When the old bell-wether at the head rattles his bell, the mountains do indeed skip like rams and the little hills like lambs. A car-load of drovers, too, in the midst, on a level with their droves now, their vocation gone, but still clinging to their useless sticks as their badge of office. But their dogs, where are they? It is a stampede to them, they are quite thrown out, they have lost the scent. Methinks I hear them barking behind the Peterboro' Hills, or panting up the western slope of the Green Mountains. They will not be in at the death. Their vocation, too, is gone. Their fidelity and sagacity are below par now. They will slink back to their kennels in disgrace, or perchance run wild and strike a league with the wolf and the fox. So is your pastoral life whirled past and away. But the bell rings, and I must get off the track and let the cars go by—

What's the railroad to me?
I never go to see Where it ends
It fills a few hollows,
And makes banks for the swallows,
It sets the sand a-blowing,
And the blackberries a-growing, but I cross it like a cart-path in the woods. I will not have my eyes put out and my ears spoiled by its smoke and steam and hissing

Now that the cars are gone by and all the restless world with them, and the fishes in the pond no longer feel their rumbling, I am more alone than ever. For the rest of the long afternoon, perhaps, my meditations are interrupted only by the faint rattle of a carriage or team along the distant highway.

Sometimes, on Sundays, I heard the bells, the Lincoln, Acton, Bedford, or Concord bell, when the wind was favorable, a faint, sweet, and, as it were, natural melody, worth importing into the wilderness. At a sufficient distance over the woods this sound acquires a certain vibratory hum, as if the pine needles in the horizon were the strings of a harp which it swept All sound heard at the greatest possible distance produces one and the same effect, a vibration of the universal lyre, just as the intervening atmosphere makes a distant ridge of earth interesting to our eyes by the azure tint it imparts to it There came to me in this case a melody which the air had strained, and which had conversed with every leaf and needle of the wood, that portion of the sound which the elements had taken up and modulated and echoed from vale to vale The echo is, to some extent, an original sound, and therein is the magic and charm of it It is not merely a repetition of what was worth repeating in the bell, but partly the voice of the wood, the same trivial words and notes sung by a wood-nymph

At evening, the distant lowing of some cow in the horizon beyond the woods sounded sweet and melodious, and at first I would mistake it for the voices of certain minstrels by whom I was sometimes serenaded, who might be straying over hill and dale, but soon I was not unpleasantly disappointed when it was prolonged into the cheap and natural music of the cow I do not mean to be satirical, but to express my appreciation of those youths' singing, when I state that I perceived clearly that it was akin to the music of the cow, and they were at length one articulation of Nature

Regularly at half past seven, in one part of the summer, after the evening train had gone by, the whippoorwills chanted their vespers for half an hour, sitting on a stump by my door, or upon the ridge pole of the house They would begin to sing almost with as much precision as a clock, within five minutes of a particular time, referred to the setting of the sun, every evening I had a rare opportunity to become acquainted with their habits Sometimes I heard four or five at once in different parts of the wood, by accident one a bar behind another, and so near me that I distinguished not only the cluck after each note, but often that singular buzzing sound like a fly in a spider's web, only proportionally louder Sometimes one would circle round and round me in the woods a few feet distant as if tethered by a string, when probably I was near its eggs They sang at intervals throughout the night, and were again as musical as ever just before and about dawn

When other birds are still the screech owls take up the strain, like mourning women their ancient u-lu-lu Their dismal scream is truly Ben Jonsonian Wise midnight hags! It is no honest and blunt tu-whit tu-who of the poets, but, without jesting, a most solemn graveyard ditty, the mutual consolations of suicide lovers remembering the pangs and the delights of supernal love in the infernal groves Yet I love to hear their wailing, their doleful responses, trilled along the woodside, reminding me sometimes of music and singing birds, as if it were the dark and tearful side of music, the regrets and sighs that would fain be sung They are the spirits, the low spirits and melancholy forebodings, of fallen souls that once in human shape night-walked the earth and did the deeds of darkness, now expiating their sins with their wailing hymns or threnodies in the scenery of their transgressions They give me a new sense of the variety and capacity of that nature which is our common dwelling Oh-o-o-o-o that I never had been bor-r-r-r-r-n' sighs one on this side of the pond, and circles with the restlessness of despair to some new perch on the gray oaks Then—That I never had been bor-r-r-r-r-n' echoes another on the farther side with tremulous sincerity, and—bor-r-r-r-r-n' comes faintly from far in the Lincoln woods

I was also serenaded by a hooting owl Near at hand you could fancy it the most melancholy sound in Nature, as if she meant by this to stereotype and make permanent in her choir the dying moans of a human being—some poor weak relic of mortality who has left hope behind, and howls like an animal, yet with human sobs, on entering the dark valley, made more awful by a certain gurgling melodiousness—I find myself beginning with the letters gl when I try to imitate it—expressive of a mind which has reached the gelatinous mildewy stage in the mortification of all healthy and courageous thought It reminded me of ghouls and idiots and insane howlings But now one answers from far woods in a strain made really melodious by distance—Hoo hoo hoo, hoorer hoo, and indeed for the most part it suggested only pleasing associations, whether heard by day or night, summer or winter

I rejoice that there are owls. Let them do the idiotic and maniacal hooting for men. It is a sound admirably suited to swamps and twilight woods which no day illustrates, suggesting a vast and undeveloped nature which men have not recognized. They represent the stark twilight and unsatisfied thoughts which all have. All day the sun has shone on the surface of some savage swamp, where the single spruce stands hung with usnea lichens, and small hawks circulate above, and the chickadee lisps amid the evergreens, and the partridge and rabbit skulk beneath, but now a more dismal and fitting day dawns, and a different race of creatures awakes to express the meaning of Nature there.

Late in the evening I heard the distant rumbling of wagons over bridges—a sound heard farther than almost any other at night—the baying of dogs, and sometimes again the lowing of some disconsolate cow in a distant barnyard. In the meanwhile all the shore rang with the trump of bullfrogs, the sturdy spirits of ancient wine-bibbers and wassailers, still unrepentant, trying to sing a catch in their Stygian lake—if the Walden nymphs will pardon the comparison, for though there are almost no weeds, there are frogs there—who would fain keep up the hilarious rules of their old festal tables, though their voices have waxed hoarse and solemnly grave, mocking at mirth, and the wine has lost its flavor, and become only liquor to distend their paunches, and sweet intoxication never comes to drown the memory of the past, but mere saturation and waterloggedness and distention. The most aldermanic, with his chin upon a heart-leaf, which serves for a napkin to his drooling chaps, under this northern shore quaffs a deep draught of the once scorned water, and passes round a cup with the ejaculation tr-r-r-oonk, tr-r-r-oonk, tr-r-r-oonk! and straightway comes over the water from some distant cove the same password repeated, where the next in seniority and girth has gulped down to his mark, and when this observance has made the circuit of the shores, then ejaculates the master of ceremonies, with satisfaction, tr-r-r-oonk! and each in his turn repeats the same down to the least distended, leakiest, and flabbiest paunched, that there be no mistake, and then the bowl goes round again and again, until the sun disperses the morning mist, and only the patriarch is not under the pond, but vainly bellowing troonk from time to time, and pausing for a reply.

I am not sure that ever I heard the sound of cock-crowing from my clearing, and I thought that it might be worth the while to keep a cockerel for his music merely, as a singing bird. The note of this once wild Indian pheasant is certainly the most remarkable of any bird's, and if they could be naturalized without being domesticated, it would soon become the most famous sound in our woods, surpassing the clangor of the goose and the hooting of the owl, and then imagine the cackling of the hens to fill the pauses when their lords' clarions rested! No wonder that man added this bird to his tame stock—to say nothing of the eggs and drumsticks. To walk in a winter morning in a wood where these birds abounded, their native woods, and hear the wild cockerels crow on the trees, clear and shrill for miles over the resounding earth, drowning the feebler notes of other birds—think of it! It would put nations on the alert. Who would not be early to rise, and rise earlier and earlier every successive day of his life, till he became unspeakably healthy, wealthy, and wise? This foreign bird's note is celebrated by the poets of all countries along with the notes of their native songsters. All climates agree with brave Chanticleer. He is more indigenous even than the natives. His health is ever good, his lungs are sound, his spirits never flag. Even the sailor on the Atlantic and Pacific is awakened by his voice, but its shrill sound never roused me from my slumbers. I kept neither dog, cat, cow, pig, nor hens, so that you would have said there was a deficiency of domestic sounds, neither the churn, nor the spinning-wheel, nor even the singing of the kettle, nor the hissing of the urn, nor children crying, to comfort one. An old-fashioned man would have lost his senses or died of ennui before this. Not even rats in the wall, for they were starved out, or rather were never baited in—only squirrels on the roof and under the floor, a whippoorwill on the ridge-pole, a blue-jay screaming beneath the window, a hare or woodchuck under the house, a screech-owl or a cat-owl behind it, a flock of wild geese or a laughing loon on the pond, and a fox to bark in the night. Not even a lark or an oriole, those mild plantation birds, ever visited my clearing. No cockerels to crow nor hens to cackle in the yard. No yard! but unfenced Nature reaching up to your very sills. A young forest growing up under your windows, and wild sumachs and blackberry vines breaking through into your cellar, sturdy pitch pines rubbing and creaking against the shingles for want of room, their roots reaching quite under the house. Instead of a scuttle or a blind blown off in the gale—a pine tree snapped off or torn up by the roots behind your house for fuel. Instead of no path to the front-yard gate in the Great Snow—no gate—no front-yard—and no path to the civilized world!

VISITORS

I THINK that I love society as much as most, and am ready enough to fasten myself like a bloodsucker for the time to any full-blooded man that comes in my way. I am naturally no hermit, but might possibly sit out the sturdiest frequenter of the bar-room, if my business called me thither.

I had three chairs in my house, one for solitude, two for friendship, three for society. When visitors came in larger and unexpected numbers there was but the third chair for them all, but they generally economized the room by standing up. It is surprising how many great men and women a small house will contain. I have had twenty-five or thirty souls, with their bodies, at once under my roof, and yet we often parted without being aware that we had come very near to one another. Many of our houses, both public and private, with their almost innumerable apartments, their huge halls and their cellars for the storage of wines and other munitions of peace, appear to me extravagantly large for their inhabitants. They are so vast and magnificent that the latter seem to be only vermin which infest them. I am surprised when the herald blows his summons before some Tremont, or Astor, or Middlesex House, to see come creeping out over the piazza for all inhabitants a ridiculous mouse, which soon again slinks into some hole in the pavement.

One inconvenience I sometimes experienced in so small a house, the difficulty of getting to a sufficient distance from my guest when we began to utter the big thoughts in big words. You want room for your thoughts to get into sailing trim and run a course or two before they make their port. The bullet of your thought must have overcome its lateral and ricochet motion and fallen into its last and steady course before it reaches the ear of the hearer, else it may plough out again through the side of his head. Also, our sentences wanted room to unfold and form their columns in the interval. Individuals, like nations, must have suitable broad and natural boundaries, even a considerable neutral ground, between them. I have found it a singular luxury to talk across the pond to a companion on the opposite side. In my house we were so near that we could not begin to hear—we could not speak low enough to be heard, as when you throw two stones into calm water so near that they break each other's undulations. If we are merely loquacious and loud talkers, then we can afford to stand very near together, cheek by jowl, and feel each other's breath, but if we speak reservedly and thoughtfully, we want to be farther apart, that all animal heat and moisture may have a chance to evaporate. If we would enjoy the most intimate society with that in each of us which is without, or above, being spoken to, we must not only be silent, but commonly so far apart bodily that we cannot possibly hear each other's voice in any case. Referred to this standard, speech is for the convenience of those who are hard of hearing, but there are many fine things which we cannot say if we have to shout. As the conversation began to assume a loftier and grander tone, we gradually shoved our chairs farther apart till they touched the wall in opposite corners, and then commonly there was not room enough.

My 'best' room, however—my withdrawing room—always ready for company, on whose carpet the sun rarely fell, was the pine wood behind my house. Thither in summer days, when distinguished guests came, I took them, and a priceless domestic swept the floor and dusted the furniture and kept the things in order.

If one guest came he sometimes partook of my frugal meal, and it was no interruption to conversation to be stirring a hasty-pudding, or watching the rising and maturing of a loaf of bread in the ashes, in the meanwhile. But if twenty came and sat in my house there was nothing said about dinner, though there might be bread enough for two, more than if eating were a forsaken habit, but we naturally practised abstinence, and this was never felt to be an offence against hospitality, but the most proper and considerate course. The waste and decay of physical life, which so often needs repair, seemed miraculously retarded in such a case, and the vital vigor stood its ground. I could entertain thus a thousand as well as twenty, and if any ever went away disappointed or hungry from my house when they found me at home, they may depend upon it that I sympathized with them at least. So easy is it, though many housekeepers doubt it, to establish new and better customs in the place of the old. You need not rest your reputation on the dinners you give. For my own part, I was never so effectually deterred from frequenting a man's house, by any kind of Cerberus whatever, as by the parade one made about dining me, which I took to be a very polite and roundabout hint never to trouble him so again. I think I shall never revisit those scenes. I should be proud to have for the motto of my cabin those lines of Spenser which one of my visitors inscribed on a yellow walnut leaf for a card —

'Arrivèd there, the little house they fill, Ne looke for entertainment where none was,
 Rest is their feast, and all things at their will
 The noblest mind the best contentment has.'

When Winslow, afterward governor of the Plymouth Colony, went with a companion on a visit of ceremony to Massasoit on foot through the woods, and arrived tired and hungry at his lodge, they were well received by the king, but nothing was said about eating that day. When the night arrived, to quote their own words—'He laid us on the bed with himself and his wife, they at the one end and we at the other, it being only plank, laid a foot from the ground, and a thin mat upon them. Two more of his chief men, for want of room, pressed by and upon us, so that we were worse weary of our lodging than of our journey.' At one o'clock the next day Massasoit 'brought two fishes that he had shot,' about thrice as big as a bream, 'these being boiled, there were at least forty looked for a share in them. The most ate of them. This meal only we had in two nights and a day, and had not one of us bought a partridge, we had taken our journey fasting.' Fearing that they would be light-headed for want of food and also sleep, owing to 'the savages' barbarous singing, (for they used to sing themselves asleep), and that they might get home while they had strength to travel, they departed. As for lodging, it is true they were but poorly entertained, though what they found an inconvenience was no doubt intended for an honor, but as far as eating was concerned, I do not see how the Indians could have done better. They had nothing to eat themselves, and they were wiser than to think that apologies could supply the place of food to their guests, so they drew their belts tighter and said nothing about it. Another time when Winslow visited them, it being a season of plenty with them, there was no deficiency in this respect.

As for men, they will hardly fail one anywhere. I had more visitors while I lived in the woods than at any other period of my life, I mean that I had some. I met several there under more favorable circumstances than I could anywhere else. But fewer came to see me upon trivial business. In this respect, my company was winnowed by my mere distance from town. I had withdrawn so far within the great ocean of solitude, into which the rivers of society empty, that for the most part, so far as my needs were concerned, only the finest sediment was deposited around me. Beside, there were wafted to me evidences of unexplored and uncultivated continents on the other side.

Who should come to my lodge this morning but a true Homeric or Paphlagonian man—he had so suitable and poetic a name that I am sorry I cannot print it here—a Canadian, a wood-chopper and post-maker, who can hole fifty posts in a day, who made his last supper on a woodchuck which his dog caught He, too, has heard of Homer, and, 'if it were not for books,' would 'not know what to do rainy days,' though perhaps he has not read one wholly through for many rainy seasons Some priest who could pronounce the Greek itself taught him to read his verse in the testament in his native parish far away, and now I must translate to him, while he holds the book, Achilles' reproof to Patroclus for his sad countenance — 'Why are you in tears, Patroclus, like a young girl?'

'Or have you alone heard some news from Phthia?

They say that Menœtius lives yet, son of Actor,

And Peleus lives, son of Æacus, among the Myrmidons,

Either of whom having died, we should greatly grieve '

He says, 'That's good ' He has a great bundle of white-oak bark under his arm for a sick man, gathered this Sunday morning 'I suppose there's no harm in going after such a thing to-day,' says he To him Homer was a great writer, though what his writing was about he did not know. A more simple and natural man it would be hard to find Vice and disease, which cast such a sombre moral hue over the world, seemed to have hardly any existence for him He was about twenty-eight years old, and had left Canada and his father's house a dozen years before to work in the States, and earn money to buy a farm with at last, perhaps in his native country He was cast in the coarsest mould, a stout but sluggish body, yet gracefully carried, with a thick sunburnt neck, dark bushy hair, and dull, sleepy blue eyes, which were occasionally lit up with expression He wore a flat gray cloth cap, a dingy wool-colored great-coat, and cowhide boots He was a great consumer of meat, usually carrying his dinner to his work a couple of miles past my house—for he chopped all summer—in a tin pail, cold meats, often cold woodchucks, and coffee in a stone bottle which dangled by a string from his belt, and sometimes he offered me a drink He came along early, crossing my bean-field, though without anxiety or haste to get to his work, such as Yankees exhibit He wasn't a-going to hurt himself He didn't care if he only earned his board Frequently he would leave his dinner in the bushes, when his dog had caught a woodchuck by the way, and go back a mile and a half to dress it and leave it in the cellar of the house where he boarded, after deliberating first for half an hour whether he could not sink it in the pond safely till nightfall—loving to dwell long upon these themes He would say, as he went by in the morning, 'How thick the pigeons are! If working every day were not my trade, I could get all the meat I should want by hunting—pigeons, woodchucks, rabbits, partridges—by gosh! I could get all I should want for a week in one day '

He was a skilful chopper, and indulged in some flourishes and ornaments in his art He cut his trees level and close to the ground, that the sprouts which came up afterwards might be more vigorous and a sled might slide over the stumps, and instead of leaving a whole tree to support his corded wood, he would pare it away to a slender stake or splinter which you could break off with your hand at last

He interested me because he was so quiet and solitary and so happy withal, a well of good humor and contentment which overflowed at his eyes His mirth was without alloy Sometimes I saw him at his work in the woods, felling trees, and he would greet me with a laugh of inexpressible satisfaction, and a salutation in Canadian French, though he spoke English as well When I approached him he would suspend his work, and with half-suppressed mirth lie along the trunk of a pine which he had felled, and, peeling off the inner bark, roll it up into a ball and chew it while he laughed and talked Such an exuberance of animal spirits had he that he sometimes tumbled down and rolled on the ground with laughter at anything which made him think and tickled him Looking round upon the trees he would exclaim—'By George! I can enjoy myself well enough here chopping, I want no better sport ' Sometimes, when at leisure, he amused himself all day in the woods with a pocket pistol, firing salutes to himself at regular intervals as he walked In the winter he had a fire by which at noon he warmed his coffee in a kettle, and as he sat on a log to eat his dinner the chucadees would sometimes come round and alight on his arm and peck at the potato in his fingers, and he said that he 'liked to have the little fellers about him'

In him the animal man chiefly was developed. In physical endurance and contentment he was cousin to the pine and the rock. I asked him once if he was not sometimes tired at night, after working all day, and he answered, with a sincere and serious look, 'Gorrappit, I never was tired in my life.' But the intellectual and what is called spiritual man in him were slumbering as in an infant. He had been instructed only in that innocent and ineffectual way in which the Catholic priests teach the aborigines, by which the pupil is never educated to the degree of consciousness, but only to the degree of trust and reverence, and a child is not made a man, but kept a child. When Nature made him, she gave him a strong body and contentment for his portion, and propped him on every side with reverence and reliance, that he might live out his threescore years and ten a child. He was so genuine and unsophisticated that no introduction would serve to introduce him, more than if you introduced a woodchuck to your neighbor. He had got to find him out as you did. He would not play any part. Men paid him wages for work, and so helped to feed and clothe him, but he never exchanged opinions with them. He was so simply and naturally humble—if he can be called humble—who never aspires—that humility was no distinct quality in him, nor could he conceive of it. Wiser men were demigods to him. If you told him that such a one was coming, he did as if he thought that anything so grand would expect nothing of himself, but take all the responsibility on itself, and let him be forgotten still. He never heard the sound of praise. He particularly revered the writer and the preacher. Their performances were miracles. When I told him that I wrote considerably, he thought for a long time that it was merely the handwriting which I meant, for he could write a remarkably good hand himself. I sometimes found the name of his native parish handsomely written in the snow by the highway, with the proper French accent, and knew that he had passed. I asked him if he ever wished to write his thoughts. He said that he had read and written letters for those who could not, but he never tried to write thoughts—no, he could not, he could not tell what to put first, it would kill him, and then there was spelling to be attended to at the same time!

I heard that a distinguished wise man and reformer asked him if he did not want the world to be changed, but he answered with a chuckle of surprise in his Canadian accent, not knowing that the question had ever been entertained before, 'No, I like it well enough.' It would have suggested many things to a philosopher to have dealings with him. To a stranger he appeared to know nothing of things in general, yet I sometimes saw in him a man whom I had not seen before, and I did not know whether he was as wise as Shakespeare or as simply ignorant as a child—whether to suspect him of a fine poetic consciousness or of stupidity. A townsman told me that when he met him sauntering through the village in his small close-fitting cap, and whistling to himself, he reminded him of a prince in disguise.

His only books were an almanac and an arithmetic, in which last he was considerably expert. The former was a sort of cyclopædia to him, which he supposed to contain an abstract of human knowledge, as indeed it does to a considerable extent. I loved to sound him on the various reforms of the day, and he never failed to look at them in the most simple and practical light. He had never heard of such things before. Could he do without factories? I asked. He had worn the home-made Vermont gray, he said, and that was good. Could he dispense with tea and coffee? Did this country afford any beverage beside water? He had soaked hemlock leaves in water and drank it, and thought that was better than water in warm weather. When I asked him if he could do without money, he showed the convenience of money in such a way as to suggest and coincide with the most philosophical accounts of the origin of this institution, and the very derivation of the word pecunia. If an ox were his property, and he wished to get needles and thread at the store, he thought it would be inconvenient and impossible soon to go on mortgaging some portion of the creature each time to that amount. He could defend many institutions better than any philosopher, because, in describing them as they concerned him, he gave the true reason for their prevalence, and speculation had not suggested to him any other. At another time, hearing Plato's definition of a man—a biped without feathers—and that one exhibited a cock plucked and called it Plato's man, he thought it an important difference that the knees bent the wrong way. He would sometimes exclaim, 'How I love to talk! By George, I could talk all day!' I asked him once, when I had not seen him for many months, if he had got a new idea this summer. 'Good Lord,' said he, 'a man that has to work as I do, if he does not forget the ideas he has had, he will do well. May be the man you hoe with is inclined to race, then, by gorry, your mind must be there, you think of weeds.' He would sometimes ask me first on such occasions, if I had made any improvement. One winter day I asked him if he was always satisfied with himself, wishing to suggest a substitute within him for the priest without, and some higher motive for living. 'Satisfied!' said he, 'some men are satisfied with one thing, and some with another. One man, perhaps, if he has got enough, will be satisfied to sit all day with his back to the fire and his belly to the table, by George!' Yet I never, by any manœuvring, could get him to take the spiritual view of things, the highest that he appeared to conceive of was a simple expediency, such as you might expect an animal to appreciate, and this, practically, is true of most men. If I suggested any improvement in his mode of life, he merely answered, without expressing any regret, that it was too late. Yet he thoroughly believed in honesty and the like virtues.

There was a certain positive originality, however slight, to be detected in him, and I occasionally observed that he was thinking for himself and expressing his own opinion—a phenomenon so rare that I would any day walk ten miles to observe it, and it amounted to the re-origination of many of the institutions of society. Though he hesitated, and perhaps failed to express himself distinctly, he always had a presentable thought behind. Yet his thinking was so primitive and immersed in his animal life, that, though more promising than a merely learned man's, it rarely ripened to anything which can be reported. He suggested that there might be men of genius in the lowest grades of life, however permanently humble and illiterate, who take their own view always, or do not pretend to see at all—who are as bottomless even as Walden Pond was thought to be, though they may be dark and muddy.

Many a traveller came out of his way to see me and the inside of my house, and, as an excuse for calling, asked for a glass of water. I told them that I drank at the pond, and pointed thither, offering to lend them a dipper. Far off as I lived, I was not exempted from that annual visitation which occurs, methinks, about the first of April, when everybody is on the move, and I had my share of good luck, though there were some curious specimens among my visitors. Half-witted men from the almshouse and elsewhere came to see me, but I endeavored to make them exercise all the wit they had, and make their confessions to me, in such cases making wit the theme of our conversation, and so was compensated. Indeed, I found some of them to be wiser than the so-called overseers of the poor and selectmen of the town, and thought it was time that the tables were turned. With respect to wit, I learned that there was not much difference between the half and the whole. One day, in particular, an inoffensive, simple-minded pauper, whom with others I had often seen used as fencing stuff, standing or sitting on a bushel in the fields to keep cattle and himself from straying, visited me, and expressed a wish to live as I did. He told me, with the utmost simplicity and truth, quite superior, or rather inferior, to anything that is called humility, that he was 'deficient in intellect.' These were his words. The Lord had made him so, yet he supposed the Lord cared as much for him as for another. 'I have always been so,' said he, 'from my childhood, I never had much mind, I was not like other children, I am weak in the head. It was the Lord's will, I suppose.' And there he was to prove the truth of his words. He was a metaphysical puzzle to me. I have rarely met a fellow-man on such promising ground—it was so simple and sincere, and so true, all that he said. And, true enough, in proportion as he appeared to humble himself was he exalted. I did not know at first but it was the result of a wise policy. It seemed that from such a basis of truth and frankness as the poor weak-headed pauper had laid, our intercourse might go forward to something better than the intercourse of sages.

I had some guests from those not reckoned commonly among the town's poor, but who should be—who are among the world's poor, at any rate—guests who appeal, not to your hospitality, but to your hospitality, who earnestly wish to be helped, and preface their appeal with the information that they are resolved, for one thing, never to help themselves. I require of a visitor that he be not actually starving, though he may have the very best appetite in the world, however he got it. Objects of charity are not guests. Men who did not know when their visit had terminated, though I went about my business again, answering them from greater and greater remoteness. Men of almost every degree of wit called on me in the migrating season. Some who had more wits than they knew what to do with—runaway slaves, with plantation manners, who listened from time to time, like the fox in the fable, as if they heard the hounds a-baying on their track, and looked at me beseechingly, as much as to say—

'O Christian, will you send me back?'

One real runaway slave, among the rest, whom I had helped to forward toward the north star. Men of one idea, like a hen with one chicken, and that a duckling, men of a thousand ideas, and unkempt heads, like those hens which are made to take charge of a hundred chickens, all in pursuit of one bug, a score of them lost in every morning's dew—and become frizzled and mangy in consequence, men of ideas instead of legs, a sort of intellectual centipede that made you crawl all over. One man proposed a book in which visitors should write their names, as at the White Mountains, but, alas! I have too good a memory to make that necessary.

I could not but notice some of the peculiarities of my visitors. Girls and boys and young women generally seemed glad to be in the woods. They looked in the pond and at the flowers, and improved their time.

Men of business, even farmers, thought only of solitude and employment, and of the great distance at which I dwelt from something or other, and though they said that they loved a ramble in the woods occasionally, it was obvious that they did not. Restless, committed men, whose time was all taken up in getting a living or keeping it, ministers who spoke of God as if they enjoyed a monopoly of the subject, who could not bear all kinds of opinions, doctors, lawyers, uneasy housekeepers who pried into my cupboard and bed when I was out—how came Mrs. — to know that my sheets were not as clean as hers?—young men who had ceased to be young, and had concluded that it was safest to follow the beaten track of the professions—all these generally said that it was not possible to do so much good in my position. Ay! there was the rub. The old and infirm and the timid, of whatever age or sex, thought most of sickness, and sudden accident and death, to them life seemed full of danger—what danger is there if you don't think of any?—and they thought that a prudent man would carefully select the safest position, where Dr. B. might be on hand at a moment's warning. To them the village was literally a community, a league for mutual defence, and you would suppose that they would not go a-huckleberrying without a medicine chest. The amount of it is, if a man is alive, there is always danger that he may die, though the danger must be allowed to be less in proportion as he is dead-and-alive to begin with. A man sits as many risks as he runs. Finally, there were the self-styled reformers, the greatest bores of all, who thought that I was forever singing—

This is the house that I built,
This is the man that lives in the house that I built,

but they did not know that the third line was—

These are the folks that worry the man
That lives in the house that I built

I did not fear the hen-harriers, for I kept no chickens, but I feared the men-harriers rather.

I had more cheering visitors than the last Children come a-berrying, railroad men taking a Sunday morning walk in clean shirts, fishermen and hunters, poets and philosophers, in short, all honest pilgrims, who came out to the woods for freedom's sake, and really left the village behind, I was ready to greet with—'Welcome, Englishmen! welcome, Englishmen!' for I had had communication with that race

THE PONDS

SOMETIMES, having had a surfeit of human society and gossip, and worn out all my village friends, I rambled still farther westward than I habitually dwell, into yet more unfrequented parts of the town, 'to fresh woods and pastures new,' or, while the sun was setting, made my supper of huckleberries and blueberries on Fair Haven Hill, and laid up a store for several days. The fruits do not yield their true flavor to the purchaser of them, nor to him who raises them for the market. There is but one way to obtain it, yet few take that way. If you would know the flavor of huckleberries, ask the cow-boy or the partridge. It is a vulgar error to suppose that you have tasted huckleberries who never plucked them. A huckleberry never reaches Boston, they have not been known there since they grew on her three hills. The ambrosial and essential part of the fruit is lost with the bloom which is rubbed off in the market cart, and they become mere provender. As long as Eternal Justice reigns, not one innocent huckleberry can be transported thither from the country's hills.

Occasionally, after my hoeing was done for the day, I joined some impatient companion who had been fishing on the pond since morning, as silent and motionless as a duck or a floating leaf, and, after practising various kinds of philosophy, had concluded commonly, by the time I arrived, that he belonged to the ancient sect of Cœnobites. There was one older man, an excellent fisher and skilled in all kinds of woodcraft, who was pleased to look upon my house as a building erected for the convenience of fishermen, and I was equally pleased when he sat in my doorway to arrange his lines. Once in a while we sat together on the pond, he at one end of the boat, and I at the other, but not many words passed between us, for he had grown deaf in his later years, but he occasionally hummed a psalm, which harmonized well enough with my philosophy. Our intercourse was thus altogether one of unbroken harmony, far more pleasing to remember than if it had been carried on by speech. When, as was commonly the case, I had none to commune with, I used to raise the echoes by striking with a paddle on the side of my boat, filling the surrounding woods with circling and dilating sound, stirring them up as the keeper of a menagerie his wild beasts, until I elicited a growl from every wooded vale and hillside.

In warm evenings I frequently sat in the boat playing the flute, and saw the perch, which I seemed to have charmed, hovering around me, and the moon travelling over the ribbed bottom, which was strewn with the wrecks of the forest. Formerly I had come to this pond adventurously, from time to time, in dark summer nights, with a companion, and making a fire close to the water's edge, which we thought attracted the fishes, we caught pouts with a bunch of worms strung on a thread, and when we had done, far in the night, threw the burning brands high into the air like skyrockets, which, coming down into the pond, were quenched with a loud hissing, and we were suddenly groping in total darkness. Through this, whistling a tune, we took our way to the haunts of men again. But now I had made my home by the shore.

Sometimes, after staying in a village parlor till the family had all retired, I have returned to the woods, and, partly with a view to the next day's dinner, spent the hours of midnight fishing from a boat by moonlight, serenaded by owls and foxes, and hearing, from time to time, the creaking note of some unknown bird close at hand. These experiences were very memorable and valuable to me—anchored in forty feet of water, and twenty or thirty rods from the shore, surrounded sometimes by thousands of small perch and shiners, dimpling the surface with their tails in the moonlight, and communicating by a long flaxen line with mysterious nocturnal fishes which had their dwelling forty feet below, or sometimes dragging sixty feet of line about the pond as I drifted in the gentle night breeze, now and then feeling a slight vibration along it, indicative of some life prowling about its extremity, of dull uncertain blundering purpose there, and slow to make up its mind. At length you slowly raise, pulling hand over hand, some horned pout squeaking and squirming to the upper air. It was very queer, especially in dark nights, when your thoughts had wandered to vast and cosmogonical themes in other spheres, to feel this faint jerk, which came to interrupt your dreams and link you to Nature again. It seemed as if I might next cast my line upward into the air, as well as downward into this element which was scarcely more dense. Thus I caught two fishes as it were with one hook.

The scenery of Walden is on a humble scale, and, though very beautiful, does not approach grandeur, nor can it much concern one who has not long frequented it or lived by its shore, yet this pond is so remarkable for its depth and purity as to merit a particular description. It is a clear and deep green well, half a mile long and a mile and three quarters in circumference, and contains about sixty-one and a half acres, a perennial spring in the midst of pine and oak woods, without any visible inlet or outlet except by the clouds and evaporation. The surrounding hills rise abruptly from the water to the height of forty to eighty feet, though on the southeast and east they attain to about one hundred and one hundred and fifty feet respectively, within a quarter and a third of a mile. They are exclusively woodland. All our Concord waters have two colors at least, one when viewed at a distance, and another, more proper, close at hand. The first depends more on the light, and follows the sky. In clear weather, in summer, they appear blue at a little distance, especially if agitated, and at a great distance all appear alike. In stormy weather they are sometimes of a dark slate color. The sea, however, is said to be blue one day and green another without any perceptible change in the atmosphere. I have seen our river, when, the landscape being covered with snow, both water and ice were almost as green as grass. Some consider blue 'to be the color of pure water, whether liquid or solid.' But, looking directly down into our waters from a boat, they are seen to be of very different colors. Walden is blue at one time and green at another, even from the same point of view. Lying between the earth and the heavens, it partakes of the color of both. Viewed from a hilltop it reflects the color of the sky, but near at hand it is of a yellowish tint next the shore where you can see the sand, then a light green, which gradually deepens to a uniform dark green in the body of the pond. In some lights, viewed even from a hilltop, it is of a vivid green next the shore. Some have referred this to the reflection of the verdure, but it is equally green there against the railroad sand-bank, and in the spring, before the leaves are expanded, and it may be simply the result of the prevailing blue mixed with the yellow of the sand. Such is the color of its iris. This is that portion, also, where in the spring, the ice being warmed by the heat of the sun reflected from the bottom, and also transmitted through the earth, melts first and forms a narrow canal about the still frozen middle. Like the rest of our waters, when much agitated, in clear weather, so that the surface of the waves may reflect the sky at the right angle, or because there is more light mixed with it, it appears at a little distance of a darker blue than the sky itself, and at such a time, being on its surface, and looking with divided vision, so as to see the reflection, I have discerned a matchless and indescribable light blue, such as watered or changeable silks and sword blades suggest, more cerulean than the sky itself, alternating with the original dark green on the opposite sides of the waves, which last appeared but muddy in comparison. It is a vitreous greenish blue, as I remember it, like those patches of the winter sky seen through cloud vistas in the west before sundown. Yet a single glass of its water held up to the light is as colorless as an equal quantity of air. It is well known that a large plate of glass will have a green tint, owing, as the makers say, to its 'body,' but a small piece of the same will be colorless. How large a body of Walden water would be required to reflect a green tint I have never proved. The water of our river is black or a very dark brown to one looking directly down on it, and, like that of most ponds, imparts to the body of one bathing in it a yellowish tinge, but this water is of such crystalline purity that the body of the bather appears of an alabaster whiteness, still more unnatural, which, as the limbs are magnified and distorted withal, produces a monstrous effect, making fit studies for a Michael Angelo

The water is so transparent that the bottom can easily be discerned at the depth of twenty-five or thirty feet. Paddling over it, you may see many feet beneath the surface the schools of perch and shiners, perhaps only an inch long, yet the former easily distinguished by their transverse bars, and you think that they must be ascetic fish that find a subsistence there. Once, in the winter, many years ago, when I had been cutting holes through the ice in order to catch pickerel, as I stepped ashore I tossed my axe back on to the ice, but, as if some evil genius had directed it, it slid four or five rods directly into one of the holes, where the water was twenty-five feet deep. Out of curiosity, I lay down on the ice and looked through the hole, until I saw the axe a little on one side, standing on its head, with its helve erect and gently swaying to and fro with the pulse of the pond, and there it might have stood erect and swaying till in the course of time the handle rotted off, if I had not disturbed it. Making another hole directly over it with an ice chisel which I had, and cutting down the longest birch which I could find in the neighborhood with my knife, I made a slip noose, which I attached to its end, and, letting it down carefully, passed it over the knob of the handle, and drew it by a line along the birch, and so pulled the axe out again.

The shore is composed of a belt of smooth rounded white stones like paving stones, excepting one or two short sand beaches, and is so steep that in many places a single leap will carry you into the water over your head, and were it not for its remarkable transparency, that would be the last to be seen of its bottom till it rose on the opposite side. Some think it is bottomless. It is nowhere muddy, and a casual observer would say that there were no weeds at all in it, and of noticeable plants, except in the little meadows recently overflowed, which do not properly belong to it, a closer scrutiny does not detect a flag nor a bulrush, nor even a lily, yellow or white, but only a few small heart-leaves and potamogetons, and perhaps a water-target or two, all which however a bather might not perceive, and these plants are clean and bright like the element they grow in. The stones extend a rod or two into the water, and then the bottom is pure sand, except in the deepest parts, where there is usually a little sediment, probably from the decay of the leaves which have been wafted on to it so many successive falls, and a bright green weed is brought up on anchors even in midwinter.

We have one other pond just like this—White Pond in Nine Acre Corner, about two and a half miles westerly, but, though I am acquainted with most of the ponds within a dozen miles of this centre, I do not know a third of this pure and well-like character. Successive nations perchance have drank at, admired, and fathomed it, and passed away, and still its water is green and pellucid as ever. Not an intermitting spring! Perhaps on that spring morning when Adam and Eve were driven out of Eden, Walden Pond was already in existence, and even then breaking up in a gentle spring rain accompanied with mist and a southerly wind, and covered with myriads of ducks and geese, which had not heard of the fall, when still such pure lakes sufficed them. Even then it had commenced to rise and fall, and had clarified its waters and colored them of the hue they now wear, and obtained a patent of heaven to be the only Walden Pond in the world and distiller of celestial dews. Who knows in how many unremembered nations' literatures this has been the Castalian Fountain? or what nymphs presided over it in the Golden Age? It is a gem of the first water which Concord wears in her coronet.

Yet perchance the first who came to this well have left some trace of their footsteps. I have been surprised to detect encircling the pond, even where a thick wood has just been cut down on the shore, a narrow shelf-like path in the steep hill-side, alternately rising and falling, approaching and receding from the water's edge, as old probably as the race of man here, worn by the feet of aboriginal hunters, and still from time to time unwittingly trodden by the present occupants of the land. This is particularly distinct to one standing on the middle of the pond in winter, just after a light snow has fallen, appearing as a clear undulating white line, unobscured by weeds and twigs, and very obvious a quarter of a mile off in many places where in summer it is hardly distinguishable close at hand. The snow reprints it, as it were, in clear white type alto-relievo. The ornamented grounds of villas which will one day be built here may still preserve some trace of this.

The pond rises and falls, but whether regularly or not, and within what period, nobody knows, though, as usual, many pretend to know. It is commonly higher in the winter and lower in the summer, though not corresponding to the general wet and dryness. I can remember when it was a foot or two lower, and also when it was at least five feet higher, than when I lived by it. There is a narrow sand-bar running into it, with very deep water on one side, on which I helped boil a kettle of chowder, some six rods from the main shore, about the year 1824, which it has not been possible to do for twenty-five years, and on the other hand, my friends used to listen with incredulity when I told them, that a few years later I was accustomed to fish from a boat in a secluded cove in the woods, fifteen rods from the only shore they knew, which place was long since converted into a meadow. But the pond has risen steadily for two years, and now, in the summer of '52, is just five feet higher than when I lived there, or as high as it was thirty years ago, and fishing goes on again in the meadow. This makes a difference of level, at the outside, of six or seven feet, and yet the water shed by the surrounding hills is insignificant in amount, and this overflow must be referred to causes which affect the deep springs. This same summer the pond has begun to fall again. It is remarkable that this fluctuation, whether periodical or not, appears thus to require many years for its accomplishment. I have observed one rise and a part of two falls, and I expect that a dozen or fifteen years hence the water will again be as low as I have ever known it. Flints' Pond, a mile eastward, allowing for the disturbance occasioned by its inlets and outlets, and the smaller intermediate ponds also, sympathize with Walden, and recently attained their greatest height at the same time with the latter. The same is true, as far as my observation goes, of White Pond.

This rise and fall of Walden at long intervals serves this use at least, the water standing at this great height for a year or more, though it makes it difficult to walk round it, kills the shrubs and trees which have sprung up about its edge since the last rise—pitch-pines, birches, alders, aspens, and others—and, falling again, leaves an unobstructed shore, for, unlike many ponds and all waters which are subject to a daily tide, its shore is cleanest when the water is lowest. On the side of the pond next my house a row of pitch-pines fifteen feet high has been killed and tipped over as if by a lever, and thus a stop put to their encroachments, and their size indicates how many years have elapsed since the last rise to this height. By this fluctuation the pond asserts its title to a shore, and thus the shore is shorn, and the trees cannot hold it by right of possession. These are the lips of the lake, on which no beard grows. It licks its chops from time to time. When the water is at its height, the alders, willows, and maples send forth a mass of fibrous red roots several feet long from all sides of their stems in the water, and to the height of three or four feet from the ground, in the effort to maintain themselves, and I have known the high blueberry bushes about the shore, which commonly produce no fruit, bear an abundant crop under these circumstances.

Some have been puzzled to tell how the shore became so regularly paved. My townsmen have all heard the tradition—the oldest people tell me that they heard it in their youth—that anciently the Indians were holding a pow-wow upon a hill there, which rose as high into the heavens as the pond now sinks deep into the earth, and they used much profanity, as the story goes, though this vice is one of which the Indians were never guilty, and while they were thus engaged the hill shook and suddenly sank, and only one old squaw, named Walden, escaped, and from her the pond was named. It has been conjectured that when the hill shook, these stones rolled down its side and became the present shore. It is very certain, at any rate, that once there was no pond here, and now there is one, and this Indian fable does not in any respect conflict with the account of that ancient settler whom I have mentioned, who remembers so well when he first came here with his divining rod, saw a thin vapor rising from the sward, and the hazel pointed steadily downward, and he concluded to dig a well here. As for the stones, many still think that they are hardly to be accounted for by the action of the waves on these hills, but I observe that the surrounding hills are remarkably full of the same kind of stones, so that they have been obliged to pile them up in walls on both sides of the railroad cut nearest the pond, and, moreover, there are most stones where the shore is most abrupt, so that, unfortunately, it is no longer a mystery to me. I detect the paver. If the name was not derived from that of some English locality—Saffron Walden, for instance—one might suppose that it was called, originally, Walled-in Pond.

The pond was my well ready dug. For four months in the year its water is as cold as it is pure at all times, and I think that it is then as good as any, if not the best, in the town. In the winter, all water which is exposed to the air is colder than springs and wells which are protected from it. The temperature of the pond water which had stood in the room where I sat from five o'clock in the afternoon till noon the next day, the 6th of March, 1846, the thermometer having been up to 65° or 70° some of the time, owing partly to the sun on the roof, was 42°, or one degree colder than the water of one of the coldest wells in the village just drawn. The temperature of the Boiling Spring the same day was 45°, or the warmest of any water tried, though it is the coldest that I know of in summer, when, beside, shallow and stagnant surface water is not mingled with it. Moreover, in summer, Walden never becomes so warm as most water which is exposed to the sun, on account of its depth. In the warmest weather I usually placed a pailful in my cellar, where it became cool in the night, and remained so during the day, though I also resorted to a spring in the neighborhood. It was as good when a week old as the day it was dipped, and had no taste of the pump. Whoever camps for a week in summer by the shore of a pond, needs only bury a pail of water a few feet deep in the shade of his camp to be independent of the luxury of ice.

There have been caught in Walden pickerel, one weighing seven pounds, to say nothing of another which carried off a reel with great velocity, which the fisherman safely set down at eight pounds because he did not see him, perch and pouts, some of each weighing over two pounds, shiners, chivins or roach (Leuciscus pulchellus), a very few breams, and a couple of eels, one weighing four pounds—I am thus particular because the weight of a fish is commonly its only title to fame, and these are the only eels I have heard of here,—also, I have a faint recollection of a little fish some five inches long, with silvery sides and a greenish back, somewhat dace-like in its character, which I mention here chiefly to link my facts to fable. Nevertheless, this pond is not very fertile in fish. Its pickerel, though not abundant, are its chief boast. I have seen at one time lying on the ice pickerel of at least three different kinds, a long and shallow one, steel-colored, most like those caught in the river, a bright golden kind, with greenish reflections and remarkably deep, which is the most common here, and another, golden-colored, and shaped like the last, but peppered on the sides with small dark brown or black spots, intermixed with a few faint blood-red ones, very much like a trout. The specific name reticulatus would not apply to this, it should be guttatus rather. These are all very firm fish, and weigh more than their size promises. The shiners, pouts, and perch also, and indeed all the fishes which inhabit this pond, are much cleaner, handsomer, and firmer fleshed than those in the river and most other ponds, as the water is purer, and they can easily be distinguished from them. Probably many ichthyologists would make new varieties of some of them. There are also a clean race of frogs and tortoises, and a few mussels in it, muskrats and minks leave their traces about it, and occasionally a travelling mud-turtle visits it. Sometimes, when I pushed off my boat in the morning, I disturbed a great mud-turtle which had secreted himself under the boat in the night. Ducks and geese frequent it in the spring and fall, the white-bellied swallows (Hirundo bicolor) skim over it, and the peewees (Totanus macularius) 'teter' along its stony shores all summer. I have sometimes disturbed a fish-hawk sitting on a white-pine over the water, but I doubt if it is ever profaned by the wing of a gull, like Fair Haven. At most, it tolerates one annual loon. These are all the animals of consequence which frequent it now.

You may see from a boat, in calm weather, near the sandy eastern shore, where the water is eight or ten feet deep, and also in some other parts of the pond, some circular heaps half a dozen feet in diameter by a foot in height, consisting of small stones less than a hen's egg in size, where all around is bare sand. At first you wonder if the Indians could have formed them on the ice for any purpose, and so, when the ice melted, they sank to the bottom, but they are too regular and some of them plainly too fresh for that. They are similar to those found in rivers, but as there are no suckers nor lampreys here, I know not by what fish they could be made. Perhaps they are the nests of the chivin. These lend a pleasing mystery to the bottom.

The shore is irregular enough not to be monotonous. I have in my mind's eye the western indented with deep bays, the bolder northern, and the beautifully scoloped southern shore, where successive capes overlap each other and suggest unexplored coves between. The forest has never so good a setting, nor is so distinctly beautiful, as when seen from the middle of a small lake amid hills which rise from the water's edge, for the water in which it is reflected not only makes the best foreground in such a case, but, with its winding shore, the most natural and agreeable boundary to it. There is no rawness nor imperfection in its edge there, as where the axe has cleared a part, or a cultivated field abuts on it. The trees have ample room to expand on the water side, and each sends forth its most vigorous branch in that direction. There Nature has woven a natural selvage, and the eye rises by just gradations from the low shrubs of the shore to the highest trees. There are few traces of man's hand to be seen. The water laves the shore as it did a thousand years ago.

A lake is the landscape's most beautiful and expressive feature. It is earth's eye, looking into which the beholder measures the depth of his own nature. The fluvial trees next the shore are the slender eyelashes which fringe it, and the wooded hills and cliffs around are its overhanging brows.

Standing on the smooth sandy beach at the east end of the pond, in a calm September afternoon, when a slight haze makes the opposite shore-line indistinct, I have seen whence came the expression, 'the glassy surface of a lake.' When you invert your head, it looks like a thread of finest gossamer stretched across the valley, and gleaming against the distant pine woods, separating one stratum of the atmosphere from another. You would think that you could walk dry under it to the opposite hills, and that the swallows which skim over might perch on it. Indeed, they sometimes dive below the line, as it were by mistake, and are undeceived. As you look over the pond westward you are obliged to employ both your hands to defend your eyes against the reflected as well as the true sun, for they are equally bright, and if, between the two, you survey its surface critically, it is literally as smooth as glass, except where the skater insects, at equal intervals scattered over its whole extent, by their motions in the sun produce the finest imaginable sparkle on it, or, perchance, a duck plumes itself, or, as I have said, a swallow skims so low as to touch it. It may be that in the distance a fish describes an arc of three or four feet in the air, and there is one bright flash where it emerges, and another where it strikes the water, sometimes the whole silvery arc is revealed, or here and there, perhaps, is a thistle-down floating on its surface, which the fishes dart at and so dimple it again. It is like molten glass cooled but not congealed, and the few motes in it are pure and beautiful, like the imperfections in glass. You may often detect a yet smoother and darker water, separated from the rest as if by an invisible cobweb, boom of the water nymphs, resting on it. From a hilltop you can see a fish leap in almost any part, for not a pickerel or shiner picks an insect from this smooth surface but it manifestly disturbs the equilibrium of the whole lake. It is wonderful with what elaborateness this simple fact is advertised—this piscine murder will out—and from my distant perch I distinguish the circling undulations when they are half a dozen rods in diameter. You can even detect a water-bug (Gyrinus) ceaselessly progressing over the smooth surface a quarter of a mile off, for they furrow the water slightly, making a conspicuous ripple bounded by two diverging lines, but the skaters glide over it without rippling it perceptibly. When the surface is considerably agitated there are no skaters nor water-bugs on it, but apparently, in calm days, they leave their havens and adventurously glide forth from the shore by short impulses till they completely cover it. It is a soothing employment, on one of those fine days in the fall, when all the warmth of the sun is fully appreciated, to sit on a stump on such a height as this, overlooking the pond, and study the dimpling circles which are incessantly inscribed on its otherwise invisible surface amid the reflected skies and trees. Over this great expanse there is no disturbance but it is thus at once gently smoothed away and assuaged, as, when a vase of water is jarred, the trembling circles seek the shore, and all is smooth again. Not a fish can leap or an insect fall on the pond but it is thus reported in circling dimples, in lines of beauty, as it were the constant welling up of its fountain, the gentle pulsing of its life, the heaving of its breast. The thrills of joy and thrills of pain are undistinguishable. How peaceful the phenomena of the lake! Again the works of man shine as in the spring, ay, every leaf and twig and stone and cobweb sparkles now at mid-afternoon as when covered with dew in a spring morning. Every motion of an oar or an insect produces a flash of light, and if an oar falls, how sweet the echo!

In such a day, in September or October, Walden is a perfect forest mirror, set round with stones as precious to my eye as if fewer or rarer. Nothing so fair, so pure, and at the same time so large, as a lake, perchance, lies on the surface of the earth. Sky water. It needs no fence. Nations come and go without defiling it. It is a mirror which no stone can crack, whose quicksilver will never wear off, whose gilding Nature continually repairs, no storms, no dust, can dim its surface ever fresh,—a mirror in which all impurity presented to it sinks, swept and dusted by the sun's hazy brush—thus the light dust-cloth—which retains no breath that is breathed on it, but sends its own to float as clouds high above its surface, and be reflected in its bosom still.

A field of water betrays the spirit that is in the air. It is continually receiving new life and motion from above. It is intermediate in its nature between land and sky. On land only the grass and trees wave, but the water itself is rippled by the wind. I see where the breeze dashes across it by the streaks or flakes of light. It is remarkable that we can look down on its surface. We shall, perhaps, look down thus on the surface of air at length, and mark where a still subtler spirit sweeps over it.

The skaters and water-bugs finally disappear in the latter part of October, when the severe frosts have come, and then and in November, usually, in a calm day, there is absolutely nothing to ripple the surface. One November afternoon, in the calm at the end of a rain storm of several days' duration, when the sky was still completely overcast and the air was full of mist, I observed that the pond was remarkably smooth, so that it was difficult to distinguish its surface, though it no longer reflected the bright tints of October, but the sombre November colors of the surrounding hills. Though I passed over it as gently as possible, the slight undulations produced by my boat extended almost as far as I could see, and gave a ribbed appearance to the reflections. But, as I was looking over the surface, I saw here and there at a distance a faint glimmer, as if some skater insects which had escaped the frosts might be collected there, or, perchance, the surface, being so smooth, betrayed where a spring welled up from the bottom. Paddling gently to one of these places, I was surprised to find myself surrounded by myriads of small perch, about five inches long, of a rich bronze color in the green water, sporting there and constantly rising to the surface and dimpling it, sometimes leaving bubbles on it. In such transparent and seemingly bottomless water, reflecting the clouds, I seemed to be floating through the air as in a balloon, and their swimming impressed me as a kind of flight or hovering, as if they were a compact flock of birds passing just beneath my level on the right or left, their fins, like sails, set all around them. There were many such schools in the pond, apparently improving the short season before winter would draw an icy shutter over their broad skylight, sometimes giving to the surface an appearance as if a slight breeze struck it, or a few rain-drops fell there. When I approached carelessly and alarmed them, they made a sudden splash and rippling with their tails, as if one had struck the water with a brushy bough, and instantly took refuge in the depths. At length the wind rose, the mist increased, and the waves began to run, and the perch leaped much higher than before, half out of water, a hundred black points, three inches long, at once above the surface. Even as late as the 5th of December, one year, I saw some dimples on the surface, and thinking it was going to rain hard immediately, the air being full of mist, I made haste to take my place at the oars and row homeward, already the rain seemed rapidly increasing, though I felt none on my cheek, and I anticipated a thorough soaking. But suddenly the dimples ceased, for they were produced by the perch, which the noise of my oars had scared into the depths, and I saw their schools dimly disappearing, so I spent a dry afternoon after all.

An old man who used to frequent this pond nearly sixty years ago, when it was dark with surrounding forests, tells me that in those days he sometimes saw it all alive with ducks and other water-fowl, and that there were many eagles about it. He came here a-fishing, and used an old log canoe which he found on the shore. It was made of two white-pine logs dug out and pinned together, and was cut off square at the ends. It was very clumsy, but lasted a great many years before it became water-logged and perhaps sank to the bottom. He did not know whose it was, it belonged to the pond. He used to make a cable for his anchor of strips of hickory bark tied together. An old man, a potter, who lived by the pond before the Revolution, told him once that there was an iron chest at the bottom, and that he had seen it. Sometimes it would come floating up to the shore, but when you went toward it, it would go back into deep water and disappear. I was pleased to hear of the old log canoe, which took the place of an Indian one of the same material but more graceful construction, which perchance had first been a tree on the bank, and then, as it were, fell into the water, to float there for a generation, the most proper vessel for the lake. I remember that when I first looked into these depths there were many large trunks to be seen indistinctly lying on the bottom, which had either been blown over formerly, or left on the ice at the last cutting, when wood was cheaper, but now they have mostly disappeared.

When I first paddled a boat on Walden, it was completely surrounded by thick and lofty pine and oak woods, and in some of its coves grape vines had run over the trees next the water and formed bowers under which a boat could pass. The hills which form its shores are so steep, and the woods on them were then so high, that, as you looked down from the west end, it had the appearance of an amphitheatre for some kind of sylvan spectacle. I have spent many an hour, when I was younger, floating over its surface as the zephyr willed, having paddled my boat to the middle, and lying on my back across the seats, in a summer forenoon, dreaming awake, until I was aroused by the boat touching the sand, and I arose to see what shore my fates had impelled me to—days when idleness was the most attractive and productive industry. Many a forenoon have I stolen away, preferring to spend thus the most valued part of the day, for I was rich, if not in money, in sunny hours and summer days, and spent them lavishly, nor do I regret that I did not waste more of them in the workshop or the teacher's desk. But since I left those shores the wood choppers have still further laid them waste, and now for many a year there will be no more rambling through the aisles of the wood, with occasional vistas through which you see the water. My Muse may be excused if she is silent henceforth. How can you expect the birds to sing when their groves are cut down?

Now the trunks of trees on the bottom, and the old log canoe, and the dark surrounding woods, are gone, and the villagers, who scarcely know where it lies, instead of going to the pond to bathe or drink, are thinking to bring its water, which should be as sacred as the Ganges at least, to the village in a pipe, to wash their dishes with! —to earn their Walden by the turning of a cock or drawing of a plug! That devilish Iron Horse, whose ear-rending neigh is heard throughout the town, has muddied the Boiling Spring with his foot, and he it is that has browsed off all the woods on Walden shore, that Trojan horse, with a thousand men in his belly, introduced by mercenary Greeks! Where is the country's champion, the Moore of Moore Hall, to meet him at the Deep Cut and thrust an avenging lance between the ribs of the bloated pest?

Nevertheless, of all the characters I have known, perhaps Walden wears best, and best preserves its purity. Many men have been likened to it, but few deserve that honor. Though the wood choppers have laid bare first this shore and then that, and the Irish have built their sties by it, and the railroad has infringed on its border, and the ice-men have skimmed it once, it is itself unchanged, the same water which my youthful eyes fell on, all the change is in me. It has not acquired one permanent wrinkle after all its ripples. It is perennially young, and I may stand and see a swallow dip apparently to pick an insect from its surface as of yore. It struck me again to-night, as if I had not seen it almost daily for more than twenty years—Why, here is Walden, the same woodland lake that I discovered so many years ago, where a forest was cut down last winter another is springing up by its shore as lustily as ever, the same thought is welling up to its surface that was then, it is the same liquid joy and happiness to itself and its Maker, ay, and it may be to me. It is the work of a brave man surely, in whom there was no guile! He rounded this water with his hand, deepened and clarified it in his thought, and in his will bequeathed it to Concord. I see by its face that it is visited by the same reflection, and I can almost say, Walden, is it you?

It is no dream of mine,
To ornament a line,
I cannot come nearer to God and Heaven Than I live to Walden even
I am its stony shore,
And the breeze that passes o'er,
In the hollow of my hand

Are its water and its sand,
And its deepest resort
Lies high in my thought

The cars never pause to look at it, yet I fancy that the engineers and firemen and brakemen, and those passengers who have a season ticket and see it often, are better men for the sight. The engineer does not forget at night, or his nature does not, that he has beheld this vision of serenity and purity once at least during the day. Though seen but once, it helps to wash out State Street and the engine's soot. One proposes that it be called 'God's Drop.'

I have said that Walden has no visible inlet nor outlet, but it is on the one hand distantly and indirectly related to Flint's Pond, which is more elevated, by a chain of small ponds coming from that quarter, and on the other directly and manifestly to Concord River, which is lower, by a similar chain of ponds through which in some other geological period it may have flowed, and by a little digging, which God forbid, it can be made to flow thither again. If by living thus reserved and austere, like a hermit in the woods, so long, it has acquired such wonderful purity, who would not regret that the comparatively impure waters of Flint's Pond should be mingled with it, or itself should ever go to waste its sweetness in the ocean wave?

Flint's, or Sandy Pond, in Lincoln, our greatest lake and inland sea, lies about a mile east of Walden. It is much larger, being said to contain one hundred and ninety-seven acres, and is more fertile in fish, but it is comparatively shallow, and not remarkably pure. A walk through the woods thither was often my recreation. It was worth the while, if only to feel the wind blow on your cheek freely, and see the waves run, and remember the life of mariners. I went a-chestnutting there in the fall, on windy days, when the nuts were dropping into the water and were washed to my feet, and one day, as I crept along its sedgy shore, the fresh spray blowing in my face, I came upon the mouldering wreck of a boat, the sides gone, and hardly more than the impression of its flat bottom left amid the rushes, yet its model was sharply defined, as if it were a large decayed pad, with its veins It was as impressive a wreck as one could imagine on the sea-shore, and had as good a moral It is by this time mere vegetable mould and undistinguishable pond shore, through which rushes and flags have pushed up I used to admire the ripple marks on the sandy bottom, at the north end of this pond, made firm and hard to the feet of the wader by the pressure of the water, and the rushes which grew in Indian file, in waving lines, corresponding to these marks, rank behind rank, as if the waves had planted them There also I have found, in considerable quantities, curious balls, composed apparently of fine grass or roots, of pipewort perhaps, from half an inch to four inches in diameter, and perfectly spherical These wash back and forth in shallow water on a sandy bottom, and are sometimes cast on the shore They are either solid grass or have a little sand in the middle At first you would say that they were formed by the action of the waves, like a pebble, yet the smallest are made of equally coarse materials, half an inch long, and they are produced only at one season of the year Moreover, the waves, I suspect, do not so much construct as wear down a material which has already acquired consistency They preserve their form when dry for an indefinite period

Flints' Pond' Such is the poverty of our nomenclature What right had the unclean and stupid farmer, whose farm abutted on this sky water, whose shores he has ruthlessly laid bare, to give his name to it? Some skin-flint, who loved better the reflecting surface of a dollar, or a bright cent, in which he could see his own brazen face, who regarded even the wild ducks which settled in it as trespassers, his fingers grown crooked and horny talons from the long habit of grasping harpy-like,—so it is not named for me I go not there to see him nor to hear of him, who never saw it, who never bathed in it, who never loved it, who never protected it, who never spoke a good word for it, nor thanked God that He had made it Rather let it be named from the fishes that swim in it, the wild fowl or quadrupeds which frequent it, the wild flowers which grow by its shores, or some wild man or child the thread of whose history is interwoven with its own, not from him who could show no title to it but the deed which a like-minded neighbor or legislature gave him—him who thought only of its money value; whose presence perchance cursed all the shore, who exhausted the land around it, and would fain have exhausted the waters within it, who regretted only that it was not English hay or cranberry meadow—there was nothing to redeem it, forsooth, in his eyes—and would have drained and sold it for the mud at its bottom It did not turn his mill, and it was no privilege to him to behold it. I respect not his labors, his farm where everything has its price, who would carry the landscape, who would carry his God, to market, if he could get anything for him; who goes to market for his god as it is, on whose farm nothing grows free, whose fields bear no crops, whose meadows no flowers, whose trees no fruits, but dollars, who loves not the beauty of his fruits, whose fruits are not ripe for him till they are turned to dollars Give me the poverty that enjoys true wealth Farmers are respectable and interesting to me in proportion as they are poor—poor farmers. A model farm! where the house stands like a fungus in a muck-heap, chambers for men, horses, oxen, and swine, cleansed and uncleansed, all contiguous to one another! Stocked with men! A great grease-spot, redolent of manures and buttermilk! Under a high state of cultivation, being manured with the hearts and brains of men! As if you were to raise your potatoes in the churchyard! Such is a model farm

No, no, if the fairest features of the landscape are to be named after men, let them be the noblest and worthiest men alone. Let our lakes receive as true names at least as the Icarian Sea, where 'stull the shore' a 'brave attempt resounds'

Goose Pond, of small extent, is on my way to Flint's; Fair Haven, an expansion of Concord River, said to contain some seventy acres, is a mile south-west, and White Pond, of about forty acres, is a mile and a half beyond Fair Haven This is my lake country. These, with Concord River, are my water privileges, and night and day, year in year out, they grind such grist as I carry to them

Since the woodcutters, and the railroad, and I myself have profaned Walden, perhaps the most attractive, if not the most beautiful, of all our lakes, the gem of the woods, is White Pond,—a poor name from its commonness, whether derived from the remarkable purity of its waters or the color of its sands. In these as in other respects, however, it is a lesser twin of Walden. They are so much alike that you would say they must be connected under ground. It has the same stony shore, and its waters are of the same hue. As at Walden, in sultry dog-day weather, looking down through the woods on some of its bays which are not so deep but that the reflection from the bottom tinges them, its waters are of a misty bluish-green or glaucous color. Many years since I used to go there to collect the sand by cart-loads, to make sand-paper with, and I have continued to visit it ever since. One who frequents it purposes to call it Virid Lake. Perhaps it might be called Yellow Pine Lake, from the following circumstance. About fifteen years ago you could see the top of a pitch-pine, of the kind called yellow pine hereabouts, though it is not a distinct species, projecting above the surface in deep water, many rods from the shore. It was even supposed by some that the pond had sunk, and this was one of the primitive forest that formerly stood there. I find that even so long ago as 1792, in a Topographical Description of the Town of Concord, by one of its citizens, in the Collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society, the author, after speaking of Walden and White Ponds, adds 'In the middle of the latter may be seen, when the water is very low, a tree which appears as if it grew in the place where it now stands, although the roots are fifty feet below the surface of the water; the top of this tree is broken off, and at that place measures fourteen inches in diameter.' In the spring of '49 I talked with a man who lived nearest the pond in Sudbury, who told me that it was he who got out this tree ten or fifteen years before. As near as he could remember, it stood twelve or fifteen rods from the shore, where the water was thirty or forty feet deep. It was in the winter, and he had been getting out ice in the forenoon, and had resolved that in the afternoon, with the aid of his neighbors, he would take out the old yellow pine. He sawed a channel in the ice toward the shore, and hauled it over and along and out on to the ice with oxen, but, before he had gone far in his work, he was surprised to find that it was wrong end upward, with the stumps of the branches pointing down, and the small end firmly fastened in the sandy bottom. It was about a foot in diameter at the big end, and he had expected to get a good saw-log, but it was so rotten as to be fit only for fuel, if for that. He had some of it in his shed then. There were marks of an axe and of woodpeckers on the butt. He thought that it might have been a dead tree on the shore, but was finally blown over into the pond, and after the top had become water-logged, while the butt-end was still dry and light, had drifted out and sunk wrong end up. His father, eighty years old, could not remember when it was not there. Several pretty large logs may still be seen lying on the bottom, where, owing to the undulation of the surface, they look like huge water snakes in motion.

This pond has rarely been profaned by a boat, for there is little in it to tempt a fisherman. Instead of the white lily, which requires mud, or the common sweet flag, the blue flag (Iris versicolor) grows thinly in the pure water, rising from the stony bottom all around the shore, where it is visited by hummingbirds in June, and the color both of its bluish blades and its flowers, and especially their reflections, are in singular harmony with the glaucous water.

White Pond and Walden are great crystals on the surface of the earth, Lakes of Light. If they were permanently congealed, and small enough to be clutched, they would, perchance, be carried off by slaves, like precious stones, to adorn the heads of emperors, but being liquid, and ample, and secured to us and our successors forever, we disregard them, and run after the diamond of Kohinoor. They are too pure to have a market value, they contain no muck. How much more beautiful than our lives, how much more transparent than our characters, are they! We never learned meanness of them. How much fairer than the pool before the farmer's door, in which his ducks swim! Hither the clean wild ducks come. Nature has no human inhabitant who appreciates her. The birds with their plumage and their notes are in harmony with the flowers, but what youth or maiden conspires with the wild luxuriant beauty of Nature? She flourishes most alone, far from the towns where they reside. Talk of heaven! ye disgrace earth

BAKER FARM

SOMETIMES I rambled to pine groves, 10 standing like temples, or like fleets at sea, full-rigged, with wavy boughs, and rippling with light, so soft and green and shady that the Druids would have forsaken their oaks to worship in them, or to the cedar wood beyond Flint's Pond, where the trees, covered with hoary blue berries, spiring higher and higher, are fit to stand before Valhalla, and the creeping juniper covers the ground with wreaths full of fruit, or to swamps where the usnea lichen hangs in festoons from the white spruce trees, and toadstools, round tables of the swamp gods, cover the ground, and more beautiful fungi adorn the stumps, like butterflies or shells, vegetable winkles, where the swamp-pink and dogwood grow, the red alder-berry glows like eyes of imps, the waxwork grooves and crushes the hardest woods in its folds, and the wild holly 30 berries make the beholder forget his home with their beauty, and he is dazzled and tempted by nameless other wild forbidden fruits, too fair for mortal taste. Instead of calling on some scholar, I paid many a visit to particular trees, of kinds which are rare in this neighborhood, standing far away in the middle of some pasture, or in the depths of a wood or swamp, or on a hilltop, such as the black birch, of which we have some handsome specimens two feet in diameter, its cousin, the yellow birch, with its loose golden vest, perfumed like the first, the beech, which has so neat a bole and beautifully lichen-painted, perfect in all its details, of which, excepting scattered specimens, I know but one small grove of sizable trees left in the township, supposed by some to have been planted by the pigeons that were once baited with beech 50 nuts near by, it is worth the while to see the silver grain sparkle when you split this wood, the bass, the horn-beam, the celtis occidentalis, or false elm, of which we have but one well-grown, some taller mast of a pine, a shingle tree, or a more perfect hemlock than usual, standing like a pagoda in the midst of the woods; and many others I could mention. These were the shrines I visited both summer and winter.

Once it chanced that I stood in the very abutment of a rainbow's arch, which filled the lower stratum of the atmosphere, tingling the grass and leaves around, and dazzling me as if I looked through colored crystal. It was a lake of rainbow light, in which, for a short while, I lived like a dolphin. If it had lasted longer it might have tinged my employments and life. As I walked on the railroad causeway, I used to wonder at the halo of light around my shadow, and would fain fancy myself one of the elect. One who visited me declared that the shadows of some Irishmen before him had no halo about them, that it was only natives that were so distinguished. Benvenuto Cellini tells us in his memoirs, that, after a certain terrible dream or vision which he had during his confinement in the castle of St Angelo, a resplendent light appeared over the shadow of his head at morning and evening, whether he was in Italy or France, and it was particularly conspicuous when the grass was moist with dew. This was probably the same phenomenon to which I have referred, which is especially observed in the morning, but also at other times, and even by moonlight. Though a constant one, it is not commonly noticed, and, in the case of an excitable imagination like Cellini's, it would be basis enough for superstition. Beside, he tells us that he showed it to very few. But are they not indeed distinguished who are conscious that they are regarded at all?

I set out one afternoon to go a-fishing to Fair Haven, through the woods, to eke out my scanty fare of vegetables. My way led through Pleasant Meadow, an adjunct of the Baker Farm, that retreat of which a poet has since sung, beginning—

'Thy entry is a pleasant field, Which some mossy fruit trees yield Partly to a ruddy brook,
By gliding musquash undertook,
And mercurial trout,
Darting about'

I thought of living there before I went to Walden. I 'hooked' the apples, leaped the brook, and scared the musquash and the trout. It was one of those afternoons which seem indefinitely long before one, in which many events may happen, a large portion of our natural life, though it was already half spent when I started. By the way there came up a shower, which compelled me to stand half an hour under a pine, piling boughs over my head, and wearing my handkerchief for a shed, and when at length I had made one cast over the pickerel-weed, standing up to my middle in water, I found myself suddenly in the shadow of a cloud, and the thunder began to rumble with such emphasis that I could do no more than listen to it. The gods must be proud, thought I, with such forked flashes to rout a poor unarmed fisherman. So I made haste for shelter to the nearest hut, which stood half a mile from any road, but so much the nearer to the pond, and had long been uninhabited —

'And here a poet builded, In the completed years,
For behold a trivial cabin
That to destruction steers'

So the Muse fables. But therein, as I found, dwelt now John Field, an Irishman, and his wife, and several children, from the broad-faced boy who assisted his father at his work, and now came running by his side from the bog to escape the rain, to the wrinkled, sibyl-like, cone-headed infant that sat upon its father's knee as in the palaces of nobles, and looked out from its home in the midst of wet and hunger inquisitively upon the stranger, with the privilege of infancy, not knowing but it was the last of a noble line, and the hope and cynosure of the world, instead of John Field's poor starveling brat. There we sat together under that part of the roof which leaked the least, while it showered and thundered without. I had sat there many times of old before the ship was built that floated this family to America. An honest, hard-working, but shiftless man plainly was John Field, and his wife—she too was brave to cook so many successive dinners in the recesses of that lofty stove, with round greasy face and bare breast, still thinking to improve her condition one day, with the never absent mop in one hand, and yet no effects of it visible anywhere. The chickens, which had also taken shelter here from the rain, stalked about the room like members of the family, too humanized methought to roast well. They stood and looked in my eye or pecked at my shoe significantly. Meanwhile my host told me his story, how hard he worked 'bogg' for a neighboring farmer, turning up a meadow with a spade or bog hoe at the rate of ten dollars an acre and the use of the land with manure for one year, and his little broad-faced son worked cheerfully at his father's side the while, not knowing how poor a bargain the latter had made. I tried to help him with my experience, telling him that he was one of my nearest neighbors, and that I, too, who came a-fishing here, and looked like a loafer, was getting my living like himself, that I lived in a tight, light, and clean house, which hardly cost more than the annual rent of such a ruin as his commonly amounts to, and how, if he chose, he might in a month or two build himself a palace of his own, that I did not use tea, nor coffee, nor butter, nor milk, nor fresh meat, and so did not have to work to get them, again, as I did not work hard, I did not have to eat hard, and it cost me but a trifle for my food, but as he began with tea, and coffee, and butter, and milk, and beef, he had to work hard to pay for them, and when he had worked hard he had to eat hard again to repair the waste of his system, and so it was as broad as it was long—indeed it was broader than it was long—for he was discontented and wasted his life into the bargain, and yet he had rated it as a gain in coming to America, that here you could get tea, and coffee, and meat every day. But the only true America is that country where you are at liberty to pursue such a mode of life as may enable you to do without these, and where the state does not endeavor to compel you to sustain the slavery and war and other superfluous expenses which directly or indirectly result from the use of such things. For I purposely talked to him as if he were a philosopher, or desired to be one. I should be glad if all the meadows on the earth were left in a wild state, if that were the consequence of men's beginning to redeem themselves. A man will not need to study history to find out what is best for his own culture. But alas! the culture of an Irishman is an enterprise to be undertaken with a sort of moral bog hoe. I told him, that as he worked so hard at bogging, he required thick boots and stout clothing, which yet were soon soiled and worn out, but I wore light shoes and thin clothing, which cost not half so much, though he might think that I was dressed like a gentleman (which, however, was not the case), and in an hour or two, without labor, but as a recreation, I could, if I wished, catch as many fish as I should want for two days, or earn enough money to support me a week. If he and his family would live simply, they might all go a-huckleberrying in the summer for their amusement. John heaved a sigh at this, and his wife stared with arms a-kimbo, and both appeared to be wondering if they had capital enough to begin such a course with, or arithmetic enough to carry it through. It was sailing by dead reckoning to them, and they saw not clearly how to make their port so, therefore I suppose they still take life bravely, after their fashion, face to face, giving it tooth and nail, not having skill to split its massive columns with any fine entering wedge, and rout it in detail—thinking to deal with it roughly, as one should handle a thistle. But they fight at an overwhelming disadvantage—living, John Field, alas! without arithmetic, and failing so.

‘Do you ever fish?’ I asked. ‘Oh yes, I catch a mess now and then when I am lying by, good perch I catch.’ ‘What’s your bait?’ ‘I catch shiners with fish-worms, and bait the perch with them.’ ‘You’d better go now, John,’ said his wife with glistening and hopeful face, but John demurred.

The shower was now over, and a rainbow above the eastern woods promised a fair evening, so I took my departure. When I had got without I asked for a dish, hoping to get a sight of the well bottom, to complete my survey of the premises, but there, alas! are shallows and quicksands, and rope broken withal, and bucket irrecoverable. Meanwhile the right culinary vessel was selected, water was seemingly distilled, and after consultation and long delay passed out to the thirsty one—not yet suffered to cool, not yet to settle. Such gruel sustains life here, I thought, so, shutting my eyes, and excluding the motes by a skilfully directed undercurrent, I drank to genuine hospitality the heartiest draught I could. I am not squeamish in such cases when manners are concerned.

As I was leaving the Irishman’s roof after the rain, bending my steps again to the pond, my haste to catch pickerel, wading in retired meadows, in sloughs and bog-holes, in forlorn and savage places, appeared for an instant trivial to me who had been sent to school and college, but as I ran down the hill toward the reddening west, with the rainbow over my shoulder, and some faint tinkling sounds borne to my ear through the cleansed air, from I know not what quarter, my Good Genius seemed to say—Go fish and hunt far and wide day by day—farther and wider—and rest thee by many brooks and hearth-sides without misgiving. Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth. Rise free from care before the dawn, and seek adventures. Let the noon find thee by other lakes, and the night overtake thee everywhere at home. There are no larger fields than these, no worthier games than may here be played. Grow wild according to thy nature, like these sedges and brakes, which will never become English hay. Let the thunder rumble, what if it threaten ruin to farmers’ crops? that is not its errand to thee. Take shelter under the cloud, while they flee to carts and sheds. Let not to get a living be thy trade, but thy sport. Enjoy the land, but own it not. Through want of enterprise and faith men are where they are, buying and selling, and spending their lives like serfs.

Men come tamely home at night only from the next field or street, where their household echoes haunt, and their life pines because it breathes its own breath over again, their shadows morning and evening reach farther than their daily steps. We should come home from far, from adventures, and perils, and discoveries every day, with new experience and character.

Before I had reached the pond some fresh impulse had brought out John Field, with altered mind, letting go 'boggling' ere this sunset. But he, poor man, disturbed only a couple of fins while I was catching a fair string, and he said it was his luck, but when we changed seats in the boat luck changed seats too. Poor John Field!—I trust he does not read this, unless he will improve by it—thinking to live by some derivative old country mode in this primitive new country—to catch perch with shiners. It is good bait sometimes, I allow. With his horizon all his own, yet he a poor man, born to be poor, with his inherited Irish poverty or poor life, his Adam's grandmother and boggy ways, not to rise in this world, he nor his posterity, till their wading, webbed, bog-trotting feet get talaria to their heels.

CONCLUSION

To the sick the doctors wisely recommend a change of air and scenery. Thank Heaven, here is not all the world. The buckeye does not grow in New England, and the mocking-bird is rarely heard here. The wild goose is more of a cosmopolite than we, he breaks his fast in Canada, takes a luncheon in the Ohio, and plumes himself for the night in a southern bayou. Even the bison, to some extent, keeps pace with the seasons, cropping the pastures of the Colorado only till a greener and sweeter grass awaits him by the Yellowstone. Yet we think that if rail-fences are pulled down, and stone-walls piled up on our farms, bounds are henceforth set to our lives and our fates decided. If you are chosen town-clerk, forsooth, you cannot go to Tierra del Fuego this summer but you may go to the land of infernal fire nevertheless. The universe is wider than our views of it.

Yet we should oftener look over the taffarel of our craft, like curious passengers, and not make the voyage like stupid sailors picking oakum. The other side of the globe is but the home of our correspondent. Our voyaging is only great-circle sailing, and the doctors prescribe for diseases of the skin merely. One hastens to Southern Africa to chase the giraffe, but surely that is not the game he would be after. How long, pray, would a man hunt giraffes if he could? Snipes and woodcocks also may afford rare sport, but I trust it would be nobler game to shoot one's self.

Yet undiscovered. Travel them, and be

What does Africa—what does the West stand for? Is not our own interior white on the chart? Black though it may prove, like the coast, when discovered. Is it the source of the Nile, or the Niger, or the Mississippi, or a North-West passage around this continent, that we would find? Are these the problems which most concern mankind? Is Franklin the only man who is lost, that his wife should be so earnest to find him? Does Mr. Grinnell know where he himself is? Be rather the Mungo Park, the Lewis and Clarke and Frobisher, of your own streams and oceans, explore your own higher latitudes—with shiploads of preserved meats to support you, if they be necessary; and pile the empty cans sky-high for a sign. Were preserved meats invented to preserve meat merely? Nay, be a Columbus to whole new continents and worlds within you, opening new channels, not of trade, but of thought. Every man is the lord of a realm beside which the earthly empire of the Czar is but a petty state, a hummock left by the ice. Yet some can be patriotic who have no self-respect, and sacrifice the greater to the less. They love the soil which makes their graves, but have no sympathy with the spirit which may still animate their clay. Patriotism is a maggot in their heads. What was the meaning of that South Sea Exploring Expedition, with all its parade and expense, but an indirect recognition of the fact that there are continents and seas in the moral world, to which every man is an isthmus or an inlet, yet unexplored by him, but that it is easier to sail many thousand miles through cold and storm and cannibals, in a government ship, with five hundred men and boys to assist one, than it is to explore the private sea, the Atlantic and Pacific Ocean of one's being alone

It is not worth the while to go round the world to count the cats in Zanzibar. Yet do this even till you can do better, and you may perhaps find some 'Symmes' Hole' by which to get at the inside at last. England and France, Spain and Portugal, Gold Coast and Slave Coast, all front on this private sea, but no bark from them has ventured out of sight of land, though it is without doubt the direct way to India. If you would learn to speak all tongues and conform to the customs of all nations, if you would travel farther than all travellers, be naturalized in all climes, and cause the Sphinx to dash her head against a stone, even obey the precept of the old philosopher, and Explore thyself. Herein are demanded the eye and the nerve. Only the defeated and deserters go to the wars, cowards that run away and enlist. Start now on that farthest western way, which does not pause at the Mississippi or the Pacific, nor conduct toward a worn-out China or Japan, but leads on direct, a tangent to this sphere, summer and winter, day and night, sun down, moon down, and at last earth down too.

It is said that Mirabeau took to highway robbery 'to ascertain what degree of resolution was necessary in order to place one's self in formal opposition to the most sacred laws of society.' He declared that 'a soldier who fights in the ranks does not require half so much courage as a foot-pad'—that honor and religion have never stood in the way of a well-considered and a firm resolve.' This was manly, as the world goes, and yet it was idle, if not desperate. A saner man would have found himself often enough 'in formal opposition' to what are deemed 'the most sacred laws of society,' through obedience to yet more sacred laws, and so have tested his resolution without going out of his way. It is not for a man to put himself in such an attitude to society, but to maintain himself in whatever attitude he find himself through obedience to the laws of his being, which will never be one of opposition to a just government, if he should chance to meet with such.

I left the woods for as good a reason as I went there. Perhaps it seemed to me that I had several more lives to live, and could not spare any more time for that one. It is remarkable how easily and insensibly we fall into a particular route, and make a beaten track for ourselves. I had not lived there a week before my feet wore a path from my door to the pond-side, and though it is five or six years since I trod it, it is still quite distinct. It is true, I fear, that others may have fallen into it, and so helped to keep it open. The surface of the earth is soft and impressible by the feet of men, and so with the paths which the mind travels. How worn and dusty, then, must be the highways of the world—how deep the ruts of tradition and conformity! I did not wish to take a cabin passage, but rather to go before the mast and on the deck of the world, for there I could best see the moonlight amid the mountains. I do not wish to go below now.

I learned this, at least, by my experiment that if one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavors to live the life which he has imagined, he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours. He will put some things behind, will pass an invisible boundary; new, universal, and more liberal laws will begin to establish themselves around and within him, or the old laws be expanded, and interpreted in his favor in a more liberal sense, and he will live with the license of a higher order of beings. In proportion as he simplifies his life, the laws of the universe will appear less complex, and solitude will not be solitude, nor poverty poverty, nor weakness weakness. If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost, that is where they should be. Now put the foundations under them.

It is a ridiculous demand which England and America make, that you shall speak so that they can understand you. Neither men nor toad-stools grow so. As if that were important, and there were not enough to understand you without them. As if Nature could support but one order of understandings, could not sustain birds as well as quadrupeds, flying as well as creeping things, and hush and who, which Bright can understand, were the best English. As if there were safety in stupidity alone. I fear chiefly lest my expression may not be extra-vagant enough—may not wander far enough beyond the narrow limits of my daily experience, so as to be adequate to the truth of which I have been convinced. Extra vagance! it depends on how you are yarded. The migrating buffalo, which seeks new pastures in another latitude, is not extravagant like the cow which kicks over the pail, leaps the cow-yard fence, and runs after her calf, in milking time. I desire to speak somewhere without bounds, like a man in a waking moment, to men in their waking moments, for I am convinced that I cannot exaggerate enough even to lay the foundation of a true expression. Who that has heard a strain of music feared then lest he should speak extravagantly any more forever? In view of the future or possible, we should live quite laxly and undefined in front, our outlines dim and musty on that side, as our shadows reveal an insensible perspiration toward the sun. The volatile truth of our words should continually betray the inadequacy of the residual statement. Their truth is instantly translated, its literal monument alone remains. The words which express our faith and piety are not definite, yet they are significant and fragrant like frankincense to superior natures.

Why level downward to our dullest perception always, and praise that as common sense? The commonest sense is the sense of men asleep, which they express by snoring. Sometimes we are inclined to class those who are once-and-a-half-witted with the half-witted, because we appreciate only a third part of their wit. Some would find fault with the morning red, if they ever got up early enough. 'They pretend,' as I hear,

'that the verses of Kabir have four different senses—illusion, spirit, intellect, and the exoteric doctrine of the Vedas', but in this part of the world it is considered a ground for complaint if a man's writings admit of more than one interpretation. While England endeavors to cure the potato-rot, will not any endeavor to cure the brain-rot, which prevails so much more widely and fatally?

I do not suppose that I have attained to obscurity, but I should be proud if no more fatal fault were found with my pages on this score than was found with the Walden ice. Southern customers objected to its blue color, which is the evidence of its purity, as if it were muddy, and preferred the Cambridge ice, which is white, but tastes of weeds. The purity men love is like the mists which envelop the earth, and not like the azure ether beyond.

Some are dinnung in our ears that we Americans, and moderns generally, are intellectual dwarfs compared with the ancients, or even the Elizabethan men. But what is that to the purpose? A living dog is better than a dead lion. Shall a man go and hang himself because he belongs to the race of pigmies, and not be the biggest pigmy that he can? Let every one mind his own business, and endeavor to be what he was made.

Why should we be in such desperate haste to succeed, and in such desperate enterprises? If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer. Let him step to the music which he hears, however measured or far away. It is not important that he should mature as soon as an apple-tree or an oak. Shall he turn his spring into summer? If the condition of things which we were made for is not yet, what were any reality which we can substitute? We will not be shipwrecked on a vain reality. Shall we with pains erect a heaven of blue glass over ourselves, though when it is done we shall be sure to gaze still at the true ethereal heaven far above, as if the former were not?

There was an artist in the city of Kouroo who was disposed to strive after perfection. One day it came into his mind to make a staff. Having considered that in an imperfect work time is an ingredient, but into a perfect work time does not enter, he said to himself, It shall be perfect in all respects, though I should do nothing else in my life. He proceeded instantly to the forest for wood, being resolved that it should not be made of unsuitable material, and as he searched for and rejected stick after stick, his friends gradually deserted him, for they grew old in their works and died, but he grew not older by a moment. His singleness of purpose and resolution, and his elevated piety, endowed him, without his knowledge, with perennial youth. As he made no compromise with Time, Time kept out of his way, and only sighed at a distance because he could not overcome him. Before he had found a stock in all respects suitable the city of Kouroo was a hoary ruin, and he sat on one of its mounds to peel the stick. Before he had given it the proper shape the dynasty of the Candahars was at an end, and with the point of the stick he wrote the name of the last of that race in the sand, and then resumed his work. By the time he had smoothed and polished the staff Kalpa was no longer the pole-star, and ere he had put on the ferule and the head adorned with precious stones, Brahma had awoke and slumbered many times. But why do I stay to mention these things? When the finishing stroke was put to his work, it suddenly expanded before the eyes of the astonished artist into the fairest of all the creations of Brahma. He had made a new system in making a staff, a world with full and fair proportions, in which, though the old cities and dynasties had passed away, fairer and more glorious ones had taken their places. And now he saw by the heap of shavings still fresh at his feet, that, for him and his work, the former lapse of time had been an illusion, and that no more time had elapsed than is required for a single scintillation from the brain of Brahma to fall on and inflame the tinder of a mortal brain. The material was pure, and his art was pure, how could the result be other than wonderful?

No face which we can give to a matter will stand us so well at last as the truth. This alone wears well. For the most part, we are not where we are, but in a false position. Through an infirmity of our natures, we suppose a case and put ourselves into it, and hence are in two cases at the same time, and it is doubly difficult to get out. In sane moments we regard only the facts, the case that is. Say what you have to say, not what you ought. Any truth is better than make-believe. Tom Hyde, the tinker, standing on the gallows, was asked if he had anything to say. 'Tell the tailors,' said he, 'to remember to make a knot in their thread before they take the first stitch.' His companion's prayer is forgotten.

However mean your life is, meet it and live it, do not shun it and call it hard names. It is not so bad as you are. It looks poorest when you are richest. The fault-finder will find faults even in paradise. Love your life, poor as it is. You may perhaps have some pleasant, thrilling, glorious hours, even in a poor-house. The setting sun is reflected from the windows of the alms-house as brightly as from the rich man's abode; the snow melts before its door as early in the spring. I do not see but a quiet mind may live as contentedly there, and have as cheering thoughts, as in a palace. The town's poor seem to me often to live the most independent lives of any. Maybe they are simply great enough to receive without misgiving. Most think that they are above being supported by the town, but it oftener happens that they are not above supporting themselves by dishonest means, which should be more disreputable. Cultivate poverty like a garden herb, like sage. Do not trouble yourself much to get new things, whether clothes or friends. Turn the old, return to them. Things do not change, we change. Sell your clothes and keep your thoughts. God will see that you do not want society. If I were confined to a corner of a garret all my days, like a spider, the world would be just as large to me while I had my thoughts about me. The philosopher said 'From an army of three divisions one can take away its general, and put it in disorder, from the man the most abject and vulgar one cannot take away his thought.' Do not seek so anxiously to be developed, to subject yourself to many influences to be played on; it is all dissipation. Humility like darkness reveals the heavenly lights. The shadows of poverty and meanness gather around us, 'and lo! creation widens to our view.' We are often reminded that if there were bestowed on us the wealth of Croesus, our aims must still be the same, and our means essentially the same. Moreover, if you are restricted in your range by poverty, if you cannot buy books and newspapers, for instance, you are but confined to the most significant and vital experiences, you are compelled to deal with the material which yields the most sugar and the most starch. It is life near the bone where it is sweetest. You are defended from being a trifle. No man loses ever on a lower level by magnanimity on a higher. Superfluous wealth can buy superfluities only. Money is not required to buy one necessary of the soul.

I live in the angle of a leaden wall, into whose composition was poured a little alloy of bell metal. Often, in the repose of my mid-day, there reaches my ears a confused tintinnabulum from without. It is the noise of my contemporaries. My neighbors tell me of their adventures with famous gentlemen and ladies, what notabilities they met at the dinner-table; but I am no more interested in such things than in the contents of the Daily Times. The interest and the conversation are about costume and manners chiefly, but a goose is a goose still, dress it as you will. They tell me of California and Texas, of England and the Indies, of the Hon. Mr — of Georgia or of Massachusetts, all transient and fleeting phenomena, till I am ready to leap from their court-yard like the Mameluke bey. I delight to come to my bearings—not walk in procession with pomp and parade, in a conspicuous place, but to walk even with the Builder of the universe, if I may—not to live in this restless, nervous, bustling, trivial Nineteenth Century, but stand or sit thoughtfully while it goes by. What are men celebrating? They are all on a committee of arrangements, and hourly expect a speech from somebody. God is only the president of the day, and Webster is his orator. I love to weigh, to settle, to gravitate toward that which most strongly and rightfully attracts me,—not hang by the beam of the scale and try to weigh less—not suppose a case, but take the case that is; to travel the only path I can, and that on which no power can resist me. It affords me no satisfaction to commence to spring an arch before I have got a solid foundation. Let us not play at kittlybenders. There is a solid bottom everywhere. We read that the traveller asked the boy if the swamp before him had a hard bottom. The boy replied that it had. But presently the traveller's horse sank in up to the girths, and he observed to the boy, 'I thought you said that this bog had a hard bottom.' 'So it has,' answered the latter, 'but you have not got half way to it yet.' So it is with the bogs and quicksands of society; but he is an old boy that knows it. Only what is thought, said, or done at a certain rare coincidence is good. I would not be one of those who will foolishly drive a nail into mere lath and plastering, such a deed would keep me awake nights. Give me a hammer, and let me feel for the furrowing. Do not depend on the putty. Drive a nail home and clinch it so faithfully that you can wake up in the night and think of your work with satisfaction—a work at which you would not be ashamed to invoke the Muse. So will help you God, and so only. Every nail driven should be as another rivet in the machine of the universe, you carrying on the work.

Rather than love, than money, than fame, give me truth. I sat at a table where were rich food and wine in abundance, and obsequious attendance, but sincerity and truth were not, and I went away hungry from the inhospitable board. The hospitality was as cold as the ices. I thought that there was no need of ice to freeze them. They talked to me of the age of the wine and the fame of the vintage, but I thought of an older, a newer, and purer wine, of a more glorious vintage, which they had not got, and could not buy. The style, the house and grounds and 'entertainment' pass for nothing with me. I called on the king, but he made me wait in his hall, and conducted like a man incapacitated for hospitality. There was a man in my neighborhood who lived in a hollow tree. His manners were truly regal. I should have done better had I called on him.

How long shall we sit in our porticoes practising idle and musty virtues, which any work would make unpertinent? As if one were to begin the day with long-suffering, and hire a man to hoe his potatoes; and in the afternoon go forth to practise Christian meekness and charity with goodness aforethought! Consider the China pride and stagnant self-complacency of mankind. This generation reclines a little to congratulate itself on being the last of an illustrious line, and in Boston and London and Paris and Rome, thinking of its long descent, it speaks of its progress in art and science and literature with satisfaction. There are the Records of the Philosophical Societies, and the public eulogies of Great Men! It is the good Adam contemplating his own virtue. 'Yes, we have done great deeds, and sung divine songs, which shall never die'—that is, as long as we can remember them. The learned societies and great men of Assyria—where are they? What youthful philosophers and experimentalists we are! There is not one of my readers who has yet lived a whole human life. These may be but the spring months in the life of the race. If we have had the seven-years' itch, we have not seen the seventeen-year locust yet in Concord. We are acquainted with a mere pellicle of the globe on which we live. Most have not delved six feet beneath the surface, nor leaped as many above it. We know not where we are. Beside, we are sound asleep nearly half our time. Yet we esteem ourselves wise, and have an established order on the surface. Truly, we are deep thinkers, we are ambitious spirits! As I stand over the insect crawling amid the pine needles on the forest floor, and endeavoring to conceal itself from my sight, and ask myself why it will cherish those humble thoughts, and hide its head from me who might, perhaps, be its benefactor, and impart to its race some cheering information, I am reminded of the greater Benefactor and Intelligence that stands over me, the human insect.

There is an incessant influx of novelty into the world, and yet we tolerate incredible dulness. I need only suggest what kind of sermons are still listened to in the most enlightened countries. There are such words as joy and sorrow, but they are only the burden of a psalm, sung with a nasal twang, while we believe in the ordinary and mean. We think that we can change our clothes only. It is said that the British Empire is very large and respectable, and that the United States are a first-rate power. We do not believe that a tide rises and falls behind every man which can float the British Empire like a chip, if he should ever harbor it in his mind. Who knows what sort of seventeen-year locust will next come out of the ground? The government of the world I live in was not framed, like that of Britain, in after-dinner conversations over the wine.

The life in us is like the water in the river. It may rise this year higher than man has ever known it, and flood the parched uplands, even this may be the eventful year, which will drown out all our muskrats. It was not always dry land where we dwell. I see far inland the banks which the stream anciently washed, before science began to record its freshets. Every one has heard the story which has gone the rounds of New England, of a strong and beautiful bug which came out of the dry leaf of an old table of apple-tree wood, which had stood in a farmer's kitchen for sixty years, first in Connecticut, and afterward in Massachusetts—from an egg deposited in the living tree many years earlier still, as appeared by counting the annual layers beyond it, which was heard gnawing out for several weeks, hatched perchance by the heat of an urn. Who does not feel his faith in a resurrection and immortality strengthened by hearing of this? Who knows what beautiful and winged life, whose egg has been buried for ages under many concentric layers of woodenness in the dead dry life of society, deposited at first in the alburnum of the green and living tree, which has been gradually converted into the semblance of its well-seasoned tomb—heard perchance gnawing out now for years by the astonished family of man, as they sat round the festive board—may unexpectedly come forth from amidst society's most trivial and handselled furniture, to enjoy its perfect summer life at last!

I do not say that John or Jonathan will realize all this, but such is the character of that morrow which mere lapse of time can never make to dawn. The light which puts out our eyes is darkness to us. Only that day dawns to which we are awake. There is more day to dawn. The sun is but a morning star.

INSPIRATION

WHATE'ER we leave to God, God does,
And blesses us;

The work we choose should be our own,
God leaves alone

If with light head erect I sing,
Though all the Muses lend their force,
From my poor love of anything,
The verse is weak and shallow as its source

But if with bended neck I grope Listening behind me for my wit, 10
With faith superior to hope, More anxious to keep back than forward
it,

Making my soul accomplice there
Unto the flame my heart hath lit,
Then will the verse forever wear—Time cannot bend the line which God hath writ

Always the general show of things Floats in review before my mind,
And such true love and reverence brings,
That sometimes I forget that I am blind 20

But now there comes unsought, unseen,
Some clear divine electuary,
And I, who had but sensual been,
Grow sensible, and as God is, am wary

I hearing get, who had but ears,
And sight, who had but eyes before,
I moments live, who lived but years,
And truth discern, who knew but learning's lore

I hear beyond the range of sound,
I see beyond the range of sight, 30
New earths and skies and seas around,
And in my day the sun doth pale his light

A clear and ancient harmony
Pierces my soul through all its din,
As through its utmost melody,— Farther behind than they, farther within.

More swift its bolt than lightning is,
Its voice than thunder is more loud,
It doth expand my privacies 39
To all, and leave me single in the crowd

It speaks with such authority,
With so serene and lofty tone,
That idle Time runs gadding by,
And leaves me with Eternity alone.

Now chiefly is my natal hour,
And only now my prime of life,
Of manhood's strength it is the flower,
'Tis peace's end and war's beginning strife

It comes in summer's broadest noon,
By a grey wall or some chance place, 50
Unseasoning Time, insulting June,
And vexing day with its presuming face.

Such fragrance round my couch it makes,
More rich than are Arabian drugs,
That my soul scents its life and wakes
The body up beneath its perfumed rugs

Such is the Muse, the heavenly maid,
The star that guides our mortal course,
Which shows where life's true kernel's laid,
Its wheat's fine flour, and its undying force 60

She with one breath attunes the spheres,
And also my poor human heart,
With one impulse propels the years Around, and gives my throbbing pulse its start

I will not doubt for evermore,
Nor falter from a steadfast faith,
For though the system be turned o'er,
God takes not back the word which once He saith

I will not doubt the love untold Which not my worth nor want has bought, 70
Which wooed me young, and woos me old,
And to this evening hath me brought.

My memory I'll educate
To know the one historic truth,
Remembering to the latest date
The only true and sole immortal youth.

Be but thy inspiration given,
No matter through what danger sought,
I'll fathom hell or climb to heaven,
And yet esteem that cheap which love has bought. 80

Fame cannot tempt the bard Who's famous with his God, Nor laurel him reward
 Who has his Maker's nod.

MY LIFE IS LIKE A STROLL UPON THE BEACH

My life is like a stroll upon the beach,
 As near the ocean's edge as I can go, My tardy steps its waves sometimes o'erreach,
 Sometimes I stay to let them overflow.

My sole employment 'tis, and scrupulous care,
 To place my gains beyond the reach of tides,
 Each smoother pebble, and each shell more rare,
 Which Ocean kindly to my hand confides

I have but few companions on the shore, They scorn the strand who sail upon the sea, 10
 Yet oft I think the ocean they've sailed o'er Is deeper known upon the strand to me

The middle sea contains no crimson dulse, Its deeper waves cast up no pearls to view,
 Along the shore my hand is on its pulse,
 And I converse with many a shipwrecked crew

'Friends, Romans, Countrymen, and Lovers'

LET such pure hate still underprop
 Our love, that we may be Each other's conscience,
 And have our sympathy Mainly from thence.

We'll one another treat like gods,
 And all the faith we have In virtue and in truth, bestow
 On either, and suspicion leave To gods below 10

Two solitary stars—
 Unmeasured systems far Between us roll,
 But by our conscious light we are Determined to one pole

What need confound the sphere?—
 Love can afford to wait,
 For it no hour's too late
 That witnesseth one duty's end,
 Or to another doth beginning lend. 20

It will subserve no use,
 More than the tints of flowers;
 Only the independent guest Frequents its bowers,
 Inherits its bequest

No speech, though kind, has it,
 But kinder silence doles Unto its mates,
 By night consoles,
 By day congratulates 30

What saith the tongue to tongue?
 What heareth ear of ear?
 By the decrees of fate
 From year to year,
 Does it communicate

Pathless the gulf of feeling yawns,
 No trivial bridge of words,
 Or arch of boldest span,
 Can leap the moat that girds
 The sincere man 40

No show of bolts and bars
 Can keep the foeman out,
 Or 'scape his secret mine,
 Who entered with the doubt That drew the line

No warder at the gate
 Can let the friendly in,
 But, like the sun, o'er all
 He will the castle win,
 And shine along the wall 50

There's nothing in the world I know
 That can escape from love,
 For every depth it goes below,
 And every height above

It waits, as waits the sky,
 Until the clouds go by,

Yet shines serenely on
With an eternal day,
Alike when they are gone,
And when they stay

60

Implacable is Love,— Foes may be bought or teased
From their hostile intent,
But he goes unappeased
Who is on kindness bent.

THE SUMMER RAIN

My books I'd fain cast off, I cannot read,
'Twixt every page my thoughts go stray at large Down in the meadow, where is richer feed,
And will not mind to hit their proper target

Plutarch was good, and so was Homer too, Our Shakespeare's life were rich to live again,
What Plutarch read, that was not good nor true,
Nor Shakespeare's books, unless his books were men

Here while I lie beneath this walnut bough, What care I for the Greeks or for Troy
town,
If juster battles are enacted now Between the ants upon this hummock's crown?

10

Bid Homer wait till I the issue learn,
If red or black the gods will favor most,
Or yonder Ajax will the phalanx turn, Struggling to heave some rock against the host

Tell Shakespeare to attend some leisure hour,
For now I've business with this drop of dew,
And see you not, the clouds prepare a shower,— I'll meet him shortly when the sky is blue

20

This bed of herdsgrass and wild oats was spread
Last year with nicer skill than monarchs use,

A clover tuft is pillow for my head,
And violets quite overtop my shoes.

And now the cordial clouds have shut all in,
And gently swells the wind to say all's well,
The scattered drops are falling fast and thin,
Some in the pool, some in the flower-bell

I am well drenched upon my bed of oats;
But see that globe come rolling down its stem,
Now like a lonely planet there it floats,
And now it sinks into my garment's hem.

30

Drip, drip the trees for all the country
round,
And richness rare distills from every bough,
The wind alone it is makes every sound, Shaking down crystals on the leaves below

For shame the sun will never show himself, Who could not with his beams e'er melt me so,
My dripping locks,—they would become an elf,
Who in a beaded coat does gayly go

HAZE

WOOF of the sun, ethereal gauze, Woven of Nature's richest stuffs, Visible heat, air-water, and dry sea,
Last conquest of the eye,
Toil of the day displayed, sun-dust,
Aerial surf upon the shores of earth,
Ethereal estuary, frith of light,
Breakers of air, billows of heat,
Fine summer spray on inland seas,
Bird of the sun, transparent-winged,
Owlet of noon, soft-pinioned, From heath or stubble rising without song,—

SMOKE IN WINTER

THE sluggish smoke curls up from some deep dell,

The stiffl'd air exploring in the dawn,
And making slow acquaintance with the day,
Delaying now upon its heavenward course,
In wreath'd loiterings dallying with itself,
With as uncertain purpose and slow deed,
As its half-wakened master by the hearth, Whose mind, still slumbering, and sluggish thoughts
Have not yet swept into the onward current
Of the new day,—and now it streams afar,
The while the chopper goes with step direct, 11
And mind intent to wield the early axe.
First in the dusky dawn he sends abroad
His early scout, his emissary, smoke,
The earliest, latest pilgrim from the roof,
To feel the frosty air, inform the day,
And while he crouches still beside the hearth,
Nor musters courage to unbar the door,
It has gone down the glen with the light wind,
And o'er the plain unfurled its venturous
wreath, 20
Draped the tree-tops, loitered upon the hill,
And warmed the pinions of the early bird,
And now, perchance, high in the crispy air,
Has caught sight of the day o'er the earth's edge,
And greets its master's eye at his low door,
As some refulgent cloud in the upper sky.

CONSCIENCE

CONSCIENCE is instinct bred in the house,
Feeling and Thinking propagate the sin
By an unnatural breeding in and in I say, Turn it out doors,
Into the moors
I love a life whose plot is simple,
And does not thicken with every pimple,
A soul so sound no sickly conscience binds
it,
That makes the universe no worse than 't finds it
I love an earnest soul, 10
Whose mighty joy and sorrow
Are not drowned in a bowl,
And brought to life to-morrow,
I hat lives one tragedy,
And not seventy,

A conscience worth keeping,
Laughing not weeping,
A conscience wise and steady,
And for ever ready,
Not changing with events,
Dealing in compliments,
A conscience exercised about Large things, where one may doubt
I love a soul not all of wood, Predestinated to be good,
But true to the backbone Unto itself alone,
And false to none,
Born to its own affairs,
Its own joys and own cares,
By whom the work which God begun
Is finished, and not undone,
Taken up where he left off,
Whether to worship or to scoff,
If not good, why then evil,
If not good god, good devil Goodness!—you hypocrite, come out of that,
Live your life, do your work, then take your hat
I have no patience towards Such conscientious cowards Give me simple laboring folk,
Who love their work,
Whose virtue is a song
To cheer God along

INDEPENDENCE

My life more civil is and free
Than any civil polity

Ye princes, keep your realms
And circumscribèd power,
Not wide as are my dreams,
Nor rich as is this hour

What can ye give which I have not?
What can ye take which I have got?
Can ye defend the dangerless?
Can ye inherit nakedness?

To all true wants Time's ear is deaf, Penurious States lend no relief
Out of their pelf,
But a free soul—thank God—
Can help itself.

Be sure your fate
Doth keep apart its state,—

Not linked with any band,
Even the noblest in the land,—

In tented fields with cloth of gold      20
No place doth hold,
But is more chivalrous than they are,
And sightheth for a nobler war,

A finer strain its trumpet rings,
A brighter gleam its armor flings.

The life that I aspire to live,
No man proposeth me,
No trade upon the street Wears its emblazonry.      1841

GNOSIS

THOUGHT is deeper than all speech,
Feeling deeper than all thought,
Souls to souls can never teach What unto themselves was taught

We are spirits clad in veils,
Man by man was never seen,
All our deep communing fails
To remove the shadowy screen

Heart to heart was never known,
Mind with mind did never meet,      10
We are columns left alone,
Of a temple once complete

Like the stars that gem the sky, Far apart, though seeming near,
In our light we scattered lie,
All is thus but starlight here

What is social company
But a babbling summer stream?
What our wise philosophy
But the glancing of a dream?      20

Only when the sun of love Melts the scattered stars of thought,
Only when we live above
What the dim-eyed world hath taught,

Only when our souls are fed
By the Fount which gave them birth,

And by inspiration led,
Which they never drew from earth,

We like parted drops of rain Swelling till they meet and run,      30
Shall be all absorbed again, Melting, flowing into one

THE PINES AND THE SEA

BEYOND the low marsh-meadows and the beach,
Seen through the hoary trunks of windy
pines,
The long blue level of the ocean shines
The distant surf, with hoarse, complaining speech,
Out from its sandy barrier seems to reach,
And while the sun behind the woods declines,
The moaning sea with sighing boughs combines,
And waves and pines make answer, each to each
O melancholy soul, whom far and near,
In life, faith, hope, the same sad undertone Pursues from thought to thought! thou needs must hear      11
An old refrain, too much, too long thine own
'Tis thy mortality infects thine ear,
The mournful strain was in thyself alone

FROM THE EARTH SPIRIT

I HAVE WOVEN SHROUDS OF AIR

I HAVE woven shrouds of air
 In a loom of hurrying light,
 For the trees which blossoms bear,
 And gilded them with sheets of bright, 10
 I fall upon the grass like love's first kiss,
 I make the golden flies and their fine bliss
 I paint the hedge-rows in the lane,
 And clover white and red the pathways bear,
 I laugh aloud in sudden gusts of rain,
 To see the ocean lash himself in air, I throw smooth shells and weeds along the beach,
 And pour the curling waves far o'er the glassy reach,
 Swing birds' nests in the elms, and shake cool moss
 Along the aged beams and hide their loss 20
 The very broad rough stones I gladden too,
 Some willing seeds I drop along their sides, Nourish the generous plant with freshening
 dew,
 Till there, where all was waste, true joy abides
 The peaks of aged mountains, with my care
 Smile in the red of glowing morn elate,
 I bind the caverns of the sea with hair,
 Glossy, and long, and rich as king's estate,
 I polish the green ice, and gleam the wall With the white frost, and leaf the brown trees tall 30

FROM THE MOUNTAIN

IN THIS SWEET SOLITUDE, THE MOUNTAIN'S LIFE

IN this sweet solitude, the Mountain's life,
 At morn and eve, at rise and hush of day, 81
 I heard the wood-thrush sing in the white spruce,
 The living water, the enchanted air
 So mingling in the crystal clearness there,
 A sweet peculiar grace from both,—this song,
 Voice of the lovely mountain's favorite bird!

These steeps inviolate by human art,
 Centre of awe, raised over all that man Would fain enjoy and consecrate to one,
 Lord of the desert and of all beside, 90 Consorting with the cloud, the echoing storm,

When like a myriad bowls the mountain wakes

In all its alleys one responsive roar,
 And sheeted down the precipice, all light, Tumble the momentary cataracts,— The sudden laughter of the mountain-child!

Here haunts the sage of whom I sometime spake,—

Ample Fortunio On the mountain-peak I marked him once, at sunset, where he mused,

Forth looking on the continent of hills, 100 While from his feet the five long granite spurs

That bind the centre to the valley's side (The spokes from this strange middle to the wheel)

Stretched in the fitful torrent of the gale, Bleached on the terraces of leaden cloud
 And passages of light,—Sierras long
 In archipelagos of mountain sky,
 Where it went wandering all the livelong year

He spoke not, yet methought I heard him
 say,

'All day and night the same, in sun or shade, 110

In summer flames and the jagged biting knife

That hardy winter splits upon the cliff,—
 From earliest time the same One mother And one father brought us forth, thus gazing

On the summits of the days, nor wearied
 Yet if all your generations fade
 The crystal air, the hurrying light, the night,

Always the day that never seems to end, Always the night whose day does never set,

One harvest and one reaper, ne'er too ripe, Sown by the self-preserver, free from mould, 121

And builded in these granaries of heaven,

This ever living purity of air,
In these perpetual centres of repose Still softly rocked '

AND HERE THE HERMIT SAT, AND TOLD HIS BEADS

AND here the hermit sat, and told his beads, And stroked his flowing locks, red as the fire,
Summed up his tale of moon and sun and star

220

'How blest are we,' he deemed, 'who so comprise
The essence of the whole, and of ourselves,
As in a Venice flask of lucent shape,
Ornate of gilt Arabic, and inscribed With Suras from Time's Koran, live and pray,

More than half grateful for the glittering prize,

Human existence! If I note my powers,
So poor and frail a toy, the insect's prey,
Itched by a berry, festered by a plum,
The very air infecting my thin frame

230

With its malarial trick, whom every day
Rushes upon and hustles to the grave, Yet raised, by the great love that broods o'er all

Responsive, to a height beyond all thought '

He ended, as the nightly prayer and fast Summoned him inward But I sat and heard

The night-hawks rip the air above my head, Till midnight o'er the warm, dry, dewless rocks,

And saw the blazing dog-star droop his fire,
And the low comet, trailing to the south, 240
Bend his reverted gaze, and leave us free

FROM FLIGHT OF THE WILD GEESE

RAMBLING ALONG THE MARSHES

RAMBLING along the marshes,
On the bank of the Assabet, Sounding myself as to how it went,
Praying that I might not forget,
And all uncertain
Whether I was in the right,
Toiling to lift Time's curtain,
And if I burnt the strongest light;
Suddenly,
High in the air, 10
I heard the travelled geese
Their overture prepare

Stirred above the patent ball,
The wild geese flew,
Nor near so wild as that doth me befall,
Or, swollen Wisdom, you

In the front there fetched a leader,
Him behind the line spread out,
And waved about,
As it was near night, 20
When these air-pilots stop their flight

Cruising off the shoal dominion Where we sit,
Depending not on their opinion,
Nor hiving sops of wit,
Geographical in tact,
Naming not a pond or river,
Pulled with twilight down in fact,
In the reeds to quack and quiver,
There they go, 30

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW

1807-1882

HYMN TO THE NIGHT

I HEARD the trailing garments of the Night Sweep through her marble halls!

I saw her sable skirts all fringed with light
From the celestial walls!

I felt her presence, by its spell of might,
Stoop o'er me from above,
The calm, majestic presence of the Night,
As of the one I love the hour and scene' The Writings of Longfellow (Boston, 1886), III, 19

I heard the sounds of sorrow and delight,
 The manifold, soft chimes, 10
 That fill the haunted chambers of the Night,
 Like some old poet's rhymes

From the cool cisterns of the midnight air
 My spirit drank repose,
 The fountain of perpetual peace flows there,—
 From those deep cisterns flows.

O holy Night! from thee I learn to bear
 What man has borne before!
 Thou layest thy finger on the lips of Care,
 And they complain no more 20

Peace! Peace! Orestes-like I breathe this prayer!
 Descend with broad-winged flight, The welcome, the thrice-prayed for, the most fair,
 The best-beloved Night!

A PSALM OF LIFE <sup>1</sup>

WHAT THE HEART OF THE YOUNG MAN SAID TO THE PSALMIST

TELL me not, in mournful numbers,
 Life is but an empty dream!—
 For the soul is dead that slumbers, And things are not what they seem

Life is real! Life is earnest!
 And the grave is not its goal,
 Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
 Was not spoken of the soul

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
 Is our destined end or way, 10
 But to act, that each to-morrow
 Find us farther than to-day.

Art is long, and Time is fleeting,
 And our hearts, though stout and brave,
 Still, like muffled drums, are beating Funeral marches to the grave.

In the world's broad field of battle,
 In the bivouac of Life,

<sup>1</sup> Of the poem, Longfellow wrote 'I kept it some time in manuscript, unwilling to show it to any one, it being a voice from my inmost heart, at a time when I was rallying from depression' Ibid, III, 20 His depression came from the death of his first wife, in 1835

Be not like dumb, driven cattle!
 Be a hero in the strife! 20

Trust no Future, howe'er pleasant!
 Let the dead Past bury its dead!
 Act,—act in the living Present!
 Heart within, and God o'erhead!

Lives of great men all remind us
 We can make our lives sublime,
 And, departing, leave behind us Footprints on the sands of time;

Footprints, that perhaps another,
 Sailing o'er life's solemn main, 30
 A forlorn and shipwrecked brother, Seeing, shall take heart again

Let us, then, be up and doing,
 With a heart for any fate,
 Still achieving, still pursuing,
 Learn to labor and to wait

THE SKELETON IN ARMOR <sup>2</sup>

'SPEAK! speak! thou fearful guest!
 Who, with thy hollow breast
 Still in rude armor drest, Comest to daunt me!
 Wrapt not in Eastern balms,
 But with thy fleshless palms Stretched, as if asking alms, Why dost thou haunt me?'

Then, from those cavernous eyes Pale flashes seemed to rise, 10
 As when the Northern skies Gleam in December,
 And, like the water's flow
 Under December's snow, Came a dull voice of woe
 From the heart's chamber

<sup>2</sup> Longfellow wrote, 1 December 1840, to his father 'I have been hard at work,—for the most part wrapped up in my own dreams Have written a translation of a German ballad, and prepared for the press another original ballad, which has been lying by me some time It is called "The Skeleton in Armor", and is connected with the old Round Tower at Newport. This skeleton in armor really exists It was dug up near Fall River, where I saw it some two years ago I suppose it to be the remains of one of the old Northern sea-rovers, who came to this country in the tenth century Of course I make the tradition myself, and I think I have succeeded in giving the whole a Northern air' Ibid III, 52

'I was a Viking old!
My deeds, though manifold,
No Skald in song has told,
No Saga taught thee! 20
Take heed, that in thy verse
Thou dost the tale rehearse, Else dread a dead man's curse;
For this I sought thee

'Far in the Northern Land,
By the wild Baltic's strand,
I, with my childish hand,
Tamed the gerfalcon,
And, with my skates fast-bound,
Skimmed the half-frozen Sound, 30
That the poor whumpering hound Trembled to walk on

'Oft to his frozen lair Tracked I the grisly bear, While from my path the hare Fled like a shadow,
Oft through the forest dark Followed the were-wolf's bark
Until the soaring lark Sang from the meadow. 40

'But when I older grew, Joining a corsair's crew, O'er the dark sea I flew With the marauders Wild was the life we led,
Many the souls that sped,
Many the hearts that bled,
By our stern orders

'Many a wassail-bout Wore the long Winter out, 50
Often our midnight shout Set the cocks crowing,
As we the Berserk's tale Measured in cups of ale, Draining the oaken pail, Filled to o'erflowing

'Once as I told in glee Tales of the stormy sea,
Soft eyes did gaze on me,
Burning yet tender, 60
And as the white stars shine
On the dark Norway pine,
On that dark heart of mine
Fell their soft splendor,

'I wooed the blue-eyed maid, Yielding, yet half afraid,
And in the forest's shade
Our vows were plighted.
Under its loosened vest Fluttered her little breast, 70
Like birds within their nest
By the hawk frightened

'Bright in her father's hall Shields gleamed upon the wall,
Loud sang the minstrels all,
Chanting his glory,
When of old Hildebrand
I asked his daughter's hand,
Mute did the minstrels stand
To hear my story 80

'While the brown ale he quaffed, Loud then the champion laughed,
And as the wind-gusts waft
The sea-foam brightly,
So the loud laugh of scorn,
Out of those lips unshorn,
From the deep drinking-horn Blew the foam lightly

'She was a Prince's child,
I but a Viking wild, 90
And though she blushed and smiled,
I was discarded!
Should not the dove so white
Follow the sea-mew's flight,
Why did they leave that night
Her nest unguarded?

'Scarce had I put to sea,
Bearing the maid with me, Fairest of all was she Among the Norsemen! 100
When on the white sea-strand, Waving his armed hand,
Saw we old Hildebrand,
With twenty horsemen

'Then launched they to the blast, Bent like a reed each mast,
Yet we were gaming fast,
When the wind failed us,
And with a sudden flaw
Came round the gusty Skaw, 110
So that our foe we saw Laugh as he hailed us

'And as to catch the gale Round veered the flapping sail,
'Death!' was the helmsman's hail,

'Death without quarter!'
Mid-ships with iron keel Struck we her ribs of steel, Down her black hulk did reel
Through the black water!

120

'As with his wings aslant, Sails the fierce cormorant,
Seeking some rocky haunt,
With his prey laden,—
So toward the open main,
Beating to sea again,
Through the wild hurricane,
Bore I the maiden

'Three weeks we westward bore,
And when the storm was o'er,
Cloud-like we saw the shore Stretching to leeward,
There for my lady's bower Built I the lofty tower,
Which, to this very hour,
Stands looking seaward

130

'There lived we many years,
Time dried the maiden's tears,
She had forgot her fears,
She was a mother,
Death closed her mild blue eyes,
Under that tower she lies,
Ne'er shall the sun arise
On such another!

140

'Still grew my bosom then,
Still as a stagnant fen!
Hateful to me were men,
The sunlight hateful!
In the vast forest here,
Clad in my warlike gear,
Fell I upon my spear,
Oh, death was grateful!

150

'Thus, seamed with many scars, Bursting these prison bars,
Up to its native stars
My soul ascended!
There from the flowing bowl
Deep drinks the warrior's soul,
Skool! to the Northland! skool!
Thus the tale ended

FROM THE SPANISH STUDENT

SERENADE

STARS of the summer night!
Far in yon azure deeps,
Hide, hide your golden light!
She sleeps!
My lady sleeps!
Sleeps!

MOON of the summer night!
Far down yon western steeps,
Sink, sink in silver light!
She sleeps!
My lady sleeps!
Sleeps!

10

Wind of the summer night!
Where yonder woodbine creeps,
Fold, fold thy pinions light!
She sleeps!
My lady sleeps!
Sleeps!

DREAMS of the summer night!
Tell her, her lover keeps Watch! while in slumbers light
She sleeps!
My lady sleeps!
Sleeps!

MEZZO CAMMIN

HALF of my life is gone, and I have let The years slip from me and have not fulfilled
The aspiration of my youth, to build
Some tower of song with lofty parapet
Not indolence, nor pleasure, nor the fret Of restless passions that would not be stilled,
But sorrow, and a care that almost killed, Kept me from what I may accomplish yet,
Though, half-way up the hill, I see the Past Lying beneath me with its sounds and sights,—
A city in the twilight dim and vast,
With smoking roofs, soft bells, and gleaming lights,—
And hear above me on the autumnal blast
The cataract of Death far thundering from the heights.

I HEARD a voice, that cried,
 'Balder the Beautiful
 Is dead, is dead!'
 And through the misty air
 Passed like the mournful cry
 Of sunward sailing cranes.

I saw the pallid corpse
 Of the dead sun
 Borne through the Northern sky.
 Blasts from Niffelheim Lifted the sheeted mists Around him as he passed.

And the voice forever cried,
 'Balder the Beautiful
 Is dead, is dead!'
 And died away
 Through the dreary night,
 In accents of despair

Balder the Beautiful,
 God of the summer sun,
 Fairest of all the Gods!
 Light from his forehead beamed, Runes were upon his tongue,
 As on the warrior's sword

All things in earth and air Bound were by magic spell
 Never to do him harm,
 Even the plants and stones,
 All save the mistletoe,
 The sacred mistletoe!

Høder, the blind old God,
 Whose feet are shod with silence,
 Pierced through that gentle breast
 With his sharp spear, by fraud,
 Made of the mistletoe,
 The accursed mistletoe!

They laid him in his ship,
 With horse and harness,
 As on a funeral pyre.
 Odin placed

A ring upon his finger,
 And whispered in his ear.

They launched the burning ship!
 It floated far away
 Over the misty sea,
 Till like the sun it seemed,
 Sinking beneath the waves.
 Balder returned no more!

So perish the old Gods!
 But out of the sea of Time Rises a new land of song,
 Fairer than the old
 Over its meadows green
 Walk the young bards and sing.

Build it again,
 O ye bards,
 Fairer than before!
 Ye fathers of the new race,
 Feed upon morning dew,
 Sing the new Song of Love!

The law of force is dead!
 The law of love prevails!
 Thor, the thunderer,
 Shall rule the earth no more,
 No more, with threats,
 Challenge the meek Christ

Sing no more,
 O ye bards of the North,
 Of Vikings and of Jarls!
 Of the days of Eld
 Preserve the freedom only,
 Not the deeds of blood!

THE WARDEN OF THE CINQUE
PORTS <sup>2</sup>

A MIST was driving down the British Channel,
 The day was just begun,
 And through the window-panes, on floor and panel,
 Streamed the red autumn sun

It glanced on flowing flag and rippling pennon,

<sup>1</sup> Longfellow wrote, 14 October 1847, in his journal 'Went to town, after finishing a poem on Tegnér's death, in the spirit of the old Norse poetry' Ibid, III, 282 Tegnér (1782-1846) was, in Longfellow's words, 'first among the poets of Sweden' Longfellow translated several of his poems, among them 'The Children of the Lord's Supper' and 'Frithjof's Saga' The 'drapa' is a darg

<sup>2</sup> The poem was written in October 1852 to commemorate the death, the month before, of the Duke of Wellington, one of whose honorary titles was Warden of the Cinque Ports

And the white sails of ships,
And, from the frowning rampart, the black cannon
Hailed it with feverish lips

Sandwich and Romney, Hastings, Hithe, and Dover
Were all alert that day, 10
To see the French war-steamers speeding over,
When the fog cleared away

Sullen and silent, and like couchant lions,
Their cannon, through the night, Holding their breath, had watched, in grim defiance,
The sea-coast opposite

And now they roared at drum-beat from their stations
On every citadel, Each answering each, with morning salutations,
That all was well. 20

And down the coast, all taking up the burden,
Replied the distant forts,
As if to summon from his sleep the Warden
And Lord of the Cinque Ports.

Him shall no sunshine from the fields of azure,
No drum-beat from the wall,
No morning gun from the black fort's embrasure,
Awaken with its call!

No more, surveying with an eye impartial
The long line of the coast, 30
Shall the gaunt figure of the old Field Marshal
Be seen upon his post!

For in the night, unseen, a single warrior,
In sombre harness mailed, Dreaded of man, and surnamed the Destroyer,
The rampart wall had scaled

He passed into the chamber of the sleeper,
The dark and silent room,
And as he entered, darker grew, and deeper,
The silence and the gloom 40

He did not pause to parley or dissemble,
But smote the Warden hoar, Ah! what a blow! that made all England tremble
And groan from shore to shore

Meanwhile, without, the surly cannon waited,
The sun rose bright o'erhead,
Nothing in Nature's aspect intimated
That a great man was dead.

FROM THE SONG OF HIAWATHA<sup>1</sup>

10

HIAWATHA'S WOOING

'As unto the bow the cord is,
So unto the man is woman,
Though she bends him, she obeys him,
Though she draws him, yet she follows,
Useless each without the other!'
Thus the youthful Hiawatha
Said within himself and pondered, Much perplexed by various feelings,
Listless, longing, hoping, fearing, 10
Dreaming still of Minnehaha,
Of the lovely Laughing Water,
In the land of the Dacotahs.

1 'This Indian Edda—if I may so call it—is founded on a tradition, prevalent among the North American Indians, of a personage of miraculous birth, who was sent among them to clear their rivers, forests, and fishing-grounds, and to teach them the arts of peace. He was known among different tribes by the several names of Michabou, Chiabo, Manabozo, Taren-yawagon, and Hiawatha. Mr. Schoolcraft gives an account of him in his Algic Researches, vol. I, p. 134, and in his History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States, Part III, p. 314, may be found the Iroquois form of the tradition, derived from the verbal narrations of an Onondaga chief.

'Into this old tradition I have woven other curious Indian legends, drawn chiefly from the various and valuable writings of Mr. Schoolcraft, to whom the literary world is greatly indebted for his indefatigable zeal in rescuing from oblivion so much of the legendary lore of the Indians.

'The scene of the poem is among the Ojibways on the southern shore of Lake Superior, in the region between the Pictured Rocks and the Grand Sable.' Author's note, ibid., IV, 351-52.

Longfellow had written in his journal for 22 June 1854 'I have at length hit upon a plan for a poem on the American Indians, which seems to me the right one and the only. It is to weave together their beautiful traditions into a whole. I have hit upon a measure, too, which I think the right and only one for such a theme.' Ibid., IV, 107. The measure was that of the Finnish epic Kalevala, which Longfellow had been reading a few days previous, and found 'charming.'

'Wed a maiden of your people,' Warning said the old Nokomis;
 'Go not eastward, go not westward,
 For a stranger, whom we know not!
 Like a fire upon the hearth-stone
 Is a neighbor's homely daughter,
 Like the starlight or the moonlight
 Is the handsomest of strangers!'

Thus dissuading spake Nokomis,
 And my Hiawatha answered
 Only this 'Dear old Nokomis,
 Very pleasant is the firelight,
 But I like the starlight better,
 Better do I like the moonlight!'

Gravely then said old Nokomis:
 'Bring not here an idle maiden,
 Bring not here a useless woman,
 Hands unskilful, feet unwilling,
 Bring a wife with nimble fingers,
 Heart and hand that move together,
 Feet that run on willing errands!'

Smiling answered Hiawatha
 'In the land of the Dacotahs
 Lives the Arrow-maker's daughter,
 Minnehaha, Laughing Water,
 Handsomest of all the women
 I will bring her to your wigwam,
 She shall run upon your errands,
 Be your starlight, moonlight, firelight,
 Be the sunlight of my people!'

Still dissuading said Nokomis
 'Bring not to my lodge a stranger From the land of the Dacotahs!
 Very fierce are the Dacotahs,
 Often is there war between us,
 There are feuds yet unforgotten,
 Wounds that ache and still may open!'

Laughing answered Hiawatha
 'For that reason, if no other,
 Would I wed the fair Dacotah, That our tribes might be united,
 That old feuds might be forgotten,
 And old wounds be healed forever!'

Thus departed Hiawatha
 To the land of the Dacotahs,
 To the land of handsome women,
 Striding over moor and meadow,
 Through interminable forests,
 Through uninterrupted silence

With his moccasins of magic,
 At each stride a mile he measured,
 Yet the way seemed long before him,
 And his heart outran his footsteps,
 And he journeyed without resting,
 Till he heard the cataract's laughter,

Heard the Falls of Minnehaha
 Calling to him through the silence.
 'Pleasant is the sound!' he murmured,
 'Pleasant is the voice that calls me!'

On the outskirts of the forests,
 'Twixt the shadow and the sunshune, Herds of fallow deer were feeding,
 But they saw not Hiawatha,
 To his bow he whispered, 'Fail not!'
 To his arrow whispered, 'Swerve not!'
 Sent it singing on its errand,
 To the red heart of the roebuck,
 Threw the deer across his shoulder,

And sped forward without pausing
 At the doorway of his wigwam
 Sat the ancient Arrow-maker,
 In the land of the Dacotahs,
 Making arrow-heads of jasper,
 Arrow-heads of chalcedony.
 At his side, in all her beauty,
 Sat the lovely Minnehaha,
 Sat his daughter, Laughing Water, Plating mats of flags and rushes,
 Of the past the old man's thoughts were,
 And the maiden's of the future

He was thinking, as he sat there,
 Of the days when with such arrows
 He had struck the deer and bison,
 On the Muskoday, the meadow,
 Shot the wild goose, flying southward,
 On the wing, the clamorous Wawa,
 Thinking of the great war-parties,
 How they came to buy his arrows,
 Could not fight without his arrows
 Ah, no more such noble warriors Could be found on earth as they were!
 Now the men were all like women,
 Only used their tongues for weapons!

She was thinking of a hunter,
 From another tribe and country,
 Young and tall and very handsome,
 Who one morning, in the Spring-time,
 Came to buy her father's arrows,
 Sat and rested in the wigwam,
 Lingered long about the doorway,
 Looking back as he departed
 She had heard her father praise him,
 Praise his courage and his wisdom,
 Would he come again for arrows
 To the Falls of Minnehaha?
 On the mat her hands lay idle,
 And her eyes were very dreamy

Through their thoughts they heard a footstep,
 Heard a rustling in the branches,

And with glowing cheek and forehead,
With the deer upon his shoulders,
Suddenly from out the woodlands Hiawatha stood before them

Straight the ancient Arrow-maker Looked up gravely from his labor,
Laid aside the unfinished arrow,
Bade him enter at the doorway, Saying, as he rose to meet him, 130
'Hiawatha, you are welcome!'

At the feet of Laughing Water
Hiawatha laid his burden, Threw the red deer from his shoulders;
And the maiden looked up at him,
Looked up from her mat of rushes,
Said with gentle look and accent,
'You are welcome, Hiawatha!'

Very spacious was the wigwam,
Made of deer-skins dressed and whitened,
With the Gods of the Dacotahs 141
Drawn and painted on its curtains,
And so tall the doorway, hardly Hiawatha stooped to enter,
Hardly touched his eagle-feathers
As he entered at the doorway

Then uprose the Laughing Water,
From the ground fair Minnehaha,
Laid aside her mat unfinished,
Brought forth food and set before them, 150
Water brought them from the brooklet, Gave them food in earthen vessels,
Gave them drink in bowls of bass-wood,
Listened while the guest was speaking,
Listened while her father answered,
But not once her lips she opened,
Not a single word she uttered

Yes, as in a dream she listened To the words of Hiawatha,
As he talked of old Nokomis, 160
Who had nursed him in his childhood,
As he told of his companions,
Chibiabos, the musician,
And the very strong man, Kwasind,
And of happiness and plenty
In the land of the Ojibways,
In the pleasant land and peaceful.

'After many years of warfare,
Many years of strife and bloodshed,
There is peace between the Ojibways 170
And the tribe of the Dacotahs ' Thus continued Hiawatha,
And then added, speaking slowly,
'That this peace may last forever,
And our hands be clasped more closely,
And our hearts be more united,

Give me as my wife this maiden,
Minnehaha, Laughing Water,
Loveliest of Dacotah women!'

And the ancient Arrow-maker 180
Paused a moment ere he answered, Smoked a little while in silence,
Looked at Hiawatha proudly, Fondly looked at Laughing Water,
And made answer very gravely:
'Yes, if Minnehaha wishes, Let your heart speak, Minnehaha!'

And the lovely Laughing Water Seemed more lovely as she stood there, Neither willing nor reluctant, 190
As she went to Hiawatha, Softly took the seat beside him,
While she said, and blushed to say it,
'I will follow you, my husband!'

This was Hiawatha's wooing!
Thus it was he won the daughter Of the ancient Arrow-maker,
In the land of the Dacotahs!

From the wigwam he departed,
Leading with him Laughing Water, 200
Hand in hand they went together,
Through the woodland and the meadow,
Left the old man standing lonely
At the doorway of his wigwam,
Heard the Falls of Minnehaha
Calling to them from the distance, Crying to them from afar off,
'Fare thee well, O Minnehaha!'

And the ancient Arrow-maker 210
Turned again unto his labor,
Sat down by his sunny doorway, Murmuring to himself, and saying
'Thus it is our daughters leave us,
Those we love, and those who love us!
Just when they have learned to help us,
When we are old and lean upon them,
Comes a youth with flaunting feathers,
With his flute of reeds, a stranger
Wanders piping through the village,
Beckons to the fairest maiden, 220
And she follows where he leads her,
Leaving all things for the stranger!'

Pleasant was the journey homeward,
Through interminable forests,
Over meadow, over mountain,
Over river, hill, and hollow
Short it seemed to Hiawatha, Though they journeyed very slowly,
Though his pace he checked and slackened
To the steps of Laughing Water 230
Over wide and rushing rivers

In his arms he bore the maiden,
 Light he thought her as a feather,
 As the plume upon his head-gear,
 Cleared the tangled pathway for her,
 Bent aside the swaying branches,
 Made at night a lodge of branches,
 And a bed with boughs of hemlock,
 And a fire before the doorway
 With the dry cones of the pine-tree 240
 All the travelling winds went with
 them,

O'er the meadows, through the forest;
 All the stars of night looked at them,
 Watched with sleepless eyes their slumber,
 From his ambush in the oak-tree
 Peeped the squirrel, Adjidaumo, Watched with eager eyes the lovers,
 And the rabbit, the Wabasso, Scampered from the path before them,
 Peering, peeping from his burrow, 250
 Sat erect upon his haunches, Watched with curious eyes the lovers
 Pleasant was the journey homeward!

All the birds sang loud and sweetly Songs of happiness and heart's-ease; Sang the bluebird, the Owaissa,
 'Happy are you, Hiawatha, Having such a wife to love you!'
 Sang the robin, the Opechee,
 'Happy are you, Laughing Water, 260 Having such a noble husband!'

From the sky the sun benignant Looked upon them through the branches, Saying to them, 'O my children,
 Love is sunshine, hate is shadow,
 Life is checkered shade and sunshine,
 Rule by love, O Hiawatha!'

From the sky the moon looked at
 them,
 Filled the lodge with mystic splendors,
 Whispered to them, 'O my children, 270
 Day is restless, night is quiet, Man imperious, woman feeble,
 Half is mine, although I follow,
 Rule by patience, Laughing Water!'

Thus it was they journeyed homeward;
 Thus it was that Hiawatha
 To the lodge of old Nokomis Brought the moonlight, starlight, firelight, Brought the sunshine of his people,
 Minnehaha, Laughing Water, 280
 Handsomest of all the women
 In the land of the Dacotahs,
 In the land of handsome women.

MY LOST YOUTH<sup>1</sup>

OFTEN I think of the beautiful town
 That is seated by the sea,
 Often in thought go up and down
 The pleasant streets of that dear old town,
 And my youth comes back to me.
 And a verse of a Lapland song Is haunting my memory still
 'A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts'

I can see the shadowy lines of its trees, 10
 And catch, in sudden gleams,
 The sheen of the far-surrounding seas,
 And islands that were the Hesperides
 Of all my boyish dreams
 And the burden of that old song, It murmurs and whispers still
 'A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts'

I remember the black wharves and the slips,
 And the sea-tides tossing free, 20
 And Spanish sailors with bearded lips,
 And the beauty and mystery of the ships,
 And the magic of the sea
 And the voice of that wayward song Is singing and saying still
 'A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts'

I remember the bulwarks by the shore,
 And the fort upon the hill,
 The sunrise gun, with its hollow roar, 30
 The drum-beat repeated o'er and o'er,
 And the bugle wild and shrill
 And the music of that old song
 'Throbs in my memory still'
 'A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts'

<sup>1</sup> In his journal for 29 March 1855, Longfellow wrote 'A day of pain, cowering over the fire At night, as I lie in bed, a poem comes into my mind,—a memory of Portland,—my native town, the city by the sea'
 The next day he entered 'Wrote the poem, and am rather pleased with it, and with the bringing in of the two lines of the old Lapland song,

A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts'
 Ibid, V, 41

I remember the sea-fight far away,
 How it thundered o'er the tide!
 And the dead captains, as they lay In their graves, o'erlooking the tranquil bay, 40

Where they in battle died.
 And the sound of that mournful song Goes through me with a thrill:
 'A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts.'

I can see the breezy dome of groves,
 The shadows of Deering's Woods;
 And the friendships old and the early loves Come back with a Sabbath sound, as of doves

In quiet neighborhoods, 50
 And the verse of that sweet old song, It flutters and murmurs still
 'A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts'

I remember the gleams and glooms that dart
 Across the school-boy's brain,
 The song and the silence in the heart,
 That in part are prophecies, and in part
 Are longings wild and vain
 And the voice of that fitful song 60 Sings on, and is never still
 'A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts'

There are things of which I may not speak;
 There are dreams that cannot die,
 There are thoughts that make the strong heart weak,
 And bring a pallor into the cheek,
 And a mist before the eye,
 And the words of that fatal song
 Come over me like a chill 70
 'A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts'

Strange to me now are the forms I meet
 When I visit the dear old town;
 But the native air is pure and sweet,
 And the trees that o'ershadow each well-known street,
 As they balance up and down,
 Are singing the beautiful song,

Are sighing and whispering still
 'A boy's will is the wind's will, 80
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts'

And Deering's Woods are fresh and fair,
 And with joy that is almost pain
 My heart goes back to wander there, And among the dreams of the days that were,

I find my lost youth again.
 And the strange and beautiful song,
 The groves are repeating it still:
 'A boy's will is the wind's will,
 And the thoughts of youth are long, long
 thoughts.' 90

SANDALPHON

HAVE you read in the Talmud of old,
 In the Legends the Rabbins have told
 Of the limitless realms of the air,
 Have you read it,—the marvellous story
 Of Sandalphon, the Angel of Glory, Sandalphon, the Angel of Prayer?

How, erect, at the outermost gates Of the City Celestial he waits,
 With his feet on the ladder of light,
 That, crowded with angels unnumbered, 10
 By Jacob was seen, as he slumbered
 Alone in the desert at night?

The Angels of Wind and of Fire
 Chant only one hymn, and expire
 With the song's irresistible stress;
 Expire in their rapture and wonder,
 As harp-strings are broken asunder
 By music they throb to express.

But serene in the rapturous throng, Unmoved by the rush of the song, 20
 With eyes unimpassioned and slow,
 Among the dead angels, the deathless Sandalphon stands listening breathless
 To sounds that ascend from below;—

From the spirits on earth that adore,
 From the souls that entreat and implore
 In the fervor and passion of prayer, From the hearts that are broken with losses,
 And weary with dragging the crosses Too heavy for mortals to bear 30

And he gathers the prayers as he stands,
 And they change into flowers in his hands,
 Into garlands of purple and red,
 And beneath the great arch of the portal,
 Through the streets of the City Immortal
 Is wafted the fragrance they shed.

It is but a legend, I know,—
 A fable, a phantom, a show,
 Of the ancient Rabbinical lore;
 Yet the old mediæval tradition, 40
 The beautiful, strange superstition,
 But haunts me and holds me the more

When I look from my window at night,
 And the welkin above is all white,
 All throbbing and panting with stars,
 Among them majestic is standing Sandalphon the angel, expanding
 His pinions in nebulous bars

And the legend, I feel, is a part Of the hunger and thirst of the heart, 50
 The frenzy and fire of the brain,
 That grasps at the fruitage forbidden,
 The golden pomegranates of Eden,
 To quiet its fever and pain

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

BETWEEN the dark and the daylight,
 When the night is beginning to lower,
 Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
 That is known as the Children's Hour

I hear in the chamber above me
 The patter of little feet,
 The sound of a door that is opened,
 And voices soft and sweet

From my study I see in the lamplight, Descending the broad hall stair, 10
 Grave Alice, and laughing Allegra,
 And Edith with golden hair

A whisper, and then a silence
 Yet I know by their merry eyes
 They are plotting and planning together
 To take me by surprise

A sudden rush from the stairway,
 A sudden raid from the hall!
 By three doors left unguarded
 They enter my castle wall! 20

They climb up into my turret O'er the arms and back of my chair;
 If I try to escape, they surround me;
 They seem to be everywhere

They almost devour me with kisses,
 Their arms about me entwine,
 Till I think of the Bishop of Bingen
 In his Mouse-Tower on the Rhine!

Do you think, O blue-eyed banditti, Because you have scaled the wall, 30
 Such an old mustache as I am
 Is not a match for you all!

I have you fast in my fortress,
 And will not let you depart,
 But put you down into the dungeon
 In the round-tower of my heart

And there will I keep you forever,
 Yes, forever and a day,
 Till the walls shall crumble to ruin,
 And moulder in dust away! 40

PAUL REVERE'S RIDE

LISTEN, my children, and you shall hear
 Of the midnight ride of Paul Revere, On the eighteenth of April, in Seventy-five, Hardly a man is now alive
 Who remembers that famous day and year

He said to his friend, 'If the British march By land or sea from the town to-night,
 Hang a lantern aloft in the belfry arch
 Of the North Church tower as a signal
 light,—

One, if by land, and two, if by sea, 10
 And I on the opposite shore will be, Ready to ride and spread the alarm
 Through every Middlesex village and farm,
 For the country folk to be up and to arm '

Then he said, 'Good night!' and with muffled oar
 Silently rowed to the Charlestown shore,
 Just as the moon rose over the bay,
 Where swinging wide at her moorings lay
 The Somerset, British man-of-war,
 A phantom ship, with each mast and spar 20
 Across the moon like a prison bar,
 And a huge black hulk, that was magnified
 By its own reflection in the tide

Meanwhile, his friend, through alley and street,
Wanders and watches with eager ears,
Till in the silence around him he hears
The muster of men at the barrack door,
The sound of arms, and the tramp of feet,
And the measured tread of the grenadiers,
Marching down to their boats on the shore.

Then he climbed the tower of the Old North Church, 31
By the wooden stairs, with stealthy tread,
To the belfry-chamber overhead,
And startled the pigeons from their perch On the sombre rafters, that round him made

Masses and moving shapes of shade,—
By the trembling ladder, steep and tall,
To the highest window in the wall,
Where he paused to listen and look down
A moment on the roofs of the town, 40
And the moonlight flowing over all Beneath, in the churchyard, lay the dead,
In their night-encampment on the hill, Wrapped in silence so deep and still
That he could hear, like a sentinel's tread,
The watchful night-wind, as it went Creeping along from tent to tent,
And seeming to whisper, 'All is well!'
A moment only he feels the spell
Of the place and the hour, and the secret dread 50

Of the lonely belfry and the dead,
For suddenly all his thoughts are bent
On a shadowy something far away,
Where the river widens to meet the bay,—
A line of black that bends and floats
On the rising tide, like a bridge of boats

Meanwhile, impatient to mount and ride,
Booted and spurred, with a heavy stride
On the opposite shore walked Paul Revere
Now he patted his horse's side, 60
Now gazed at the landscape far and near,
Then, impetuous, stamped the earth,
And turned and tightened his saddle-girth,
But mostly he watched with eager search
The belfry-tower of the Old North Church,

As it rose above the graves on the hill, Lonely and spectral and sombre and still
And lo! as he looks, on the belfry's height
A glimmer, and then a gleam of light!
He springs to the saddle, the bridle he turns, 70

But lingers and gazes, till full on his sight
A second lamp in the belfry burns!

A hurry of hoofs in a village street,
A shape in the moonlight, a bulk in the dark,
And beneath, from the pebbles, in passing, a spark Struck out by a steed flying fearless and fleet
That was all! And yet, through the gloom and the light,
The fate of a nation was riding that night,
And the spark struck out by that steed, in his flight,
Kindled the land into flame with its heat. 80

He has left the village and mounted the steep,
And beneath him, tranquil and broad and deep,
Is the Mystic, meeting the ocean tides;
And under the alders, that skirt its edge, Now soft on the sand, now loud on the ledge,
Is heard the tramp of his steed as he rides.

It was twelve by the village clock,
When he crossed the bridge into Medford
town

He heard the crowing of the cock,
And the barking of the farmer's dog, 90
And felt the damp of the river fog,
That rises after the sun goes down

It was one by the village clock,
When he galloped into Lexington
He saw the gilded weathercock Swim in the moonlight as he passed, And the meeting-house windows, blank and bare,
Gaze at him with a spectral glare,
As if they already stood aghast
At the bloody work they would look upon.

It was two by the village clock, 101
When he came to the bridge in Concord
town

He heard the bleating of the flock,
And the twitter of birds among the trees,
And felt the breath of the morning breeze Blowing over the meadows brown
And one was safe and asleep in his bed
Who at the bridge would be first to fall,

Who that day would be lying dead,
Pierced by a British musket-ball 110

You know the rest In the books you have read,
How the British Regulars fired and fled,—
How the farmers gave them ball for ball,
From behind each fence and farm-yard
wall,
Chasing the red-coats down the lane,
Then crossing the fields to emerge again
Under the trees at the turn of the road,
And only pausing to fire and load.

So through the night rode Paul Revere, And so through the night went his cry of alarm 120
To every Middlesex village and farm,—
A cry of defiance and not of fear,
A voice in the darkness, a knock at the door,
And a word that shall echo forevermore!
For, borne on the night-wind of the Past,
Through all our history, to the last,
In the hour of darkness and peril and need,
The people will waken and listen to hear
The hurrying hoof-beats of that steed, 129
And the midnight message of Paul Revere.

THE CHALLENGE OF THOR

I AM the God Thor,
I am the War God,
I am the Thunderer!
Here in my Northland,
My fastness and fortress,
Reign I forever!

Here amid icebergs
Rule I the nations,
This is my hammer,
Mjolner the mighty, 10
Giants and sorcerers Cannot withstand it!

These are the gauntlets Wherewith I wield it,

<sup>1</sup> 'The Saga of King Olaf' was, like 'Paul Revere's Ride,' one of the stories from The Tales of a Wayside Inn. It was based on Longfellow's study of the Heimskringla, a history of the kings of Norway up to 1177. The first section of Longfellow's saga was originally written as a part of his Christus.

And hurl it afar off;
This is my girdle,
Whenever I brace it,
Strength is redoubled!

The light thou beholdest Stream through the heavens, 20
In flashes of crimson,
Is but my red beard
Blown by the night-wind, Affrighting the nations!

Jove is my brother,
Mine eyes are the lightning,
The wheels of my chariot
Roll in the thunder,
The blows of my hammer
Ring in the earthquake! 30

Force rules the world still,
Has ruled it, shall rule it,
Meekness is weakness,
Strength is triumphant,
Over the whole earth
Still is it Thor's-Day!

Thou art a God too,
O Galilean!
And thus single-handed Unto the combat, 40
Gauntlet or Gospel,
Here I defy thee!

KING OLAF'S RETURN

AND King Olaf heard the cry,
Saw the red light in the sky,
Laid his hand upon his sword,
As he leaned upon the railing,
And his ships went sailing, sailing Northward into Drontheim fiord

There he stood as one who dreamed,
And the red light glanced and gleamed
On the armor that he wore,
And he shouted, as the rifted 10
Streamers o'er him shook and shifted,
'I accept thy challenge, Thor!'

To avenge his father slain,
And reconquer realm and reign,
Came the youthful Olaf home,
Through the midnight sailing, sailing,

Listening to the wild wind's wailing,
And the dashing of the foam

To his thoughts the sacred name
Of his mother Astrid came, 20
And the tale she oft had told
Of her flight by secret passes Through the mountains and morasses,
To the home of Hakon old.

Then strange memories crowded back Of Queen Gunhild's wrath and wrack,
And a hurried flight by sea,
Of grim Vikings, and the rapture
Of the sea-fight, and the capture, 30
And the life of slavery

How a stranger watched his face
In the Esthonian market-place, Scanned his features one by one,
Saying, 'We should know each other,
I am Sigurd, Astrid's brother,
Thou art Olaf, Astrid's son!'

Then as Queen Allogia's page,
Old in honors, young in age,
Chief of all her men-at-arms;
Till vague whispers, and mysterious, 40
Reached King Valdemar, the imperious, Filling him with strange alarms

Then his cruisings o'er the seas, Westward to the Hebrides
And to Scilly's rocky shore,
And the hermit's cavern dismal, Christ's great name and rites baptismal
In the ocean's rush and roar

All these thoughts of love and strife
Glimmered through his lurid life, 50
As the stars' intenser light Through the red flames o'er him trailing,
As his ships went sailing, sailing Northward in the summer night

Trained for either camp or court,
Skilful in each manly sport,
Young and beautiful and tall,
Art of warfare, craft of chases,
Swimming, skating, snow-shoe races,
Excellent alike in all 60

When at sea, with all his rowers,
He along the bending oars Outside of his ship could run

He the Smalsor Horn ascended,
And his shining shield suspended
On its summit, like a sun.

On the ship-rails he could stand,
Wield his sword with either hand,
And at once two javelins throw, 70
At all feasts where ale was strongest Sat the merry monarch longest,
First to come and last to go.

Norway never yet had seen
One so beautiful of mien,
One so royal in attire,
When in arms completely furnished,
Harness gold-inlaid and burnished,
Mantle like a flame of fire.

Thus came Olaf to his own,
When upon the night-wind blown 80
Passed that cry along the shore,
And he answered, while the rifted
Streamers o'er him shook and shifted,
'I accept thy challenge, Thor!'

KING OLAF'S WAR-HORNS

'STRIKE the sails!' King Olaf said,
'Never shall men of mine take flight,
Never away from battle I fled, Never away from my foes!'
Let God dispose
Of my life in the fight!'

'Sound the horns!' said Olaf the King,
And suddenly through the drifting brume
The blare of the horns began to ring,
Like the terrible trumpet shock 10
Of Ragnarock,
On the Day of Doom!'

Louder and louder the war-horns sang
Over the level floor of the flood,
All the sails came down with a clang,
And there in the midst overhead
The sun hung red
As a drop of blood

Drifting down on the Danish fleet
Three together the ships were lashed, 20
So that neither should turn and retreat;
In the midst, but in front of the rest,
The burnished crest
Of the Serpent flashed

King Olaf stood on the quarter-deck,
With bow of ash and arrows of oak,
His gilded shield was without a fleck,

His helmet inlaid with gold,
And in many a fold
Hung his crimson cloak.

On the forecastle Ulf the Red Watched the lashing of the ships;
'If the Serpent lie so far ahead,
We shall have hard work of it here,'

Said he with a sneer
On his bearded lips

King Olaf laid an arrow on string,
'Have I a coward on board?' said he.
'Shoot it another way, O King!' Sullenly answered Ulf,
The old sea-wolf,
'You have need of me!'

In front came Svend, the King of the Danes,
Sweeping down with his fifty rowers, To the right, the Swedish king with his thanes,
And on board of the Iron Beard Earl Eric steered
To the left with his oars

'These soft Danes and Swedes,' said the King,
'At home with their wives had better stay,
Than come within reach of my Serpent's sting
But where Eric the Norseman leads Heroic deeds
Will be done to-day!'

Then as together the vessels crashed,
Eric severed the cables of hude, With which King Olaf's ships were lashed,
And left them to drive and drift
With the currents swift
Of the outward tide

Louder the war-horns growl and snarl, Sharper the dragons bite and sting!
Eric the son of Hakon Jarl
A death-drink salt as the sea Pledges to thee,
Olaf the King!

EINAR TAMBERSKELVER

It was Einar Tamberskelver Stood beside the mast,
From his yew-bow, tipped with silver,
Flew the arrows fast,
Aimed at Eric unavailing,
As he sat concealed,
Half behind the quarter-railing,
Half behind his shield.

First an arrow struck the tiller,
Just above his head,
'Sing, O Eyvind Skaldaspiller,' Then Earl Eric said
'Sing the song of Hakon dying, Sing his funeral wail'
And another arrow flying Grazed his coat of mail.

Turning to a Lapland yeoman,
As the arrow passed,
Said Earl Eric, 'Shoot that bowman Standing by the mast'
Sooner than the word was spoken
Flew the yeoman's shaft,
Einar's bow in twain was broken,
Einar only laughed

'What was that?' said Olaf, standing On the quarter-deck
'Something heard I like the stranding
Of a shattered wreck' Einar then, the arrow taking
From the loosened string, Answered, 'That was Norway breaking From thy hand, O King!'

'Thou art but a poor diviner,' Straightway Olaf said,
'Take my bow, and swifter, Einar, Let thy shafts be sped'
Of his bows the fairest choosing,
Reached he from above,
Einar saw the blood-drops oozing
Through his iron glove

But the bow was thin and narrow,
At the first assay,
O'er its head he drew the arrow,
Flung the bow away,
Said, with hot and angry temper Flushing in his cheek,

'Olaf! for so great a Kämpfer
Are thy bows too weak!'

Then, with smile of joy defiant
On his beardless lip,
Scaled he, light and self-reliant,
Eric's dragon-ship
Loose his golden locks were flowing,
Bright his armor gleamed;
Like Saint Michael overthrowing Lucifer he seemed

KING OLAF'S DEATH-DRINK

ALL day has the battle raged,
All day have the ships engaged,
But not yet is assuaged
The vengeance of Eric the Earl.

The decks with blood are red,
The arrows of death are sped,
The ships are filled with the dead,
And the spears the champions hurl.

They drift as wrecks on the tide,
The grappling-irons are plied,
The boarders climb up the side,
The shouts are feeble and few.

Ah! never shall Norway again See her sailors come back o'er the main;
They all lie wounded or slain,
Or asleep in the billows blue!

On the deck stands Olaf the King,
Around him whistle and sing
The spears that the foemen fling, And the stones they hurl with their hands.

In the midst of the stones and the spears, Kolbiorn, the marshal, appears,
His shield in the air he uprears,
By the side of King Olaf he stands.

Over the slippery wreck
Of the Long Serpent's deck Sweeps Eric with hardly a check,
His lips with anger are pale,

He hews with his axe at the mast,
Till it falls, with the sails overcast,
Like a snow-covered pine in the vast Dim forests of Orkadale.

Seeking King Olaf then,
He rushes aft with his men,
As a hunter into the den
Of the bear, when he stands at bay.

'Remember Jarl Hakon!' he cries; When lo! on his wondering eyes,
Two kingly figures arise,
Two Olafs in warlike array!

Then Kolbiorn speaks in the ear
Of King Olaf a word of cheer,
In a whisper that none may hear,
With a smile on his tremulous lip;

Two shields raised high in the air,
Two flashes of golden hair,
Two scarlet meteors' glare,
And both have leaped from the ship.

Earl Eric's men in the boats Seize Kolbiorn's shield as it floats,
And cry, from their hairy throats,
'See! it is Olaf the King!'

While far on the opposite side Floats another shield on the tide,
Like a jewel set in the wide Sea-current's eddying ring

There is told a wonderful tale,
How the King stripped off his mail,
Like leaves of the brown sea-kale,
As he swam beneath the main,

But the young grew old and gray,
And never, by night or by day,
In his kingdom of Norraway Was King Olaf seen again!

HAWTHORNE

MAY 23, 1864<sup>1</sup>

How beautiful it was, that one bright day
In the long week of rain!
Though all its splendor could not chase away
The omnipresent pain.

The lovely town was white with apple-blooms,
And the great elms o'erhead

<sup>1</sup> The date is that of Hawthorne's burial in Sleepy Hollow cemetery at Concord

Dark shadows wove on their aerial looms Shot through with golden thread.

Across the meadows, by the gray old manse,
The historic river flowed 10
I was as one who wanders in a trance, Unconscious of his road.

The faces of familiar friends seemed strange,
Their voices I could hear,
And yet the words they uttered seemed to change
Their meaning to my ear.

For the one face I looked for was not there,
The one low voice was mute;
Only an unseen presence filled the air,
And baffled my pursuit. 20

Now I look back, and meadow, manse, and stream
Dimly my thought defines,
I only see—a dream within a dream—
The hill-top hearsed with pines

I only hear above his place of rest
Their tender undertone,
The infinite longings of a troubled breast,
The voice so like his own

There in seclusion and remote from men
The wizard hand lies cold, 30
Which at its topmost speed let fall the pen,
And left the tale half told

Ah! who shall lift that wand of magic power,
And the lost clew regain?
The unfinished window in Aladdin's tower Unfinished must remain!

DIVINA COMMEDIA <sup>1</sup>

I

OFT have I seen at some cathedral door
A laborer, pausing in the dust and heat, Lay down his burden, and with reverent feet
Enter, and cross himself, and on the floor
Kneel to repeat his paternoster o'er,

<sup>1</sup> The sonnets were written to precede and follow each division of Longfellow's translation of Dante's Divine Comedy

Far off the noises of the world retreat;
The loud vociferations of the street Become an undistinguishable roar
So, as I enter here from day to day, And leave my burden at this minster gate, 10
Kneeling in prayer, and not ashamed to
pray,
The tumult of the time disconsolate
To inarticulate murmurs dies away,
While the eternal ages watch and wait.

2

How strange the sculptures that adorn these towers!
This crowd of statues, in whose folded sleeves
Birds build their nests, while canopied with leaves
Parvis and portal bloom like trellised
bowers,
And the vast minster seems a cross of flowers!
But fiends and dragons on the gargoyled eaves 20
Watch the dead Christ between the living thieves,
And, underneath, the traitor Judas lowers!
Ah! from what agonies of heart and brain,
What exultations trampling on despair,
What tenderness, what tears, what hate of wrong,
What passionate outcry of a soul in pain,
Uprose this poem of the earth and air,
This mediæval miracle of song!

3

I enter, and I see thee in the gloom
Of the long aisles, O poet saturnine! 30 And strive to make my steps keep pace with thine
The air is filled with some unknown perfume,
The congregation of the dead make room
For thee to pass, the votive tapers shine, Like rooks that haunt Ravenna's groves of pine
The hovering echoes fly from tomb to tomb
From the confessionals I hear arise
Rehearsals of forgotten tragedies, And lamentations from the crypts
below,
And then a voice celestial that begins 40

With the pathetic words, 'Although your sins
As scarlet be,' and ends with 'as the snow.'

4

With snow-white veil and garments as of flame,
She stands before thee, who so long ago Filled thy young heart with passion and the woe
From which thy song and all its splendors came,
And while with stern rebuke she speaks thy name,
The ice about thy heart melts as the snow On mountain heights, and in swift overflow Comes gushing from thy lips in sobs of shame 50
Thou makest full confession, and a gleam,
As of the dawn on some dark forest cast,
Seems on thy lifted forehead to increase,
Lethe and Eunoë—the remembered dream
And the forgotten sorrow—bring at last That perfect pardon which is perfect peace

5

I lift mine eyes, and all the windows blaze With forms of saints and holy men who died,
Here martyred and hereafter glorified,
And the great Rose upon its leaves displays 60
Christ's Triumph, and the angelic roundelays,
With splendor upon splendor multiplied,
And Beatrice again at Dante's side
No more rebukes, but smiles her words of praise
And then the organ sounds, and unseen
choirs
Sing the old Latin hymns of peace and love,
And benedictions of the Holy Ghost,
And the melodious bells among the spires O'er all the house-tops and through heaven above Proclaim the elevation of the Host! 70

6

O star of morning and of liberty!
O bringer of the light, whose splendor shines

Above the darkness of the Apennines, Forerunner of the day that is to be!
The voices of the city and the sea,
The voices of the mountains and the pines,
Repeat thy song, till the familiar lines
Are footpaths for the thought of Italy!
Thy fame is blown abroad from all the heights,
Through all the nations, and a sound is heard, 80
As of a mighty wind, and men devout,
Strangers of Rome, and the new proselytes, In their own language hear thy wondrous word,
And many are amazed and many doubt

FROM THE DIVINE COMEDY

PAOLO AND FRANCESCA <sup>1</sup>

AND I began 'O Poet, willingly Speak would I to those two, who go together,
And seem upon the wind to be so light.' And he to me 'Thou'lt mark, when they shall be Nearer to us, and then do thou implore
By love which leadeth them, and they will come '
Soon as the wind in our direction sways
them,
My voice uplift I 'Oh ye weary souls! 80
Come speak to us, if no one interdicts it '
As turtle-doves, called onward by desire,
With open and steady wings to the sweet nest
Fly through the air by their volition borne,
So came they from the band where Dido
is,
Approaching us athwart the air malign,
So strong was the affectionate appeal.
'O living creature gracious and benignant, Who visiting goest through the purple air
Us, who have stained the world incarnadine, 90
If were the King of the Universe our friend,

<sup>1</sup> The selection, to which the title has been given by the editors, is from Canto 5 of the 'Inferno' The translation of The Divine Comedy was Longfellow's most ambitious work, begun in 1843 and completed for the six-hundredth anniversary of the poet's birth

We would pray unto him to give thee
     peace,
 Since thou hast pity on our woe perverse.
 Of what it pleases thee to hear and speak,
     That will we hear, and we will speak to you,
 While silent is the wind, as it is now.
 Sitteth the city, wherein I was born, Upon the sea-shore where the Po descends
 To rest in peace with all his retinue Love, that on gentle heart doth swiftly seize, 100
 Seized this man for the person beautiful That was ta'en from me, and still the mode offends me Love, that exempts no one beloved from loving,
 Seized me with pleasure of this man so strongly,
 That, as thou seest, it doth not yet desert
     me,
 Love has conducted us unto one death, Cana waiteth him who quenched our life!
 These words were borne along from them to us
 As soon as I had heard those souls tormented,
 I bowed my face, and so long held it
     down 110
 Until the Poet said to me 'What thinkest?'
 When I made answer, I began 'Alas!
 How many pleasant thoughts, how much desire,
 Conducted these unto the dolorous pass!
 Then unto them I turned me, and I
     spake,
 And I began 'Thine agonies, Francesca, Sad and compassionate to weeping make
     me
 But tell me, at the time of those sweet sighs, By what and in what manner Love conceded,
 That you should know your dubious desires?' 120
 And she to me 'There is no greater sorrow
 Than to be mindful of the happy time
 In misery, and that thy Teacher knows
 But, if to recognize the earliest root
 Of love in us thou hast so great desire, I will do even as he who weeps and speaks
 One day we reading were for our delight

Of Launcelot, how Love did him enthrall.
 Alone we were and without any fear.
 Full many a time our eyes together drew 130 That reading, and drove the color from our faces;
 But one point only was it that o'ercame us.
 Whenas we read of the much longed-for smile
 Being by such a noble lover kissed, This one, who ne'er from me shall be divided,
 Kissed me upon the mouth all palpitating Galeotto was the book and he who wrote
     it
 That day no farther did we read therein '
 And all the while one spirit uttered this, 139
 The other one did weep so, that, for pity,
 I swooned away as if I had been dying,
 And fell, even as a dead body falls

BELISARIUS

I AM poor and old and blind,
 The sun burns me, and the wind Blows through the city gate,
 And covers me with dust
 From the wheels of the august Justinian the Great

It was for him I chased
 The Persians o'er wild and waste,
     As General of the East,
 Night after night I lay 10
 In their camps of yesterday,
     Their forage was my feast

For him, with sails of red,
 And torches at mast-head,
     Piloting the great fleet,
 I swept the Afric coasts
 And scattered the Vandal hosts,
     Like dust in a windy street.

For him I won again
 The Ausonian realm and reign, 20
     Rome and Parthenope,
 And all the land was mine
 From the summits of Apennine
     To the shores of either sea.

For him, in my feeble age,
 I dared the battle's rage,

To save Byzantium's state,
When the tents of Zabergan
Like snow-drifts overran
The road of the Golden Gate. 30

And for this, for this, behold!
Infirm and blind and old,
With gray, uncovered head,
Beneath the very arch
Of my triumphal march,
I stand and beg my bread!

Methinks I still can hear, Sounding distinct and near,
The Vandal monarch's cry,
As, captive and disgraced, 40
With majestic step he paced,— 'All, all is Vanity!'

Ah! vainest of all things
Is the gratitude of kings,
The plaudits of the crowd
Are but the clatter of feet
At midnight in the street, Hollow and restless and loud.

But the bitterest disgrace
Is to see forever the face 50
Of the Monk of Ephesus!
The unconquerable will This, too, can bear,—I still Am Belisarius!

CHAUCER

AN old man in a lodge within a park,
The chamber walls depicted all around With portraitures of huntsman, hawk, and hound,
And the hurt deer He listeneth to the lark,
Whose song comes with the sunshine through the dark
Of painted glass in leaden lattice bound,
He listeneth and he laugheth at the sound,
Then writeth in a book like any clerk.
He is the poet of the dawn, who wrote 9
The Canterbury Tales, and his old age
Made beautiful with song, and as I read
I hear the crowing cock, I hear the note
Of lark and linnet, and from every page Rise odors of ploughed field or flowery mead.

MILTON

I PACE the sounding sea-beach and behold How the voluminous billows roll and run,
Upheaving and subsiding, while the sun Shines through their sheeted emerald far unrolled,
And the ninth wave, slow gathering fold by fold
All its loose-flowing garments into one, Plunges upon the shore, and floods the dun Pale reach of sands, and changes them to gold
So in majestic cadence rise and fall
The mighty undulations of thy song, 10
O sightless bard, England's Mæonides!
And ever and anon, hush over all Uplifted, a ninth wave superb and strong, Floods all the soul with its melodious seas

A DUTCH PICTURE

SIMON DANZ has come home again,
From cruising about with his buccaneers,
He has singed the beard of the King of Spain,
And carried away the Dean of Jaen
And sold him in Algiers

In his house by the Maese, with its roof of tiles,
And weathercocks flying aloft in air,
There are silver tankards of antique styles,
Plunder of convent and castle, and piles
Of carpets rich and rare 10

In his tulip-garden there by the town,
Overlooking the sluggish stream,
With his Moorish cap and dressing-gown,
The old sea-captain, hale and brown,
Walks in a waking dream.

A smile in his gray mustachio lurks Whenever he thinks of the King of Spain,
And the listed tulips look like Turks,
And the silent gardener as he works
Is changed to the Dean of Jaen 20

The windmills on the outermost Verge of the landscape in the haze,
To him are towers on the Spanish coast,

With whiskered sentinels at their post,
Though this is the river Maese

But when the winter rains begin,
He sits and smokes by the blazing brands,
And old seafaring men come in,
Goat-bearded, gray, and with double chin,
And rings upon their hands 30

They sit there in the shadow and shine
Of the flickering fire of the winter night,
Figures in color and design
Like those by Rembrandt of the Rhine, Half darkness and half light

And they talk of ventures lost or won,
And their talk is ever and ever the same,
While they drink the red wine of Tarragon,
From the cellars of some Spanish Don,
Or convent set on flame 40

Restless at times with heavy strides
He paces his parlor to and fro,
He is like a ship that at anchor rides,
And swings with the rising and falling tides,
And tugs at her anchor-tow

Voices mysterious far and near,
Sound of the wind and sound of the sea,
Are calling and whispering in his ear,
'Simon Danz' Why stayest thou here?
Come forth and follow me! 50

So he thinks he shall take to the sea again
For one more cruise with his buccaneers,
To singe the beard of the King of Spain,
And capture another Dean of Jaen
And sell him in Algiers 1878

VENICE

WHITE swan of cities, slumbering in thy nest
So wonderfully built among the reeds
Of the lagoon, that fences thee and feeds,
As sayeth thy old historian and thy guest!
White water-lily, cradled and caressed By ocean streams, and from the silt and weeds
Lifting thy golden filaments and seeds, Thy sun-illumined spires, thy crown and crest!

White phantom city, whose untrodden streets

Are rivers, and whose pavements are the shifting 10
Shadows of palaces and strips of sky,
I wait to see thee vanish like the fleets Seen in mirage, or towers of cloud uplifting
In air their unsubstantial masonry 1875

THE CROSS OF SNOW <sup>1</sup>

IN the long, sleepless watches of the night, A gentle face—the face of one long dead—
Looks at me from the wall, where round its head
The night-lamp casts a halo of pale light Here in this room she died, and soul more white Never through martyrdom of fire was led
To its repose, nor can in books be read
The legend of a life more benedight
There is a mountain in the distant West
That, sun-defying, in its deep ravines 10
Displays a cross of snow upon its side
Such is the cross I wear upon my breast These eighteen years, through all the changing scenes
And seasons, changeless since the day she died

JUGURTHA <sup>2</sup>

How cold are thy baths, Apollo!
Cried the African monarch, the splendid,
As down to his death in the hollow
Dark dungeons of Rome he descended, Uncrowned, unthroned, unattended,
How cold are thy baths, Apollo!

<sup>1</sup> Longfellow's wife was tragically burned to death in 1861. 'Eighteen years afterward, looking over, one day, an illustrated book of Western scenery, his attention was arrested by a picture of that mysterious mountain [the Mount of the Holy Cross, in Colorado] upon whose lonely, lofty breast the snow lies in long furrows that make a rude but wonderfully clear image of a vast cross. At night, as he looked upon the pictured countenance that hung upon his chambered wall, his thoughts framed themselves into the verses that follow. He put them away in his portfolio, where they were found after his death.' Samuel Longfellow, Life of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (Boston, 1886), II, 372.

<sup>2</sup> Jugurtha, vanquished king of Numidia, was brought to Rome and, after the triumphal procession of his conqueror, thrown into prison and starved to death.

How cold are thy baths, Apollo!
 Cried the Poet, unknown, unbefriended,
 As the vision, that lured him to follow,
 With the mist and the darkness blended,
 And the dream of his life was ended, 11
 How cold are thy baths, Apollo!

HELEN OF TYRE

WHAT phantom is this that appears
 Through the purple mists of the years, Itself but a mist like these?
 A woman of cloud and of fire,
 It is she, it is Helen of Tyre,
 The town in the midst of the seas.

O Tyre! in thy crowded streets
 The phantom appears and retreats,
 And the Israelites that sell Thy lilies and lions of brass, 10
 Look up as they see her pass,
 And murmur 'Jezebel!'

Then another phantom is seen
 At her side, in a gray gabardine,
 With beard that floats to his waist;
 It is Simon Magus, the Seer,
 He speaks, and she pauses to hear
 The words he utters in haste.

He says 'From this evil fame,
 From this life of sorrow and shame, 20
 I will lift thee and make thee mine, Thou hast been Queen Candace,
 And Helen of Troy, and shalt be The Intelligence Divine!'

Oh, sweet as the breath of morn,
 To the fallen and forlorn
 Are whispered words of praise;
 For the famished heart believes
 The falsehood that tempts and deceives, 30
 And the promise that betrays

So she follows from land to land
 The wizard's beckoning hand,
 As a leaf is blown by the gust, Till she vanishes into night
 O reader, stoop down and write
 With thy finger in the dust.

O town in the midst of the seas,
 With thy rafts of cedar trees,
 Thy merchandise and thy ships,

Thou, too, art become as naught, 40
 A phantom, a shadow, a thought,
 A name upon men's lips.

THE BELLS OF SAN BLAS

WHAT say the Bells of San Blas
 To the ships that southward pass From the harbor of Mazatlan?
 To them it is nothing more Than the sound of surf on the shore,— Nothing more to master or man

But to me, a dreamer of dreams,
 To whom what is and what seems Are often one and the same,— 10
 The Bells of San Blas to me
 Have a strange, wild melody,
 And are something more than a name.

For bells are the voice of the church,
 They have tones that touch and search
 The hearts of young and old,
 One sound to all, yet each Lends a meaning to their speech,
 And the meaning is manifold

They are a voice of the Past,
 Of an age that is fading fast, 20
 Of a power austere and grand;
 When the flag of Spain unfurled
 Its folds o'er this western world,
 And the Priest was lord of the land.

The chapel that once looked down
 On the little seaport town Has crumbled into the dust,
 And on oaken beams below
 The bells swing to and fro,
 And are green with mould and rust 30

'Is, then, the old faith dead,'
 They say, 'and in its stead
 Is some new faith proclaimed,
 That we are forced to remain Naked to sun and rain, Unsheltered and ashamed?

'Once in our tower aloof
 We rang over wall and roof
 Our warnings and our complaints:
 And round about us there 40
 The white doves filled the air,
 Like the white souls of the saints

'The saints! Ah, have they grown Forgetful of their own?
 Are they asleep, or dead,
 That open to the sky
 Their ruined Missions lie,
 No longer tenanted?

'Oh, bring us back once more
 The vanished days of yore, When the world with faith was filled,
 Bring back the fervid zeal,
 The hearts of fire and steel,
 The hands that believe and build 50

'Then from our tower again
 We will send over land and main
 Our voices of command,
 Like exiled kings who return
 To their thrones, and the people learn That the Priest is lord of the land!' 60

O Bells of San Blas, in vain
 Ye call back the Past again!
 The Past is deaf to your prayer,
 Out of the shadows of night
 The world rolls into light,
 It is daybreak everywhere.

1809-1894

THE AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST-TABLE <sup>1</sup>

I

I WAS just going to say, when I was interrupted, that one of the many ways of classifying minds is under the heads of arithmetical and algebraical intellects. All economical and practical wisdom is an extension or variation of the following arithmetical formula  $2 + 2 = 4$ . Every philosophical proposition has the more general character of the expression  $a + b = c$ . We are mere operatives, empirics, and egotists, until we learn to think in letters instead of figures.

They all stared. There is a divinity student lately come among us to whom I commonly address remarks like the above, allowing him to take a certain share in the conversation, so far as assent or pertinent questions are involved. He abused his liberty on this occasion by presuming to say that Leibnitz had the same observation.—No, sir, I replied, he has not. But he said a mighty good thing about mathematics, that sounds something like it, and you found it, not in the original, but quoted by Dr. Thomas Reid. I will tell the company what he did say, one of these days.

— If I belong to a Society of Mutual Admiration?—I blush to say that I do not at this present moment. I once did, however. It was the first association to which I ever heard the term applied, a body of scientific young men in a great foreign city who admired their teacher, and to some extent each other. Many of them deserved it, they have become famous since. It amuses me to hear the talk of one of those beings described by Thackeray—

'Letters four do form his name'— about a social development which belongs to the very noblest stage of civilization. All generous companies of artists, authors, philanthropists, men of science, are, or ought to be, Societies of Mutual Admiration. A man of genius, or any kind of superiority, is not debarred from admiring the same quality in another, nor the other from returning his admiration. They may even associate together and continue to think highly of each other. And so of a dozen such men, if any one place is fortunate enough to hold so many. The being referred to above assumes several false premises. First, that men of talent necessarily hate each other. Secondly, that intimate knowledge or habitual association destroys our admiration of persons whom we esteemed highly at a distance. Thirdly, that a circle of clever fellows, who meet together to dine and have a good time, have signed a constitutional compact to glorify themselves and to put down him and the fraction of the human race not belonging to their number. Fourthly, that it is an outrage that he is not asked to join them.

<sup>1</sup> The essay is the first of a series contributed by Holmes to the Atlantic Monthly, and appeared in its first number, November, 1857. The opening sentence refers to two similar essays by Holmes, which he wrote for the New England Magazine in 1831 and 1832.

Here the company laughed a good deal, and the old gentleman who sits opposite said, 'That's it! that's it!'

I continued, for I was in the talking vein. As to clever people's hating each other, I think a little extra talent does sometimes make people jealous. They become irritated by perpetual attempts and failures, and it hurts their tempers and dispositions. Unpretending mediocrity is good, and genius is glorious, but a weak flavor of genius in an essentially common person is detestable. It spoils the grand neutrality of a commonplace character, as the rinsings of an unwashed wine-glass spoil a draught of fair water. No wonder the poor fellow we spoke of, who always belongs to this class of slightly flavored mediocrities, is puzzled and vexed by the strange sight of a dozen men of capacity working and playing together in harmony. He and his fellows are always fighting. With them familiarity naturally breeds contempt. If they ever praise each other's bad drawings, or broken-winded novels, or spavined verses, nobody ever supposed it was from admiration, it was simply a contract between themselves and a publisher or dealer.

If the Mutuals have really nothing among them worth admiring, that alters the question. But if they are men with noble powers and qualities, let me tell you, that, next to youthful love and family affections, there is no human sentiment better than that which unites the Societies of Mutual Admiration. And what would literature or art be without such associations? Who can tell what we owe to the Mutual Admiration Society of which Shakspeare, and Ben Jonson, and Beaumont and Fletcher were members? Or to that of which Addison and Steele formed the centre, and which gave us the Spectator? Or to that where Johnson, and Goldsmith, and Burke, and Reynolds, and Beauclerk, and Boswell, most admiring among all admirers, met together? Was there any great harm in the fact that the Irvings and Paulding wrote in company? or any unpardonable cabal in the literary union of Verplanck and Bryant and Sands, and as many more as they chose to associate with them?

The poor creature does not know what he is talking about, when he abuses this noblest of institutions. Let him inspect its mysteries through the knot-hole he has secured, but not use that orifice as a medium for his popgun. Such a society is the crown of a literary metropolis, if a town has not material for it, and spirit and good feeling enough to organize it, it is a mere caravansary, fit for a man of genius to lodge in, but not to live in. Foolish people hate and dread and envy such an association of men of varied powers and influence, because it is lofty, serene, impregnable, and, by the necessity of the case, exclusive. Wise ones are prouder of the title M S M A than of all their other honors put together.

— All generous minds have a horror of what are commonly called 'facts.' They are the brute beasts of the intellectual domain. Who does not know fellows that always have an ill-conditioned fact or two which they lead after them into decent company like so many bull-dogs, ready to let them slip at every ingenious suggestion, or convenient generalization, or pleasant fancy? I allow no 'facts' at this table. What! Because bread is good and wholesome and necessary and nourishing, shall you thrust a crumb into my windpipe while I am talking? Do not these muscles of mine represent a hundred loaves of bread? and is not my thought the abstract of ten thousand of these crumbs of truth with which you would choke off my speech?

(The above remark must be conditioned and qualified for the vulgar mind. The reader will of course understand the precise amount of seasoning which must be added to it before he adopts it as one of the axioms of his life. The speaker disclaims all responsibility for its abuse in incompetent hands.)

This business of conversation is a very serious matter. There are men whom it weakens one to talk with an hour more than a day's fasting would do. Mark this which I am going to say, for it is as good as a working professional man's advice, and costs you nothing. It is better to lose a pint of blood from your veins than to have a nerve tapped Nobody measures your nervous force as it runs away, nor bandages your brain and marrow after the operation

There are men of esprit who are excessively exhausting to some people. They are the talkers who have what may be called jerky minds Their thoughts do not run in the natural order of sequence They say bright things on all possible subjects, but their zigzags rack you to death After a jolting half-hour with one of these jerky companions, talking with a dull friend affords great relief It is like taking the cat in your lap after holding a squirrel

What a comfort a dull but kindly person is, to be sure, at times! A ground-glass shade over a gas-lamp does not bring more solace to our dazzled eyes than such a one to our minds

'Do not dull people bore you?' said one of the lady-boarders,—the same who sent me her autograph-book last week with a request for a few original stanzas, not remembering that 'The Pactolian' pays me five dollars a line for every thing I write in its columns

'Madam,' said I (she and the century were in their teens together), 'all men are bores, except when we want them There never was but one man whom I would trust with my latch-key'

'Who might that favored person be?'

'Zimmermann'

— The men of genius that I fancy most have erectile heads like the cobra-dicapello You remember what they tell of William Pinkney, the great pleader, how in his eloquent paroxysms the veins of his neck would swell and his face flush and his eyes glitter, until he seemed on the verge of apoplexy The hydraulic arrangements for supplying the brain with blood are only second in importance to its own organization The bulbous-headed fellows who steam well when they are at work are the men that draw big audiences and give us marrowy books and pictures It is a good sign to have one's feet grow cold when he is writing A great writer and speaker once told me that he often wrote with his feet in hot water, but for this, all his blood would have run into his head, as the mercury sometimes withdraws into the ball of a thermometer

— You don't suppose that my remarks made at this table are like so many postage-stamps, do you,—each to be only once uttered? If you do, you are mistaken He must be a poor creature who does not often repeat himself Imagine the author of the excellent piece of advice, 'Know thyself,' never alluding to that sentiment again during the course of a protracted existence! Why, the truths a man carries about with him are his tools, and do you think a carpenter is bound to use the same plane but once to smooth a knotty board with, or to hang up his hammer after it has driven its first nail? I shall never repeat a conversation, but an idea often I shall use the same types when I like, but not commonly the same stereotypes A thought is often original, though you have uttered it a hundred times It has come to you over a new route, by a new and express train of associations

Sometimes, but rarely, one may be caught making the same speech twice over, and yet be held blameless Thus, a certain lecturer, after performing in an inland city, where dwells a littératrice of note, was invited to meet her and others over the social teacup She pleasantly referred to his many wanderings in his new occupation 'Yes,' he replied, 'I am like the Huma, the bird that never lights, being always in the cars, as he is always on the wing'—Years elapsed The lecturer visited the same place once more for the same purpose Another social cup after the lecture, and a second meeting with the distinguished lady 'You are constantly going from place to place,' she said 'Yes,' he answered, 'I am like the Huma,'—and finished the sentence as before

What horrors, when it flashed over him that he had made this fine speech, word for word, twice over! Yet it was not true, as the lady might perhaps have fairly inferred, that he had embellished his conversation with the Huma daily during that whole interval of years On the contrary, he had never once thought of the odious fowl until the recurrence of precisely the same circumstances brought up precisely the same idea He ought to have been proud of the accuracy of his mental adjustments Given certain factors, and a sound brain should always evolve the same fixed product with the certainty of Babbage's calculating machine

— What a satire, by the way, is that machine on the mere mathematician! A Frankenstein-monster, a thing without brains and without heart, too stupid to make a blunder, which turns out results like a corn-sheller, and never grows any wiser or better, though it grind a thousand bushels of them!

I have an immense respect for a man of talents plus 'the mathematics.' But the calculating power alone should seem to be the least human of qualities, and to have the smallest amount of reason in it, since a machine can be made to do the work of three or four calculators, and better than any one of them. Sometimes I have been troubled that I had not a deeper intuitive apprehension of the relations of numbers. But the triumph of the cyphering hand-organ has consoled me. I always fancy I can hear the wheels clicking in a calculator's brain. The power of dealing with numbers is a kind of 'detached lever' arrangement, which may be put into a mighty poor watch. I suppose it is about as common as the power of moving the ears voluntarily, which is a moderately rare endowment.

— Little localized powers, and little narrow streaks of specialized knowledge, are things men are very apt to be conceited about. Nature is very wise, but for this encouraging principle how many small talents and little accomplishments would be neglected! Talk about conceit as much as you like, it is to human character what salt is to the ocean, it keeps it sweet, and renders it endurable. Say rather it is like the natural unguent of the sea-fowl's plumage, which enables him to shed the rain that falls on him and the wave in which he dips. When one has had all his conceit taken out of him, when he has lost all his illusions, his feathers will soon soak through, and he will fly no more.

'So you admire conceited people, do you?' said the young lady who has come to the city to be finished off for—the duties of life.

I am afraid you do not study logic at your school, my dear. It does not follow that I wish to be pickled in brine because I like a salt-water plunge at Nahant. I say that conceit is just as natural a thing to human minds as a centre is to a circle. But little-minded people's thoughts move in such small circles that five minutes' conversation gives you an arc long enough to determine their whole curve. An arc in the movement of a large intellect does not sensibly differ from a straight line. Even if it have the third vowel as its centre, it does not soon betray it. The highest thought, that is, is the most seemingly impersonal, it does not obviously imply any individual centre.

Audacious self-esteem, with good ground for it, is always imposing. What resplendent beauty that must have been which could have authorized Phryne to 'peel' in the way she did! What fine speeches are those two 'Non omnis moriar,'<sup>1</sup> and 'I have taken all knowledge to be my province'! Even in common people, conceit has the virtue of making them cheerful, the man who thinks his wife, his baby, his house, his horse, his dog, and himself severally unequalled, is almost sure to be a good-humored person, though liable to be tedious at times.

— What are the great faults of conversation? Want of ideas, want of words, want of manners, are the principal ones, I suppose you think. I don't doubt it, but I will tell you what I have found spoil more good talks than anything else,—long arguments on special points between people who differ on the fundamental principles upon which these points depend. No men can have satisfactory relations with each other until they have agreed on certain ultima of belief not to be disturbed in ordinary conversation, and unless they have sense enough to trace the secondary questions depending upon these ultimate beliefs to their source. In short, just as a written constitution is essential to the best social order, so a code of finalities is a necessary condition of profitable talk between two persons. Talking is like playing on the harp, there is as much in laying the hand on the strings to stop their vibrations as in twanging them to bring out their music.

— Do you mean to say the pun-question is not clearly settled in your minds? Let me lay down the law upon the subject. Life and language are alike sacred. Homicide and verbicide—that is, violent treatment of a word with fatal results to its legitimate meaning, which is its life—are alike forbidden. Manslaughter, which is the meaning of the one, is the same as man's laughter, which is the end of the other. A pun is primâ facie an insult to the person you are talking with. It implies utter indifference to, or sublime contempt for his remarks, no matter how serious. I speak of total depravity, and one says all that is written on the subject is deep raving. I have committed my self-respect by talking with such a person. I should like to commit him, but cannot, because he is a nuisance. Or I speak of geological convulsions, and he asks me what was the cosine of Noah's ark, also, whether the Deluge was not a deal huger than any modern inundation.

A pun does not commonly justify a blow in return. But if a blow were given for such cause, and death ensued, the jury would be judges both of the facts and of the pun, and might, if the latter were of an aggravated character, return a verdict of justifiable homicide. Thus, in a case lately decided before Miller, J., Doe presented Roe a subscription paper, and urged the claims of suffering humanity. Roe replied by asking, "When charity was like a top?" It was in evidence that Doe preserved a dignified silence. Roe then said, "When it begins to hum?" Doe then—and not till then—struck Roe, and his head happening to hit a bound volume of the Monthly Rag-bag and Stolen Miscellany, intense mortification ensued, with a fatal result. The chief laid down his notions of the law to his brother justices, who unanimously replied, "Jest so." The chief rejoined, that no man should jest so without being punished for it, and charged for the prisoner, who was acquitted, and the pun ordered to be burned by the sheriff. The bound volume was forfeited as a deodand, but not claimed.

People that make puns are like wanton boys that put coppers on the railroad tracks. They amuse themselves and other children, but their little trick may upset a freight train of conversation for the sake of a battered witticism.

I will thank you, B F., to bring down two books, of which I will mark the places on this slip of paper. (While he is gone, I may say that this boy, our landlady's youngest, is called BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, after the celebrated philosopher of that name. A highly merited compliment.)

I wish to refer to two eminent authorities. Now be so good as to listen. The great moralist says: "To trifle with the vocabulary which is the vehicle of social intercourse is to tamper with the currency of human intelligence. He who would violate the sanctities of his mother tongue would invade the recesses of the paternal till without remorse, and repeat the banquet of Saturn without an indigestion."

And, once more, listen to the historian. "The Puritans hated puns. The Bishops were notoriously addicted to them. The Lords Temporal carried them to the verge of license. Majesty itself must have its Royal quibble. "Ye be burly, my Lord of Burleigh," said Queen Elizabeth, "but ye shall make less stir in our realm than my Lord of Leicester." The gravest wisdom and the highest breeding lent their sanction to the practice. Lord Bacon playfully declared himself a descendant of 'Og, the King of Bashan. Sir Philip Sidney, with his last breath, reproached the soldier who brought him water, for wasting a casqueful upon a dying man. A courtier, who saw Othello performed at the Globe Theatre, remarked, that the blackamoor was a brute, and not a man. "Thou hast reason," replied a great Lord, "according to Plato his saying, for this be a two-legged animal with feathers." The fatal habit became universal. The language was corrupted. The infection spread to the national conscience. Political double-dealings naturally grew out of verbal double meanings. The teeth of the new dragon were sown by the Cadmus who introduced the alphabet of equivocation. What was levity in the time of the Tudors grew to regicide and revolution in the age of the Stuarts."

Who was that boarder that just whispered something about the Macaulay-flowers of literature?—There was a dead silence.—I said calmly, I shall henceforth consider any interruption by a pun as a hint to change my boarding-house. Do not plead my example. If I have used any such, it has been only as a Spartan father would show up a drunken helot. We have done with them.

— If a logical mind ever found out anything with its logic?—I should say that its most frequent work was to build a pons asinorum over chasms which shrewd people can bestride without such a structure You can hire logic, in the shape of a lawyer, to prove anything that you want to prove You can buy treatises to show that Napoleon never lived, and that no battle of Bunker-hill was ever fought The great minds are those with a wide span, which couple truths related to, but far removed from, each other.

Logicians carry the surveyor's chain over the track of which these are the true explorers I value a man mainly for his primary relations with truth, as I understand truth,—not for any secondary artifice in handling his ideas Some of the sharpest men in argument are notoriously unsound in judgment I should not trust the counsel of a clever debater, any more than that of a good chess-player Either may of course advise wisely, but not necessarily because he wrangles or plays well

The old gentleman who sits opposite got his hand up, as a pointer lifts his forefoot, at the expression, 'his relations with truth, as I understand truth,' and when I had done, snuffed audibly, and said I talked like a transcendentalist For his part, common sense was good enough for him

Precisely so, my dear sir, I replied, common sense, as you understand it We all have to assume a standard of judgment in our own minds, either of things or persons. A man who is willing to take another's opinion has to exercise his judgment in the choice of whom to follow, which is often as nice a matter as to judge of things for one's self On the whole, I had rather judge men's minds by comparing their thoughts with my own, than judge of thoughts by knowing who utter them I must do one or the other It does not follow, of course, that I may not recognize another man's thoughts as broader and deeper than my own, but that does not necessarily change my opinion, otherwise this would be at the mercy of every superior mind that held a different one. How many of our most cherished beliefs are like those drinking-glasses of the ancient pattern, that serve us well so long as we keep them in our hand, but spill all if we attempt to set them down! I have sometimes compared conversation to the Italian game of mora, in which one player lifts his hand with so many fingers extended, and the other gives the number if he can. I show my thought, another his, if they agree, well, if they differ, we find the largest common factor, if we can, but at any rate avoid disputing about remainders and fractions, which is to real talk what tuning an instrument is to playing on it.

— What if, instead of talking this morning, I should read you a copy of verses, with critical remarks by the author? Any of the company can retire that like.

ALBUM VERSES

When Eve had led her lord away,
And Cain had killed his brother,
The stars and flowers, the poets say,
Agreed with one another

To cheat the cunning tempter's art,
And teach the race its duty,
By keeping on its wicked heart
Their eyes of light and beauty.

A million sleepless lids, they say,
Will be at least a warning,
And so the flowers would watch by day,
The stars from eve to morning

On hill and prairie, field and lawn,
Their dewy eyes upturning,
The flowers still watch from reddening dawn
Till western skies are burning

Alas! each hour of daylight tells A tale of shame so crushing, That some turn white as sea-bleached shells,
And some are always blushing

But when the patient stars look down
On all their light discovers,
The traitor's smile, the murderer's frown,
The lips of lying lovers,

They try to shut their saddening eyes,
And in the vain endeavor
We see them twinkling in the skies,
And so they wink for ever.

What do you think of these verses, my friends?—Is that piece an impromptu? said my landlady's daughter (Æt 19+

They want to be off, and you want to have them off, but they don't know how to manage it One would think they had been built in your parlor or study, and were waiting to be launched I have contrived a sort of ceremonial inclined plane for such visitors, which being lubricated with certain smooth phrases, I backed them down, metaphorically speaking, stern-foremost, into their 'native element,' the great ocean of outdoors. Well, now, there are poems as hard to get rid of as these rural visitors They come in glibly, use up all the serviceable rhymes, day, ray, beauty, duty, skies, eyes, other, brother, mountain, fountain, and the like, and so they go on until you think it is time for the wind-up, and the wind-up won't come on any terms So they lie about until you get sick of the sight of them, and end by thrusting some cold scrap of a final couplet upon them, and turning them out of doors I suspect a good many 'impromptus' could tell just such a story as the above—Here turning to our landlady, I used an illustration which pleased the company much at the time, and has since been highly commended 'Madam,' I said, 'you can pour three gills and three quarters of honey from that pint jug, if it is full, in less than one minute, but, madam, you could not empty that last quarter of a gill, though you were turned into a marble Hebe, and held the vessel upside down for a thousand years

One gets tired to death of the old, old rhymes, such as you see in that copy of verses,—which I don't mean to abuse, or to praise either I always feel as if I were

10 Nine tenths of the 'Juvenile Poems' written spring out of the above musical and suggestive coincidences

'Yes?' said our landlady's daughter

I did not address the following remark to her, and I trust, from her limited range of reading, she will never see it, I said it softly to my next neighbor.

20 When a young female wears a flat circular side-curl, gummed on each temple,—when she walks with a male, not arm in arm, but his arm against the back of hers,—and when she says 'Yes?' with the note of interrogation, you are generally safe in asking her what wages she gets, and who the 'feller' was you saw her with

'What were you whispering?' said the daughter of the house, moistening her lips, as she spoke, in a very engaging manner

30 'I was only laying down a principle of social diagnosis'

'Yes?'

— It is curious to see how the same wants and tastes find the same implements and modes of expression in all times and places The young ladies of Otaheite, as you may see in Cook's Voyages, had a sort of crinoline arrangement fully equal in radius to the largest spread of our own lady-baskets. When I flung a Bay-State shawl over my shoulders, I am only taking a lesson from the climate that the Indian had learned before me A blanket-shawl we call it, and not a plaid, and we wear it like the aborigines, and not like the Highlanders.

50 — We are the Romans of the modern world,—the great assimilating people Conflicts and conquests are of course necessary accidents with us, as with our prototypes And so we come to their style of weapon Our army sword is the short, stiff, pointed gladius of the Romans, and the American bowie-knife is the same tool, modified to meet the daily wants of civil society I announce at this table an axiom not to be found in Montesquieu or the journals of Congress —

The race that shortens its weapons lengthens its boundaries

Corollary It was the Polish lance that left Poland at last with nothing of her own to bound

'Dropped from her nerveless grasp the shattered spear'

What business had Sarmatia to be fighting for liberty with a fifteen-foot pole between her and the breasts of her enemies? If she had but clutched the old Roman and young American weapon, and come to close quarters, there might have been a chance for her, but it would have spoiled the best passage in 'The Pleasures of Hope'

— Self-made men?—Well, yes Of course everybody likes and respects self-made men It is a great deal better to be made in that way than not to be made at all Are any of you younger people old enough to remember that Irishman's house on the marsh at Cambridgeport, which house he built from drain to chimney-top with his own hands? It took him a good many years to build it, and one could see that it was a little out of plumb, and a little wavy in outline, and a little queer and uncertain in general aspect A regular hand could certainly have built a better house, but it was a very good house for a 'self-made' carpenter's house, and people praised it, and said how remarkably well the Irishman had succeeded They never thought of praising the fine blocks of houses a little farther on

Your self-made man, whittled into shape with his own jack-knife, deserves more credit, if that is all, than the regular engine-turned article, shaped by the most approved pattern, and French polished by society and travel But as to saying that one is every way the equal of the other, that is another matter The right of strict social discrimination of all things and persons, according to their merits, native or acquired, is one of the most precious republican privileges I take the liberty to exercise it, when I say, that other things being equal, in most relations of life I prefer a man of family.

What do I mean by a man of family?— Oh, I'll give you a general idea of what I mean Let us give him a first-rate fit out, it costs us nothing

Four or five generations of gentlemen and gentlewomen, among them a member of his Majesty's Council for the Province, a Governor or so, one or two Doctors of Divinity, a member of Congress, not later than the time of long boots with tassels

Family portraits The member of the Council, by Smibert The great merchant-uncle, by Copley, full length, sitting in his arm-chair, in a velvet cap and flowered robe, with a globe by him, to show the range of his commercial transactions, and letters with large red seals lying round, one directed conspicuously to The Honorable, etc , etc Great-grandmother, by the same artist, brown satin, lace very fine, hands superlative, grand old lady, stiffish, but imposing Her mother, artist unknown, flat, angular, hanging sleeves, parrot on fist A pair of Stuarts, viz , 1 A superb full-blown, mediæval gentleman, with a fiery dash of Tory blood in his veins, tempered down with that of a fine old rebel grandmother, and warmed up with the best of old India Madeira, his face is one flame of ruddy sunshine, his ruffled shirt rushes out of his bosom with an impetuous generosity, as if it would drag his heart after it, and his smile is good for twenty thousand dollars to the Hospital, besides ample bequests to all relatives and dependents 2 Lady of the same, remarkable cap, high waist, as in time of Empire, bust a la Josephine, wisps of curls, like celery-tips, at sides of forehead, complexion clear and warm, like rose-cordial As for the miniatures by Malbone, we don't count them in the gallery

Books, too, with the names of old college-students in them,—family names,—you will find them at the head of their respective classes in the days when students took rank on the catalogue from their parents' condition. Elzevirs, with the Latinized appellations of youthful progenitors, and Hic liber est meus on the title-page A set of Hogarth's original plates Pope, original edition, 15 volumes, London, 1717. Barrow on the lower shelves, in folio Tillotson on the upper, in a little dark platoon of octodecimos

Some family silver; a string of wedding and funeral rings, the arms of the family curiously blazoned, the same in worsted, by a maiden aunt

If the man of family has an old place to keep these things in, furnished with claw-footed chairs and black mahogany tables, and tall bevel-edged mirrors, and stately upright cabinets, his outfit is complete.

No, my friends, I go (always, other things being equal) for the man who inherits family traditions and the cumulative humanities of at least four or five generations. Above all things, as a child, he should have tumbled about in the library. All men are afraid of books, who have not handled them from infancy. Do you suppose our dear didascalos over there ever read Poh Synopsis, or consulted Castell's Lexicon, while he was growing up to their stature? Not he, but virtue passed through the hem of their parchment and leather garments whenever he touched them, as the precious drugs sweated through the bat's handle in the Arabian story. I tell you he is at home wherever he smells the invigorating fragrance of Russia leather. No self-made man feels so. One may, it is true, have all the antecedents I have spoken of, and yet be a boor or a shabby fellow. One may have none of them, and yet be fit for councils and courts. Then let them change places. Our social arrangement has this great beauty, that its strata shift up and down as they change specific gravity, without being clogged by layers of prescription. But I still insist on my democratic liberty of choice, and I go for the man with the gallery of family portraits against the one with the twenty-five-cent daguerreotype, unless I find out that the last is the better of the two.

— I should have felt more nervous about the late comet if I had thought the world was ripe. But it is very green yet, if I am not mistaken, and besides, there is a great deal of coal to use up, which I cannot bring myself to think was made for nothing. If certain things, which seem to me essential to a millennium, had come to pass, I should have been frightened, but they haven't. Perhaps you would like to hear my

The company seemed to like the verses, 50 and I promised them to read others occasionally, if they had a mind to hear them. Of course they would not expect it every morning. Neither must the reader suppose that all these things I have reported were said at any one breakfast-time. I have not taken the trouble to date them, as Raspail, père, used to date every proof he sent to the printer, but they were scattered over several breakfasts, and I have said a good many more things since, which I shall very possibly print some time or other, if I am urged to do it by judicious friends

I finish off with reading some verses of my friend the Professor, of whom you may perhaps hear more by and by The Professor read them, he told me, at a farewell meeting, where the youngest of our great Historians met a few of his many friends at their invitation

Yes, we knew we must lose him,—though friendship may claim To blend her green leaves with the laurels of fame,
Though fondly, at parting, we call him our
own,
'Tis the whisper of love when the bugle has blown

As the rider who rests with the spur on his heel,—
As the guardsman who sleeps in his corselet of steel,—
As the archer who stands with his shaft on the string,
He stoops from his toil to the garland we bring

What pictures yet slumber unborn in his loom Till their warriors shall breathe and their beauties shall bloom, While the tapestry lengthens the life-glowing dyes
That caught from our sunsets the stain of their skies!

In the alcoves of death, in the charnels of time,
Where flit the gaunt spectres of passion and crime,
There are triumphs untold, there are martyrs unsung,
There are heroes yet silent to speak with his tongue!

Let us hear the proud story which time has bequeathed
From lips that are warm with the freedom they breathed!

Let him summon its tyrants, and tell us their doom,
Though he sweep the black past like Van Tromp with his broom!

The dream flashes by, for the west-winds awake
On pampas, on prairie, o'er mountain and lake,
To bathe the swift bark, like a sea-girdled shrine,
With incense they stole from the rose and the pine.

So fill a bright cup with the sunlight that gushed
When the dead summer's jewels were trampled and crushed
THE TRUE KNIGHT OF LEARNING,—the world holds him dear,— Love bless him, Joy crown him, God speed his career!

OLD IRONSIDES <sup>1</sup>

Ay, tear her tattered ensign down!
Long has it waved on high,
And many an eye has danced to see That banner in the sky,
Beneath it rung the battle shout,
And burst the cannon's roar,—
The meteor of the ocean air Shall sweep the clouds no more

Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
Where knelt the vanquished foe,
When winds were hurrying o'er the flood,
And waves were white below,
No more shall feel the victor's tread,
Or know the conquered knee,—
The harpies of the shore shall pluck
The eagle of the sea!

Oh better that her shattered hulk
Should sink beneath the wave,
Her thunders shook the mighty deep,
And there should be her grave,
Nail to the mast her holy flag,

THE LAST LEAF <sup>1</sup>

I SAW him once before,
As he passed by the door,
And again
The pavement stones resound,
As he totters o'er the ground
With his cane

They say that in his prime,
Ere the pruning-knife of Time
Cut him down,
Not a better man was found
By the Crier on his round
Through the town

10

But now he walks the streets,
And he looks at all he meets Sad and wan,
And he shakes his feeble head,
That it seems as if he said,
'They are gone'

The mossy marbles rest
On the lips that he has prest
In their bloom,
And the names he loved to hear
Have been carved for many a year
On the tomb

20

My grandmama has said—
Poor old lady, she is dead Long ago—
That he had a Roman nose,
And his cheek was like a rose
In the snow

30

But now his nose is thin,
And it rests upon his chin
Like a staff,
And a crook is in his back,
And a melancholy crack
In his laugh

<sup>1</sup> 'This poem was suggested by the appearance in one of our streets of a venerable relic of the Revolution, said to be one of the party who threw the tea overboard in Boston Harbor. He was a fine monumental specimen in his cocked hat and knee breeches, with his buckled shoes and his sturdy cane.' Author's note, ibid., XII, 3. The relic was Major Thomas Melville, grandfather of Herman Melville.

I know it is a sin
For me to sit and grin
At him here,
But the old three-cornered hat,
And the breeches, and all that,
Are so queer!

40

And if I should live to be The last leaf upon the tree
In the spring,
Let them smile, as I do now,
At the old forsaken bough
Where I cling

THE HEIGHT OF THE RIDICULOUS

I WROTE some lines once on a time
In wondrous merry mood,
And thought, as usual, men would say
They were exceeding good

They were so queer, so very queer,
I laughed as I would die,
Albert, in the general way,
A sober man am I

I called my servant, and he came,
How kind it was of him
To mind a slender man like me,
He of the mighty limb

10

'These to the printer,' I exclaimed,
And, in my humorous way,
I added, (as a trifling jest,)
'There'll be the devil to pay.'

He took the paper, and I watched,
And saw him peep within,
At the first line he read, his face
Was all upon the grin

20

He read the next, the grin grew broad,
And shot from ear to ear,
He read the third, a chuckling noise
I now began to hear.

The fourth; he broke into a roar,
The fifth, his waistband split,
The sixth, he burst five buttons off,
And tumbled in a fit

Ten days and nights, with sleepless eye,
I watched that wretched man,

30

And since, I never dare to write
As funny as I can

ON LENDING A PUNCH-BOWL <sup>1</sup>

THIS ancient silver bowl of mine, it tells of good old times,
Of joyous days and jolly nights, and merry Christmas chimes, They were a free and jovial race, but honest, brave, and true, That dipped their ladle in the punch when this old bowl was new

A Spanish galleon brought the bar,—so runs the ancient tale,
'T was hammered by an Antwerp smith, whose arm was like a flail,
And now and then between the strokes, for fear his strength should fail, He wiped his brow and quaffed a cup of good old Flemish ale

'T was purchased by an English squire to please his loving dame, Who saw the cherubs, and conceived a longing for the same, <sup>10</sup> And oft as on the ancient stock another twig was found,
'T was filled with caudle spiced and hot, and handed smoking round

But, changing hands, it reached at length a Puritan divine,
Who used to follow Timothy, and take a little wine,
But hated punch and prelacy, and so it was, perhaps,
He went to Leyden, where he found conventicles and schnapps

And then, of course, you know what's next—it left the Dutchman's shore With those that in the Mayflower came,—a hundred souls and more,— Along with all the furniture, to fill their new abodes,—
To judge by what is still on hand, at least a hundred loads <sup>20</sup>

<sup>1</sup> "This 'punch-bowl' was, according to old family tradition, a caudle-cup. It is a massive piece of silver, its cherubs and other ornaments of course repousse work, and has two handles like a loving-cup, by which it was held, or passed from guest to guest." Author's note, ibid., XII, 69. What Holmes thought was a Dutch

'T was on a dreary winter's eve, the night was closing dim,
When brave Miles Standish took the bowl, and filled it to the brim,
The little Captain stood and stirred the posset with his sword,
And all his sturdy men-at-arms were ranged about the board.

He poured the fiery Hollands in,—the man that never feared,— He took a long and solemn draught, and wiped his yellow beard,
And one by one the musketeers—the men that fought and prayed—All drank as 't were their mother's milk, and not a man afraid

That night, affrighted from his nest, the screaming eagle flew,
He heard the Pequot's ringing whoop, the soldier's wild halloo, <sup>30</sup> And there the sachem learned the rule he taught to kith and kin,
'Run from the white man when you find he smells of Hollands gin!"

A hundred years, and fifty more, had spread their leaves and snows, A thousand rubs had flattened down each little cherub's nose,
When once again the bowl was filled, but not in mirth or joy,—
'T was mingled by a mother's hand to cheer her parting boy

Drink, John, she said, 't will do you good, —poor child, you'll never bear This working in the dismal trench, out in the midnight air,
And if—God bless me!—you were hurt,
't would keep away the chill
So John did drink,—and well he wrought that night at Bunker's Hill! <sup>40</sup>

I tell you, there was generous warmth in good old English cheer, I tell you, 't was a pleasant thought to bring its symbol here
'T is but the fool that loves excess, hast thou a drunken soul?
Thy bane is in thy shallow skull, not in my silver bowl!

bowl was actually made in New England by the famous silversmith John Corey, c. 1680

I love the memory of the past,—its pressed yet fragrant flowers,— The moss that clothes its broken walls, the ivy on its towers, Nay, this poor bauble it bequeathed,—my eyes grow moist and dim, To think of all the vanished joys that danced around its brim.

Then fill a fair and honest cup, and bear it straight to me,
 The goblet hallows all it holds, whate'er the liquid be, 50
 And may the cherubs on its face protect me from the sin
 That dooms one to those dreadful words,—
 'My dear, where have you been?' 1849

THE MORAL BULLY

YON whey-faced brother, who delights to wear
 A weedy flux of ill-conditioned hair,
 Seems of the sort that in a crowded place
 One elbows freely into smallest space,
 A timid creature, lax of knee and hip, Whom small disturbance whitens round the lip;
 One of those harmless spectacled machines,
 The Holy-Week of Protestants convenes, Whom school-boys question if their walk transcends
 The last advices of maternal friends, 10
 Whom John, obedient to his master's sign, Conducts, laborious, up to ninety-nine, While Peter, glistening with luxurious scorn, Husks his white ivories like an ear of corn;
 Dark in the brow and bilious in the cheek, Whose yellowish linen flowers but once a week,
 Conspicuous, annual, in their threadbare suits,
 And the laced high-lows which they call their boots,
 Well mayst thou shun that dingy front severe,
 But him, O stranger, him thou canst not fear! 20

Be slow to judge, and slower to despise,
 Man of broad shoulders and heroic size!
 The tiger, writhing from the boa's rings,

Drops at the fountain where the cobra stings
 In that lean phantom, whose extended glove
 Points to the text of universal love,
 Behold the master that can tame thee down
 To crouch, the vassal of his Sunday frown;
 His velvet throat against thy corded wrist,
 His loosened tongue against thy doubled fist! 30

The MORAL BULLY, though he never swears,
 Nor kicks intruders down his entry stairs, Though meekness plants his backwardsloping hat,
 And non-resistance ties his white cravat, Though his black broadcloth glories to be seen In the same plight with Shylock's gaberline,
 Hugs the same passion to his narrow breast That heaves the cuirass on the trooper's chest,
 Hears the same hell-hounds yelling in his rear
 That chase from port the maddened buccaneer, 40
 Feels the same comfort while his acrid words
 Turn the sweet milk of kindness into curds,
 Or with grim logic prove, beyond debate,
 That all we love is worthiest of our hate,
 As the scarred ruffian of the pirate's deck,
 When his long swivel rakes the staggering wreck!

Heaven keep us all! Is every rascal clown Whose arm is stronger free to knock us
 down?
 Has every scarecrow, whose cachectic soul
 Seems fresh from Bedlam, airing on parole,
 Who, though he carries but a doubtful trace Of angel visits on his hungry face, 52
 From lack of marrow or the coins to pay,
 Has dodged some vices in a shabby way,
 The right to stick us with his cutthroat terms,
 And bait his homilies with his brother worms? 1862

THE CHAMBERED NAUTILUS

THIS is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign, Sails the unshadowed main,—

The venturous bark that flings
On the sweet summer wind its purpled wings
In gulfs enchanted, where the Siren sings,
And coral reefs lie bare,
Where the cold sea-maids rise to sun their streaming hair

Its webs of living gauze no more unfurl;
Wrecked is the ship of pearl!
And every chambered cell, 10 Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell,
As the frail tenant shaped his growing shell,
Before thee lies revealed,— Its irised ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed!

Year after year beheld the silent toil
That spread his lustrous coil, Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway
through,
Built up its idle door, 20 Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more

Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
Child of the wandering sea,
Cast from her lap, forlorn!
From thy dead lips a clearer note is born
Than ever Triton blew from wreathed horn!
While on mine ear it rings, Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings —

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll! 30
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free, Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!

THE DEACON'S MASTERPIECE OR, THE WONDERFUL 'ONE-HOSS SHAY'

A Logical Story

HAVE you heard of the wonderful one-hoss
shay,
'That was built in such a logical way

It ran a hundred years to a day,
And then, of a sudden, it—ah, but stay,
I'll tell you what happened without delay,
Scaring the parson into fits,
Frightening people out of their wits,—
Have you ever heard of that, I say?

Seventeen hundred and fifty-five.
Georgius Secundus was then alive,— 10
Snuffy old drone from the German hivel
That was the year when Lisbon-town
Saw the earth open and gulp her down,
And Braddock's army was done so brown,
Left without a scalp to its crown
It was on the terrible Earthquake-day That the Deacon finished the one-hoss
shay

Now in building of chaises, I tell you what,
There is always somewhere a weakest spot,—
In hub, tire, felloe, in spring or thill, 20
In panel, or crossbar, or floor, or sill, In screw, bolt, thoroughbrace,—lurking still,
Find it somewhere you must and will,— Above or below, or within or without,—
And that's the reason, beyond a doubt,
That a chaise breaks down, but doesn't wear out

But the Deacon swore (as Deacons do,
With an 'I dew vum,' or an 'I tell yeou')
He would build one shay to beat the taown
'n' the keounty 'n' all the kentry raoun', 30
It should be so built that it couldn't break daown
'Fur,' said the Deacon, 't' 's mighty plain Thut the weakes' place mus' stan' the strain,
'n' the way t' fix it, uz I maintain,
Is only jest
T' make that place uz strong uz the rest.'

So the Deacon inquired of the village folk Where he could find the strongest oak, That couldn't be split nor bent nor broke,—
That was for spokes and floor and sills; 40
He sent for lancewood to make the thills;
The crossbars were ash, from the straightest
trees,
The panels of white-wood, that cuts like cheese,
But lasts like iron for things like these,

The hubs of logs from the 'Settler's ellum,'—
Last of its timber,—they couldn't sell 'em,
Never an axe had seen their chips,
And the wedges flew from between their lips,
Their blunt ends frizzled like celery-tips,
Step and prop-iron, bolt and screw, 50
Spring, tire, axle, and linchpin too,
Steel of the finest, bright and blue,
Thoroughbrace bison-skin, thick and wide,
Boot, top, dasher, from tough old hide Found in the pit when the tanner died
That was the way he 'put her through '
'There!' said the Deacon, 'naow she'll dew!'

Do! I tell you, I rather guess
She was a wonder, and nothing less!
Colts grew horses, beards turned gray, 60
Deacon and deaconess dropped away, Children and grandchildren—where were they?
But there stood the stout old one-hoss shay
As fresh as on Lisbon-earthquake-day!

EIGHTEEN HUNDRED,—it came and found The Deacon's masterpiece strong and
sound
Eighteen hundred increased by ten,— 'Hahnsum kerridge' they called it then Eighteen hundred and twenty came,— Running as usual, much the same 70
Thirty and forty at last arrive,
And then come fifty, and FIFTY-FIVE

Little of all we value here
Wakes on the morn of its hundredth year Without both feeling and looking queer
In fact, there's nothing that keeps its youth,
So far as I know, but a tree and truth (This is a moral that runs at large, Take it —You're welcome —No extra charge )

FIRST OF NOVEMBER,—the Earthquake-
day,— 80
There are traces of age in the one-hoss
shay,
A general flavor of mild decay,
But nothing local, as one may say.
There couldn't be,—for the Deacon's art
Had made it so like in every part That there wasn't a chance for one to start For the wheels were just as strong as the thills,

And the floor was just as strong as the sills,
And the panels just as strong as the floor, 89
And the whipple-tree neither less nor more,
And the back-crossbar as strong as the fore,
And spring and axle and hub encore
And yet, as a whole, it is past a doubt In another hour it will be worn out!

First of November, 'Fifty-five!
This morning the parson takes a drive
Now, small boys, get out of the way!
Here comes the wonderful one-hoss shay,
Drawn by a rat-tailed, ewe-necked bay 'Huddup!' said the parson —Off went they 100

The parson was working his Sunday's text,—
Had got to fifthly, and stopped perplexed
At what the—Moses—was coming next All at once the horse stood still,
Close by the meet'n'-house on the hill.
First a shiver, and then a thrill,
Then something decidedly like a spill,—
And the parson was sitting upon a rock, At half-past nine by the meet'n'-house clock,—
Just the hour of the Earthquake shock! 110
What do you think the parson found,
When he got up and stared around?
The poor old chaise in a heap or mound,
As if it had been to the mill and ground!
You see, of course, if you're not a dunce,
How it went to pieces all at once,—
All at once, and nothing first,—
Just as bubbles do when they burst

End of the wonderful one-hoss shay Logic is logic That's all I say 120

DOROTHY Q.

A FAMILY PORTRAIT

GRANDMOTHER's mother her age, I guess,
Thirteen summers, or something less,
Girlish bust, but womanly air, Smooth, square forehead with uprolled hair,
Lips that lover has never kissed,
Taper fingers and slender wrist;
Hanging sleeves of stuff brocade,
So they painted the little maid

On her hand a parrot green Sits unmoving and broods serene. 10

Hold up the canvas full in view,— Look! there's a rent the light shines
    through,
Dark with a century's fringe of dust,—
That was a Red-Coat's rapier-thrust!
Such is the tale the lady old,
Dorothy's daughter's daughter, told

Who the painter was none may tell,—
One whose best was not over well,
Hard and dry, it must be confessed,
Flat as a rose that has long been pressed, 20
Yet in her cheek the hues are bright,
Dainty colors of red and white,
And in her slender shape are seen Hint and promise of stately mien

Look not on her with eyes of scorn,— Dorothy Q was a lady born!
Ay! since the galloping Normans came,
England's annals have known her name,
And still to the three-hulled rebel town
Dear is that ancient name's renown, 30
For many a civic wreath they won,
The youthful sire and the gray-haired son

O Damsel Dorothy! Dorothy Q!
Strange is the gift that I owe to you,
Such a gift as never a king Save to daughter or son might bring,— All my tenure of heart and hand,
All my title to house and land,
Mother and sister and child and wife
And joy and sorrow and death and life! 40

What if a hundred years ago
Those close-shut lips had answered No,
When forth the tremulous question came That cost the maiden her Norman name,
And under the folds that look so still The bodice swelled with the bosom's thrill?
Should I be I, or would it be One tenth another, to nine tenths me?

Soft is the breath of a maiden's Yes
Not the light gossamer stirs with less, 50
But never a cable that holds so fast
Through all the battles of wave and blast,
And never an echo of speech or song
That lives in the babbling air so long!
There were tones in the voice that whispered then
You may hear to-day in a hundred men.

O lady and lover, how faint and far Your images hover,—and here we are,
Solid and stirring in flesh and bone,— Edward's and Dorothy's—all their own,—
A goodly record for Time to show 61
Of a syllable spoken so long ago!
Shall I bless you, Dorothy, or forgive
For the tender whisper that bade me live?

It shall be a blessing, my little maid!
I will heal the stab of the Red-Coat's blade,
And freshen the gold of the tarnished frame,
And gild with a rhyme your household
    name,
So you shall smile on us brave and bright
As first you greeted the morning's light, 70
And live untroubled by woes and fears Through a second youth of a hundred years

AT THE SATURDAY CLUB <sup>1</sup>

THIS is our place of meeting, opposite That towered and pillared building look at
    it,

King's Chapel in the Second George's day, Rebellion stole its regal name away,— Stone Chapel sounded better; but at last
The poisoned name of our provincial past Had lost its ancient venom, then once more Stone Chapel was King's Chapel as before (So let rechristened North Street, when it can,

Bring back the days of Marlborough and Queen Anne!) 10

Next the old church your wandering eye will meet—

A granite pile that stares upon the street—
Our civic temple, slanderous tongues have said

Its shape was modelled from St. Botolph's
    head,

Lofty, but narrow, jealous passers-by Say Boston always held her head too high.

Turn half-way round, and let your look survey

<sup>1</sup> 'At about the same time as the establishment of the Atlantic Monthly there grew up in Boston a literary association which became at last well known as the "Saturday Club," the members dining together on the last Saturday of every month' Author's note, ibid, XI, 171 Every Boston Brahmin attended, as well as many whom God seemed to have created a little lower than the Brahmans

The white façade that gleams across the way,—
The many-windowed building, tall and wide,
The palace-inn that shows its northern side In grateful shadow when the sunbeams beat 21
The granite wall in summer's scorching heat
This is the place, whether its name you spell Tavern, or caravansera, or hotel Would I could steal its echoes! you should find Such store of vanished pleasures brought to mind
Such feasts! the laughs of many a jocund
hour
That shook the mortar from King George's tower,
Such guests! What famous names its record boasts,
Whose owners wander in the mob of ghosts! 30
Such stories! Every beam and plank is filled With juicy wit the joyous talkers spilled,
Ready to ooze, as once the mountain pine The floors are laid with oozed its turpentine!
A month had flitted since The Club had met,
The day came round, I found the table set,
The waiters lounging round the marble stairs,
Empty as yet the double row of chairs
I was a full half hour before the rest, Alone, the banquet-chamber's single guest 40
So from the table's side a chair I took,
And having neither company nor book
To keep me waking, by degrees there crept
A torpor over me,—in short, I slept Loosed from its chain, along the wreckstrorn track
Of the dead years my soul goes travelling back,
My ghosts take on their robes of flesh, it seems Dreaming is life, nay, life less life than dreams,
So real are the shapes that meet my eyes.
They bring no sense of wonder, no surprise, 50
No hint of other than an earth-born source, All seems plain daylight, everything of course

How dim the colors are, how poor and faint
This palette of weak words with which I paint!
Here sit my friends, if I could fix them so As to my eyes they seem, my page would glow
Like a queen's missal, warm as if the brush
Of Titian or Velasquez brought the flush
Of life into their features Ay de mi! 59
If syllables were pigments, you should see Such breathing portraitures as never man Found in the Pitti or the Vatican

Here sits our POET, Laureate, if you will Long has he worn the wreath, and wears it still
Dead? Nay, not so, and yet they say his bust
Looks down on marbles covering royal dust, Kings by the Grace of God, or Nature's grace,
Dead! No! Alive! I see him in his place, Full-featured, with the bloom that heaven denies Her children, pinched by cold New England skies, 70
Too often, while the nursery's happier few Win from a summer cloud its roseate hue Kind, soft-voiced, gentle, in his eye there shines
The ray serene that filled Evangeline's Modest he seems, not shy, content to wait
Amid the noisy clamor of debate
The looked-for moment when a peaceful
word Smooths the rough ripples louder tongues have stirred
In every tone I mark his tender grace
And all his poems hunted in his face, 80
What tranquil joy his friendly presence gives!
How could I think him dead? He lives! He lives!

There, at the table's further end I see
In his old place our Poet's vis-à-vis, The great PROFESSOR, strong, broad-shouldered, square,
In life's rich noontide, joyous, debonair.
His social hour no leaden care alloys,
His laugh rings loud and mirthful as a boy's,—

That lusty laugh the Puritan forgot,— 89
What ear has heard it and remembers not?
How often, halting at some wide crevasse
Amid the windings of his Alpine pass, High up the cliffs, the climbing mountaineer,

Listening the far-off avalanche to hear,
Silent, and leaning on his steel-shod staff,
Has heard that cheery voice, that ringing laugh,

From the rude cabin whose nomadic walls
Creep with the moving glacier as it crawls!

How does vast Nature lead her living train
In ordered sequence through that spacious brain, 100

As in the primal hour when Adam named
The new-born tribes that young creation claimed!—

How will her realm be darkened, losing thee,
Her darling, whom we call our AGASSIZ!

But who is he whose massive frame belies
The maiden shyness of his downcast eyes?
Who broods in silence till, by questions pressed,
Some answer struggles from his laboring breast?

An artist Nature meant to dwell apart, 109 Locked in his studio with a human heart,
Tracking its caverned passions to their lair,
And all its throbbing mysteries laying bare

Count it no marvel that he broods alone
Over the heart he studies,—'tis his own,
So in his page, whatever shape it wear,
The Essex wizard's shadowed self is there,—

The great ROMANCER, hid beneath his veil
Like the stern preacher of his sombre tale, Virile in strength, yet bashful as a girl,
Prouder than Hester, sensitive as Pearl. 120

From his mild throng of worshippers released,
Our Concord Delphi sends its chosen priest,
Prophet or poet, mystic, sage, or seer,
By every title always welcome here.
Why that ethereal spirit's frame describe?
You know the race-marks of the Brahmin tribe,—
The spare, slight form, the sloping shoulders' droop,

The calm, scholastic mien, the clerkly stoop,
The lines of thought the sharpened features
wear,
Carved by the edge of keen New England
air 130

List! for he speaks! As when a king would choose
The jewels for his bride, he might refuse This diamond for its flaw,—find that less bright

Than those, its fellows, and a pearl less white

Than fits her snowy neck, and yet at last,
The fairest gems are chosen, and made fast
In golden fetters, so, with light delays
He seeks the fittest word to fill his phrase, Nor vain nor idle his fastidious quest, 139
His chosen word is sure to prove the best.

Where in the realm of thought, whose air is song,
Does he, the Buddha of the West, belong?
He seems a winged Franklin, sweetly wise,
Born to unlock the secrets of the skies,
And which the nobler calling,—if 'tis fair Terrestrial with celestial to compare,— To guide the storm-cloud's elemental
flame,
Or walk the chambers whence the lightning came,
Amidst the sources of its subtle fire,
And steal their effluence for his lips and lyre? 150

If lost at times in vague aerial flights, None treads with firmer footstep when he lights,
A soaring nature, ballasted with sense,
Wisdom without her wrinkles or pretence,
In every Bible he has faith to read,
And every altar helps to shape his creed
Ask you what name this prisoned spirit bears While with ourselves thus fleeting breath it shares?
Till angels greet him with a sweeter one 159
In heaven, on earth we call him EMERSON

I start, I wake; the vision is withdrawn,
Its figures fading like the stars at dawn, Crossed from the roll of life their cherished
names,
And memory's pictures fading in their frames;
Yet life is lovelier for these transient gleams Of buried friendships, blest is he who dreams!

PROEM

I LOVE the old melodious lays Which softly melt the ages through,
The songs of Spenser's golden days,
Arcadian Sidney's silvery phrase, Sprinkling our noon of time with freshest morning dew

Yet, vainly in my quiet hours
To breathe their marvellous notes I try,
I feel them, as the leaves and flowers
In silence feel the dewy showers,
And drink with glad, still lips the blessing of the sky. 10

The rigor of a frozen clime,
The harshness of an untaught ear,
The jarring words of one whose rhyme
Beat often Labor's hurried time, Or Duty's rugged march through storm and strife, are here.

Of mystic beauty, dreamy grace,
No rounded art the lack supplies,
Unskilled the subtle lines to trace,
Or softer shades of Nature's face,
I view her common forms with unanointed eyes 20

Nor mine the seer-like power to show
The secrets of the heart and mind,
To drop the plummet-line below
Our common world of joy and woe, A more intense despair or brighter hope to find

Yet here at least an earnest sense
Of human right and weal is shown;
A hate of tyranny intense,
And hearty in its vehemence, As if my brother's pain and sorrow were my own 30

O Freedom! if to me belong
Nor mighty Milton's gift divine,
Nor Marvell's wit and graceful song,
Still with a love as deep and strong As theirs, I lay, like them, my best gifts on thy shrine!

MASSACHUSETTS TO VIRGINIA <sup>1</sup>

THE blast from Freedom's Northern hills, upon its Southern way, Bears greeting to Virginia from Massachusetts Bay
No word of haughty challenging, nor battle bugle's peal,
Nor steady tread of marching files, nor clang of horsemen's steel

No trains of deep-mouthed cannon along our highways go, Around our silent arsenals untrodden lies the snow,
And to the land-breeze of our ports, upon their errands far,
A thousand sails of commerce swell, but none are spread for war

<sup>1</sup> 'Written on reading an account of the proceedings of the citizens of Norfolk, Va., in reference to George Latimer, the alleged fugitive slave, who was seized in Boston without warrant at the request of James B. Grey, of Norfolk, claiming to be his master. The case caused great excitement North and South, and led to the presentation of a petition to Congress, signed by more than fifty thousand citizens of Massachusetts, calling for such laws and proposed amendments to the Constitution as should relieve the Commonwealth from all further participation in the crime of oppression. George Latimer himself was finally given free papers for the sum of four hundred dollars.' Author's note, The Writings of John Greenleaf Whittier (Boston, 1888), III, 80.

'Perhaps a word of explanation may be needed in regard to a class of poems written between the years 1832 and 1865. Of their defects from an artistic point of view it is not necessary to speak. They were the earnest and often vehement expression of the writer's thought and feeling at critical periods in the great conflict between Freedom and Slavery. They were written with no expectation that they would survive the occasions which called them forth: they were protests, alarm signals, trumpet-calls to action, words wrung from the writer's heart, forged at white heat, and of course lacking the finish and careful word-selection which reflection and patient brooding over them might have given. Such as they are, they belong to the history of the Anti-Slavery movement, and may serve as way-marks of its progress. If their language at times seems severe and harsh, the monstrous wrong of Slavery which provoked it must be its excuse, if any is needed. In attacking it, we did not measure our words. "It is," said Garrison, "a waste of politeness to be courteous to the devil."' Whittier, Introduction, ibid., I, 14-15.

We hear thy threats, Virginia! thy stormy words and hugh,
Swell harshly on the Southern winds which melt along our sky, 10 Yet, not one brown, hard hand foregoes its honest labor here,
No hewer of our mountain oaks suspends his axe in fear

Wild are the waves which lash the reefs along St. George's bank, Cold on the shore of Labrador the fog lies white and dank,
Through storm, and wave, and blinding mist, stout are the hearts which man The fishing-smacks of Marblehead, the sea-boats of Cape Ann

The cold north light and wintry sun glare on their icy forms, Bent grimly o'er their straining lines or wrestling with the storms, Free as the winds they drive before, rough as the waves they roam, They laugh to scorn the slaver's threat against their rocky home 20

What means the Old Dominion? Hath she forgot the day
When o'er her conquered valleys swept the Briton's steel array?
How side by side, with sons of hers, the Massachusetts men Encountered Tarleton's charge of fire, and stout Cornwallis, then?

Forgets she how the Bay State, in answer to the call
Of her old House of Burgesses, spoke out from Faneuil Hall?
When, echoing back her Henry's cry, came pulsing on each breath
Of Northern winds, the thrilling sounds of 'Liberty or Death!'

What asks the Old Dominion? If now her sons have proved False to their fathers' memory, false to the faith they loved, 30 If she can scoff at Freedom, and its great charter spurn, Must we of Massachusetts from truth and duty turn?

We hunt your bondmen, flying from Slav-ery's hateful hell;
Our voices, at your bidding, take up the bloodhound's yell,
We gather, at your summons, above our fathers' graves,
From Freedom's holy altar-horns to tear your wretched slaves!

Thank God! not yet so vilely can Massachusetts bow,
The spirit of her early time is with her even now,
Dream not because her Pilgrim blood moves slow and calm and cool, She thus can stoop her chainless neck, a sister's slave and tool! 40

All that a sister State should do, all that a free State may,
Heart, hand, and purse we proffer, as in our early day,
But that one dark loathsome burden ye must stagger with alone, And reap the bitter harvest which ye yourselves have sown!

Hold, while ye may, your struggling slaves, and burden God's free air With woman's shriek beneath the lash, and manhood's wild despair, Cling closer to the 'cleaving curse' that writes upon your plains
The blasting of Almighty wrath against a land of chains

Still shame your gallant ancestry, the cavaliers of old,
By watching round the shambles where human flesh is sold, 50 Gloat o'er the new-born child, and count his market value, when The maddened mother's cry of woe shall pierce the slaver's den!

Lower than plummet soundeth, sink the Virginia name, Plant, if ye will, your fathers' graves with rankest weeds of shame, Be, if ye will, the scandal of God's fair universe,
We wash our hands forever of your sin and shame and curse

A voice from lips whereon the coal from Freedom's shrine hath been, Thrilled, as but yesterday, the hearts of Berkshire's mountain men
 The echoes of that solemn voice are sadly lingering still
 In all our sunny valleys, on every windswept hill 60

And when the prowling man-thief came hunting for his prey Beneath the very shadow of Bunker's shaft of gray,
 How, through the free lips of the son, the father's warning spoke;
 How, from its bonds of trade and sect, the Pilgrim city broke!

A hundred thousand right arms were lifted up on high,
 A hundred thousand voices sent back their loud reply, Through the thronged towns of Essex the startling summons rang,
 And up from bench and loom and wheel her young mechanics sprang!

The voice of free, broad Middlesex, of thousands as of one,
 The shaft of Bunker calling to that of Lexington, 70
 From Norfolk's ancient villages, from Plymouth's rocky bound To where Nantucket feels the arms of ocean close her round,

From rich and rural Worcester, where through the calm repose Of cultured vales and fringing woods the gentle Nashua flows, To where Wachuset's wintry blasts the mountain larches stir, Swelled up to Heaven the thrilling cry of 'God save Latimer!'

And sandy Barnstable rose up, wet with the salt sea spray;
 And Bristol sent her answering shout down Narragansett Bay!
 Along the broad Connecticut old Hampden felt the thrill,
 And the cheer of Hampshire's woodmen swept down from Holyoke Hill. 80

The voice of Massachusetts! Of her free sons and daughters, Deep calling unto deep aloud, the sound of many waters!
 Against the burden of that voice what tyrant power shall stand?
 No fetters in the Bay State! No slave upon her land!

Look to it well, Virginians! In calmness we have borne,
 In answer to our faith and trust, your insult and your scorn;
 You've spurned our kindest counsels, you've hunted for our lives,
 And shaken round our hearths and homes your manacles and gyves!

We wage no war, we lift no arm, we fling no torch within
 The fire-damps of the quaking mine beneath your soil of sin, 90 We leave ye with your bondmen, to wrestle, while ye can,
 With the strong upward tendencies and godlike soul of man!

But for us and for our children, the vow which we have given For freedom and humanity is registered in heaven,
 No slave-hunt in our borders,—no pirate on our strand!
 No fetters in the Bay State,—no slave upon our land!

SONG OF SLAVES IN THE DESERT

WHERE are we going? where are we going,
 Where are we going, Rubee?

Lord of peoples, lord of lands,
 Look across these shining sands,
 Through the furnace of the noon,
 Through the white light of the moon
 Strong the Ghiblee wind is blowing, Strange and large the world is growing!
 Speak and tell us where we are going,
 Where are we going, Rubee? 10

Bornou land was rich and good,
 Wells of water, fields of food,

Dourra fields, and bloom of bean,
And the palm-tree cool and green;
Bornou land we see no longer,
Here we thirst and here we hunger,
Here the Moor-man smites in anger:
Where are we going, Rubee?

When we went from Bornou land,
We were like the leaves and sand, 20
We were many, we are few;
Life has one, and death has two Whitened bones our path are showing,
Thou All-seeing, thou All-knowing!
Hear us, tell us, where are we going,
Where are we going, Rubee?

Moons of marches from our eyes
Bornou land behind us lies;
Stranger round us day by day
Bends the desert circle gray, 30
Wild the waves of sand are flowing,
Hot the winds above them blowing,— Lord of all things! where are we going?
Where are we going, Rubee?

We are weak, but Thou art strong,
Short our lives, but Thine is long,
We are blind, but Thou hast eyes,
We are fools, but Thou art wise!
Thou, our morrow's pathway knowing Through the strange world round us growing, 40
Hear us, tell us where are we going,
Where are we going, Rubee?

ICHABOD<sup>1</sup>

So fallen! so lost! the light withdrawn
Which once he wore!
The glory from his gray hairs gone
Forevermore!

1 'This poem was the outcome of the surprise and grief and forecast of evil consequences which I felt on reading the seventh of March speech of Daniel Webster in support of the "compromise," and the Fugitive Slave Law. No partisan or personal enmity dictated it. On the contrary my admiration of the splendid personality and intellectual power of the great Senator was never stronger than when I laid down his speech, and, in one of the saddest moments of my life, penned my protest. I saw, as I wrote, with painful clearness its sure results,—the Slave Power arrogant and defiant, strengthened and encouraged to carry out its scheme for the extension of its baleful system, or the dissolution of the Union, the guarantees of personal liberty in the free States broken down, and the whole coun-

Revile him not, the Tempter hath A snare for all;
And pitying tears, not scorn and wrath,
Befit his fall!

Oh, dumb be passion's stormy rage,
When he who might 10
Have lighted up and led his age,
Falls back in night

Scorn! would the angels laugh, to mark
A bright soul driven,
Fiend-goaded, down the endless dark,
From hope and heaven!

Let not the land once proud of him
Insult him now,
Nor brand with deeper shame his dim,
Dishonored brow 20

But let its humbled sons, instead,
From sea to lake,
A long lament, as for the dead,
In sadness make

Of all we loved and honored, naught
Save power remains,
A fallen angel's pride of thought,
Still strong in chains

All else is gone, from those great eyes
The soul has fled 30
When faith is lost, when honor dies,
The man is dead!

Then, pay the reverence of old days
To his dead fame,
Walk backward, with averted gaze,
And hide the shame!

THE BAREFOOT BOY

BLESSINGS on thee, little man,
Barefoot boy, with cheek of tan!
With thy turned-up pantaloons,
And thy merry whistled tunes,
With thy red lip, redder still Kissed by strawberries on the hill;
With the sunshine on thy face,
Through thy torn brim's jaunty grace, try made the hunting-ground of slave-catchers. In the horror of such a vision, so soon fearfully fulfilled, if one spoke at all, he could only speak in tones of stern and sorrowful rebuke.' Author's note, ibid, IV, 61

From my heart I give thee joy,—
 I was once a barefoot boy! 10
 Prince thou art,—the grown-up man
 Only is republican
 Let the million-dollared ride!
 Barefoot, trudging at his side,
 Thou hast more than he can buy
 In the reach of ear and eye,— Outward sunshine, inward joy:
 Blessings on thee, barefoot boy!

Oh for boyhood's painless play,
 Sleep that wakes in laughing day, 20
 Health that mocks the doctor's rules,
 Knowledge never learned of schools,
 Of the wild bee's morning chase,
 Of the wild-flower's time and place,
 Flight of fowl and habitude
 Of the tenants of the wood,
 How the tortoise bears his shell,
 How the woodchuck digs his cell,
 And the ground-mole sinks his well,
 How the robin feeds her young, 30
 How the oriole's nest is hung,
 Where the whitest lilies blow,
 Where the freshest berries grow,
 Where the ground-nut trails its vine,
 Where the wood-grape's clusters shine,
 Of the black wasp's cunning way,
 Mason of his walls of clay,
 And the architectural plans
 Of gray hornet artisans! 40
 For, eschewing books and tasks,
 Nature answers all he asks,
 Hand in hand with her he walks,
 Face to face with her he talks,
 Part and parcel of her joy,— Blessings on the barefoot boy!

Oh for boyhood's time of June,
 Crowding years in one brief moon,
 When all things I heard or saw,
 Me, their master, waited for I was rich in flowers and trees, 50
 Humming-birds and honey-bees,
 For my sport the squirrel played,
 Plied the snouted mole his spade,
 For my taste the blackberry cone Purpled over hedge and stone, Laughed the brook for my delight
 Through the day and through the night,
 Whispering at the garden wall,
 Talked with me from fall to fall,
 Mine the sand-rimmed pickerel pond, 60
 Mine the walnut slopes beyond,

Mine, on bending orchard trees, Apples of Hesperides!
 Still as my horizon grew,
 Larger grew my riches too,
 All the world I saw or knew Seemed a complex Chinese toy, Fashioned for a barefoot boy!

Oh for festal dainties spread,
 Like my bowl of milk and bread, 70
 Pewter spoon and bowl of wood,
 On the door-stone, gray and rude!
 O'er me, like a regal tent,
 Cloudy-ribbed, the sunset bent,
 Purple-curtained, fringed with gold,
 Looped in many a wind-swung fold,
 While for music came the play
 Of the pied frogs' orchestra,
 And, to light the noisy choir,
 Lit the fly his lamp of fire 80
 I was monarch pomp and joy Waited on the barefoot boy!

Cheerily, then, my little man,
 Live and laugh, as boyhood can!
 Though the flinty slopes be hard,
 Stubble-speared the new-mown sward, Every morn shall lead thee through Fresh baptisms of the dew,
 Every evening from thy feet
 Shall the cool wind kiss the heat 90
 All too soon these feet must hude
 In the prison cells of pride,
 Lose the freedom of the sod,
 Like a colt's for work be shod,
 Made to tread the mills of toil,
 Up and down in ceaseless moil Happy if their track be found Never on forbidden ground, Happy if they sink not in Quick and treacherous sands of sin 100
 Ah! that thou couldst know thy joy,
 Ere it passes, barefoot boy!

FOR RIGHTEOUSNESS' SAKE

INSCRIBED TO FRIENDS UNDER ARREST FOR TREASON AGAINST THE SLAVE POWER

THE age is dull and mean Men creep,
 Not walk, with blood too pale and tame
 To pay the debt they owe to shame,
 Buy cheap, sell dear, eat, drink, and sleep
 Down-pillowed, deaf to moaning wail,

Pay tithes for soul-insurance, keep Six days to Mammon, one to Cant.

In such a time, give thanks to God,
That somewhat of the holy rage
With which the prophets in their age 10
On all its decent seemings trod,
Has set your feet upon the lie,
That man and ox and soul and clod
Are market stock to sell and buy!

The hot words from your lips, my own,
To caution trained, might not repeat,
But if some tares among the wheat
Of generous thought and deed were sown,
No common wrong provoked your zeal,
The silken gauntlet that is thrown 20
In such a quarrel rings like steel

The brave old strife the fathers saw For Freedom calls for men again
Like those who battled not in vain
For England's Charter, Alfred's law, And right of speech and trial just Wage in your name their ancient war
With venal courts and perjured trust

God's ways seem dark, but, soon or late,
They touch the shining hills of day, 30
The evil cannot brook delay,
The good can well afford to wait
Give ermined knaves their hour of crime, Ye have the future grand and great,
The safe appeal of Truth to Time!

SKIPPER IRESON'S RIDE<sup>1</sup>

Of all the rides since the birth of time,
Told in story or sung in rime,—

<sup>1</sup> Under the headline 'Melancholy' the Salem Gazette for 4 Nov. 1808 contained the following communication from a Capt Gibbons: 'Friday, at 11 P.M. sprung a leak, and immediately filled at 12 P.M. spoke to the sch Betsy, for Marblehead, but who, contrary to the principles of humanity, gave us no assistance! On Saturday, at 3 P.M. Capt Gibbons, Capt Danford, passenger, Joseph Maxwell, of Portland do and David Stanford, of Brunswick, do were taken off the wreck by Mr Hardy, of Truro, in a whale boat, and the tempest increasing so fast, could not return to relieve the four remaining. When the Betsy arrived at Marblehead on Sunday last, information was given of the wreck, and two vessels were immediately dispatched to save the people, but alas! too late, they were doubtless swallowed up in the ocean. The shocking indifference of the master (Ireson) to the lives of his fellow creatures has excited the strongest resentment

On Apuleius's Golden Ass,
Or one-eyed Calendar's horse of brass, Witch astride of a human back,
Islam's prophet on Al-Borak,—
The strangest ride that ever was sped
Was Ireson's, out from Marblehead!
Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, Tarred and feathered and carried in a 10
cart
By the women of Marblehead!

Body of turkey, head of owl,
Wings a-droop like a rained-on fowl,
Feathered and ruffled in every part,
Skipper Ireson stood in the cart Scores of women, old and young,
Strong of muscle, and glib of tongue,
Pushed and pulled up the rocky lane,
Shouting and singing the shrill refrain 19
'Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd horrt,
Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a corrt
By the women o' Morble'ead!'

Wrinkled scolds with hands on hips,
Girls in bloom of cheek and lips,
Wild-eyed, free-limbed, such as chase
Bacchus round some antique vase, Brief of skirt, with ankles bare,
Loose of kerchief and loose of hair,
With conch-shells blowing and fish-horns' twang,
Over and over the Mænads sang 30
'Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd horrt,
Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a corrt
By the women o' Morble'ead!'

Small pity for him!—He sailed away From a leaking ship, in Chaleur Bay,— Sailed away from a sinking wreck,
With his own town's-people on her deck!
'Lay by! lay by!' they called to him Back he answered, 'Sink or swim!
Brag of your catch of fish again!' 40 in the people of Marblehead, who have a deservedly high reputation for their exertions in the cause of humanity.'

The form of the resentment became locally traditional, and Whittier wrote in 1857 to James Russell Lowell, as editor of the Atlantic Monthly: 'I send for December a bit of a Yankee ballad, the spirit of which pleases me more than the execution. Will it do?'

The incident occurred sometime in the last century. The refrain is the actual song of the women on this march. To relish it, one must understand the peculiar tone and dialect of the ancient Marbleheaders. Quoted, Pickard, Life and Letters of John Greenleaf Whittier (Boston, 1894), 406.

And off he sailed through the fog and rain!
 Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
 Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
 By the women of Marblehead!

Fathoms deep in dark Chaleur
 That wreck shall lie forevermore.
 Mother and sister, wife and maid,
 Looked from the rocks of Marblehead
 Over the moaning and rainy sea,— Looked for the coming that might not be! 50
 What did the winds and the sea-birds say
 Of the cruel captain who sailed away?—
 Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
 By the women of Marblehead!

Through the street, on either side,
 Up flew windows, doors swung wide,
 Sharp-tongued spinsters, old wives gray,
 Treble lent the fish-horn's bray Sea-worn grandsires, cripple-bound, 60
 Hulks of old sailors run aground,
 Shook head, and fist, and hat, and cane,
 And cracked with curses the hoarse refrain:
 'Here's Flud Orson, fur his horrd horrt,
 Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a corrt
 By the women o' Morble'ead!'

Sweetly along the Salem road Bloom of orchard and lilac showed Little the wicked skipper knew
 Of the fields so green and the sky so blue 70
 Riding there in his sorry trim,
 Like an Indian idol glum and grim, Scarcely he seemed the sound to hear Of voices shouting, far and near
 'Here's Flud Orson, fur his horrd horrt,
 Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a corrt
 By the women o' Morble'ead!'

'Hear me, neighbors!' at last he cried,—
 'What to me is this noisy ride?
 What is the shame that clothes the skin 80
 To the nameless horror that lives within?
 Waking or sleeping, I see a wreck,
 And hear a cry from a reeling deck!
 Hate me and curse me,—I only dread
 The hand of God and the face of the dead!
 Said old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
 By the women of Marblehead!

Then the wife of the skipper lost at sea Said, 'God has touched him! why should we?' 90
 Said an old wife mourning her only son,
 'Cut the rogue's tether and let him run!'
 So with soft relentings and rude excuse,
 Half scorn, half pity, they cut him loose,
 And gave him a cloak to hide him in,
 And left him alone with his shame and sin
 Poor Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
 By the women of Marblehead!

TELLING THE BEES <sup>1</sup>

HERE is the place, right over the hill Runs the path I took,
 You can see the gap in the old wall still,
 And the stepping-stones in the shallow brook

There is the house, with the gate red-barred,
 And the poplars tall,
 And the barn's brown length, and the cattle-yard,
 And the white horns tossing above the wall

There are the beehives ranged in the sun,
 And down by the brink 10
 Of the brook are her poor flowers, weedo'errun,
 Pansy and daffodil, rose and pink

A year has gone, as the tortoise goes,
 Heavy and slow,
 And the same rose blows, and the same sun
 glows,
 And the same brook sings of a year ago

There's the same sweet clover-smell in the breeze,
 And the June sun warm
 Tangles his wings of fire in the trees,
 Setting, as then, over Fernside farm. 20

1 'A remarkable custom, brought from the Old Country, formerly prevailed in the rural districts of New England. On the death of a member of the family, the bees were at once informed of the event, and their hives dressed in mourning. This ceremonial was supposed to be necessary to prevent the swarms from leaving their hives and seeking a new home.' Author's note, The Writings of John Greenleaf Whittier (Boston, 1888) I, 186

I mind me how with a lover's care
 From my Sunday coat
 I brushed off the burrs, and smoothed my hair,
 And cooled at the brookside my brow and throat

Since we parted, a month had passed,—
 To love, a year,
 Down through the beeches I looked at last
 On the little red gate and the well-sweep near.

I can see it all now,—the slantwise rain
 Of light through the leaves, 30
 The sundown's blaze on her window-pane,
 The bloom of her roses under the eaves

Just the same as a month before,—
 The house and the trees, The barn's brown gable, the vine by the door,—
 Nothing changed but the hives of bees

Before them, under the garden wall,
 Forward and back,
 Went drearly singing the chore-girl small,
 Draping each hive with a shred of black

Trembling, I listened the summer sun 41
 Had the chill of snow,
 For I knew she was telling the bees of one Gone on the journey we all must go!

Then I said to myself, 'My Mary weeps
 For the dead to-day
 Haply her blind old grandsire sleeps
 The fret and the pain of his age away '

But her dog whined low, on the doorway sill,
 With his cane to his chin, 50
 The old man sat, and the chore-girl still Sung to the bees stealing out and in

And the song she was singing ever since In my ear sounds on —
 'Stay at home, pretty bees, fly not hence!
 Mistress Mary is dead and gone!'

BARBARA FRIETCHIE <sup>1</sup>

UP from the meadows rich with corn, Clear in the cool September morn,

<sup>1</sup> There was much dispute as to the truth of the incident. Whittier wrote 'That there was a Dame Frietchie

The clustered spires of Frederick stand Green-walled by the hulls of Maryland.

Round about them orchards sweep,
 Apple and peach tree fruited deep,

Fair as the garden of the Lord
 To the eyes of the famished rebel horde,

On that pleasant morn of the early fall When Lee marched over the mountain-
     wall, 10

Over the mountains winding down,
 Horse and foot, into Frederick town.

Forty flags with their silver stars,
 Forty flags with their crimson bars,

Flapped in the morning wind: the sun
 Of noon looked down, and saw not one

Up rose old Barbara Frietchie then, Bowed with her fourscore years and ten,

Bravest of all in Frederick town,
 She took up the flag the men hauled down;

In her attic window the staff she set, 21
 To show that one heart was loyal yet

Up the street came the rebel tread, Stonewall Jackson riding ahead

Under his slouched hat left and right
 He glanced, the old flag met his sight

'Halt!'—the dust-brown ranks stood fast
 'Fire!'—out blazed the rifle-blast

It shivered the window, pane and sash,
 It rent the banner with seam and gash 30

Quick, as it fell, from the broken staff
 Dame Barbara snatched the silken scarf.

She leaned far out on the window-sill,
 And shook it forth with a royal will.

'Shoot, if you must, this old gray head, But spare your country's flag,' she said in Frederick who loved the old flag is not disputed by any one. As for the rest I do not feel responsible. If there was no such occurrence, so much the worse for Frederick City.' Quoted, Pickard, Life and Letters of John Greenleaf Whittier (Boston, 1894), 457.

A shade of sadness, a blush of shame,
Over the face of the leader came,

The nobler nature within him stirred
To life at that woman's deed and word: 40

'Who touches a hair of yon gray head Dies like a dog! March on!' he said

All day long through Frederick street Sounded the tread of marching feet.

All day long that free flag tost
Over the heads of the rebel host

Ever its torn folds rose and fell On the loyal winds that loved it well;

And through the hill-gaps sunset light Shone over it with a warm good-night 50

Barbara Frietchie's work is o'er,
And the Rebel rides on his raids no more

Honor to her! and let a tear
Fall, for her sake, on Stonewall's bier.

Over Barbara Frietchie's grave,
Flag of Freedom and Union, wave!

Peace and order and beauty draw Round thy symbol of light and law,

And ever the stars above look down
On thy stars below in Frederick town! 60

LAUS DEO! <sup>1</sup>

It is done!
Clang of bell and roar of gun
Send the tidings up and down
How the belfries rock and reel!
How the great guns, peal on peal,
Fling the joy from town to town!

Ring, O bells!
Every stroke exulting tells Of the burial hour of crime
Loud and long, that all may hear, 10

<sup>1</sup> 'On hearing the bells ring on the passage of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery' Author's note, The Writings of John Greenleaf Whittier (Boston, 1888), III, 254

Ring for every listening ear Of Eternity and Time!

Let us kneel
God's own voice is in that peal,
And this spot is holy ground.
Lord, forgive us! What are we,
That our eyes thus glory see,
That our ears have heard the sound!

For the Lord
On the whirlwind is abroad, 20
In the earthquake He has spoken,
He has smitten with His thunder
The iron walls asunder,
And the gates of brass are broken!

Loud and long
Lift the old exulting song,
Sing with Miriam by the sea,
He has cast the mighty down,
Horse and rider sink and drown,
'He hath triumphed gloriously!' 30

Did we dare,
In our agony of prayer,
Ask for more than He has done?
When was ever His right hand Over any time or land
Stretched as now beneath the sun?

How they pale,
Ancient myth and song and tale,
In this wonder of our days,
When the cruel rod of war 40
Blossoms white with righteous law,
And the wrath of man is praise!

Blotted out!
All within and all about Shall a fresher life begin,
Freer breathe the universe
As it rolls its heavy curse
On the dead and buried sin!

It is done!
In the circuit of the sun 50
Shall the sound thereof go forth.
It shall bid the sad rejoice,
It shall give the dumb a voice,
It shall belt with joy the earth!

Ring and swing,
Bells of joy! On morning's wing
Send the song of praise abroad!

With the sound of broken chains
 Tell the nations that He reigns,
 Who alone is Lord and God! 60

THE ETERNAL GOODNESS

O FRIENDS! with whom my feet have trod
 The quiet aisles of prayer,
 Glad witness to your zeal for God
 And love of man I bear

I trace your lines of argument,
 Your logic linked and strong
 I weigh as one who dreads dissent,
 And fears a doubt as wrong

But still my human hands are weak
 To hold your iron creeds 10
 Against the words ye bid me speak
 My heart within me pleads

Who fathoms the Eternal Thought?
 Who talks of scheme and plan?
 The Lord is God! He needeth not
 The poor device of man

I walk with bare, hushed feet the ground
 Ye tread with boldness shod,
 I dare not fix with mete and bound
 The love and power of God 20

Ye praise His justice, even such His pitying love I deem Ye seek a king, I fain would touch
 The robe that hath no seam

Ye see the curse which overbroods
 A world of pain and loss,
 I hear our Lord's beatitudes
 And prayer upon the cross

More than your schoolmen teach, within Myself, alas! I know 30
 Too dark ye cannot paint the sin,
 Too small the merit show

I bow my forehead to the dust,
 I veil mine eyes for shame,
 And urge, in trembling self-distrust,
 A prayer without a claim

I see the wrong that round me lies,
 I feel the guilt within,
 I hear, with groan and travail-cries,
 The world confess its sin 40

Yet, in the maddening maze of things,
 And tossed by storm and flood,
 To one fixed trust my spirit clings,
 I know that God is good!

Not mine to look where cherubim
 And seraphs may not see,
 But nothing can be good in Him
 Which evil is in me

The wrong that pains my soul below
 I dare not throne above, 50
 I know not of His hate,—I know
 His goodness and His love

I dimly guess from blessings known
 Of greater out of sight,
 And, with the chastened Psalmist,
 own
 His judgments too are right

I long for household voices gone,
 For vanished smiles I long,
 But God hath led my dear ones on,
 And He can do no wrong 60

I know not what the future hath Of marvel or surprise,
 Assured alone that life and death
 His mercy underlies

And if my heart and flesh are weak
 To bear an untried pain,
 The bruised reed He will not break,
 But strengthen and sustain

No offering of my own I have,
 Nor works my faith to prove, 70
 I can but give the gifts He gave,
 And plead His love for love.

And so beside the Silent Sea
 I wait the muffled oar,
 No harm from Him can come to me
 On ocean or on shore

I know not where His islands lift
 Their fronded palms in air,
 I only know I cannot drift
 Beyond His love and care. 80

O brothers! if my faith is vain,
 If hopes like these betray,
 Pray for me that my feet may gain
 The sure and safer way

And Thou, O Lord! by whom are seen Thy creatures as they be,
 Forgive me if too close I lean
 My human heart on Thee!

SNOW-BOUND<sup>1</sup>

A WINTER IDYL

THE sun that brief December day
 Rose cheerless over hills of gray,
 And, darkly circled, gave at noon
 A sadder light than waning moon Slow tracing down the thickening sky
 Its mute and ominous prophecy,
 A portent seeming less than threat,
 It sank from sight before it set
 A chill no coat, however stout,
 Of homespun stuff could quite shut out, 10
 A hard, dull bitterness of cold,
 That checked, mid-vein, the circling race
 Of life-blood in the sharpened face,
 The coming of the snow-storm told.
 The wind blew east, we heard the roar
 Of Ocean on his wintry shore,
 And felt the strong pulse throbbing there Beat with low rhythm our inland air.

Meanwhile we did our nightly chores,— Brought in the wood from out of doors, 20
 Littered the stalls, and from the mows Raked down the herd's-s-grass for the cows Heard the horse whinnying for his corn,
 And, sharply clashing horn on horn,

<sup>1</sup> The inmates of the family at the Whittier homestead who are referred to in the poem were my father, mother, my brother and two sisters, and my uncle and aunt both unmarried. In addition, there was the district school-master who boarded with us. The "not unfear'd, half-welcome guest" was Harriet Livermore, daughter of Judge Livermore, of New Hampshire, a young woman of fine natural ability, enthusiastic, eccentric, with slight control over her violent temper, which sometimes made her religious profession doubtful. She was equally ready to exhort in school-house prayer-meetings and dance in a Washington ball-room, while her father was a member of Congress. She early embraced the doctrine of the Second Advent, and felt it her duty to proclaim the Lord's speedy coming. With this message she crossed the Atlantic and spent the greater part of a long life in travelling over Europe and Asia. She lived some time with Lady Hester Stanhope, a woman as fantastic and mentally strained as herself, on the slope of Mt. Lebanon, but finally quarrelled with her in regard to two white horses with red marks on their backs which suggested the idea of saddles, on which her titled hostess expected to ride into Jerusalem with the Lord. A friend of mine found her, when quite an old woman, wandering in Syria with a tribe of Arabs, who with the

Impatient down the stanchion rows
 The cattle shake their walnut bows,
 While, peering from his early perch
 Upon the scaffold's pole of birch,
 The cock his crested helmet bent
 And down his querulous challenge sent. 30

Unwarmed by any sunset light
 The gray day darkened into night,
 A night made hoary with the swarm
 And whirl-dance of the blinding storm,
 As zigzag, wavering to and fro,
 Crossed and recrossed the winged snow
 And ere the early bedtime came
 The white drift piled the window-frame,
 And through the glass the clothes-line posts Looked in like tall and sheeted ghosts. 40

So all night long the storm roared on The morning broke without a sun,
 In tiny spherule traced with lines
 Of Nature's geometric signs,
 In starry flake, and pellicle,
 All day the hoary meteor fell,
 And, when the second morning shone,
 We looked upon a world unknown,
 On nothing we could call our own 50
 Around the glistening wonder bent
 The blue walls of the firmament,
 No cloud above, no earth below,—
 A universe of sky and snow!
 The old familiar sights of ours Took marvellous shapes, strange domes and towers

Rose up where sty or corn-crib stood,

Oriental notion that madness is inspiration, accepted her as their prophetess and leader. At the time referred to in Snow-Bound she was boarding at the Rocks Village about two miles from us.

"In my boyhood, in our lonely farm-house, we had scanty sources of information, few books and only a small weekly newspaper. Our only annual was the Almanac. Under such circumstances story-telling was a necessary resource in the long winter evenings. My father when a young man had traversed the wilderness to Canada, and could tell us of his adventures with Indians and wild beasts and of his sojourn in the French villages. My uncle was ready with his record of hunting and fishing and, it must be confessed, with stories which he at least half believed, of witchcraft and apparitions. My mother, who was born in the Indian-haunted region of Somerworth, New Hampshire, between Dover and Portsmouth, told us of the inroads of the savages, and the narrow escape of her ancestors. She described strange people who lived on the Piscataqua and Cohecho, among whom was Bantam the sorcerer. I have in my possession the wizard's "conjuring book," which he solemnly opened when consulted. It is a copy of Cornelius Agrippa's Magie printed in 1651." Author's note, ibid., II, 134-35.

Or garden-wall, or belt of wood,
 A smooth white mound the brush-pile showed,
 A fenceless drift what once was road,
 The bridle-post an old man sat                 60
 With loose-flung coat and high cocked hat,
 The well-curb had a Chinese roof;
 And even the long sweep, high aloof,
 In its slant splendor, seemed to tell
 Of Pisa's leaning miracle

A prompt, decisive man, no breath
 Our father wasted 'Boys, a path!'
 Well pleased (for when did farmer boy Count such a summons less than joy?)
 Our buskins on our feet we drew,                 70
 With mittened hands, and caps drawn low,
 To guard our necks and ears from snow,
 We cut the solid whiteness through And, where the drift was deepest, made A tunnel walled and overlaid With dazzling crystal we had read
 Of rare Aladdin's wondrous cave,
 And to our own his name we gave,
 With many a wish the luck were ours
 To test his lamp's supernal powers                 80
 We reached the barn with merry din,
 And roused the prisoned brutes within
 The old horse thrust his long head out,
 And grave with wonder gazed about,
 The cock his lusty greeting said,
 And forth his speckled harem led,
 The oxen lashed their tails, and hooked,
 And mild reproach of hunger looked,
 The horned patriarch of the sheep,
 Like Egypt's Amun roused from sleep,                 90 Shook his sage head with gesture mute,
 And emphasized with stamp of foot.

All day the gusty north-wind bore
 The loosening drift its breath before,
 Low circling round its southern zone,
 The sun through dazzling snow-must shone.
 No church-bell lent its Christian tone
 To the savage air, no social smoke Curled over woods of snow-hung oak.
 A solitude made more intense                 100
 By dreary-voiced elements,
 The shrieking of the mindless wind,
 The moaning tree-boughs swaying blind,
 And on the glass the unmeaning beat
 Of ghostly finger-tips of sleet
 Beyond the circle of our hearth
 No welcome sound of toil or mirth Unbound the spell, and testified

Of human life and thought outside.
 We munded that the sharpest ear                 110
 The buried brooklet could not hear.
 The music of whose liquid lip
 Had been to us companionship,
 And, in our lonely life, had grown
 To have an almost human tone.

As night drew on, and, from the crest
 Of wooded knolls that ridged the west,
 The sun, a snow-blown traveller, sank
 From sight beneath the smothering bank,
 We piled, with care, our nightly stack                 120
 Of wood against the chimney-back,—
 The oaken log, green, huge, and thick,
 And on its top the stout back-stuck,
 The knotty forestuck laid apart,
 And filled between with curious art
 The ragged brush, then, hovering near,
 We watched the first red blaze appear,
 Heard the sharp crackle, caught the gleam
 On whitewashed wall and sagging beam,
 Until the old, rude-furnished room                 130
 Burst, flower-like, into rosy bloom,
 While radiant with a mimic flame Outside the sparkling drift became,
 And through the bare-boughed lilac-tree
 Our own warm hearth seemed blazing free.
 The crane and pendent trammels showed,
 The Turks' heads on the andirons glowed;
 While childish fancy, prompt to tell
 The meaning of the miracle, Whispered the old rhyme 'Under the tree,
When fire outdoors burns merrily,                 141
There the witches are making tea.'

The moon above the eastern wood Shone at its full, the hill-range stood Transfigured in the silver flood,
 Its blown snows flashing cold and keen,
 Dead white, save where some sharp ravine
 Took shadow, or the sombre green
 Of hemlocks turned to pitchy black
 Against the whiteness at their back                 150
 For such a world and such a night
 Most fitting that unwarming light,
 Which only seemed where'er it fell
 To make the coldness visible.

Shut in from all the world without,
 We sat the clean-winged hearth about,
 Content to let the north-wind roar
 In baffled rage at pane and door,
 While the red logs before us beat
 The frost-line back with tropic heat,                 160

And ever, when a louder blast
 Shook beam and rafter as it passed,
 The merrier up its roaring draught
 The great throat of the chimney laughed;
 The house-dog on his paws outspread Laid to the fire his drowsy head,
 The cat's dark silhouette on the wall
 A couchant tiger's seemed to fall,
 And, for the winter fireside meet,
 Between the andirons' straddling feet, 170
 The mug of cider simmered slow,
 The apples sputtered in a row,
 And, close at hand, the basket stood
 With nuts from brown October's wood.

What matter how the night behaved?
 What matter how the north-wind raved?
 Blow high, blow low, not all its snow
 Could quench our hearth-fire's ruddy glow
 O Time and Change!—with hair as gray
 As was my sire's that winter day, 180
 How strange it seems, with so much gone
 Of life and love, to still live on!
 Ah, brother! only I and thou Are left of all that circle now,—
 The dear home faces whereupon That fitful firelight paled and shone.
 Henceforward, listen as we will,
 The voices of that hearth are still,
 Look where we may, the wide earth o'er Those lighted faces smile no more 190
 We tread the paths their feet have worn,
     We sit beneath their orchard trees,
     We hear, like them, the hum of bees
 And rustle of the bladed corn,
 We turn the pages that they read,
     Their written words we linger o'er,
 But in the sun they cast no shade,
 No voice is heard, no sign is made,
     No step is on the conscious floor!
 Yet Love will dream, and Faith will trust, (Since He who knows our need is just) 201 That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.
 Alas for him who never sees
 The stars shine through his cypress-trees!
 Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
 Nor looks to see the breaking day
 Across the mournful marbles play!
 Who hath not learned, in hours of faith,
     The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
 That Life is ever lord of Death, 210
     And Love can never lose its own!

We sped the time with stories old,
 Wrought puzzles out, and riddles told,

Or stammered from our school-book lore
 'The Chief of Gambia's golden shore.'
 How often since, when all the land
 Was clay in Slavery's shaping hand,
 As if a far-blown trumpet stirred
 The languorous sin-sick air, I heard
 'Does not the voice of reason cry, 220 Claim the first right which Nature gave,
 From the red scourge of bondage fly,
     Nor deign to live a burdened slave!'
 Our father rode again his ride
 On Memphremagog's wooded side;
 Sat down again to moose and samp
 In trapper's hut and Indian camp, Lived o'er the old idyllic ease
 Beneath St. François' hemlock-trees, Again for him the moonlight shone 230
 On Norman cap and bodiced zone;
 Again he heard the violin play
 Which led the village dance away,
 And mingled in its merry whirl
 The grandam and the laughing girl Or, nearer home, our steps he led Where Salisbury's level marshes spread Mile-wide as flies the laden bee,
 Where merry mowers, hale and strong,
 Swept, scythe on scythe, their swaths along
     The low green prairies of the sea 241
 We shared the fishing off Boar's Head,
 And round the rocky Isles of Shoals
     The hake-broil on the drift-wood coals,
 The chowder on the sand-beach made,
 Dipped by the hungry, steaming hot,
 With spoons of clam-shell from the pot.
 We heard the tales of witchcraft old,
 And dream and sign and marvel told
 To sleepy listeners as they lay 250
 Stretched idly on the salted hay, Adrift along the winding shores,
 When favoring breezes deigned to blow
 The square sail of the gundelow
 And idle lay the useless oars

Our mother, while she turned her wheel
 Or run the new-knit stocking-heel, Told how the Indian hordes came down
 At midnight on Cocheco town,
 And how her own great-uncle bore 260
 His cruel scalp-mark to fourscore.
 Recalling, in her fitting phrase,
     So rich and picturesque and free,
 (The common unrhymed poetry Of simple life and country ways),
 The story of her early days,—
 She made us welcome to her home;

Old hearths grew wide to give us room,
 We stole with her a frightened look At the gray wizard's conjuring-book, 270
 The fame whereof went far and wide
 Through all the simple country side,
 We heard the hawks at twilight play,
 The boat-horn on Piscataqua,
 The loon's weird laughter far away;
 We fished her little trout-brook, knew What flowers in wood and meadow grew,
 What sunny hillsides autumn-brown
 She climbed to shake the ripe nuts down, Saw where in sheltered cove and bay 280
 The ducks' black squadron anchored lay,
 And heard the wild-geese calling loud
 Beneath the gray November cloud

Then, haply, with a look more grave,
 And soberer tone, some tale she gave From painful Sewall's ancient tome, Beloved in every Quaker home,
 Of faith fire-winged by martyrdom,
 Or Chalkley's Journal, old and quaint,— 290 Gentlest of skippers, rare sea-saint!—
 Who, when the dreary calms prevailed,
 And water-butt and bread-cask failed,
 And cruel, hungry eyes pursued
 His portly presence mad for food,
 With dark hints muttered under breath
 Of casting lots for life or death,
 Offered, if Heaven withheld supplies,
 To be himself the sacrifice
 Then, suddenly, as if to save
 The good man from his living grave, 300
 A ripple on the water grew,
 A school of porpoise flashed in view
 'Take, eat,' he said, 'and be content, These fishes in my stead are sent By Him who gave the tangled ram
 To spare the child of Abraham.'

Our uncle, innocent of books,
 Was rich in lore of fields and brooks,
 The ancient teachers never dumb
 Of Nature's unhoused lyceum 310
 In moons and tides and weather wise,
 He read the clouds as prophecies,
 And foul or fair could well divine,
 By many an occult hint and sign,
 Holding the cunning-warded keys
 To all the woodcraft mysteries, Himself to Nature's heart so near That all her voices in his ear
 Of beast or bird had meanings clear,
 Like Apollonius of old, 320

Who knew the tales the sparrows told,
 Or Hermes who interpreted
 What the sage cranes of Nilus said, Content to live where life began,
 A simple, guileless, childlike man,
 Strong only on his native grounds,
 The little world of sights and sounds
 Whose girdle was the parish bounds, Whereof his fondly partial pride
 The common features magnified, 330
 As Surrey hills to mountains grew In White of Selborne's loving view,—
 He told how teal and loon he shot,
 And how the eagle's eggs he got,
 The feats on pond and river done,
 The prodigies of rod and gun,
 Till, warming with the tales he told,
 Forgotten was the outside cold,
 The bitter wind unheeded blew,
 From ripening corn the pigeons flew, 340
 The partridge drummed i' the wood, the mink
 Went fishing down the river-brink.
 In fields with bean or clover gay,
 The woodchuck, like a hermit gray,
 Peered from the doorway of his cell;
 The muskrat plied the mason's trade,
 And tier by tier his mud-walls laid,
 And from the shagbark overhead
 The grizzled squirrel dropped his shell.

Next, the dear aunt, whose smile of cheer
 And voice in dreams I see and hear,— 351
 The sweetest woman ever Fate Perverse denied a household mate,
 Who, lonely, homeless, not the less Found peace in love's unselfishness,
 And welcome wheresoe'er she went,
 A calm and gracious element,
 Whose presence seemed the sweet income
 And womanly atmosphere of home,— 360
 Called up her girlhood memories,
 The huskings and the apple-bees,
 The sleigh-rides and the summer sails,
 Weaving through all the poor details
 And homespun warp of circumstance
 A golden woof-thread of romance
 For well she kept her genial mood
 And simple faith of maidenhood,
 Before her still a cloud-land lay,
 The mirage loomed across her way,
 The morning dew, that dries so soon 370
 With others, glistened at her noon,
 Through years of toil and soil and care,
 From glossy tress to thin gray hair.

All unprofaned she held apart
 The virgin fancies of the heart.
 Be shame to him of woman born
 Who hath for such but thought of scorn.

There, too, our elder sister plied
 Her evening task the stand beside;
 A full, rich nature, free to trust, 380 Truthful and almost sternly just,
 Impulsive, earnest, prompt to act,
 And make her generous thought a fact,
 Keeping with many a light disguise
 The secret of self-sacrifice
 O heart sore-tried! thou hast the best
 That Heaven itself could give thee,—rest, Rest from all bitter thoughts and things!
 How many a poor one's blessing went With thee beneath the low green tent 390
 Whose curtain never outward swings!

As one who held herself a part Of all she saw, and let her heart
 Against the household bosom lean,
 Upon the motley-braided mat
 Our youngest and our dearest sat,
 Lifting her large, sweet, asking eyes,
 Now bathed in the unfading green
 And holy peace of Paradise.
 Oh, looking from some heavenly hill, 400
 Or from the shade of saintly palms,
 Or silver reach of river calms,
 Do those large eyes behold me still?
 With me one little year ago —
 The chill weight of the winter snow
 For months upon her grave has lain;
 And now, when summer south-winds blow
 And brier and harebell bloom again,
 I tread the pleasant paths we trod,
 I see the violet-sprinkled sod 410
 Whereon she leaned, too frail and weak
 The hillside flowers she loved to seek,
 Yet following me where'er I went With dark eyes full of love's content.
 The birds are glad, the brier-rose fills
 The air with sweetness, all the hills
 Stretch green to June's unclouded sky,
 But still I wait with ear and eye
 For something gone which should be nigh,
 A loss in all familiar things, 420
 In flower that blooms, and bird that sings.
 And yet, dear heart! remembering thee,
 Am I not richer than of old?
 Safe in thy immortality,
 What change can reach the wealth I hold?
 What chance can mar the pearl and gold

Thy love hath left in trust with me?
 And while in life's late afternoon,
 Where cool and long the shadows grow,
 I walk to meet the night that soon 430
 Shall shape and shadow overflow,
 I cannot feel that thou art far,
 Since near at need the angels are;
 And when the sunset gates unbar,
 Shall I not see thee waiting stand,
 And, white against the evening star,
 The welcome of thy beckoning hand?

Brisk wielder of the birch and rule,
 The master of the district school
 Held at the fire his favored place, 440
 Its warm glow lit a laughing face
 Fresh-hued and fair, where scarce appeared
 The uncertain prophecy of beard
 He teased the mitten-blinded cat, Played cross-pins on my uncle's hat,
 Sang songs, and told us what befalls
 In classic Dartmouth's college halls Born the wild Northern hills among,
 From whence his yeoman father wrung
 By patient toil subsistence scant, 450
 Not competence and yet not want,
 He early gained the power to pay
 His cheerful, self-reliant way,
 Could doff at ease his scholar's gown
 To peddle wares from town to town,
 Or through the long vacation's reach
 In lonely lowland districts teach,
 Where all the droll experience found At stranger hearths in boarding round,
 The moonlit skater's keen delight, 460
 The sleigh-drive through the frosty
 night,
 The rustic-party, with its rough Accompaniment of blind-man's-buff,
 And whirling plate, and forfeits paid,
 His winter task a pastime made Happy the snow-locked homes wherein He tuned his merry violin,
 Or played the athlete in the barn,
 Or held the good dame's winding-yarn,
 Or mirth-provoking versions told 470
 Of classic legends rare and old,
 Wherein the scenes of Greece and Rome
 Had all the commonplace of home,
 And little seemed at best the odds
 'Twixt Yankee pedlers and old gods; Where Pindus-born Arachthus took The guise of any grist-mill brook,
 And dread Olympus at his will Became a huckleberry hill

A careless boy that night he seemed; 480
 But at his desk he had the look
 And air of one who wisely schemed, And hostage from the future took
 In trained thought and lore of book.

Large-brained, clear-eyed, of such as he Shall Freedom's young apostles be,
 Who, following in War's bloody trail,
 Shall every lingering wrong assail,
 All chains from limb and spirit strike,
 Uplift the black and white alike, 490 Scatter before their swift advance
 The darkness and the ignorance,
 The pride, the lust, the squalid sloth, Which nurtured Treason's monstrous growth,

Made murder pastime, and the hell
 Of prison-torture possible,
 The cruel lie of caste refute,
 Old forms remould, and substitute For Slavery's lash the freeman's will,
 For blind routine, wise-handed skill, 500
 A school-house plant on every hill, Stretching in radiate nerve-lines thence
 The quick wires of intelligence, Till North and South together brought Shall own the same electric thought,
 In peace a common flag salute,
 And, side by side in labor's free
 And unresentful rivalry,
 Harvest the fields wherein they fought.

Another guest that winter night 510
 Flashed back from lustrous eyes the light Unmarked by time, and yet not young,
 The honeyed music of her tongue
 And words of meekness scarcely told
 A nature passionate and bold,
 Strong, self-concentrated, spurning guide,
 Its milder features dwarfed beside Her unbent will's majestic pride
 She sat among us, at the best,
 A not unfear'd, half-welcome guest, 520
 Rebuking with her cultured phrase
 Our homeliness of words and ways
 A certain pard-like, treacherous grace Swayed the lithe limbs and dropped the lash,

Lent the white teeth their dazzling flash;
 And under low brows, black with night,
 Rayed out at times a dangerous light;
 The sharp heat-lightnings of her face Presaging ill to him whom Fate Condemned to share her love or hate. 530
 A woman tropical, intense

In thought and act, in soul and sense,
 She blended in a like degree
 The vixen and the devotee, Revealing with each freak or feint
 The temper of Petruchio's Kate,
 The raptures of Siena's saint.
 Her tapering hand and rounded wrist
 Had facile power to form a fist,
 The warm, dark languish of her eyes 540
 Was never safe from wrath's surprise.
 Brows saintly calm and lips devout Knew every change of scowl and pout;
 And the sweet voice had notes more high
 And shrill for social battle-cry.

Since then what old cathedral town
 Has missed her pilgrim staff and gown,
 What convent-gate has held its lock Against the challenge of her knock!
 Through Smyrna's plague-hushed thoroughfares, 550

Up sea-set Malta's rocky stairs,
 Gray olive slopes of hills that hem
 Thy tombs and shrines, Jerusalem,
 Or startling on her desert throne
 The crazy Queen of Lebanon
 With claims fantastic as her own,
 Her tireless feet have held their way;
 And still, unrestful, bowed, and gray,
 She watches under Eastern skies,
 With hope each day renewed and fresh,
 The Lord's quick coming in the flesh, 560 Whereof she dreams and prophesies!

Where'er her troubled path may be,
 The Lord's sweet pity with her go!
 The outward wayward life we see,
 The hidden springs we may not know.
 Nor is it given us to discern What threads the fatal sisters spun,
 Through what ancestral years has run
 The sorrow with the woman born, 570
 What forged her cruel chain of moods,
 What set her feet in solitudes,
 And held the love within her mute,
 What mingled madness in the blood,
 A life-long discord and annoy,
 Water of tears with oil of joy,
 And hid within the folded bud Perversities of flower and fruit.
 It is not ours to separate
 The tangled skein of will and fate, 580 To show what metes and bounds should stand
 Upon the soul's debatable land,

And between choice and Providence
Divide the circle of events;
But He who knows our frame is just,
Merciful and compassionate,
And full of sweet assurances And hope for all the language is,
That He remembereth we are dust!

At last the great logs, crumbling low, 590
Sent out a dull and duller glow,
The bull's-eye watch that hung in view, Ticking its weary circuit through,
Pointed with mutely warning sign
Its black hand to the hour of nine
That sign the pleasant circle broke My uncle ceased his pipe to smoke, Knocked from its bowl the refuse gray,
And laid it tenderly away,
Then roused himself to safely cover 600
The dull red brands with ashes over
And while, with care, our mother laid
The work aside, her steps she stayed One moment, seeking to express Her grateful sense of happiness
For food and shelter, warmth and health,
And love's contentment more than wealth,
With simple wishes (not the weak, Vain prayers which no fulfilment seek,
But such as warm the generous heart, 610 O'er-prompt to do with Heaven its part)
That none might lack, that bitter night,
For bread and clothing, warmth and light

Within our beds awhile we heard
The wind that round the gables roared,
With now and then a ruder shock,
Which made our very bedsteads rock
We heard the loosened clapboards tost,
The board-nails snapping in the frost,
And on us, through the unplastered wall, 620
Felt the light sifted snow-flakes fall
But sleep stole on, as sleep will do When hearts are light and life is new,
Faint and more faint the murmurs grew,
Till in the summer-land of dreams
They softened to the sound of streams,
Low stir of leaves, and dip of oars,
And lapsing waves on quiet shores

Next morn we wakened with the shout
Of merry voices high and clear, 630
And saw the teamsters drawing near To break the drifted highways out Down the long hillside treading slow
We saw the half-buried oxen go,

Shaking the snow from heads uptost,
Their straining nostrils white with frost.
Before our door the straggling team
Drew up, an added team to gain
The elders threshed their hands a-cold, Passed, with the cider-mug, their jokes
From lip to lip, the younger folks 641 Down the loose snow-banks, wrestling, rolled,
Then toiled again the cavalcade
O'er windy hill, through clogged ravine,
And woodland paths that wound between Low drooping pine-boughs winter-weighted
From every barn a team afoot,
At every house a new recruit,
Where, drawn by Nature's subtle law
Haply the watchful young men saw 650
Sweet doorway pictures of the curls
And curious eyes of merry girls, Lifting their hands in mock defence
Against the snow-ball's compliments,
And reading in each missive tost
The charm with Eden never lost

We heard once more the sleigh-bells'
sound;
And, following where the teamsters led,
The wise old Doctor went his round,
Just pausing at our door to say, 660
In the brief autocratic way
Of one who, prompt at Duty's call,
Was free to urge her claim on all,
That some poor neighbor sick abed
At night our mother's aid would need
For, one in generous thought and deed,
What mattered in the sufferer's sight
The Quaker matron's inward light,
The Doctor's mail of Calvin's creed?
All hearts confess the saints elect 670
Who, twain in faith, in love agree,
And melt not in an acid sect
The Christian pearl of charity!

So days went on a week had passed Since the great world was heard from last.
The Almanac we studied o'er,
Read and reread our little store
Of books and pamphlets, scarce a score,
One harmless novel, mostly hid
From younger eyes, a book forbid, 680
And poetry, (or good or bad, A single book was all we had.)
Where Ellwood's meek, drab-skirted Muse,
A stranger to the heathen Nine,
Sang, with a somewhat nasal whine,

The wars of David and the Jews
 At last the floundering carrier bore
 The village paper to our door,
 Lo! broadening outward as we read,
 To warmer zones the horizon spread, 690
 In panoramic length unrolled
 We saw the marvels that it told.
 Before us passed the painted Creeks,
 And daft McGregor on his raids
 In Costa Rica's everglades
 And up Taygetos winding slow Rode Ypsilanti's Mainote Greeks,
 A Turk's head at each saddle-bow!
 Welcome to us its week-old news,
 Its corner for the rustic Muse, 700
 Its monthly gauge of snow and rain,
 Its record, mingling in a breath
 The wedding bell and dirge of death;
 Jest, anecdote, and love-lorn tale,
 The latest culprit sent to jail,
 Its hue and cry of stolen and lost,
 Its vendue sales and goods at cost,
 And traffic calling loud for gain.
 We felt the stir of hall and street,
 The pulse of life that round us beat, 710
 The chill embargo of the snow
 Was melted in the genial glow,
 Wide swung again our ice-locked door,
 And all the world was ours once more!

Clasp, Angel of the backward look
 And folded wings of ashen gray
 And voice of echoes far away,
 The brazen covers of thy book,
 The weird palimpsest old and vast, 720
 Wherein thou hid'st the spectral past,
 Where, closely mingling, pale and glow
 The characters of joy and woe,
 The monographs of outlived years,
 Or smile-illumed or dim with tears,
 Green hills of life that slope to death,
 And haunts of home, whose vistaed trees
 Shade off to mournful cypresses
 With the white amaranths underneath
 Even while I look, I can but heed
 The restless sands' incessant fall, 730
 Importunate hours that hours succeed,
 Each clamorous with its own sharp need,
 And duty keeping pace with all.
 Shut down and clasp the heavy lids,
 I hear again the voice that bids
 The dreamer leave his dream midway
 For larger hopes and graver fears Life greatens in these later years,
 The century's aloe flowers to-day!

Yet, haply, in some lull of life, 740 Some Truce of God which breaks its
 strife,
 The worldling's eyes shall gather dew,
 Dreaming in throngful city ways
 Of winter joys his boyhood knew,
 And dear and early friends—the few Who yet remain—shall pause to view
 These Flemish pictures of old days;
 Sit with me by the homestead hearth,
 And stretch the hands of memory forth To warm them at the wood-fire's blaze! 750
 And thanks untraced to lips unknown
 Shall greet me like the odors blown From unseen meadows newly mown,
 Or lilies floating in some pond,
 Wood-fringed, the wayside gaze beyond;
 The traveller owns the grateful sense
 Of sweetness near, he knows not whence,
 And, pausing, takes with forehead bare
 The benediction of the air.

OUR MASTER

IMMORTAL Love, forever full,
 Forever flowing free,
 Forever shared, forever whole,
 A never-ebbing sea!
 Our outward lips confess the name
 All other names above,
 Love only knoweth whence it came,
 And comprehendeth love
 Blow, winds of God, awake and blow
 The mists of earth away! 10 Shine out, O Light Divine, and show
 How wide and far we stray!
 Hush every lip, close every book,
 The strife of tongues forbear;
 Why forward reach, or backward look,
 For love that clasps like air?
 We may not climb the heavenly steepes
 To bring the Lord Christ down.
 In vain we search the lowest deeps,
 For Him no depths can drown 20
 Nor holy bread, nor blood of grape,
 The lineaments restore
 Of Him we know in outward shape
 And in the flesh no more.

He cometh not a king to reign,
The world's long hope is dim,
The weary centuries watch in vain
The clouds of heaven for Him

Death comes, life goes, the asking eye
And ear are answerless, 30
The grave is dumb, the hollow sky
Is sad with silentness

The letter fails, and systems fall,
And every symbol wanes,
The Spirit over-brooding all Eternal Love remains

And not for signs in heaven above
Or earth below they look,
Who know with John His smile of love,
With Peter His rebuke. 40

In joy of inward peace, or sense
Of sorrow over sin,
He is His own best evidence,
His witness is within

No fable old, nor mythic lore,
Nor dream of bards and seers,
No dead fact stranded on the shore
Of the oblivious years,—

But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
A present help is He, 50
And faith has still its Olivet,
And love its Galilee

The healing of His seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain,
We touch Him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again

Through Him the first fond prayers are said
Our lips of childhood frame,
The last low whispers of our dead
Are burdened with His name. 60

Our Lord and Master of us all Whate'er our name or sign,
We own Thy sway, we hear Thy call,
We test our lives by Thine

Thou judgest us, Thy purity Doth all our lusts condemn;
The love that draws us nearer Thee
Is hot with wrath to them

Our thoughts lie open to Thy sight;
And, naked to Thy glance, 70
Our secret sins are in the light Of Thy pure countenance

Thy healing pains, a keen distress Thy tender light shines in,
Thy sweetness is the bitterness,
Thy grace the pang of sin

Yet, weak and blinded though we be,
Thou dost our service own,
We bring our varying gifts to Thee,
And Thou rejectest none 80

To Thee our full humanity,
Its joys and pains, belong,
The wrong of man to man on Thee
Inflicts a deeper wrong.

Who hates, hates Thee, who loves becomes Therein to Thee allied,
All sweet accords of hearts and homes
In Thee are multiplied

Deep strike Thy roots, O heavenly Vine,
Within our earthly sod, 90
Most human and yet most divine,
The flower of man and God!

O Love! O Life! Our faith and sight
Thy presence maketh one
As through transfigured clouds of white
We trace the noon-day sun

So, to our mortal eyes subdued, Flesh-veiled, but not concealed,
We know in Thee the fatherhood
And heart of God revealed 100

We faintly hear, we dimly see,
In differing phrase we pray,
But, dim or clear, we own in Thee
The Light, the Truth, the Way!

The homage that we render Thee
Is still our Father's own,
No jealous claim or rivalry Divides the Cross and Throne

To do Thy will is more than praise,
As words are less than deeds, 110
And simple trust can find Thy ways
We miss with chart of creeds

No pride of self Thy service hath,
 No place for me and mine,
 Our human strength is weakness, death
 Our life, apart from Thine

Apart from Thee all gain is loss,
 All labor vainly done,
 The solemn shadow of Thy Cross
 Is better than the sun

Alone, O Love ineffable!
 Thy saving name is given,
 To turn aside from Thee is hell,
 To walk with Thee is heaven!

How vain, secure in all Thou art,
 Our noisy championship!
 The sighing of the contrite heart
 Is more than flattering lip

Not Thine the bigot's partial plea,
 Nor Thine the zealot's ban, Thou well canst spare a love of Thee
 Which ends in hate of man

Our Friend, our Brother, and our Lord, What may Thy service be?—
 Nor name, nor form, nor ritual word,
 But simply following Thee

We bring no ghastly holocaust,
 We pile no graven stone,
 He serves thee best who loveth most His brothers and Thy own.

Thy litanies, sweet offices
 Of love and gratitude;
 Thy sacramental liturgies,
 The joy of doing good

In vain shall waves of incense drift
 The vaulted nave around,
 In vain the minster turret lift
 Its brazen weights of sound

The heart must ring Thy Christmas bells, Thy inward altars raise,
 Its faith and hope Thy canticles,
 And its obedience praise!

THE PRESSED GENTIAN

THE time of gifts has come again,
 And, on my northern window-pane,

Outlined against the day's brief light,
 A Christmas token hangs in sight
 The wayside travellers, as they pass,
 Mark the gray disk of clouded glass,
 And the dull blankness seems, perchance,
 Folly to their wise ignorance

They cannot from their outlook see
 The perfect grace it hath for me,
 For there the flower, whose fringes through The frosty breath of autumn blew, Turns from without its face of bloom
 To the warm tropic of my room,
 As fair as when beside its brook
 The hue of bending skies it took.

So from the trodden ways of earth, Seem some sweet souls who veil their worth,

And offer to the careless glance
 The clouding gray of circumstance
 They blossom best where hearth-fires burn,
 To loving eyes alone they turn
 The flowers of inward grace, that hide
 Their beauty from the world outside

But deeper meanings come to me,
 My half-immortal flower, from thee!
 Man judges from a partial view,
 None ever yet his brother knew,
 The Eternal Eye that sees the whole
 May better read the darkened soul,
 And find, to outward sense denied,
 The flower upon its inmost side!

FROM THE BREWING OF SOMA

DEAR Lord and Father of mankind,
 Forgive our foolish ways!
 Reclothe us in our rightful mind,
 In purer lives Thy service find,
 In deeper reverence, praise

In simple trust like theirs who heard Beside the Syrian sea
 The gracious calling of the Lord,
 Let us, like them, without a word,
 Rise up and follow Thee.

O Sabbath rest by Galilee!
 O calm of hills above,
 Where Jesus knelt to share with Thee
 The silence of eternity Interpreted by love!

With that deep hush subduing all
 Our words and works that drown
 The tender whisper of Thy call,
 As noiseless let Thy blessing fall
 As fell Thy manna down.

Drop Thy still dews of quietness,
 Till all our strivings cease, Take from our souls the strain and stress,

And let our ordered lives confess
 The beauty of Thy peace.

80

Breathe through the heats of our desire Thy coolness and Thy balm, Let sense be dumb, let flesh retire, Speak through the earthquake, wind, and
 fire,
 O still, small voice of calm!

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL

1819-1891

ON A CERTAIN CONDESCENSION IN FOREIGNERS

WALKING one day toward the Village, as we used to call it in the good old days, when almost every dweller in the town had been born in it, I was enjoying that delicious sense of disenthralment from the actual which the deepening twilight brings with it, giving as it does a sort of obscure novelty to things familiar. The coolness, the hush, broken only by the distant bleat of some belated goat, querulous to be disburthened of her mulky load, the few faint stars, more guessed as yet than seen, the sense that the coming dark would so soon fold me in the secure privacy of its disguise,—all things combined in a result as near absolute peace as can be hoped for by a man who knows that there is a writ out against him in the hands of the printer's devil. For the moment, I was enjoying the blessed privilege of thinking without being called on to stand and deliver what I thought to the small public who are good enough to take any interest therein. I love old ways, and the path I was walking felt kindly to the feet it had known for almost fifty years. How many fleeting impressions it had shared with me! How many times I had lingered to study the shadows of the leaves mezzotinted upon the turf that edged it by the moon, of the bare boughs etched with a touch beyond Rembrandt by the same unconscious artist on the smooth page of snow! If I turned round, through dusky tree-gaps came the first twinkle of evening lamps in the dear old homestead. On Corev's hill I could see these tiny pharoses of love and home and sweet domestic thoughts flash out one by one across the blackening salt-meadow between. How much has not kerosene added to the cheerfulness of our evening landscape! A pair of night-herons flapped heavily over me toward the hidden river. The war was ended. I might walk townward without that aching dread of bulletins that had darkened the July sunshine and twice made the scarlet leaves of October seem stained with blood. I remembered with a pang, half-proud, half-painful, how, so many years ago, I had walked over the same path and felt round my finger the soft pressure of a little hand that was one day to harden with faithful grip of sabre. On how many paths, leading to how many homes where proud Memory does all she can to fill up the fireside gaps with shining shapes, must not men be walking in just such pensive mood as I? Ah, young heroes, safe in immortal youth as those of Homer, you at least carried your ideal hence untarnished! It is locked for you beyond moth or rust in the treasure-chamber of Death.

Is not a country, I thought, that has had such as they in it, that could give such as they a brave joy in dying for it, worth something, then? And as I felt more and more the soothing magic of evening's cool palm upon my temples, as my fancy came home from its reverie, and my senses, with reawakened curiosity, ran to the front windows again from the viewless closet of abstraction, and felt a strange charm in finding the old tree and shabby fence still there under the travesty of falling night, nay, were conscious of an unsuspected newness in familiar stars and the fading outlines of hills my earliest horizon, I was conscious of an immortal soul, and could not but rejoice in the unwaning goodliness of the world into which I had been born without any merit of my own. I thought of dear Henry Vaughan's rainbow, 'Still young and fine' I remembered people who had to go over to the Alps to learn what the divine silence of snow was, who must run to Italy before they were conscious of the miracle wrought every day under their very noses by the sunset, who must call upon the Berkshire hills to teach them what a painter autumn was, while close at hand the Fresh Pond meadows made all orriels cheap with hues that showed as if a sunset-cloud had been wrecked among their maples. One might be worse off than even in America, I thought. There are some things so elastic that even the heavy roller of democracy cannot flatten them altogether down. The mind can weave itself warmly in the cocoon of its own thoughts and dwell a hermit anywhere. A country without traditions, without ennobling associations, a scramble of parvenus, with a horrible consciousness of shoddy running through politics, manners, art, literature, nay, religion itself? I confess, it did not seem so to me there in that illimitable quiet, that serene self-possession of nature, where Collins might have brooded his 'Ode to Evening,' or where those verses on Solitude in Dodsley's Collection, that Hawthorne liked so much, might have been composed. Traditions? Granting that we had none, all that is worth having in them is the common property of the soul,—an estate in gavel-kind for all the sons of Adam,—and, moreover, if a man cannot stand on his two feet (the prime quality of whoever has left any tradition behind him), were it not better for him to be honest about it at once, and go down on all fours? And for associations, if one have not the wit to make them for himself out of native earth, no ready-made ones of other men will avail much. Lexington is none the worse to me for not being in Greece, nor Gettysburg that its name is not Marathon. 'Blessed old fields,' I was just exclaiming to myself, like one of Mrs. Radcliffe's heroes, 'dear acres, innocently secure from history, which these eyes first beheld, may you be also those to which they shall at last slowly darken!' when I was interrupted by a voice which asked me in German whether I was the Herr Professor, Doctor, So-and-so? The 'Doctor' was by brevet or vaticination, to make the grade easier to my pocket.

One feels so intimately assured that one is made up, in part, of shreds and leavings of the past, in part of the interpolations of other people, that an honest man would be slow in saying yes to such a question. But 'my name is So-and-so' is a safe answer, and I gave it. While I had been romancing with myself, the street-lamps had been lighted, and it was under one of these detectives that have robbed the Old Road of its privilege of sanctuary after nightfall that I was ambushed by my foe. The inexorable villain had taken my description, it appears, that I might have the less chance to escape him. Dr. Holmes tells us that we change our substance, not every seven years, as was once believed, but with every breath we draw. Why had I not the wit to avail myself of the subterfuge, and, like Peter, to renounce my identity, especially, as in certain moods of mine, I have often more than doubted of it myself? When a man is, as it were, his own front-door, and is thus knocked at, why may he not assume the right of that sacred wood to make every house a castle, by denying himself to all visitations? I was truly not at home when the question was put to me, but had to recall myself from all out-of-doors, and to piece my self-consciousness hastily together as well as I could before I answered it.

I knew perfectly well what was coming. It is seldom that debtors or good Samaritans waylay people under gas-lamps in order to force money upon them, so far as I have seen or heard. I was also aware, from considerable experience, that every foreigner is persuaded that, by doing this country the favor of coming to it, he has laid every native thereof under an obligation, pecuniary or other, as the case may be, whose discharge he is entitled to on demand duly made in person or by letter. Too much learning (of this kind) had made me mad in the provincial sense of the word. I had begun life with the theory of giving something to every beggar that came along, though sure of never finding a native-born countryman among them. In a small way, I was resolved to emulate Hatem Tai's tent, with its three hundred and sixty-five entrances, one for every day in the year,—I know not whether he was astronomer enough to add another for leap-years. The beggars were a kind of German-silver aristocracy, not real plate, to be sure, but better than nothing. Where everybody was overworked, they supplied the comfortable equipose of absolute leisure, so aesthetically needful. Besides, I was but too conscious of a vagrant fibre in myself, which too often thrilled me in my solitary walks with the temptation to wander on into infinite space, and by a single spasm of resolution to emancipate myself from the drudgery of prosaic serfdom to respectability and the regular course of things. This prompting has been at times my familiar demon, and I could not but feel a kind of respectful sympathy for men who had dared what I had only sketched out to myself as a splendid possibility. For seven years I helped maintain one heroic man on an imaginary journey to Portland,—as fine an example as I have ever known of hopeless loyalty to an ideal. I assisted another so long in a fruitless attempt to reach Mecklenburg-Schwerin, that at last we grinned in each other's faces when we met, like a couple of augurs. He was possessed by this harmless mania as some are by the North Pole, and I shall never forget his look of regretful compassion (as for one who was sacrificing his higher life to the fleshpots of Egypt) when I at last advised him somewhat strenuously to go to the D—, whither the road was so much travelled that he could not miss it. General Banks, in his noble zeal for the honor of his country, would confer on the Secretary of State the power of imprisoning, in case of war, all these seekers of the unattainable, thus by a stroke of the pen annihilating the single poetic element in our humdrum life. Alas! not everybody has the genius to be a Bobbin-Boy, or doubtless all these also would have chosen that more prosperous line of life! But moralists, sociologists, political economists, and taxes have slowly convinced me that my beggarly sympathies were a sin against society. Especially was the Buckle doctrine of averages (so flattering to our free-will) persuasive with me; for as there must be in every year a certain number who would bestow an alms on these abridged editions of the Wandering Jew, the withdrawal of my quota could make no possible difference, since some destined proxy must always step forward to fill my gap. Just so many misdirected letters every year and no more! Would it were as easy to reckon up the number of men on whose backs fate has written the wrong address, so that they arrive by mistake in Congress and other places where they do not belong! May not these wanderers of whom I speak have been sent into the world without any proper address at all? Where is our Dead-Letter Office for such? And if wiser social arrangements should furnish us with something of the sort, fancy (horrible thought!) how many a workingman's friend (a kind of industry in which the labor is light and the wages heavy) would be sent thither because not called for in the office where he at present lies!

But I am leaving my new acquaintance too long under the lamp-post. The same Gano which had betrayed me to him revealed to me a well-set young man of about half my own age, as well dressed, so far as I could see, as I was, and with every natural qualification for getting his own livelihood as good, if not better, than my own. He had been reduced to the painful necessity of calling upon me by a series of crosses beginning with the Baden Revolution (for which, I own, he seemed rather young,—but perhaps he referred to a kind of revolution practised every season at Baden-Baden), continued by repeated failures in business, for amounts which must convince me of his entire respectability, and ending with our Civil War. During the latter, he had served with distinction as a soldier, taking a main part in every important battle, with a rapid list of which he favored me, and no doubt would have admitted that, impartial as Jonathan Wild's great ancestor, he had been on both sides, had I baited him with a few hints of conservative opinions on a subject so distressing to a gentleman wishing to profit by one's sympathy and unhappily doubtful as to which way it might lean. For all these reasons, and, as he seemed to imply, for his merit in consenting to be born in Germany, he considered himself my natural creditor to the extent of five dollars, which he would handsomely consent to accept in greenbacks, though he preferred specie. The offer was certainly a generous one, and the claim presented with an assurance that carried conviction. But, unhappily, I had been led to remark a curious natural phenomenon. If I was ever weak enough to give anything to a petitioner of whatever nationality, it always rained decayed compatriots of his for a month after. Post hoc ergo propter hoc<sup>1</sup> may not always be safe logic, but here I seemed to perceive a natural connection of cause and effect. Now, a few days before I had been so tickled with a paper (professedly written by a benevolent American clergyman) certifying that the bearer, a hard-working German, had long 'sofered with rheumatic paints in his limps,' that, after copying the passage into my note-book, I thought it but fair to pay a trifling honorarium to the author. I had pulled the string of the shower-bath! It had been running shipwrecked sailors for some time, but forthwith it began to pour Teutons, redolent of lager-bier. I could not help associating the apparition of my new friend with this series of otherwise unaccountable phenomena. I accordingly made up my mind to deny the debt, and modestly did so, pleading a native bias towards impecuniosity to the full as strong as his own. He took a high tone with me at once, such as an honest man would naturally take with a confessed repudiator. He even brought down his proud stomach so far as to join himself to me for the rest of my townward walk, that he might give me his views of the American people, and thus inclusively of myself.

I know not whether it is because I am pigeon-livered and lack gall, or whether it is from an overmastering sense of drollery, but I am apt to submit to such bastings with a patience which afterwards surprises me, being not without my share of warmth in the blood. Perhaps it is because I so often meet with young persons who know vastly more than I do, and especially with so many foreigners whose knowledge of this country is superior to my own. However it may be, I listened for some time with tolerable composure as my self-appointed lecturer gave me in detail his opinions of my country and its people. America, he informed me, was without arts, science, literature, culture, or any native hope of supplying them. We were a people wholly given to money-getting, and who, having got it, knew no other use for it than to hold it fast. I am fain to confess that I felt a sensible itching of the biceps, and that my fingers closed with such a grip as he had just informed me was one of the effects of our unhappy climate. But happening just then to be where I could avoid temptation by dodging down a by-street, I hastily left him to finish his diatribe to the lamp-post, which could stand it better than I. That young man will never know how near he came to being assaulted by a respectable gentleman of middle age, at the corner of Church Street. I have never felt quite satisfied that I did all my duty by him in not knocking him down. But perhaps he might have knocked me down, and then?

The capacity of indignation makes an essential part of the outfit of every honest man, but I am inclined to doubt whether he is a wise one who allows himself to act upon its first hints. It should be rather, I suspect, a latent heat in the blood, which makes itself felt in character, a steady reserve for the brain, warming the ovum of thought to life, rather than cooking it by a too hasty enthusiasm in reaching the boiling-point. As my pulse gradually fell back to its normal beat, I reflected that I had been uncomfortably near making a fool of myself,—a handy salve of euphuism for our vanity, though it does not always make a just allowance to Nature for her share in the business. What possible claim had my Teutonic friend to rob me of my composure? I am not, I think, specially thin-skinned as to other people's opinions of myself, having, as I conceive, later and fuller intelligence on that point than anybody else can give me. Life is continually weighing us in very sensitive scales, and telling every one of us precisely what his real weight is to the last grain of dust. Whoever at fifty does not rate himself quite as low as most of his acquaintance would be likely to put him, must be either a fool or a great man, and I humbly disclaim being either. But if I was not smarting in person from any scattering shot of my late companion's commination, why should I grow hot at any implication of my country therein? Surely her shoulders are broad enough, if yours or mine are not, to bear up under a considerable avalanche of this kind. It is the bit of truth in every slander, the hint of likeness in every caricature, that makes us smart 'Art thou there, old Truepenny?' How did your blade know its way so well to that one loose rivet in our armor? I wondered whether Americans were over-sensitive in this respect, whether they were more touchy than other folks. On the whole, I thought we were not Plutarch, who at least had studied philosophy, if he had not mastered it, could not stomach something Herodotus had said of Boeotia, and devoted an essay to showing up the delightful old traveller's malice and ill-breeding. French editors leave out of Montaigne's Travels some remarks of his about France, for reasons best known to themselves. Pachydermatous Deutschland, covered with trophies from every field of letters, still winces under that question which Père Bouhours put two centuries ago, Si un Allemand peut être bel-esprit?<sup>1</sup> John Bull grew apoplectic with angry amazement at the audacious persiflage of Puckler-Muskau. To be sure, he was a prince,—but that was not all of it, for a chance phrase of gentle Hawthorne sent a spasm through all the journals of England. Then this tenderness is not peculiar to us? Console yourself, dear man and brother, whatever else you may be sure of, be sure at least of this, that you are dreadfully like other people. Human nature has a much greater genius for sameness than for originality, or the world would be at a sad pass shortly. The surprising thing is that men have such a taste for this somewhat musty flavor, that an Englishman, for example, should feel himself defrauded, nay, even outraged, when he comes over here and finds a people speaking what he admits to be something like English, and yet so very different from (or, as he would say, to) those he left at home. Nothing, I am sure, equals my thankfulness when I meet an Englishman who is not like every other, or,

1 'Can a German have true wit?'

I may add, an American of the same odd turn.

Certainly it is no shame to a man that he should be as nice about his country as about his sweetheart, and who ever heard even the friendliest appreciation of that unexpressive she that did not seem to fall infinitely short? Yet it would hardly be wise to hold every one an enemy who could not see her with our own enchanted eyes. It seems to be the common opinion of foreigners that Americans are too tender upon this point. Perhaps we are, and if so, there must be a reason for it. Have we had fair play? Could the eyes of what is called Good Society (though it is so seldom true either to the adjective or noun) look upon a nation of democrats with any chance of receiving an undistorted image? Were not those, moreover, who found in the old order of things an earthly paradise, paying them quarterly dividends for the wisdom of their ancestors, with the punctuality of the seasons, unconsciously bribed to misunderstand if not to misrepresent us? Whether at war or at peace, there we were, a standing menace to all earthly paradises of that kind, fatal underminers of the very credit on which the dividends were based, all the more hateful and terrible that our destructive agency was so insidious, working invisible in the elements, as it seemed, active while they slept, and coming upon them in the darkness like an armed man. Could Larus have the proper feelings of a father towards Œdipus, announced as his destined destroyer by infallible oracles, and felt to be such by every conscious fibre of his soul? For more than a century the Dutch were the laughing-stock of polite Europe. They were butter-firkins, swillers of beer and schnaps, and their vrouws from whom Holbein painted the all-but loveliest of Madonnas, Rembrandt the graceful girl who sits immortal on his knee in Dresden, and Rubens his abounding goddesses, were the synonymes of clumsy vulgarity. Even so late as Irving the ships of the greatest navigators in the world were represented as sailing equally well stern-foremost. That the aristocratic Venetians should have

'Riveted with gigantic piles Thorough the centre their new-catched miles,'

was heroic. But the far more marvellous achievement of the Dutch in the same kind was ludicrous even to republican Marvell. Meanwhile, during that very century of scorn, they were the best artists, sailors, merchants, bankers, printers, scholars, jurisconsults, and statesmen in Europe, and the genius of Motley has revealed them to us, earning a right to themselves by the most heroic struggle in human annals. But, alas! they were not merely simple burghers who had fairly made themselves High Mightinesses, and could treat on equal terms with anointed kings, but their commonwealth carried in its bosom the germs of democracy. They even unmuzzled, at least after dark, that dreadful mastiff, the Press, whose scent is, or ought to be, so keen for wolves in sheep's clothing and for certain other animals in lions' skins. They made fun of Sacred Majesty, and, what was worse, managed uncommonly well without it. In an age when periwigs made so large a part of the natural dignity of man, people with such a turn of mind were dangerous. How could they seem other than vulgar and hateful?

In the natural course of things we succeeded to this unenviable position of general butt. The Dutch had thriven under it pretty well, and there was hope that we could at least contrive to worry along. And we certainly did in a very redoubtable fashion. Perhaps we deserved some of the sarcasm more than our Dutch predecessors in office. We had nothing to boast of in arts or letters, and were given to bragging overmuch of our merely material prosperity, due quite as much to the virtue of our continent as to our own. There was some truth in Carlyle's sneer, after all. Till we had succeeded in some higher way than this, we had only the success of physical growth. Our greatness, like that of enormous Russia, was greatness on the map,—barbarian mass only, but had we gone down, like that other Atlantis, in some vast cataclysm, we should have covered but a pin's point on the chart of memory, compared with those ideal spaces occupied by tiny Attica and cramped England. At the same time, our critics somewhat too easily forgot that material must make ready the foundation for ideal triumphs, that the arts have no chance in poor countries. But it must be allowed that democracy stood for a great deal in our shortcoming. The Edinburgh Review never would have thought of asking, 'Who reads a Russian book?' and England was satisfied with iron from Sweden without being impudently inquisitive after her painters and statuaries. Was it that they expected too much from the mere miracle of Freedom? Is it not the highest art of a Republic to make men of flesh and blood, and not the marble ideals of such? It may be fairly doubted whether we have produced this higher type of man yet. Perhaps it is the collective, not the individual, humanity that is to have a chance of nobler development among us. We shall see. We have a vast amount of imported ignorance, and, still worse, of native ready-made knowledge, to digest before even the preliminaries of such a consummation can be arranged. We have got to learn that statesmanship is the most complicated of all arts, and to come back to the apprenticeship-system too hastily abandoned. At present, we trust a man with making constitutions on less proof of competence than we should demand before we gave him our shoe to patch. We have nearly reached the limit of the reaction from the old notion, which paid too much regard to birth and station as qualifications for office, and have touched the extreme point in the opposite direction, putting the highest of human functions up at auction to be bid for by any creature capable of going upright on two legs. In some places, we have arrived at a point at which civil society is no longer possible, and already another reaction has begun, not backwards to the old system, but towards fitness either from natural aptitude or special training. But will it always be safe to let evils work their own cure by becoming unendurable? Every one of them leaves its taint in the constitution of the body-politic, each in itself, perhaps, trifling, yet all together powerful for evil.

But whatever we might do or leave undone, we were not genteel, and it was uncomfortable to be continually reminded that, though we should boast that we were the Great West till we were black in the face, it did not bring us an inch nearer to the world's West-End. That sacred enclosure of respectability was tabooed to us.

The Holy Alliance did not inscribe us on its visiting-list. The Old World of wigs and orders and liveries would shop with us, but we must ring at the area-bell, and not venture to awaken the more august clamors of the knocker. Our manners, it must be granted, had none of those graces that stamp the caste of Vere de Vere, in whatever museum of British antiquities they may be hidden. In short, we were vulgar.

This was one of those horribly vague accusations, the victim of which has no defence. An umbrella is of no avail against a Scotch mist. It envelops you, it penetrates at every pore, it wets you through without seeming to wet you at all. Vulgarity is an eighth deadly sin, added to the list in these latter days, and worse than all the others put together, since it perils your salvation in this world,—far the more important of the two in the minds of most men. It profits nothing to draw nice distinctions between essential and conventional, for the convention in this case is the essence, and you may break every command of the decalogue with perfect good-breeding, nay, if you are adroit, without losing caste. We, indeed, had it not to lose, for we had never gained it. 'How am I vulgar?' asks the culprit, shudderingly. 'Because thou art not like unto Us,' answers Lucifer, Son of the Morning, and there is no more to be said. The god of this world may be a fallen angel, but he has us there! We were as clean,—so far as my observation goes, I think we were cleaner, morally and physically, than the English, and therefore, of course, than everybody else. But we did not pronounce the diphthong ou as they did, and we said eether and not eyther, following therein the fashion of our ancestors, who unhappily could bring over no English better than Shakespeare's, and we did not stammer as they had learned to do from the courtiers, who in this way flattered the Hanoverian king, a foreigner among the people he had come to reign over. Worse than all, we might have the noblest ideas and the finest sentiments in the world, but we vented them through that organ by which men are led rather than leaders, though some physiologists would persuade us that Nature furnishes her captains with a fine handle to their faces that Opportunity may get a good purchase on them for dragging them to the front.

This state of things was so painful that excellent people were not wanting who gave their whole genius to reproducing here the original Bull, whether by garters, the cut of their whiskers, by a factitious brutality in their tone, or by an accent that was forever tripping and falling flat over the tangled roots of our common tongue. Martyrs to a false ideal, it never occurred to them that nothing is more hateful to gods and men than a second-rate Englishman, and for the very reason that this planet never produced a more splendid creature than the first-rate one, witness Shakespeare and the Indian Mutiny. Witness that truly sublime self-abnegation of those prisoners lately among the bandits of Greece, where average men gave an example of quiet fortitude for which all the stoicism of antiquity can show no match. Witness the wreck of the Birkenhead, an example of disciplined heroism, perhaps the most precious, as the rarest, of all. If we could contrive to be not too unobtrusively our simple selves, we should be the most delightful of human beings, and the most original, whereas, when the plating of Anglicism rubs off, as it always will in points that come to much wear, we are liable to very unpleasing conjectures about the quality of the metal underneath. Perhaps one reason why the average Briton spreads himself here with such an easy air of superiority may be owing to the fact that he meets with so many bad imitations as to conclude himself the only real thing in a wilderness of shams. He fancies himself moving through an endless Bloomsbury, where his mere apparition confers honor as an avatar of the court-end of the universe. Not a Bull of them all but is persuaded he bears Europa upon his back. This is the sort of fellow whose patronage is so divertingly insufferable. Thank Heaven he is not the only specimen of cater-cousinship from the dear old Mother Island that is shown to us! Among genuine things, I know nothing more genuine than the better men whose limbs were made in England. So manly-tender, so brave, so true, so warranted to wear, they make us proud to feel that blood is thicker than water.

But it is not merely the Englishman, every European candidly admits in himself some right of primogeniture in respect of us, and pats this shaggy continent on the back with a lively sense of generous unbending. The German who plays the bass-viol has a well-founded contempt, which he is not always nice in concealing, for a country so few of whose children ever take that noble instrument between their knees. His cousin, the Ph D from Gottingen, cannot help despising a people who do not grow loud and red over Aryans and Turanians, and are indifferent about their descent from either. The Frenchman feels an easy mastery in speaking his mother tongue, and attributes it to some native superiority or parts that lifts him high above us barbarians of the West. The Italian prima donna sweeps a curtsy of careless pity to the over-facile pit which unsexes her with the bravo! innocently meant to show a familiarity with foreign usage. But all without exception make no secret of regarding us as the goose bound to deliver them a golden egg in return for their cackle. Such men as Agassiz, Guyot, and Goldwin Smith come with gifts in their hands, but since it is commonly European failures who bring hither their remarkable gifts and acquirements, this view of the case is sometimes just the least bit in the world provoking. To think what a delicious seclusion of contempt we enjoyed till California and our own ostentatious parvenus, flinging gold away in Europe that might have endowed libraries at home, gave us the ill repute of riches! What a shabby downfall from the Arcadia which the French officers of our Revolutionary War fancied they saw here through Rousseau-tinted spectacles! Something of Arcadia there really was, something of the Old Age, and that divine provincialism were cheaply repurchased could we have it back again in exchange for the tawdry upholstery that has taken its place.

For some reason or other, the European has rarely been able to see America except in caricature. Would the first Review of the world have printed the mauseries of M. Maurice Sand as a picture of society in any civilized country? M. Sand, to be sure, has inherited nothing of his famous mother's literary outfit, except the pseudonym. But since the conductors of the Revue could not have published his story because it was clever, they must have thought it valuable for its truth. As true as the last-century Englishman's picture of Jean Crapaud! We do not ask to be sprinkled with rosewater, but may perhaps fairly protest against being drenched with the rinsings of an unclean imagination. The next time the Revue allows such ill-bred persons to throw their slops out of its first-floor windows, let it honestly preface the discharge with a gare l'eau!<sup>1</sup> that we may run from under in season. And M. Duvergier de Hauranne, who knows how to be entertaining! I know that le Français est plutôt indiscret que confiant,<sup>2</sup> and the pen slides too easily when indiscretions will fetch so much a page, but should we not have been tant-soit-peu<sup>3</sup> more cautious had we been writing about people on the other side of the Channel? But then it is a fact in the natural history of the American long familiar to Europeans, that he abhors privacy, knows not the meaning of reserve, lives in hotels because of their greater publicity, and is never so pleased as when his domestic affairs (if he may be said to have any) are paraded in the newspapers. Barnum, it is well known, represents perfectly the average national sentiment in this respect. However it be, we are not treated like other people, or perhaps I should say like people who are ever likely to be met with in society.

Is it in the climate? Either I have a false notion of European manners, or else the atmosphere affects them strangely when exported hither. Perhaps they suffer from the sea-voyage like some of the more delicate wines. During our Civil War an English gentleman of the highest description was kind enough to call upon me, mainly, as it seemed, to inform me how entirely he sympathized with the Confederates, and how sure he felt that we could never subdue them,—‘they were the gentlemen of the country, you know.’ Another, the first greetings hardly over, asked me how I accounted for the universal meagerness of my countrymen. To a thinner man than I, or from a stouter man than he, the question might have been offensive. The Marquis of Hartington<sup>1</sup> wore a secession badge at a public ball in New York. In a civilized country he might have been roughly handled, but here, where the bien-séances are not so well understood, of course nobody minded it. A French traveller told me he had been a good deal in the British colonies, and had been astonished to see how soon the people became Americanized. He added, with delightful bonhomie, and as if he were sure it would charm me, that 'they even began to talk through their noses, just like you!' I was naturally ravished with this testimony to the assimilating power of democracy, and could only reply that I hoped they would never adopt our democratic patent-method of seeming to settle one's honest debts, for they would find it paying through the nose in the long-run. I am a man of the New World, and do not know precisely the present fashion of May-Fair, but I have a kind of feeling that if an American (mutato nomine, de te<sup>2</sup> is always frightfully possible) were to do this kind of thing under a European roof, it would induce some disagreeable reflections as to the ethical results of democracy. I read the other day in print the remark of a British tourist who had eaten large quantities of our salt, such as it is (I grant it has not the European savor), that the Americans were hospitable, no doubt, but that it was partly because they longed for foreign visitors to relieve the tedium of their dead-level existence, and partly from ostentation. What shall we do? Shall we close our doors? Not I, for one, if I should so have forfeited the friendship of L.S.,<sup>3</sup> most lovable of men. He somehow seems to find us human, at least, and so did Clough, whose poetry will one of these days, perhaps, be found to have been the best utterance in verse of this generation. And T.H.,<sup>4</sup> the mere grasp of whose manly hand carries with it the pledge of frankness and friendship, of an abiding simplicity of nature as affecting as it is rare!

The fine old Tory aversion of former times was not hard to bear. There was something even refreshing in it, as in a northeaster to a hardy temperament. When a British parson, travelling in Newfoundland while the slash of our separation was still raw, after prophesying a glorious future for an island that continued to dry its fish under the ægis of Saint George, glances disdainfully over his spectacles in parting at the U.S.A., and forebodes for them a 'speedy relapse into barbarism,' now that they have madly cut themselves off from the humanizing influences of Britain, I smile with barbarian self-conceit.

But this kind of thing became by degrees an unpleasant anachronism. For meanwhile the young giant was growing, was beginning indeed to feel tight in his clothes, was obliged to let in a gore here and there in Texas, in California, in New Mexico, in Alaska, and had the scissors and needle and thread ready for Canada when the time came. His shadow loomed like a Brocken-spectre over against Europe,—the shadow of what they were coming to, that was the unpleasant part of it. Even in such misty image as they had of him, it was painfully evident that his clothes were not of any cut hitherto fashionable, nor conceivable by a Bond Street tailor,—and this is in an age, too, when everything depends upon clothes, when, if we do not keep up appearances, the seeming-solid frame of this universe, nay, your very God, would slump into himself, like a mockery king of snow, being nothing, after all, but a prevailing mode, a make-believe of believing. From this moment the young giant assumed the respectable aspect of a phenomenon, to be got rid of if possible, but at any rate as legitimate a subject of human study as the glacial period or the silurian what-d'ye-call-ems. If the man of the primeval drift-heaps be so absorbingly interesting, why not the man of the drift that is just beginning, of the drift into whose irresistible current we are just being sucked

It was something to have advanced even to the dignity of a phenomenon, and yet I do not know that the relation of the individual American to the individual European was bettered by it, and that, after all, must adjust itself comfortably before there can be a right understanding between the two. We had been a desert, we became a museum. People came hither for scientific and not social ends. The very cockney could not complete his education without taking a vacant stare at us in passing. But the sociologists (I think they call themselves so) were the hardest to bear. There was no escape. I have even known a professor of this fearful science to come disguised in petticoats. We were cross-examined as a chemist cross-examines a new substance. Human? yes, all the elements are present, though abnormally combined. Civilized? Hm! that needs a stricter assay. No entomologist could take a more friendly interest in a strange bug. After a few such experiences, I, for one, have felt as if I were merely one of those horrid things preserved in spirits (and very bad spirits, too) in a cabinet. I was not the fellow-being of these explorers. I was a curiosity, I was a specimen. Hath not an American organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions even as a European hath? If you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? I will not keep on with Shylock to his next question but one.

Till after our Civil War it never seemed to enter the head of any foreigner, especially of any Englishman, that an American had what could be called a country, except as a place to eat, sleep, and trade in. Then it seemed to strike them suddenly 'By Jove, you know, fellahs don't fight like that for a shop-till!' No, I rather think not. To Americans America is something more than a promise and an expectation. It has a past and traditions of its own. A descent from men who sacrificed everything and came hither, not to better their fortunes, but to plant their idea in virgin soil, should be a good pedigree. There was never colony save this that went forth, not to seek gold, but God. Is it not as well to have sprung from such as these as from some burly beggar who came over with Wilhelmus Conquestor, unless, indeed, a line grow better as it runs farther away from stalwart ancestors? And for our history, it is dry enough, no doubt, in the books, but, for all that, is of a kind that tells in the blood. I have admitted that Carlyle's sneer had a show of truth in it. But what does he himself, like a true Scot, admire in the Hohenzollerns? First of all, that they were canmy, a thrifty, forehanded race. Next, that they made a good fight from generation to generation with the chaos around them. That is precisely the battle which the English race on this continent has been pushing doughtily forward for two centuries and a half. Doughtily and silently, for you cannot hear in Europe 'that crash, the death-song of the perfect tree,' that has been going on here from sturdy father to sturdy son, and making this continent habitable for the weaker Old World breed that has swarmed to it during the last half-century. If ever men did a good stroke of work on this planet, it was the forefathers of those whom you are wondering whether it would not be prudent to acknowledge as far-off cousins. Alas, man of genius, to whom we owe so much, could you see nothing more than the burning of a foul chimney in that clash of Michael and Satan which flamed up under your very eyes?

Before our war we were to Europe but a huge mob of adventurers and shopkeepers. Leigh Hunt expressed it well enough when he said that he could never think of America without seeing a gigantic counter stretched all along the seaboard. And Leigh Hunt, without knowing it, had been more than half Americanized, too! Feudalism had by degrees made commerce, the great civilizer, contemptible. But a tradesman with sword on thigh and very prompt of stroke was not only redoubtable, he had become respectable also. Few people, I suspect, alluded twice to a needle in Sir John Hawkwood's presence, after that doughty fighter had exchanged it for a more dangerous tool of the same metal. Democracy had been hitherto only a ludicrous effort to reverse the laws of nature by thrusting Cleon into the place of Pericles. But a democracy that could fight for an abstraction, whose members held life and goods cheap compared with that larger life which we call country, was not merely unheard-of, but portentous. It was the nightmare of the Old World taking upon itself flesh and blood, turning out to be substance and not dream. Since the Norman crusader clanged down upon the throne of the porphyro-gemiti, carefully-draped appearances had never received such a shock, had never been so rudely called on to produce their titles to the empire of the world. Authority has had its periods not unlike those of geology, and at last comes Man claiming kingship in right of his mere manhood. The world of the Saurians might be in some respects more picturesque, but the march of events is inexorable, and that world is bygone.

The young giant had certainly got out of long-clothes. He had become the enfant terrible of the human household. It was not and will not be easy for the world (especially for our British cousins) to look upon us as grown up. The youngest of nations, its people must also be young and to be treated accordingly, was the syllogism,—as if libraries did not make all nations equally old in all those respects, at least, where age is an advantage and not a defect. Youth, no doubt, has its good qualities, as people feel who are losing it, but boyishness is another thing. We had been somewhat boyish as a nation, a little loud, a little pushing, a little braggart. But might it not partly have been because we felt that we had certain claims to respect that were not admitted? The war which established our position as a vigorous nationality has also sobered us. A nation, like a man, cannot look death in the eye for four years without some strange reflections, without arriving at some clearer consciousness of the stuff it is made of, without some great moral change. Such a change, or the beginning of it, no observant person can fail to see here. Our thought and our politics, our bearing as a people, are assuming a manlier tone. We have been compelled to see what was weak in democracy as well as what was strong. We have begun obscurely to recognize that things do not go of themselves, and that popular government is not in itself a panacea, is no better than any other form except as the virtue and wisdom of the people make it so, and that when men undertake to do their own kingship, they enter upon the dangers and responsibilities as well as the privileges of the function. Above all, it looks as if we were on the way to be persuaded that no government can be carried on by declamation. It is noticeable also that facility of communication has made the best English and French thought far more directly operative here than ever before. Without being Europeanized, our discussion of important questions in statesmanship, in political economy, in æsthetics, is taking a broader scope and a higher tone. It had certainly been provincial, one might almost say local, to a very unpleasant extent. Perhaps our experience in soldiery has taught us to value training more than we have been popularly wont. We may possibly come to the conclusion, one of these days, that self-made men may not be always equally skilful in the manufacture of wisdom, may not be divinely commissioned to fabricate the higher qualities of opinion on all possible topics of human interest.

So long as we continue to be the most common-schooled and the least cultivated people in the world, I suppose we must consent to endure this condescending manner of foreigners toward us. The more friendly they mean to be, the more ludicrously prominent it becomes. They can never appreciate the immense amount of silent work that has been done here, making this continent slowly fit for the abode of man, and which will demonstrate itself, let us hope, in the character of the people. Outsiders can only be expected to judge a nation by the amount it has contributed to the civilization of the world, the amount, that is, that can be seen and handled. A great place in history can only be achieved by competitive examinations, nay, by a long course of them How much new thought have we contributed to the common stock? Till that question can be triumphantly answered, or needs no answer, we must continue to be simply interesting as an experiment, to be studied as a problem, and not respected as an attained result or an accomplished solution. Perhaps, as I have hunted, their patronizing manner toward us is the fair result of their failing to see here anything more than a poor imitation, a plaster-cast of Europe And are they not partly right? If the tone of the uncultivated American has too often the arrogance of the barbarian, is not that of the cultivated as often vulgarly apologetic? In the America they meet with is there the simplicity, the manliness, the absence of sham, the sincere human nature, the sensitiveness to duty and implied obligation, that in any way distinguishes us from what our orators call 'the effete civilization of the Old World'? Is there a politician among us daring enough (except a Dana here and there) to risk his future on the chance of our keeping our word with the exactness of superstitious communities like England? Is it certain that we shall be ashamed of a bankruptcy of honor, if we can only keep the letter of our bond? I hope we shall be able to answer all these questions with a frank yes At any rate, we would advise our visitors that we are not merely curious creatures, but belong to the family of man, and that, as individuals, we are not to be always subjected to the competitive examination above mentioned, even if we acknowledged their competence as an examining board Above all, we beg them to remember that America is not to us, as to them, a mere object of external interest to be discussed and analyzed, but in us, part of our very marrow Let them not suppose that we conceive of ourselves as exiles from the graces and amenities of an older date than we, though very much at home in a state of things not yet all it might be or should be, but which we mean to make so, and which we find both wholesome and pleasant for men (though perhaps not for dilettanti) to live in 'The full tide of human existence' may be felt here as keenly as Johnson felt it at Charing Cross, and in a larger sense I know one person who is singular enough to think Cambridge the very best spot on the habitable globe 'Doubtless God could have made a better, but doubtless he never did'

It will take England a great while to get over her airs of patronage toward us, or even passably to conceal them She cannot help confounding the people with the country, and regarding us as lusty juveniles She has a conviction that whatever good there is in us is wholly English, when the truth is that we are worth nothing except so far as we have disinfected ourselves of Anglicism She is especially condescending just now, and lavishes sugar-plums on us as if we had not outgrown them I am no believer in sudden conversions, especially in sudden conversions to a favorable opinion of people who have just proved you to be mistaken in judgment and therefore unwise in policy I never blamed her for not wishing well to democracy,—how should she?—but Alabamas are not wishes. Let her not be too hasty in believing Mr Reverdy Johnson's pleasant words Though there is no thoughtful man in America who would not consider a war with England the greatest of calamities, yet the feeling towards her here is very far from cordial, whatever our Minister may say in the effusion that comes after ample dining Mr Adams, with his famous 'My Lord, this means war,' perfectly represented his country Justly or not, we have a feeling that we have been wronged, not merely insulted The only sure way of bringing about a healthy relation between the two countries is for Englishmen to clear their minds of the notion that we are always to be treated as a kind of inferior and deported Englishman whose nature they perfectly understand, and whose back they accordingly stroke the wrong way of the fur with amazing perseverance Let them learn to treat us naturally on our merits as human beings, as they would a German or a Frenchman, and not as if we were a kind of counterfeit Briton whose crime appeared in every shade of difference, and before long there would come that right feeling which we naturally call a good understanding. The common blood, and still more the common language, are fatal instruments of misapprehension Let them give up trying to understand us, still more thinking that they do, and acting in various absurd ways as the necessary consequence, for they will never arrive at that devoutlyto-be-wished consummation, till they learn to look at us as we are and not as they suppose us to be. Dear old long-estranged mother-in-law, it is a great many years since we parted Since 1660, when you married again, you have been a step-mother to us Put on your spectacles, dear madam.

Yes, we have grown, and changed likewise. 10
You would not let us darken your doors, if you could help it We know that perfectly well But pray, when we look to be treated as men, don't shake that rattle in our faces, nor talk baby to us any longer.

'Do, child, go to it grandam, child, Give grandam kingdom, and it grandam
will

Give it a plum, a cherry, and a fig!'

RHÆCUS

God sends his teachers unto every age,
To every clime, and every race of men,
With revelations fitted to their growth And shape of mind, nor gives the realm of Truth
Into the selfish rule of one sole race Therefore each form of worship that hath swayed
The life of man, and given it to grasp
The master-key of knowledge, reverence, Infolds some germs of goodness and of right, 9
Else never had the eager soul, which loathes
The slothful down of pampered ignorance,
Found in it even a moment's fitful rest

There is an instinct in the human heart Which makes that all the fables it hath coined,
To justify the reign of its belief
And strengthen it by beauty's right divine, Veil in their inner cells a mystic gift,
Which, like the hazel twig, in faithful
hands,
Points surely to the hidden springs of truth.
For, as in nature naught is made in vain, 20
But all things have within their hull of use
A wisdom and a meaning which may speak
Of spiritual secrets to the ear
Of spirit, so, in whatsoever the heart
Hath fashioned for a solace to itself,

To make its inspirations suit its creed,
And from the niggard hands of falsehood wring
Its needful food of truth, there ever is A sympathy with Nature, which reveals,
Not less than her own works, pure gleams of light 30
And earnest parables of inward lore
Hear now this fairy legend of old Greece, As full of gracious youth, and beauty still
As the immortal freshness of that grace Carved for all ages on some Attic frieze

A youth named Rhæcus, wandering in the wood,
Saw an old oak just trembling to its fall,
And, feeling pity of so fair a tree,
He propped its gray trunk with admiring
care, 39
And with a thoughtless footstep loitered on.
But, as he turned, he heard a voice behind That murmured 'Rhæcus!' 'T was as if the leaves, Surred by a passing breath, had murmured
it,
And, while he paused bewildered, yet again It murmured 'Rhæcus!' softer than a breeze
He started and beheld with dizzy eyes What seemed the substance of a happy dream
Stand there before him, spreading a warm glow
Within the green glooms of the shadowy oak.
It seemed a woman's shape, yet far too fair
To be a woman, and with eyes too meek 51
For any that were wont to mate with gods
All naked like a goddess stood she there,
And like a goddess all too beautiful
To feel the guilt-born earthliness of shame.
'Rhæcus, I am the Dryad of this tree,' Thus she began, dropping her low-toned words
Serene, and full, and clear, as drops of dew,
'And with it I am doomed to live and die,
The rain and sunshine are my caterers, 60
Nor have I other bliss than simple life, Now ask me what thou wilt, that I can give,
And with a thankful joy it shall be thine '

Then Rhæcus, with a flutter at the heart,
Yet, by the prompting of such beauty, bold, Answered. 'What is there that can satisfy
The endless craving of the soul but love?

Give me thy love, or but the hope of that Which must be evermore my nature's goal '
After a little pause she said again, 70
But with a glimpse of sadness in her tone,
'I give it, Rhœcus, though a perilous gift;
An hour before the sunset meet me here.'
And straightway there was nothing he could see
But the green glooms beneath the shadowy oak,
And not a sound came to his straining ears
But the low trickling rustle of the leaves,
And far away upon an emerald slope
The falter of an idle shepherd's pipe

Now, in those days of simpleness and faith, 80
Men did not think that happy things were dreams
Because they overstepped the narrow bourn
Of likelihood, but reverently deemed Nothing too wondrous or too beautiful
To be the guerdon of a daring heart So Rhœcus made no doubt that he was blest,
And all along unto the city's gate Earth seemed to spring beneath him as he walked,
The clear, broad sky looked bluer than its wont,
And he could scarce believe he had not wings, 90
Such sunshine seemed to glitter through his veins
Instead of blood, so light he felt and strange.

Young Rhœcus had a faithful heart enough,
But one that in the present dwelt too much,
And, taking with blithe welcome whatsoe'er Chance gave of joy, was wholly bound in that,
Like the contented peasant of a vale, Deemed it the world, and never looked beyond
So, haply meeting in the afternoon Some comrades who were playing at the dice, 100
He joined them, and forgot all else beside

The dice were rattling at the merriest,
And Rhœcus, who had met but sorry luck,
Just laughed in triumph at a happy throw,

When through the room there hummed a yellow bee
That buzzed about his ear with down-dropped legs
As if to light And Rhœcus laughed and
said,
Feeling how red and flushed he was with loss,
'By Venus' does he take me for a rose?' And brushed him off with rough, impatient hand 110
But still the bee came back, and thrice again Rhœcus did beat him off with growing wrath Then through the window flew the wounded bee,
And Rhœcus, tracking him with angry eyes,
Saw a sharp mountain-peak of Thessaly Against the red disk of the setting sun,— And instantly the blood sank from his heart,
As if its very walls had caved away Without a word he turned, and, rushing
forth,
Ran madly through the city and the gate,
And o'er the plain, which now the wood's long shade, 121
By the low sun thrown forward broad and dim,
Darkened wellnigh unto the city's wall

Quite spent and out of breath he reached the tree,
And, listening fearfully, he heard once more The low voice murmur 'Rhœcus!' close at hand
Whereat he looked around him, but could see Naught but the deepening glooms beneath the oak
Then sighed the voice, 'O Rhœcus!
nevermore
Shalt thou behold me or by day or night, Me, who would fain have blessed thee with a love 131
More ripe and bounteous than ever yet Filled up with nectar any mortal heart—But thou didst scorn my humble messenger,
And sent'st him back to me with bruised
wings
We spirits only show to gentle eyes,
We ever ask an undivided love
And he who scorns the least of Nature's works

Is thenceforth exiled and shut out from all Farewell! for thou canst never see me
more ' 140

Then Rhœcus beat his breast, and groaned aloud,
And cried, 'Be pitiful' forgive me yet
This once, and I shall never need it more!
'Alas!' the voice returned, 't is thou art
blind,
Not I unmerciful, I can forgive,
But have no skill to heal thy spirit's eyes,
Only the soul hath power o'er itself '
With that again there murmured
'Nevermore!
And Rhœcus after heard no other sound, Except the rattling of the oak's crisp
leaves, 150
Like the long surf upon a distant shore, Raking the sea-worn pebbles up and down
The night had gathered round him. o'er the plain
The city sparkled with its thousand lights,
And sounds of revel fell upon his ear
Harshly and like a curse, above, the sky,
With all its bright sublimity of stars, Deepened, and on his forehead smote the breeze
Beauty was all around him and delight,
But from that eve he was alone on earth 160

FROM THE BIGLOW PAPERS

INTRODUCTION <sup>1</sup>

THOUGH prefaces seem of late to have fallen under some reproach, they have at least this advantage, that they set us again on the feet of our personal consciousness and rescue us from the gregarious mock-modesty 40 or cowardice of that we which shrills feebly throughout modern literature like the shrieking of mice in the walls of a house that has passed its prime. Having a few words to say to the many friends whom the 'Biglow Papers' have won me, I shall accordingly take the freedom of the first person singular of the personal pronoun.
Let each of the good-natured unknown who have cheered me by the written communica- 50 tion of their sympathy look upon this Introduction as a private letter to himself.

<sup>1</sup> The selection is the beginning of Lowell's introduction to The Biglow Papers Second Series (Boston, 1867)
Ibid., VIII, 155-59

When, more than twenty years ago, I wrote the first of the series, I had no definite plan and no intention of ever writing another. Thinking the Mexican war, as I think it still, a national crime committed in behoof of Slavery, our common sin, and wishing to put the feeling of those who thought as I did in a way that would tell, I imagined to myself such an upcountry man as I had often seen at antislavery gatherings, capable of district-school English, but always instinctively falling back into the natural stronghold of his homely dialect when heated to the point of self-forgetfulness. When I began to carry out my conception and to write in my assumed character, I found myself in a strait between two perils. On the one hand, I was in danger of being carried beyond the limit of my own opinions, or at least of that temper with which every man should speak his mind in print, and on the other I feared the risk of seeming to vulgarize a deep and sacred conviction. I needed on occasion to rise above the level of mere patois, and for this purpose conceived the Rev. Mr. Wilbur, who should express the more cautious element of the New England character and its pedantry, as Mr. Biglow should serve for its homely common-sense vivified and heated by conscience. The parson was to be the complement rather than the antithesis of his parishioner, and I felt or fancied a certain humorous element in the real identity of the two under a seeming incongruity. Mr. Wilbur's fondness for scraps of Latin, though drawn from the life, I adopted deliberately to heighten the contrast . . .

The success of my experiment soon began not only to astonish me, but to make me feel the responsibility of knowing that I held in my hand a weapon instead of the mere fencing-stick I had supposed. Very far from being a popular author under my own name, so far, indeed, as to be almost unread, I found the verses of my pseudonym copied everywhere, I saw them pinned up in workshops, I heard them quoted and their authorship debated, I once even, when rumor had at length caught up my name in one of its eddies, had the satisfaction of overhearing it demonstrated, in the pauses of a concert, that I was utterly incompetent to have written anything of the kind.

I had read too much not to know the utter worthlessness of contemporary reputation, especially as regards satire, but I knew also that by giving a certain amount of influence it also had its worth, if that influence were used on the right side. I had learned, too, that the first requisite of good writing is to have an earnest and definite purpose, whether æsthetic or moral, and that even good writing, to please long, must have more than an average amount either of imagination or common-sense. The first of these falls to the lot of scarcely one in several generations, the last is within the reach of many in every one that passes; and of this an author may fairly hope to become in part the mouthpiece. If I put on the cap and bells and made myself one of the court-fools of King Demos, it was less to make his majesty laugh than to win a passage to his royal ears for certain serious things which I had deeply at heart. I say this because there is no imputation that could be more galling to any man's self-respect than that of being a mere jester. I endeavored, by generalizing my satire, to give it what value I could beyond the passing moment and the immediate application. How far I have succeeded I cannot tell, but I have had better luck than I ever looked for in seeing my verses survive to pass beyond their nonage.

In choosing the Yankee dialect, I did not act without forethought. It had long seemed to me that the great vice of American writing and speaking was a studied want of simplicity, that we were in danger of coming to look on our mother-tongue as a dead language, to be sought in the grammar and dictionary rather than in the heart, and that our only chance of escape was by seeking it at its living sources among those who were, as Scottowe says of Major-General Gibbons, 'divinely illiterate.' President Lincoln, the only really great public man whom these latter days have seen, was great also in this, that he was master—witness his speech at Gettysburg—of a truly masculine English, classic because it was of no special period, and level at once to the highest and lowest of his countrymen. I learn from the highest authority that his favorite reading was in Shakespeare and Milton, to which, of course, the Bible should be added. But whoever should read the debates in Congress might fancy himself present at a meeting of the city council of some city of Southern Gaul in the decline of the Empire, where barbarians with a Latin varnish emulated each other in being more than Ciceronian. Whether it be want of culture, for the highest outcome of that is simplicity, or for whatever reason, it is certain that very few American writers or speakers wield their native language with the directness, precision, and force that are common as the day in the mother country. We use it like Scotsmen, not as if it belonged to us, but as if we wished to prove that we belonged to it, by showing our intimacy with its written rather than with its spoken dialect. And yet all the while our popular idiom is racy with life and vigor and originality, bucksome (as Milton used the word) to our new occasions, and proves itself no mere graft by sending up new suckers from the old root in spite of us. It is only from its roots in the living generations of men that a language can be reinforced with fresh vigor for its needs, what may be called a literate dialect grows ever more and more pedantic and foreign, till it becomes at last as unfitting a vehicle for living thought as monkish Latin. That we should all be made to talk like books is the danger with which we are threatened by the Universal Schoolmaster, who does his best to enslave the minds and memories of his victims to what he esteems the best models of English composition, that is to say, to the writers whose style is faultily correct and has no blood-warmth in it. No language after it has faded into diction, none that cannot suck up the feeding juices secreted for it in the rich mother-earth of common folk, can bring forth a sound and lusty book. True vigor and heartiness of phrase do not pass from page to page, but from man to man, where the brain is kindled and the lips supplied by downright living interests and by passion in its very throes. Language is the soil of thought, and our own especially is a rich leaf-mould, the slow deposit of ages, the shed foliage of feeling, fancy, and imagination, which has suffered an earth-change, that the vocal forest, as Howells called it, may clothe itself anew with living green. There is death in the dictionary, and, where language is too strictly limited by convention, the ground for expression to grow in is limited also, and we get a potted literature, Chinese dwarfs instead of healthy trees . . .

He immediately called for the full number of volunteers, asking Massachusetts for 777 men. On May 26 Governor Briggs issued a proclamation for the enrollment of the regiment. As the President's call was merely a request and not an order, many Whigs and the Abolitionists were for refusing it. The Liberator for June 5 severely censured the governor for complying, and accused him of not carrying out the resolutions of the last Whig Convention, which had pledged the party "to present as firm a front of opposition to the institution as was consistent with their allegiance to the Constitution." On them kittle-drums o' yourn,—

'Taint a knowin' kind o' cattle

Thet is ketched with mouldy corn,

Put in stiff, you fifer feller,

Let folks see how spry you be,—

Guess you'll toot till you are yellor

'Fore you git ahold o' me!

Thet air flag's a leetle rotten,

Hope it aint your Sunday's best,—

Fact! it takes a sight o' cotton

To stuff out a soger's chest

Sence we farmers hev to pay fer 't,

Ef you must wear humps like these,

S'posin' you should try salt hay fer 't,

It would du ez slick ez grease

'T wouldn't suit them Southun fellers,

They're a drefle graspin' set,

We must ollers blow the bellers

Wen they want their irons het,

May be it's all right ez preachin',

But my narves it kind o' grates,

Wen I see the overreachin'

O' them nigger-driven' States.

Them thet rule us, them slave-traders,

Haunt they cut a thunderin' swarth

(Helped by Yankee renegaders),

Thru the vartu o' the North!

We begin to think it's nater
To take sarse an' not be ruled;— 30 Who'd expect to see a tater
All on eend at bein' biled?

Ez fer war, I call it murder,—
There you hev it plain an' flat, I don't want to go no furdur Than my Testyment fer that, God hez sed so plump an' fairly,
It's ez long ez it is broad,
An' you've gut to git up airly
Ef you want to take in God. 40

'Taint your eppyletts an' feathers
Make the thing a grain more right,
'Taint afollerin' your bell-wethers
Will excuse ye in His sight,
Ef you take a sword an' dror it,
An' go stuck a feller thru,
Guv'ment aint to answer for it,
God'll send the bill to you

Wut's the use o' meetin'-goin'
Every Sabbath, wet or dry, 50
Ef it's right to go amowin'
Feller-men like oats an' rye?
I dunno but wut it's pooty Trainin' round in bobtail coats,—
But it's curus Christian dooty
This 'ere cuttin' folks's throats

They may talk o' Freedom's airy Tell they're pupple in the face,—
It's a grand gret cemetary
Fer the barthrights of our race, 60
They jest want this Californy So's to lug new slave-states in To abuse ye, an' to scorn ye,
An' to plunder ye like sin.

Aint it cute to see a Yankee Take sech everlastin' pains,
All to get the Devil's thankee Helpin' on 'em weld their chains?
Wy, it's jest ez clear ez figgers,
Clear ez one an' one make two, 70
Chaps thet make black slaves o' niggers
Want to make wite slaves o' you.

Tell ye jest the eend I've come to Arter cipherin' plaguy smart,
An' it makes a handy sum, tu,
Any gump could larn by heart,
Laborin' man an' laborin woman

Hev one glory an' one shame.
Ev'y thin' thet's done inhuman Injers all on 'em the same 80

'Taint by turnin' out to hack folks
You're agoin' to git your right, Nor by lookin' down on black folks
Coz you're put upon by wite, Slavery aint o' nary color,
'Taint the hide thet makes it wus,
All it keers fer in a feller
'S jest to make him fill its pus.

Want to tackle me in, du ye?
I expect you'll hev to wait, 90
Wen cold lead puts daylight thru ye You'll begin to kal'late, S'pose the crows wun't fall to pickin'
All the carkiss from your bones,
Coz you helped to give a lickin'
To them poor half-Spanish drones?

Jest go home an' ask our Nancy Wether I'd be sech a goose Ez to jine ye,—guess you'd fancy
The etarnal bung wuz loose! 100
She wants me fer home consumption,
Let alone the hay's to mow,— Ef you're arter folks o' gumption, You've a darned long row to hoe

Take them editors thet's crowin'
Like a cockerel three months old,— Don't ketch any on 'em goin',
Though they be so blasted bold, Aint they a prime lot o' fellers?
'Fore they think on 't guess they'll sprout (Like a peach thet's got the yellors), 110
With the meanness bustin' out

Wal, go 'long to help 'em stealin'
Bigger pens to cram with slaves,
Help the men thet's ollers dealin' Insults on your fathers' graves,
Help the strong to grind the feeble,
Help the many agin the few,
Help the men thet call your people
Witewashed slaves an' peddlin' crew! 120

Massachusetts, God forgive her,<sup>1</sup>
She's akneelin' with the rest,
She, thet ough' to ha' clung ferever
In her grand old eagle-nest,

<sup>1</sup> 'An allusion to the governor's call for troops as well as to the vote on the War Bill On May 11, 1846, the

She thet ough' to stand so fearless W'ile the wracks are round her hurled, Holdin' up a beacon peerless
 To the oppressed of all the world!

Ha'n't they sold your colored seamen?
 Ha'n't they made your env'ys w'iz? 130
 W'ur'll make ye act like freemen?
 W'ur'll git your dander riz?
 Come, I'll tell ye wut I'm thinkin'
 Is our dooty in this fix, They'd ha' done 't ez quick ez winkin'
 In the days o' seventy-six Clang the bells in every steeple, Call all true men to disown

 The tradooers of our people,
 The enslavers o' their own, 140 Let our dear old Bay State proudly Put the trumpet to her mouth,
 Let her ring this messidge loudly
 In the ears of all the South —

'I'll return ye good fer evil Much ez we frail mortils can,
 But I wun't go help the Devil
 Makin' man the cus o' man,
 Call me coward, call me traider,
 Jest ez suits your mean idees,— 150
 Here I stand a tyrant-hater,
 An' the friend o' God an' Peace!

Ef I'd my way I hed ruther
 We should go to work an' part,
 They take one way, we take t' other,
 Guess it would n't break my heart,
 Man hed ough' to put asunder
 Them thet God has noways jined,
 An' I should n't gretly wonder 160
 Ef there's thousands o' my mind

[The first recruiting sergeant on record I conceive to have been that individual who is mentioned in the Book of Job as going to and fro in the earth, and walking up and down

President sent to the House of Representatives his well-known message declaring the existence of war brought on "by the act of Mexico," and asking for a supply of $10,000,000. Of the seven members from Massachusetts, all Whigs, two, Robert C. Winthrop, of Boston, and Amos Abbott, of Andover, voted for the bill. The Whigs throughout the country, remembering the fate of the party which had opposed the last war with England, sanctioned the measure as necessary for the preservation of the army, then in peril by the unauthorized acts of the President. Note, ibid, VIII, 398-99 in it Bishop Latimer will have him to have been a bishop, but to me that other calling would appear more congenial. The sect of Cainites is not yet extinct, who esteemed the first-born of Adam to be the most worthy, not only because of that privilege of primogeniture, but inasmuch as he was able to overcome and slay his younger brother. That was a wise saying of the famous Marquis Pescara to the Papal Legate, that it was impossible for men to serve Mars and Christ at the same time. Yet in time past the profession of arms was judged to be κατ' ἐξοχήν<sup>1</sup> that of a gentleman, nor does this opinion want for strenuous upholders even in our day. Must we suppose, then, that the profession of Christianity was only intended for losels, or, at best, to afford an opening for plebeian ambition? Or shall we hold with that nicely metaphysical Pomeranian, Captain Vratz, who was Count Konigsmark's chief instrument in the murder of Mr. Thynne, that the Scheme of Salvation has been arranged with an especial eye to the necessities of the upper classes, and that 'God would consider a gentleman and deal with him suitably to the condition and profession he had placed him in'? It may be said of us all, Exemplo plus quam ratione vivimus<sup>2</sup>—H W.] 1846 1848

What Mr. Robinson Thinks

[A FEW remarks on the following verses will not be out of place. The satire in them was not meant to have any personal, but only a general, application. Of the gentleman upon whose letter they were intended as a commentary Mr. Biglow had never heard, till he saw the letter itself. The position of the satirist is oftentimes one which he would not have chosen, had the election been left to himself. In attacking bad principles, he is obliged to select some individual who has made himself their exponent, and in whom they are impersonate, to the end that what he says may not, through ambiguity, be dissipated tenués in auras<sup>3</sup>. For what says Seneca? Longum iter per præcepta, breve et efficace per exempla<sup>1</sup> A bad principle is comparatively harmless while it continues to be an abstraction, nor can the general mind comprehend it fully till it is printed in that large type which all men can read at sight, namely, the life and character, the sayings and doings, of particular persons. It is one of the cunningest fetches of Satan, that he never exposes himself directly to our arrows, but, still dodging behind this neighbor or that acquaintance, compels us to wound him through them, if at all. He holds our affections as hostages, the while he patches up a truce with our conscience.

Meanwhile, let us not forget that the aim of the true satirist is not to be severe upon persons, but only upon falsehood, and, as Truth and Falsehood start from the same point, and sometimes even go along together for a little way, his business is to follow the path of the latter after it diverges, and to show her floundering in the bog at the end of it. Truth is quite beyond the reach of satire. There is so brave a simplicity in her, that she can no more be made ridiculous than an oak or a pine. The danger of the satirist is, that continual use may deaden his sensibility to the force of language. He becomes more and more liable to strike harder than he knows or intends. He may be careful to put on his boxing-gloves, and yet forget that, the older they grow, the more plainly may the knuckles inside be felt. Moreover, in the heat of contest, the eye is insensibly drawn to the crown of victory, whose tawdry tinsel glitters through that dust of the ring which obscures Truth's wreath of simple leaves. I have sometimes thought that my young friend, Mr. Biglow, needed a monitor hand laid on his arm,—aliquid sufflammandus erat<sup>2</sup> I have never thought it good husbandry to water the tender plants of reform with aqua fortis, yet, where so much is to do in the beds, he were a sorry gardener who should wage a whole day's war with an iron scuffle on those ill weeds that make the garden-walks of life unsightly, when a sprinkle of Attic salt will wither them up. Est ars etiam maledicendi,<sup>3</sup> says Scaliger, and truly it is a hard thing to say where the graceful gentleness of the lamb merges in downright sheepishness. We may conclude with worthy and wise Dr. Fuller, that 'one may be a lamb in private wrongs, but in hearing general affronts to goodness they are asses which are not lions'—H.W.]

<sup>4</sup> 'George Nixon Briggs was the Whig Governor of Massachusetts from 1844 to 1851. The campaign referred to here is that of 1847. Governor Briggs was renominated by acclamation and supported by his party with great enthusiasm. His opponent was Caleb Cushing, then in Mexico, and raised by President Polk to the rank of Brigadier-General. Cushing was defeated by a majority of 14,060.' Note, ibid., VIII, 401.

<sup>5</sup> 'John Paul Robinson was a resident of Lowell, a lawyer of considerable ability, and a thorough classical scholar. Late in the gubernatorial contest of 1847 it was rumored that Robinson, heretofore a zealous Whig, and a delegate to the recent Springfield Convention, had gone over to the Democratic camp. The editor of the Boston Palladium wrote to him to learn the truth, and Robinson replied in an open letter avowing his intention to vote for Cushing.' Note, ibid., VIII, 401.

[The attentive reader will doubtless have perceived in the foregoing poem an allusion to that pernicious sentiment, 'Our country, right or wrong' It is an abuse of language to call a certain portion of land, much more, certain personages, elevated for the time being to high station, our country I would not sever nor loosen a single one of those ties by which we are united to the spot of our birth, nor diminish by a tittle the respect due to the Magistrate I love our own Bay State too well to do the one, and as for the other, I have myself for nigh forty years exercised, however unworthily, the function of Justice of the Peace, having been called thereto by the unsolicited kindness of that most excellent man and upright patriot, Caleb Strong Patriæ fumus igne alieno luculentior<sup>1</sup> is best qualified with this,—Ubi libertas, ibi patria<sup>2</sup> We are inhabitants of two worlds, and owe a double, not a divided, allegiance In virtue of our clay, this little ball of earth exacts a certain loyalty of us, while, in our capacity as spirits, we are admitted citizens of an invisible and holier fatherland There is a patriotism of the soul whose claim absolves us from our other and terrene fealty Our true country is that ideal realm which we represent to ourselves under the names of religion, duty, and the like Our terrestrial organizations are but far-off approaches to so fair a model, and all they are verily traitors who resist not any attempt to divert them from this their original intendment When, therefore, one would have us to fling up our caps and shout with the multitude, 'Our country, however bounded' he demands of us that we sacrifice the larger to the less, the higher to the lower, and that we yield to the imaginary claims of a few acres of soil our duty and privilege as liegemen of Truth Our true country is bounded on the north and the south, on the east and the west, by Justice, and when she oversteps that invisible boundary-line by so much as a hair's-breadth, she ceases to be our mother, and chooses rather to be looked upon quasi noverca <sup>1</sup> That is a hard choice when our earthly love of country calls upon us to tread one path and our duty points us to another We must make as noble and becoming an election as did Penelope between Icarus and Ulysses Veiling our faces, we must take silently the hand of Duty to follow her . . . Sunthun' in the Pastoral Lane

2 'Where freedom is, there is your fatherland'

TO THE EDITORS OF THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY

JAALAM, 17th May, 1862.

GENTLEMEN,—At the special request of Mr Biglow, I intended to inclose, together with his own contribution, (into which, at my suggestion, he has thrown a little more of pastoral sentiment than usual), some passages from my sermon on the day of the National Fast, from the text, 'Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them,' Heb xiii 3 But I have not leisure sufficient at present for the copying of them, even were I altogether satisfied with the production as it stands I should prefer, I confess, to contribute the entire discourse to the pages of your respectable miscellany, if it should be found acceptable upon perusal, especially as I find the difficulty in selection of greater magnitude than I had anticipated What passes without challenge in the fervour of oral delivery, cannot always stand the colder criticism of the closet I am not so great an enemy of Eloquence as my friend Mr Biglow would appear to be from some passages in his contribution for the current month I would not, indeed, hastily suspect him of covertly glancing at myself in his somewhat caustick animadversions, albeit some of the phrases he girds at are not entire strangers to my lips I am a more hearty admirer of the Puritans than seems now to be the fashion, and believe, that, if they Hebraized a little too much in their speech, they showed remarkable practical sagacity as statesmen and founders But such phenomena as Puritanism are the results rather of great religious than of merely social convulsions, and do not long survive them So soon as an earnest conviction has cooled into a phrase, its work is over, and the best that can be done with it is to bury it Ite, missa est I am inclined to agree with Mr Biglow that we cannot settle the great political questions which are now presenting themselves to the nation by the opinions of Jeremiah or Ezekiel as to the wants and duties of the Jews in their time, nor do I believe that an entire community with their feelings and views would be practicable or even agreeable at the present day At the same time I could wish that their habit of subordinating the actual to the moral, the flesh to the spirit, and this world to the other, were more common They had found out, at least, the great military secret that soul weighs more than body — But I am suddenly called to a sick-bed in the household of a valued parishioner.

With esteem and respect,
 Your obedient servant,
 HOMER WILBUR

Once git a smell o' musk into a draw,
 An' it clings hold like precedents in law Your gra'ma'am put it there,—when, goodness knows,—
 To jes' this-worldify her Sunday-clo'es, But the old chust wun't sarve her gran'son's wife, (For, 'thout new funnitoo, wut good in life?)
 An' so ole clawfoot, from the precinks dread
 O' the spare chamber, slinks into the shed, Where, dim with dust, it fust or last subsides
 To holdin' seeds an' fifty things besides, 10
 But better days stuck fast in heart an' husk,
 An' all you keep in 't gits a scent o' musk.

Jes' so with poets wut they 've airly read Gits kind o' worked into their heart an'
     head,
 So 's 't they can't seem to write but jest on sheers
 With furrin countries or played-out ideers, Nor hev a feelin', ef it doosn't smack
 O' wut some critter chose to feel 'way back This makes 'em talk o' daisies, larks, an'
     things,
 Ez though we 'd nothin' here that blows an'
     sings,— 20
 (Why, I 'd give more for one live bobolink Than a square mule o' larks in printer's ink,)—
 This makes 'em think our fust o' May is May,
 Which 't ain't, for all the almanucks can say.

O little city-gals, don't never go it Blind on the word o' noospaper or poet!
 They 're apt to puff, an' May-day seldom looks
 Up in the country ez it doos in books, They 're no more like than hornets'-nests an' hives,
 Or printed sarmons be to holy lives 30
 I, with my trousers perched on cowhide boots,
 Tuggin' my foundered feet out by the roots,
 Hev seen ye come to fling on April's hearse
 Your muslin nosegays from the milliner's, Puzzlin' to find dry ground your queen to choose,
 An' dance your throats sore in morocker shoes
 I 've seen ye an' felt proud, thet, come wut would,

Our Pilgrim stock wuz pethed with hardihood
 Pleasure doos make us Yankees kind o' winch, Ez though 't wuz sunthin' paid for by the inch, 40
 But yit we du contrive to worry thru,
 Ef Dooty tells us thet the thing 's to du,
 An' kerry a hollerday, ef we set out,
 Ez suddily ez though 't wuz a redoubt.

I, country-born an' bred, know where to find
 Some blooms that make the season suit the
     mind,
 An' seem to metch the doubtin' bluebird's notes,—
 Half-vent'rin' liverworts in furry coats, Bloodroots, whose rolled-up leaves ef you oncurl,
 Each on 'em 's cradle to a baby-pearl,— 50
 But these are jes' Spring's pickets, sure ez sin,
 The rebble frosts 'll try to drive 'em in;
 For half our May 's so awfully like May n't,
 't would rile a Shaker or an evrige saint,
 Though I own up I like our back'ard springs
 Thet kind o' haggle with their greens an'
     things,
 An' when you 'most give up, 'uthout more words
 Toss the fields full o' blossoms, leaves, an' birds Thet 's Northun natur', slow an' apt to doubt,
 But when it doos git sturred, ther' 's no gin-out! 60

Fust come the blackbirds clatt'rin' in tall
     trees,
 An' settlin' things in windy Congresses,— Queer politicians, though, for I 'll be skinned
 Ef all on 'em don't head against the wind
 'fore long the trees begin to show belief,—
 The maple crimsons to a coral-reef, Then saffern swarms swing off from all the willers
 So plump they look like yaller caterpillars, Then gray hossches'nuts leetle hands unfold
 Softer 'n a baby's be at three days old 70 Thet 's robin-redbreast's almanick; he knows

Thet arter this ther' 's only blossom-snows,
So, choosin' out a handy crotch an' spouse,
He goes to plast'rin' his adobe house.

Then seems to come a hutch,—things lag behind,
Till some fine mornin' Spring makes up her
mind,
An' ez, when snow-swelled rivers cresh their dams
Heaped-up with ice thet dovetails in an' jams,
A leak comes spirtin' thru some pin-hole cleft,
Grows stronger, fercer, tears out right an'
left, 80
Then all the waters bow themselves an'
come,
Suddin, in one gret slope o' shedderin'
foam,
Jes' so our Spring gits everythin' in tune
An' gives one leap from Aperl into June Then all comes crowdin' in, afore you think,
Young oak-leaves must the side-hill woods with pink,
The catbird in the laylock-bush is loud;
The orchards turn to heaps o' rosy cloud, Red-cedars blossom tu, though few folks know it,
An' look all dipt in sunshine like a poet; 90
The lime-trees pile their solid stacks o' shade
An' drows'ly simmer with the bees' sweet trade,
In ellum-shrouds the flashin' hangbird clings
An' for the summer vy'ge his hammock slings,
All down the loose-walled lanes in archin'
bowers
The barb'ry droops its strings o' golden
flowers,
Whose shrinkin' hearts the school-gals love to try
With pins,—they'll worry yourn so, boys, burneby!
But I don't love your cat'logue style,—do
you?—
Ez ef to sell off Natur' by vendoo; 100
One word with blood in't's twice ez good ez two
'nuff sed, June's bridesman, poet o' the
year,
Gladness on wings, the bobolink, is here,

Half-hid in tip-top apple-blooms he swings,
Or climbs against the breeze with quiverin'
wings,
Or, givin' way to 't in a mock despair, Runs down, a brook o' laughter, thru the air.

I ollus feel the sap start in my veins
In Spring, with curus heats an' prickly pains,
Thet drive me, when I git a chance, to walk 110
Off by myself to hev a privit talk
With a queer critter thet can't seem to 'gree Along o' me like most folks,—Mister Me Ther' 's times when I'm unsoshle ez a
stone,
An' sort o' suffercate to be alone,— I'm crowded jes' to think thet folks are nigh,
An' can't bear nothin' closer than the sky,
Now the wind 's full ez shifty in the mind
Ez wut it is ou'-doors, ef I ain't blind, An' sometimes, in the fairest sou'west weather, 120
My innard vane pints east for weeks
together,
My natur' gits all goose-flesh, an' my sins Come drizzlin' on my conscience sharp ez pins
Wal, et sech times I jes' slip out o' sight
An' take it out in a fair stan'-up fight
With the one cuss I can't lay on the shelf,
The crook'dest suck in all the heap,— Myself

'T wuz so las' Sabbath arter meetin'-time Findin' my feelin's wouldn't no ways rhyme
With nobody's, but off the hendle flew 130
An' took things from an east-wind pint o'
view,
I started off to lose me in the hills
Where the pines be, up back o' 'Siah's Mills
Pines, ef you're blue, are the best friends I know,
They mope an' sigh an' sheer your feelin's
so,— They hesh the ground beneath so, tu, I swan,
You half-forgit you've gut a body on Ther' 's a small school'us there where four roads meet,
The door-steps hollered out by little feet,

An' side-posts carved with names whose owners grew 140

To gret men, some on 'em, an' deacons, tu,
't ain't used no longer, coz the town hez gut
A high-school, where they teach the Lord knows wut

Three-story larnin' 's pop'lar now; I guess
We thriv' ez wal on jes' two stories less,
For it strikes me ther' 's sech a thing ez sinnin'

By overloadin' children's underpinnin'.
Wal, here it wuz I larned my A B C,
An' it's a kind o' favorite spot with me.

We're curus critters Now ain't jes' the minute 150

Thet ever fits us easy while we're in it, Long ez 't wuz futur', 't would be perfect bliss,—

Soon ez it's past, thet time's wuth ten o'
this,

An' yit there ain't a man thet need be told Thet Now's the only bird lays eggs o' gold.
A knee-high lad, I used to plot an' plan An' think 't wuz life's cap-sheaf to be a man,

Now, gittin' gray, there's nothin' I enjoy Like dreamin' back along into a boy
So the ole school'us' is a place I choose 160
Afore all others, ef I want to muse,
I set down where I used to set, an' git My boyhood back, an' better things with
it,—

Faith, Hope, an' sunthin', ef it isn't Cherrity,

It's want o' guile, an' thet's ez gret a rerrity,

While Fancy's cushin', free to Prince and Clown,

Makes the hard bench ez soft ez milk-weed-
down

Now, 'fore I knowed, that Sabbath arternoon

When I sot out to tramp myself in tune,
I found me in the school'us' on my seat, 170 Drummin' the march to No-wheres with my feet

Thinkin' o' nothin', I've heerd ole folks
say

Is a hard kind o' dooty in its way;
It's thinkin' everythin' you ever knew,
Or ever hearn, to make your feelin's blue.
I sot there tryin' thet on for a spell
I thought o' the Rebellion, then o' Hell,

Which some folks tell ye now is jest a metterfor

(A the'ry, p'raps, it wun't feel none the better for);

I thought o' Reconstruction, wut we'd win
Patchin' our patent self-blow-up agin 181
I thought ef this 'ere milkin' o' the wits,
So much a month, warn't givin' Natur' fits,—

Ef folks warn't druv, findin' their own milk fail,

To work the cow thet hez an iron tail,
An' ef idees 'thout ripenin' in the pan
Would send up cream to humor ary man:
From this to thet I let my worryin' creep, Till finally I must ha' fell asleep.

Our lives in sleep are some like streams thet glide 190

'twixt flesh an' sperrit boundin' on each
side,

Where both shores' shadders kind o' mix an' mingle

In sunthin' thet ain't jes' like either single,
An' when you cast off moorin's from

To-day,
An' down towards To-morrer drift away,
The imiges thet tingle on the stream Make a new upside-down'ard world o'
dream

Sometimes they seem like sunrise-streaks an' warnin's

O' wut'll be in Heaven on Sabbath-mornin's, 199

An', mixed right in ez ef jest out o' spite, Sunthin' thet says your supper ain't gone
right

I'm gret on dreams, an' often when I wake, I've lived so much it makes my mem'ry ache,

An' can't skurce take a cat-nap in my cheer
'thout hevin' 'em, some good, some bad, all queer

Now I wuz settin' where I'd ben, it seemed,

An' ain't sure yit whether I r'ally dreamed,
Nor, ef I did, how long I might ha' slep', When I hearn some un stompin' up the step,

An' lookin' round, ef two an' two make four, 210

I see a Pilgrim Father in the door.
He wore a steeple-hat, tall boots, an' spurs
With rowels to 'em big ez ches'nut-burrs,

An' his gret sword behind him sloped away Long'z a man's speech thet dunno wut to
say —

'Ef your name's Biglow, an' your given-name

Hosee,' sez he, 'it's arter you I came, I'm your gret-gran'ther multiplied by three' —

'My wut?' sez I — 'Your gret-gret-gret,' sez he

'You wouldn't ha' never ben here but for me 220

Two hundred an' three year ago this May
The ship I come in sailed up Boston Bay, I'd been a cunnle in our Civil War,— But wut on airth hev you gut up one for?
Coz we do things in England, 't ain't for
you

To git a notion you can du 'em tu
I'm told you write in public prints ef true, It's nateral you should know a thing or two' —

'Thet air's an argymunt I can't endorse,—
't would prove, coz you wear spurs, you kep' a horse 230

For brains,' sez I, 'wutever you may think, Ain't boun' to cash the draf's o' pen-an'-ink,—

Though mos' folks write ez ef they hoped jes' quickenin'

The churn would argoo skim-milk into thickenin',

But skim-milk ain't a thing to change its view

O' wut it's meant for more'n a smoky flue.
But du pray tell me, 'fore we furdur go,
How in all Natur' did you come to know
'bout our affairs,' sez I, 'in Kingdom-Come?' —

'Wal, I worked round at spernit-rappin' some, 240

An' danced the tables till their legs wuz gone,

In hopes o' larnin' wut wuz goin' on,'
Sez he, 'but mejums lie so like all-split Thet I concluded it wuz best to quit But, come now, ef you wun't confess to knowin',

You've some conjectures how the thing's a-goin' —

'Gran'ther,' sez I, 'a vane warn't never known

Nor asked to hev a jedgment of its own,
An' yit, ef 't ain't gut rusty in the jints,
It's safe to trust its say on certun' pints 250

It knows the wind's opinions to a T, An' the wind settles wut the weather'll be —
'I never thought a scion of our stock Could grow the wood to make a weather-cock,

When I wuz younger'n you, skurce more'n a shaver,

No airthly wind,' sez he, 'could make me waiver!'

(Ez he said this, he clinched his jaw an' forehead,

Hitchin' his belt to bring his sword-hilt forrard) —

'Jes so it wuz with me,' sez I, 'I swow, When I wuz younger'n wut you see me
now,— 260

Nothin' from Adam's fall to Huld'y's bonnet,

Thet I warn't full-cocked with my jedgment on it,

But now I'm gittin' on in life, I find It's a sight harder to make up my mind,—

Nor I don't often try tu, when events
Will du it for me free of all expense

The moral question's ollus plain enough,—
It's jes' the human-natur' side thet's tough, Wut's best to think mayn't puzzle me nor
you,—

The pinch comes in decidin' wut to du, 270
Ef you read History, all runs smooth ez grease,

Coz there the men ain't nothin' more'n idees,—

But come to make it, ez we must to-day, Th' idees hev arms an' legs an' stop the
way

It's easy fixin' things in facts an' figgers,— They can't resist, nor warn't brought up with niggers,

But come to try your the'ry on,—why, then Your facts an' figgers change to ign'ant men Actin' ez ugly—'—'Smute 'em hip an' thugh!'

Sez gran'ther, 'and let every man-child die! 280

Oh for three weeks o' Crommle an' the Lord!

Up, Isr'el, to your tents an' grind the sword! —

'Thet kind o' thing worked wal in ole Judee,

But you forgot how long it's ben A.D ;
You think thet's ellerkence,—I call it shoddy,

A thing,' sez I, 'wun't cover soul nor body,

I like the plain all-wool o' common-sense, Thet warms ye now, an' will a twelvemonth hence
You took to follerin' where the Prophets beckoned,
 An', fust you knowed on, back come
 Charles the Second, 290
 Now wut I want's to hev all we gain stick,
 An' not to start Millennium too quick,
 We hain't to punish only, but to keep,
 An' the cure's gut to go a cent'ry deep '
 'Wall, mulk-an'-water ain't the best o' glue,'
 Sez he, 'an' so you'll find afore you're thru,
 Ef reshness venters sunthin', shilly-shally Loses ez often wut's ten times the vally Thet exe of ourn, when Charles's neck gut split,
 Opened a gap thet ain't bridged over yit Slavy's your Charles, the Lord hez gin the exe'— 301
 'Our Charles,' sez I, 'hez gut eight million necks
 The hardest question ain't the black man's
 right,
 The trouble is to 'mancipate the white,
 One's chained in body an' can be sot free,
 But t' other's chained in soul to an idee
 It's a long job, but we shall worry thru it, Ef bagnets fail, the spellin'-book must du
 it '
 'Hosee,' sez he, 'I think you're goin' to fail
 The rattlesnake ain't dangerous in the tail, This 'ere rebellion's nothing but the rattle,— 311
 You'll stomp on thet an' think you've won the bettle,
 It's Slavery thet's the fangs an' thinkin'
 head,
 An' ef you want selvation, cresh it dead,— An' cresh it suddin, or you'll larn by wartin'
 Thet Chance wun't stop to listen to debatin'!—
 'God's truth!' sez I,—'an' ef I held the club,
 An' knowed jes' where to strike,—but there's the rub!—
 'Strike soon,' sez he, 'or you'll be deadly ailin',— Folks thet's afeared to fail are sure o' failin', 320
 God hates your sneakin' creturs thet believe
 He'll settle things they run away an' leave!'

He brought his foot down fercely, ez he spoke,
 An' give me sech a startle thet I woke.

Beaver Roars Hoarse With Meltin' Snows<sup>1</sup>

BEAVER roars hoarse with meltin' snows,
 An' rattles di'mon's from his granite,
 Time wuz, he snatched away my prose,
 An' into psalms or satires ran it,
 But he, nor all the rest thet once Started my blood to country-dances, 110
 Can't set me goin' more 'n a dunce Thet hain't no use for dreams an' fancies.

Rat-tat-tat-tattle thru the street
 I hear the drummers makin' riot,
 An' I set thinkin' o' the feet Thet follered once an' now are quiet,— White feet ez snowdrops innercent, Thet never knowed the paths o' Satan,
 Whose comin' step ther' 's ears thet won't,
 No, not lifelong, leave off awaitin' 120

Why, hain't I held 'em on my knee?
 Did n't I love to see 'em growin', Three likely lads ez wal could be,
 Hahnsome an' brave an' not tu knowin'?
 I set an' look into the blaze Whose natur', jes' like theirn, keeps climbin',
 Ez long 'z it lives, in shinin' ways,
 An' half despise myself for rhymin'.

Wut's words to them whose faith an' truth
 On War's red techstone rang true metal,
 Who ventered life an' love an' youth 131
 For the gret prize o' death in battle?
 To him who, deadly hurt, agen
 Flashed on afore the charge's thunder, Tippin' with fire the bolt of men Thet rived the Rebel line asunder?

'T ain't right to hev the young go fust,
 All throbbin' full o' gifts an' graces, Leavin' life's paupers dry ez dust
 To try an' make b'lieve fill their places Nothin' but tells us wut we miss, 141 Ther' 's gaps our lives can't never fay in,
 An' thet world seems so fur from this Lef' for us loafers to grow gray in!

<sup>1</sup> The selection is from Number X, 'Mr Hosea Biglow to the Editor of the Atlantic Monthly'

My eyes cloud up for rain, my mouth
 Will take to twitchin' roun' the corners,
 I pity mothers, tu, down South,
 For all they sot among the scorners
 I'd sooner take my chance to stan'
 At Judgment where your meanest slave 18,
 Than at God's bar hol' up a han'
 Ez drippin' red ez yourn, Jeff Davis! 150

Come, Peace! not like a mourner bowed For honor lost an' dear ones wasted,
 But proud, to meet a people proud,
 With eyes thet tell o' triumph tasted!
 Come, with han' grippin' on the hilt, An' step thet proves ye Victory's daughter!
 Longin' for you, our sperits wilt Like shipwrecked men's on raf's for water 160

Come, while our country feels the lift
 Of a gret instinct shoutin' 'Forwards!
 An' knows thet freedom ain't a gift
 Thet tarries long in han's o' cowards!
 Come, sech ez mothers prayed for, when They kissed their cross with lips thet quvered,
 An' bring fair wages for brave men,
 A nation saved, a race delivered!

HEBE

I SAW the twinkle of white feet,
 I saw the flash of robes descending,
 Before her ran an influence fleet,
 That bowed my heart like barley bending.

As, in bare fields, the searching bees Pilot to blooms beyond our finding,
 It led me on, by sweet degrees
 Joy's simple honey-cells unbinding

Those Graces were that seemed grim Fates,
 With nearer love the sky leaned o'er me, 10
 The long-sought Secret's golden gates
 On musical hinges swung before me

I saw the brimmed bowl in her grasp Thrilling with godhood, like a lover
 I sprang the proffered life to clasp,—
 The beaker fell, the luck was over

The Earth has drunk the vintage up,
 What boots it patch the goblet's splinters?
 Can Summer fill the icy cup,
 Whose treacherous crystal is but Winter's?

O spendthrift haste! await the Gods; 21
 Their nectar crowns the lips of Patience, Haste scatters on unthankful sods
 The immortal gift in vain libations

Coy Hebe flies from those that woo,
 And shuns the hands would seize upon her;
 Follow thy life, and she will sue
 To pour for thee the cup of honor 1848

FROM THE VISION OF SIR LAUNFAL

AND what is so rare as a day in June?
 Then, if ever, come perfect days,
 Then Heaven tries earth if it be in tune,
 And over it softly her warm ear lays,
 Whether we look, or whether we listen,
 We hear life murmur, or see it glisten, Every clod feels a stir of might,
 An instinct within it that reaches and 40
 towers,
 And, groping blindly above it for light,
 Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers,
 The flush of life may well be seen Thrilling back over hills and valleys,
 The cowslip startles in meadows green,
 The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,
 And there's never a leaf nor a blade too mean
 To be some happy creature's palace,
 The little bird sits at his door in the sun, Atilt like a blossom among the leaves, 50
 And lets his illumined being o'errun
 With the deluge of summer it receives,
 His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings,
 And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings,
 He sings to the wide world, and she to her nest,—
 In the nice ear of Nature which song is the best?

Now is the high-tide of the year,
 And whatever of life hath ebbed away
 Comes flooding back with a ripply cheer,
 Into every bare inlet and creek and bay,
 Now the heart is so full that a drop overfills
 it, 61

We are happy now because God wills it, No matter how barren the past may have been,
 'T is enough for us now that the leaves are green,
 We sit in the warm shade and feel right well How the sap creeps up and the blossoms swell,
 We may shut our eyes, but we cannot help knowing
 That skies are clear and grass is growing,
 The breeze comes whispering in our ear,
 That dandelions are blossoming near, 70
     That maize has sprouted, that streams are flowing,
 That the river is bluer than the sky,
 That the robin is plastering his house hard by,
 And if the breeze kept the good news back,
 For other couriers we should not lack,
     We could guess it all by yon heifer's lowing,—
 And hark! how clear bold chanticleer,
 Warmed with the new wine of the year,
     Tells all in his lusty crowing!

Joy comes, grief goes, we know not how, 80
 Everything is happy now, Everything is upward striving,
 'T is as easy now for the heart to be true
 As for grass to be green or skies to be blue,—
 'T is the natural way of living Who knows whither the clouds have fled?
     In the unscarred heaven they leave no wake,
 And the eyes forget the tears they have shed,
 The heart forgets its sorrow and ache,
 The soul partakes the season's youth, 90
     And the sulphurous rifts of passion and woe
 Lie deep 'neath a silence pure and smooth,
     Like burnt-out craters healed with snow
 What wonder if Sir Launfal now Remembered the keeping of his vow?

FROM A FABLE FOR CRITICS

IT being the commonest mode of procedure, I premise a few candid remarks
 TO THE READER.—

This trifle, begun to please only myself

and my own private fancy, was laid on the shelf But some friends, who had seen it, induced me, by dint of saying they liked it, to put it in print That is, having come to that very conclusion, I asked their advice when 't would make no confusion For though (in the gentlest of ways) they had hinted it was scarce worth the while, I should doubtless have printed it. . . .

Having scrawled at full gallop (as far as that goes) in a style that is neither good verse nor bad prose, and being a person whom nobody knows, some people will say I am rather more free with my readers than it is becoming to be, that I seem to expect them to wait on my leisure in following wherever I wander at pleasure, that, in short, I take more than a young author's lawful case, and laugh in a queer way so like Mephistopheles, that the Public will doubt, as they grope through my rhythm, if in truth I am making fun of them or with them

So the excellent Public is hereby assured that the sale of my book is already secured. For there is not a poet throughout the whole land but will purchase a copy or two out of hand, in the fond expectation of being amused in it, by seeing his betters cut up and abused in it Now, I find, by a pretty exact calculation, there are something like ten thousand bards in the nation, of that special variety whom the Review and Magazine critics call lofty and true, and about thirty thousand (this tribe is increasing) of the kinds who are termed full of promise and pleasing The Public will see by a glance at this schedule, that they cannot expect me to be over-sedulous about courting them, since it seems I have got enough fuel made sure of for boiling my pot . . .

One word to such readers (judicious and wise) as read books with something behind the mere eyes, of whom in the country, perhaps, there are two, including myself, gentle reader, and you. All the characters sketched in this slight jeu d'esprit, though, it may be, they seem, here and there, rather free, and drawn from a somewhat too cynical standpoint, are meant to be faithful, for that is the grand point, and none but an owl would feel sore at a rub from a jester who tells you, without any subterfuge, that he sits in Diogenes' tub. . . .

Now there happened to be among Phoebus's followers,
 A gentleman, one of the omnivorous swallowers, 100
 Who bolt every book that comes out of the press,
 Without the least question of larger or less,
 Whose stomachs are strong at the expense of their head,—
 For reading new books is like eating new bread,
 One can bear it at first, but by gradual steps he
 Is brought to death's door of a mental dyspepsy
 On a previous stage of existence, our Hero Had ridden outside, with the glass below zero,
 He had been, 'tis a fact you may safely rely on,
 Of a very old stock a most eminent scion,— A stock all fresh quacks their fierce boluses ply on, 111
 Who stretch the new boots Earth's unwilling to try on, Whom humbugs of all shapes and sorts keep their eye on Whose hair's in the mortar of every new Zion,
 Who, when whistles are dear, go directly and buy one,
 Who think slavery a crime that we must not say fie on,
 Who hunt, if they e'er hunt at all, with the lion (Though they hunt lions also, whenever they spy one),
 Who contrive to make every good fortune a wry one,
 And at last choose the hard bed of honor to die on, 120
 Whose pedigree, traced to earth's earliest
 years,
 Is longer than anything else but their ears,—
 In short, he was sent into life with the wrong key,
 He unlocked the door, and slept forth a poor donkey
 Though kicked and abused by his bipedal betters
 Yet he filled no mean place in the kingdom of letters,
 Far happier than many a literary hack,
 He bore only paper-mill rags on his back

(For it makes a vast difference which side the mill
 One expends on the paper his labor and skill); 130
 So, when his soul waited a new transmigration,
 And Destiny balanced 'twixt this and that station,
 Not having much time to expend upon bothers,
 Remembering he'd had some connection with authors,
 And considering his four legs had grown paralytic,—
 She set him on two, and he came forth a critic.

. . . . .

'Twould be endless to tell you the things that he knew,
 Each a separate fact, undeniably true, 180
 But with him or each other they'd nothing to do,
 No power of combining, arranging,
 discerning,
 Digested the masses he learned into learning,
 There was one thing in life he had practical knowledge for (And this, you will think, he need scarce go to college for),—
 Not a deed would he do, nor a word would he utter,
 Till he'd weighed its relations to plain bread and butter
 When he left Alma Mater, he practised his wits
 In compiling the journals' historical bits,—
 Of shops broken open, men falling in fits,
 Great fortunes in England bequeathed to poor printers, 191
 And cold spells, the coldest for many past winters,— Then, rising by industry, knack, and address,
 Got notices up for an unbiased press,
 With a mind so well poised, it seemed equally made for Applause or abuse, just which chanced to be paid for
 From this point his progress was rapid and sure,
 To the post of a regular heavy reviewer.

And here I must say he wrote excellent articles .
On Hebraical points, or the force of Greek particles, 200
They filled up the space nothing else was prepared for,
And nobody read that which nobody cared for,
If any old book reached a fiftieth edition, He could fill forty pages with safe erudition
He could gauge the old books by the old set of rules,
And his very old nothings pleased very old fools,
But give him a new book, fresh out of the heart,
And you put him at sea without compass or chart,—
His blunders aspired to the rank of an art;
For his lore was engraft, something foreign that grew in him, 210 Exhausting the sap of the native and true in him,
So that when a man came with a soul that was new in him, Carving new forms of truth out of Nature's old granite,
New and old at their birth, like Le Verrier's planet,
Which, to get a true judgment, themselves must create
In the soul of their critic the measure and weight,
Being rather themselves a fresh standard of grace,
To compute their own judge, and assign him his place,
Our reviewer would crawl all about it and round it,
And, reporting each circumstance just as he found it, 220
Without the least malice,—his record would be Profoundly æsthetic as that of a flea, Which, supping on Wordsworth, should print, for our sakes, Recollections of nights with the Bard of the Lakes,
Or, lodged by an Arab guide, ventured to render a Comprehensive account of the ruins at Denderah

As I said, he was never precisely unkind, The defect in his brain was just absence of
mind,
If he boasted, 'twas simply that he was self-made, 229
A position which I, for one, never gainsaid,
My respect for my Maker supposing a skill In His works which our Hero would answer but ill,
And I trust that the mould which he used may be cracked, or he, Made bold by success, may enlarge his phylactery,
And set up a kind of a man-manufactory,— An event which I shudder to think about,
seeing
That Man is a moral, accountable being.

He meant well enough, but was still in the way,
As dunces still are, let them be where they may,
Indeed, they appear to come into existence
To impede other folks with their awkward assistance, 241
If you set up a dunce on the very North pole
All alone with himself, I believe, on my soul,
He'd manage to get betwixt somebody's shins,
And pitch him down bodily, all in his sins,
To the grave polar bears sitting round on the ice,
All shortening their grace, to be in for a slice,
Or, if he found nobody else there to pother, Why, one of his legs would just trip up the other,
For there's nothing we read of in torture's inventions, 250
Like a well-meaning dunce, with the best of intentions

A terrible fellow to meet in society,
Not the toast that he buttered was ever so dry at tea,
There he'd sit at the table and stir in his sugar,
Crouching close for a spring, all the while,
like a cougar,
Be sure of your facts, of your measures and weights,
Of your time,—he's as fond as an Arab of dates,

You'll be telling, perhaps, in your comical
 way,
 Of something you've seen in the course of the day,
 And, just as you're tapering out the conclusion, <sup>260</sup>
 You venture an ill-fated classic allusion,—
 The girls have all got their laughs ready, when, whack!
 The cougar comes down on your thunderstruck back!
 You had left out a comma,—your Greek's put in joint,
 And pointed at cost of your story's whole point
 In the course of the evening, you find chance for certain Soft speeches to Anne, in the shade of the curtain
 You tell her your heart can be likened to one flower,
 'And that, O most charming of women's the sunflower,
 Which turns'—here a clear nasal voice, to your terror, <sup>270</sup> From outside the curtain, says, 'That's all an error'
 As for him, he's—no matter, he never grew tender,
 Sitting after a ball, with his feet on the fender, Shaping somebody's sweet features out of cigar smoke (Though he'd willingly grant you that such doings are smoke);
 All women he damns with mutabile semper,
 And if ever he felt something like love's distemper,
 'Twas tow'rds a young lady who spoke ancient Mexican,
 And assisted her father in making a lexicon, Though I recollect hearing him get quite ferocious <sup>280</sup> About Mary Clausum, the mistress of Grotius,
 Or something of that sort,—but, no more to bore ye
 With character-painting, I'll turn to my story

. . . .

'But stay, here comes Tityrus Griswold,<sup>1</sup> and leads on

The flocks whom he first plucks alive, and then feeds on,—
 A loud-cackling swarm, in whose feathers warm-drest,
 He goes for as perfect a—swan as the rest.

'There comes Emerson first, whose rich words, every one,
 Are like gold nails in temples to hang trophies on,
 Whose prose is grand verse, while his verse, the Lord knows,
 Is some of it pr— No, 'tis not even prose, I'm speaking of metres, some poems have welled <sup>531</sup> From those rare depths of soul that have ne'er been excelled, They're not epics, but that doesn't matter a pin,
 In creating, the only hard thing's to begin,
 A grass-blade's no easier to make than an
 oak;
 If you've once found the way, you've achieved the grand stroke, In the worst of his poems are mines of rich matter, But thrown in a heap with a crash and a clatter,
 Now it is not one thing nor another alone
 Makes a poem, but rather the general tone, The something pervading, uniting the whole, <sup>541</sup>
 The before unconceived, unconceivable
 soul,
 So that just in removing this trifle or that,
 you Take away, as it were, a chief limb of the statue,
 Roots, wood, bark, and leaves singly perfect may be,
 But, clapt hodge-podge together, they don't make a tree

'But, to come back to Emerson (whom,
 by the way,
 I believe we left waiting),—his is, we may
 say,
 A Greek head on right Yankee shoulders, whose range
 Has Olympus for one pole, for t'other the Exchange, <sup>550</sup> He seems, to my thinking (although I'm afraid

a divinely appointed dictatorship of poets, and who is chiefly remembered for his misunderstanding of Poe

The comparison must, long ere this, have been made),
 A Plotinus-Montaigne, where the Egyptian's gold mist
 And the Gascon's shrewd wit cheek-by-jowl coexist,
 All admire, and yet scarcely six converts he's got
 To I don't (nor they either) exactly know what,
 For though he builds glorious temples, 'tis odd
 He leaves never a doorway to get in a god
 'Tis refreshing to old-fashioned people like me
 To meet such a primitive Pagan as he, 560
 In whose mind all creation is duly respected
 As parts of himself—just a little projected, And who's willing to worship the stars and the sun,
 A convert to—nothing but Emerson
 So perfect a balance there is in his head, That he talks of things sometimes as if they were dead,
 Life, nature, love, God, and affairs of that sort,
 He looks at as merely ideas, in short,
 As if they were fossils stuck round in a cabinet,
 Of such vast extent that our earth's a mere dab in it, 570
 Composed just as he is inclined to conjecture her,
 Namely, one part pure earth, ninety-nine parts pure lecturer,
 You are filled with delight at his clear demonstration, Each figure, word, gesture, just fits the occasion,
 With the quiet precision of science he'll sort 'em,
 But you can't help suspecting the whole a post mortem
 'There are persons, mole-blind to the soul's make and style,
 Who insist on a likeness 'twixt him and Carlyle,
 To compare him with Plato would be vastly fairer, 579
 Carlyle's the more burly, but E is the rarer,
 He sees fewer objects, but clearer, trulier,
 If C's as original, E's more peculiar, That he's more of a man you might say of the one,

Of the other he's more of an Emerson.
 C's the Titan, as shaggy of mind as of limb,— E the clear-eyed Olympian, rapid and slim,
 The one's two thirds Norseman, the other half Greek,
 Where the one's most abounding, the other's to seek,
 C's generals require to be seen in the mass,—
 E's specialties gain if enlarged by the glass, C gives nature and God his own fits of the blues, 591
 And rims common-sense things with mystical hues,—
 E sits in a mystery calm and intense,
 And looks coolly around him with sharp common-sense,
 C shows you how every-day matters unite With the dim transdiurnal recesses of
 night,—
 While E, in a plain, preternatural way, Makes mysteries matters of mere every
 day,
 C draws all his characters quite à la Fuseli,—
 Not sketching their bundles of muscles and thews illy, 600
 He paints with a brush so untamed and profuse,
 They seem nothing but bundles of muscles and thews,
 E is rather like Flaxman, lines strait and
 severe,
 And a colorless outline, but full, round, and clear,—
 To the men he thinks worthy he frankly accords
 The design of a white marble statue in words
 C labors to get at the centre, and then Take a reckoning from there of his actions and men,
 E calmly assumes the said centre as granted,
 And, given himself, has whatever is wanted
 'He has imitators in scores, who omit 611 No part of the man but his wisdom and wit,—
 Who go carefully o'er the sky-blue of his brain,
 And when he has skimmed it once, skim it
 again;

If at all they resemble him, you may be sure it is Because their shoals mirror his mists and obscurities,
 As a mud-puddle seems deep as heaven for a minute,
 While a cloud that floats o'er is reflected within it

. . . . .

'There is Bryant, as quiet, as cool, and as dignified,
 As a smooth, silent iceberg, that never is dignified,
 Save when by reflection 'tis kindled o' nights
 With a semblance of flame by the chill
 Northern Lights
 He may rank (Griswold says so) first bard of your nation (There's no doubt that he stands in supreme ice-olation),
 Your topmost Parnassus he may set his heel
 on, 830
 But no warm applauses come, peal following peal on,— He's too smooth and too polished to hang any zeal on Unqualified merits, I'll grant, if you choose,
 he has 'em,
 But he lacks the one merit of kindling enthusiasm,
 If he stir you at all, it is just, on my soul,
 Like being stirred up with the very North Pole.

'He is very nice reading in summer, but inter
Nos, we don't want extra freezing in winter, Take him up in the depth of July, my advice is,
 When you feel an Egyptian devotion to ices 840
 But, deduct all you can, there's enough that's right good in him,
 He has a true soul for field, river, and wood in him,
 And his heart, in the midst of brick walls, or where'er it is,
 Glows, softens, and thrills with the tenderest charities—
 To you mortals that delve in this trade-ridden planet?
 No, to old Berkshire's hills, with their limestone and granite.

If you're one who in loco (add foco here)
desipis,
 You will get of his outermost heart (as I guess) a piece,
 But you'd get deeper down if you came as a precipice,
 And would break the last seal of its inwardest fountain, 850
 If you only could palm yourself off for a mountain
 Mr Quivis, or somebody quite as discerning,
 Some scholar who's hourly expecting his
 learning,
 Calls B the American Wordsworth, but Wordsworth
 May be rated at more than your whole tuneful herd's worth.
 No, don't be absurd, he's an excellent Bryant,
 But, my friends, you'll endanger the life of your client,
 By attempting to stretch him up into a giant
 If you choose to compare him, I think there are two per-sons fit for a parallel—Thompson and Cowper, <sup>1</sup> 860
 I don't mean exactly,—there's something of each,
 There's T's love of nature, C's penchant to preach,
 Just mix up their minds so that C's spice of craziness Shall balance and neutralize T's turn for laziness,
 And it gives you a brain cool, quite frictionless, quiet, Whose internal police nips the buds of all riot,—
 A brain like a permanent strait-jacket put
 on
 The heart that strives vainly to burst off a button,—
 A brain which, without being slow or mechanic,
 Does more than a larger less drilled, more volcanic, 870
 He's a Cowper condensed, with no
 craziness bitten,

<sup>1</sup> 'To demonstrate quickly and easily how per-versely absurd 'tis to sound this name Cowper, As people in general call him named super,
 I remark that he rhymes it himself with horse-trooper '
 Author's note, ibid, VIII, 52

And the advantage that Wordsworth before him had written

'But, my dear little bardlings, don't prick up your ears
Nor suppose I would rank you and Bryant as peers,
If I call him an iceberg, I don't mean to say There is nothing in that which is grand in its way,
He is almost the one of your poets that knows How much grace, strength, and dignity lie in Repose,
If he sometimes fall short, he is too wise to mar
His thought's modest fulness by going too far, 880
'Twould be well if your authors should all make a trial
Of what virtue there is in severe self-denial And measure their writings by Hesiod's staff,
Which teaches that all has less value than half

'There is Whittier, whose swelling and vehement heart
Strains the strait-breasted drab of the Quaker apart,
And reveals the live Man, still supreme and erect,
Underneath the bemummifying wrappers of sect,
There was ne'er a man born who had more of the swing
Of the true lyric bard and all that kind of thing, 890
And his failures arise (though he seem not to know it)
From the very same cause that has made him a poet,—
A fervor of mind which knows no separation
'Twixt simple excitement and pure
inspiration,
As my Pythoness erst sometimes erred from not knowing
If 'twere I or mere wind through her tripod was blowing, Let his mind once get head in its favorite direction
And the torrent of verse bursts the dams of reflection,
While, borne with the rush of the metre along,

The poet may chance to go right or go wrong, 900
Content with the whirl and delirium of
song,
Then his grammar's not always correct, nor his rhymes,
And he's prone to repeat his own lyrics sometimes,
Not his best, though, for those are struck off at white-heats
When the heart in his breast like a triphammer beats,
And can ne'er be repeated again any more Than they could have been carefully plotted before Like old what's-his-name there at the battle of Hastings (Who, however, gave more than mere rhythmical bastings),
Our Quaker leads off metaphorical fights For reform and whatever they call human rights, 911
Both singing and striking in front of the war,
And hitting his foes with the mallet of Thor,
Anne haec, one exclaims, on beholding his knocks,
Vestis filii tui,<sup>1</sup> O leather-clad Fox?
Can that be thy son, in the battle's mud din, Preaching brotherly love and then driving it in
To the brain of the tough old Goliath of sin, With the smoothest of pebbles from Castaly's spring
Impressed on his hard moral sense with a sling? 920

'All honor and praise to the right-hearted bard
Who was true to The Voice when such service was hard,
Who himself was so free he dared sing for the slave
When to look but a protest in silence was brave,
All honor and praise to the women and men Who spoke out for the dumb and the downtrodden then'
It needs not to name them, already for each I see History preparing the statue and niche,
They were harsh, but shall you be so shocked at hard words

x 'Are these the clothes of your son?'

Who have beaten your pruning-hooks up into swords, 930
 Whose rewards and hurrahs men are surer to gain
 By the reaping of men and of women than grain?
 Why should you stand aghast at their fierce wordy war, if You scalp one another for Bank or for Tariff?
 Your calling them cut-throats and knaves all day long Doesn't prove that the use of hard language is wrong,
 While the World's heart beats quicker to think of such men As signed Tyranny's doom with a bloody steel-pen,
 While on Fourth-of-Julys beardless orators fright one
 With hunts at Harmodius and Aristogiton, You need not look shy at your sisters and brothers 941
 Who stab with sharp words for the freedom of others,—
 No, a wreath, twine a wreath for the loyal and true
 Who, for sake of the many, dared stand with the few,
 Not of blood-spattered laurel for enemies braved,
 But of broad, peaceful oak-leaves for citizens saved!

. . . . .

"There is Hawthorne, with genius so shrinking and rare
 That you hardly at first see the strength that is there,
 A frame so robust, with a nature so sweet,
 So earnest, so graceful, so lithe, and so
 fleet, 1100
 Is worth a descent from Olympus to meet,
 'Tis as if a rough oak that for ages had stood,
 With his gnarled bony branches like ribs of
 the wood,
 Should bloom, after cycles of struggle and scathe,
 With a single anemone trembly and rathe,
 His strength is so tender, his wildness so meek,
 That a suitable parallel sets one to seek,— He's a John Bunyan Fouqué, a Puritan Tieck,

When Nature was shaping him, clay was not granted
 For making so full-sized a man as she wanted, 1110
 So, to fill out her model, a little she spared From some finer-grained stuff for a woman prepared,
 And she could not have hit a more excellent plan
 For making him fully and perfectly man
 The success of her scheme gave her so much delight,
 That she tried it again, shortly after, in Dwight,
 Only, while she was kneading and shaping the clay,
 She sang to her work in her sweet childish
 way,
 And found, when she'd put the last touch to his soul,
 That the music had somehow got mixed with the whole 1120

'Here's Cooper, who's written six volumes to show
 He's as good as a lord well, let's grant that he's so,
 If a person prefer that description of praise,
 Why, a coronet's certainly cheaper than bays,
 But he need take no pains to convince us he's not (As his enemies say) the American Scott.
 Choose any twelve men, and let C read aloud
 That one of his novels of which he's most proud,
 And I'd lay any bet that, without ever quitting
 Their box, they'd be all, to a man, for acquitting 1130
 He has drawn you one character, though, that is new,
 One wildflower he's plucked that is wet with the dew
 Of this fresh Western world, and, the thing not to mince,
 He has done naught but copy it ill ever since,
 His Indians, with proper respect be it said,
 Are just Natty Bumppo, daubed over with red,
 And his very Long Toms are the same useful Nat,

Rigged up in duck pants and a sou'wester
 hat (Though once in a Coffin, a good chance was found To have slipped the old fellow away underground) 1140
 All his other men-figures are clothes upon sticks,
 The derrière chemise<sup>1</sup> of a man in a fix (As a captain besieged, when his garrison's small,
 Sets up caps upon poles to be seen o'er the wall),
 And the women he draws from one model don't vary,
 All sappy as maples and flat as a prairie When a character's wanted, he goes to the task
 As a cooper would do in composing a cask;
 He picks out the staves, of their qualities heedful,
 Just hoops them together as tight as is needful, 1150
 And, if the best fortune should crown the attempt, he Has made at the most something wooden and empty

'Don't suppose I would underrate Cooper's abilities,
 If I thought you'd do that, I should feel very ill at ease,
 The men who have given to one character
 life
 And objective existence are not very rife, You may number them all, both prose-writers and singers, Without overrunning the bounds of your fingers,
 And Natty won't go to oblivion quicker Than Adams the parson or Primrose the vicar. 1160

'There is one thing in Cooper I like, too, and that is That on manners he lectures his countrymen gratis,
 Not precisely so either, because, for a rarity,
 He is paid for his tickets in unpopularity.
 Now he may overcharge his American pictures,
 But you'll grant there's a good deal of truth in his strictures,

1 'The last shirt.'

And I honor the man who is willing to sink Half his present reputé for the freedom to think,
 And, when he has thought, be his cause strong or weak,
 Will risk t'other half for the freedom to speak, 1170
 Caring naught for what vengeance the mob has in store,
 Let that mob be the upper ten thousand or lower

. . . . .

'There comes Poe, with his raven, like Barnaby Rudge,
 Three fifths of him genius and two fifths sheer fudge,
 Who talks like a book of iambs and pentameters,
 In a way to make people of common sense damn metres,
 Who has written some things quite the best of their kind, 1180
 But the heart somehow seems all squeezed out by the mind,
 Who—But hey-day! What's this?
 Messieurs Mathews and Poe,
 You mustn't fling mud-balls at Longfellow
 so,
 Does it make a man worse that his character's such As to make his friends love him (as you think) too much?
 Why, there is not a bard at this moment alive
 More willing than he that his fellows should thrive,
 While you are abusing him thus, even now
 He would help either one of you out of a slough,
 You may say that he's smooth and all that till you're hoarse, 1190
 But remember that elegance also is force, After polishing granite as much as you
 will,
 The heart keeps its tough old persistency
 still,
 Deduct all you can, that still keeps you at bay,
 Why, he'll live till men weary of Collins and Gray.
 I'm not over-fond of Greek metres in English,
 To me rhyme's a gain, so it be not too
 jinglish,

And your modern hexameter verses are no
 more Like Greek ones than sleek Mr Pope is like Homer,
 As the roar of the sea to the coo of a pigeon
 is, 1420
 So, compared to your moderns, sounds old Melesigenes,
 I may be too partial, the reason, perhaps,
 o't is
 That I've heard the old blind man recite his own rhapsodies,
 And my ear with that music impregnate
 may be,
 Like the poor exiled shell with the soul of the sea,
 Or as one can't bear Strauss when his nature is cloven
 To its deeps within deeps by the stroke of Beethoven,
But, set that aside, and 'tis truth that I speak,
 Had Theocritus written in English, not Greek,
 I believe that his exquisite sense would scarce change a line 1430
 In that rare, tender, virgin-like pastoral Evangeline
 That's not ancient nor modern, its place is apart
 Where time has no sway, in the realm of pure Art,
 'Tis a shrine of retreat from Earth's hubbub and strife
 As quiet and chaste as the author's own life

. . . .

'There's Holmes, who is matchless among you for wit,
 A Leyden-jar always full-charged, from which flit
 The electrical tingles of hit after hit, In long poems 'tis painful sometimes, and invites
 A thought of the way the new Telegraph writes, 1660
 Which pricks down its little sharp sentences spitefully
 As if you got more than you'd title to rightfully,
 And you find yourself hoping its wild father Lightning
 Would flame in for a second and give you a fright'ning.
 He has perfect sway of what I call a sham metre,

But many admire it, the English pentameter,
 And Campbell, I think, wrote most commonly worse,
 With less nerve, swing, and fire in the same kind of verse,
 Nor e'er achieved aught in't so worthy of praise
 As the tribute of Holmes to the grand Marseillaise 1670
 You went crazy last year over Bulwer's
 New Timon,— Why, if B, to the day of his dying, should rhyme on,
 Heaping verses on verses and tomes upon tomes,
 He could ne'er reach the best point and vigor of Holmes
 His are just the fine hands, too, to weave you a lyric
Full of fancy, fun, feeling, or spiced with satiric
 In a measure so kindly, you doubt if the toes
 That are trodden upon are your own or your foes'

'There is Lowell, who's striving Parnassus to climb
 With a whole bale of isms tied together with
 rhyme, 1680
 He might get on alone, spite of brambles and boulders,
 But he can't with that bundle he has on his shoulders,
 The top of the hill he will ne'er come nigh reaching Till he learns the distinction 'twixt singing and preaching,
 His lyre has some chords that would ring pretty well,
 But he'd rather by half make a drum of the shell,
 And rattle away till he's old as Methusalem,
 At the head of a march to the last new Jerusalem.'

AFTER THE BURIAL <sup>1</sup>

Yes, faith is a goodly anchor,
 When skies are sweet as a psalm,

<sup>1</sup> The poem, begun after the death of his daughter, Rose, in 1850 bears the grief of many deaths within Lowell's family of two daughters, a son, his wife, his father and his mother. Of it, Lowell wrote to a friend, 6 July

At the bows it lolls so stalwart,
In its bluff, broad-shouldered calm.

And when over breakers to leeward
The tattered surges are hurled,
It may keep our head to the tempest,
With its grip on the base of the world

But, after the shipwreck, tell me
What help in its iron thews, 10
Still true to the broken hawser,
Deep down among sea-weed and ooze?

In the breaking gulfs of sorrow,
When the helpless feet stretch out
And find in the deeps of darkness
No footing so solid as doubt,

Then better one spar of Memory,
One broken plank of the Past,
That our human heart may cling to,
Though hopeless of shore at last! 20

To the spirit its splendid conjectures,
To the flesh its sweet despair,
Its tears o'er the thin-worn locket
With its anguish of deathless hair!

Immortal? I feel it and know it,
Who doubts it of such as she?
But that is the pang's very secret,— Immortal away from me

There's a narrow ridge in the graveyard
Would scarce stay a child in his race, 30
But to me and my thought it is wider Than the star-sown vague of Space

Your logic, my friend, is perfect,
Your moral most dearly true,
But, since the earth clashed on her coffin,
I keep hearing that, and not you

Console if you will, I can bear it,
'Tis a well-meant alms of breath,
But not all the preaching since Adam
Has made Death other than Death. 40

It is pagan, but wait till you feel it,—
That jar of our earth, that dull shock

1875 'Poets get their sorrows and passions out of themselves by carving the lava (grown cold) into pretty forms. I should not be so indiscreet now, I suppose, and yet a living verse can only be made of a living experience—and that our own' Norton, ed., Letters of James Russell Lowell (N Y, 1894), II, 142

When the ploughshare of deeper passion
Tears down to our primitive rock.

Communion in spirit! Forgive me,
But I, who am earthly and weak,
Would give all my incomes from dreamland
For a touch of her hand on my cheek.

That little shoe in the corner,
So worn and wrinkled and brown, 50
With its emptiness confutes you,
And argues your wisdom down.

ODE RECITED AT THE HARVARD COMMEMORATION<sup>1</sup>

JULY 21, 1865

I

WEAK-WINGED IS song,
Nor aims at that clear-ethered height

<sup>1</sup> On the metrical problems of his 'Commemoration Ode' and other similar poems, Lowell wrote, 14 January 1877, to James B. Thayer 'The poems were all intended for public recitation. That was the first thing to be considered. I suppose my ear (from long and painful practice on  $\Phi$  B K poems) has more technical experience in this than almost any. The least tedious measure is the rhymed heroic, but this, too, palls unless relieved by passages of wit or even mere fun. A long series of uniform stanzas (I am always speaking of public recitation) with regularly recurring rhymes produces somnolence among the men and a desperate resort to their fans on the part of the women. No method has yet been invented by which the train of thought or feeling can be shunted off from the epical to the lyrical track. My ears have been jolted often enough over the sleepers on such occasions to know that I know something (of course an American can't know much) about Pindar. But his odes had the advantage of being chanted. Now, my problem was to contrive a measure which should not be tedious by uniformity, which should vary with varying moods, in which the transitions (including those of the voice) should be managed without jar. I at first thought of mixed rhymed and blank verses of unequal measures, like those in the choruses of "Samson Agonistes," which are in the main masterly. Of course, Milton deliberately departed from that stricter form of the Greek Chorus to which it was bound quite as much (I suspect) by the law of its musical accompaniment as by any sense of symmetry. I wrote some stanzas of the "Commemoration Ode" on this theory at first, leaving some verses without a rhyme to match. But my ear was better pleased when the rhyme, coming at a longer interval, as a far-off echo rather than instant reverberation, produced the same effect almost, and yet was grateful by unexpectedly recalling an association and faint reminiscence of consonance. I think I have succeeded pretty well, and if you try reading aloud I believe you would agree with me.' Ibid., II, 189-90

Whither the brave deed climbs for light:

We seem to do them wrong, Bringing our robin's-leaf to deck their hearse

Who in warm life-blood wrote their nobler verse,

Our trivial song to honor those who come With ears attuned to strenuous trump and drum,

And shaped in squadron-strophes their desire,

Live battle-odes whose lines were steel and
fire 10

Yet sometimes feathered words are strong,

A gracious memory to buoy up and save From Lethe's dreamless ooze, the common grave

Of the unventurous throng

To-day our Reverend Mother welcomes
back

Her wisest Scholars, those who understood

The deeper teaching of her mystic tome,
And offered their fresh lives to make it good

No lore of Greece or Rome, No science peddling with the names of
things, 20

Or reading stars to find inglorious fates,
Can lift our life with wings Far from Death's idle gulf that for the many waits,

And lengthen out our dates
With that clear fame whose memory sings In manly hearts to come, and nerves them and dilates

Nor such thy teaching, Mother of us all!

Not such the trumpet-call

Of thy diviner mood,

That could thy sons entice 30
From happy homes and toils, the fruitful
nest

Of those half-virtues which the world calls
best,

Into War's tumult rude,

But rather far that stern device

The sponsors chose that round thy cradle stood

In the dim, unventured wood,

The VERITAS that lurks beneath

The letter's unprolific sheath,

Life of whate'er makes life worth living,

Seed-grain of high emprise, immortal food, One heavenly thing whereof earth hath the giving. 41

Many loved Truth, and lavished life's best oil

Amid the dust of books to find her,
Content at last, for guerdon of their toil,
With the cast mantle she hath left behind her

Many in sad faith sought for her, Many with crossed hands sighed for
her,

But these, our brothers, fought for her,
At life's dear peril wrought for her,
So loved her that they died for her, 50 Tasting the raptured fleetness
Of her divine completeness

Their higher instinct knew

Those love her best who to themselves are
true,

And what they dare to dream of, dare to do,
They followed her and found her Where all may hope to find,

Not in the ashes of the burnt-out mind,
But beautiful, with danger's sweetness round her

Where faith made whole with deed 60
Breathes its awakening breath

Into the lifeless creed,
They saw her plumed and mailed,
With sweet, stern face unveiled,

And all-repaying eyes, look proud on them in death

Our slender life runs rippling by, and glides
Into the silent hollow of the past,

What is there that abides

To make the next age better for the last?

Is earth too poor to give us 70

Something to live for here that shall outlive us?

Some more substantial boon

Than such as flows and ebbs with Fortune's fickle moon?

The little that we see

From doubt is never free,

The little that we do

Is but half-nobly true,

With our laborious hiving

What men call treasure, and the gods call dross,

Life seems a jest of Fate's contriving, 80

Only secure in every one's conniving,
A long account of nothings paid with loss,
Where we poor puppets, jerked by unseen wires,

After our little hour of strut and rave,
With all our pasteboard passions and
desires,

Loves, hates, ambitions, and immortal fires,

Are tossed pell-mell together in the grave

But stay! no age was e'er degenerate,
Unless men held it at too cheap a rate,
For in our likeness still we shape our fate

Ah, there is something here 91

Unfathomed by the cynic's sneer,
Something that gives our feeble light
A high immunity from Night,
Something that leaps life's narrow bars

To claim its birthright with the hosts of heaven,

A seed of sunshine that can leaven Our earthy dulness with the beams of stars,

And glorify our clay

With light from fountains elder than the Day, 100

A conscience more divine than we,
A gladness fed with secret tears,
A vexing, forward-reaching sense
Of some more noble permanence,

A light across the sea,

Which haunts the soul and will not let it be,

Still beaconing from the heights of undegenerate years.

5

Whither leads the path
To ampler fates that leads?
Not down through flowery meads,
To reap an aftermath 111

Of youth's vainglorious weeds,
But up the steep, amid the wrath
And shock of deadly-hostile creeds,
Where the world's best hope and stay
By battle's flashes gropes a desperate way,
And every turf the fierce foot clings to bleeds

Peace hath her not ignoble wreath,
Ere yet the sharp, decisive word
Light the black lips of cannon, and the sword Dreams in its easeful sheath, 121 But some day the live coal behind the thought,

Whether from Baal's stone obscene,
Or from the shrine serene Of God's pure altar brought, Bursts up in flame, the war of tongue and pen

Learns with what deadly purpose it was fraught,

And, helpless in the fiery passion caught, Shakes all the pillared state with shock of men

Some day the soft Ideal that we wooed 130
Confronts us fiercely, foe-beset, pursued, And cries reproachful 'Was it, then, my praise,

And not myself was loved? Prove now thy truth,

I claim of thee the promise of thy youth,
Give me thy life, or cower in empty phrase,
The victim of thy genius, not its mate!"

Life may be given in many ways,

And loyalty to Truth be sealed

As bravely in the closet as the field,
So bountiful is Fate, 140

But then to stand beside her,

When craven churls deride her,

To front a lie in arms and not to yield,

This shows, methinks, God's plan

And measure of a stalwart man, Limbed like the old heroic breeds,

Who stands self-poised on manhood's solid earth,

Not forced to frame excuses for his birth,

Fed from within with all the strength he needs

6

Such was he, our Martyr-Chief, 150 Whom late the Nation he had led,
With ashes on her head,

Wept with the passion of an angry grief:
Forgive me, if from present things I turn To speak what in my heart will beat and burn,

And hang my wreath on his world-honored urn.

Nature, they say, doth dote,

And cannot make a man

Save on some worn-out plan,

Repeating us by rote 160

For him her Old-World moulds aside she threw,

And, choosing sweet clay from the breast

Of the unexhausted West,
 With stuff untainted shaped a hero new, Wise, steadfast in the strength of God, and true

How beautiful to see
 Once more a shepherd of mankind indeed, Who loved his charge, but never loved to lead,
 One whose meek flock the people joyed to be,

Not lured by any cheat of birth      170
 But by his clear-grained human
     worth,

And brave old wisdom of sincerity!
 They knew that outward grace is dust,
 They could not choose but trust
 In that sure-footed mind's unfaltering skill,
 And supple-tempered will That bent like perfect steel to spring again and thrust

His was no lonely mountain-peak of
     mind,
 Thrusting to thin air o'er our cloudy bars,

A sea-mark now, now lost in vapors
     blind,      180

Broad prairie rather, genial, level-lined,
 Fruitful and friendly for all human kind,

Yet also nigh to heaven and loved of loftest
     stars

Nothing of Europe here, Or, then, of Europe fronting mornward
     still,

Ere any names of Serf and Peer Could Nature's equal scheme deface
 And thwart her genial will,

Here was a type of the true elder race,
 And one of Plutarch's men talked with us face to face      190

I praise him not, it were too late,
 And some innate weakness there must be In him who condescends to victory
 Such as the Present gives, and cannot wait, Safe in himself as in a fate

So always firmly he
 He knew to bide his time,
 And can his fame abide,
 Still patent in his simple faith sublime,
 Till the wise years decide      200 Great captains, with their guns and drums,

Disturb our judgment for the hour,
 But at last silence comes,

These all are gone, and, standing like a tower,
 Our children shall behold his fame,
 The kindly-earnest, brave, foreseeing man,
 Sagacious, patient, dreading praise, not blame,
 New birth of our new soil, the first American

7

Long as man's hope insatiate can discern Or only guess some more inspiring goal      210

Outside of Self, enduring as the pole,
 Along whose course the flying axles burn Of spirits bravely-pitched, earth's manlier brood,

Long as below we cannot find
 The meed that stills the inexorable mind,
 So long this faith to some ideal Good,
 Under whatever mortal names it masks, Freedom, Law, Country, this ethereal mood

That thanks the Fates for their severer tasks,

Feeling its challenged pulses leap,      220
 While others skulk in subterfuges cheap,
 And, set in Danger's van, has all the boon it asks,

Shall win man's praise and woman's love,
 Shall be a wisdom that we set above
 All other skills and gifts to culture dear, A virtue round whose forehead we inwreathe

Laurels that with a living passion breathe When other crowns grow, while we twine them, sear

What brings us thronging these high rites to pay,

And seal these hours the noblest of our
     year,      230

Save that our brothers found this better way?

8

We sit here in the Promised Land That flows with Freedom's honey and milk,

But 't was they won it, sword in hand,
 Making the nettle danger soft for us as silk We welcome back our bravest and our best,—

Ah me! not all! some come not with the rest,

Who went forth brave and bright as any here!
 I strive to mix some gladness with my strain,
     But the sad strings complain, 240
     And will not please the ear.
 I sweep them for a pæan, but they wane
     Again and yet again
 Into a dirge, and die away, in pain.
 In these brave ranks I only see the gaps, Thinking of dear ones whom the dumb turf wraps,
 Dark to the triumph which they died to gain Fittier may others greet the living,
     For me the past is unforgiving,
     I with uncovered head 250
     Salute the sacred dead, Who went, and who return not — Say not
     so!
 'Tis not the grapes of Canaan that repay, But the high faith that failed not by the
     way,
 Virtue treads paths that end not in the grave,
 No bar of endless night exiles the brave,
     And to the saner mind
 We rather seem the dead that stayed behind
 Blow, trumpets, all your exultations blow!
 For never shall their aureoled presence lack 260
 I see them muster in a gleaming row,
 With ever-youthful brows that nobler show,
 We find in our dull road their shining track,
     In every nobler mood
 We feel the orient of their spirit glow,
 Part of our life's unalterable good,
 Of all our saintlier aspiration,
     They come transfigured back, Secure from change in their high-hearted ways,
 Beautiful evermore, and with the rays 270
 Of morn on their white Shields of Expectation!

9

But is there hope to save Even this ethereal essence from the grave?
 Whatever 'scaped Oblivion's subtle wrong
 Save a few clarion names, or golden threads of song?

Before my musing eye
 The mighty ones of old sweep by,
 Disvoiced now and insubstantial things,
 As noisy once as we, poor ghosts of kings,
 Shadows of empire wholly gone to dust,
 And many races, nameless long ago, 281
 To darkness driven by that imperious gust
 Of ever-rushing Time that here doth blow
 O visionary world, condition strange,
 Where naught abiding is but only
     Change,
 Where the deep-bolted stars themselves still shift and range!
 Shall we to more continuance make pretence?
 Renown builds tombs, a life-estate is Wit;
     And, bit by bit,
 The cunning years steal all from us but woe;
 Leaves are we, whose decays no harvest sow 291
     But, when we vanish hence,
 Shall they lie forceless in the dark below, Save to make green their little length of sods,
 Or deepen pansies for a year or two,
 Who now to us are shining-sweet as gods?
 Was dying all they had the skill to do?
 That were not fruitless. but the Soul resents
 Such short-lived service, as if blind events
 Ruled without her, or earth could so endure, 300
 She claims a more divine investiture
 Of longer tenure than Fame's airy rents, Whate'er she touches doth her nature share,
 Her inspiration haunts the ennobled air,
     Gives eyes to mountains blind,
 Ears to the deaf earth, voices to the wind,
 And her clear trump sings succor everywhere
 By lonely bivouacs to the wakeful mind;
 For soul inherits all that soul could dare Yea, Manhood hath a wider span 310
 And larger privilege of life than man.
 The single deed, the private sacrifice,
 So radiant now through proudly-hidden tears,
 Is covered up ere long from mortal eyes With thoughtless drift of the deciduous years,

But that high privilege that makes all men peers,
 That leap of heart whereby a people rise
     Up to a noble anger's height,
 And, flamed on by the Fates, not shrink, but grow more bright,
 That swift validity in noble veins, 320
     Of choosing danger and disdaining
     shame,
     Of being set on flame
 By the pure fire that flies all contact base,
 But wraps its chosen with angelic might,
     These are imperishable gains,
 Sure as the sun, medicinal as light,
 These hold great futures in their lusty reins
 And certify to earth a new imperial race.

Who now shall sneer?
 Who dare again to say we trace 330
     Our lines to a plebeian race?
     Roundhead and Cavalier!
 Dumb are those names erewhile in battle loud,
 Dream-footed as the shadow of a cloud,
     They flit across the ear
 That is best blood that hath most iron in 't
 To edge resolve with, pouring without stunt
     For what makes manhood dear
     Tell us not of Plantagenets, Hapsburgs, and Guelfs, whose thin bloods crawl 340
 Down from some victor in a border-brawl!
     How poor their outworn coronets, Matched with one leaf of that plain civic wreath
 Our brave for honor's blazon shall bequeath,
     Through whose desert a rescued Nation sets
 Her heel on treason, and the trumpet hears Shout victory, ungluing Europe's sullen
     ears
 With vain resentments and more vain regrets!

11

Not in anger, not in pride,
 Pure from passion's mixture rude Ever to base earth allied, 351
 But with far-heard gratitude,
 Still with heart and voice renewed,
 To heroes living and dear martyrs dead,

The strain should close that consecrates our brave
 Lift the heart and lift the head!
     Lofty be its mood and grave,
     Not without a martial ring,
     Not without a prouder tread
     And a peal of exultation 360
     Little right has he to sing Through whose heart in such an hour
     Beats no march of conscious power, Sweeps no tumult of elation!
     'T is no Man we celebrate,
     By his country's victories great,
 A hero half, and half the whum of Fate,
     But the pith and marrow of a Nation
     Drawing force from all her men, Highest, humblest, weakest, all, 370
     For her time of need, and then Pulsing it again through them,
 Till the basest can no longer cower, Feeling his soul spring up divinely tall, Touched but in passing by her mantle-hem
 Come back, then, noble pride, for 't is her dower!
     How could poet ever tower,
     If his passions, hopes, and fears,
     If his triumphs and his tears,
     Kept not measure with his people?
 Boom, cannon, boom to all the winds and waves! 381
 Clash out, glad bells, from every rocking steeple!
 Banners, adance with triumph, bend your staves!
     And from every mountain-peak Let beacon-fire to answering beacon
     speak,
     Katahdin tell Monadnock, Whiteface
     he,
 And so leap on in light from sea to sea,
     Till the glad news be sent Across a kindling continent, Making earth feel more firm and air breathe braver 390
 'Be proud! for she is saved, and all have helped to save her!
     She that lifts up the manhood of the poor,
     She of the open soul and open door,
     With room about her hearth for all mankind!

The fire is dreadful in her eyes no
more,
From her bold front the helm she doth unbind,
Sends all her handmaid armies back to spin,
And bids her navies, that so lately hurled Their crashing battle, hold their thunders in,
Swimming like birds of calm along the unharmful shore 400
No challenge sends she to the elder
world,
That looked aslake and hated, a light
scorn
Plays o'er her mouth, as round her mighty knees
She calls her children back, and waits the morn
Of nobler day, enthroned between her subject seas '

12

Bow down, dear Land, for thou hast found release!
Thy God, in these distempered days, Hath taught thee the sure wisdom of His ways,
And through thine enemies hath wrought thy peace!
Bow down in prayer and praise! 410
No poorest in thy borders but may now Lift to the juster skies a man's enfranchised brow
O Beautiful! my Country! ours once
more!
Smoothing thy gold of war-dishevelled
hair
O'er such sweet brows as never other wore,
And letting thy set lips,
Freed from wrath's pale eclipse,
The rosy edges of thy smile lay bare,
What words divine of lover or of poet Could tell our love and make thee know
it, 420
Among the Nations bright beyond compare?
What were our lives without thee?
What all our lives to save thee?
We reckon not what we gave thee,
We will not dare to doubt thee,
But ask whatever else, and we will dare!

A FOREBODING

WHAT were the whole void world, if thou wert dead,
Whose briefest absence can eclipse my day,
And make the hours that danced with Time
away
Drag their funeral steps with muffled
head?
Through thee, meseems, the very rose is red,
From thee the violet steals its breath in May,
From thee draw life all things that grow not gray,
And by thy force the happy stars are sped
Thou near, the hope of thee to overflow Fills all my earth and heaven, as when in Spring,
Ere April come, the birds and blossoms
know,
And grasses brighten round her feet to cling,
Nay, and this hope delights all nature so That the dumb turf I tread on seems to sing

How was I worthy so divine a loss, Deepening my midnights, kindling all my morns?
 Why waste such precious wood to make my Such far-sought roses for my crown of thorns?

And when she came, how earned I such a

 Why spend on me, a poor earth-delving

 The hourly mercy, of a woman's soul?

Ah, did we know to give her all her right,

AUSPEX

My heart, I cannot still it,
 Nest that had song-birds in it,

And when the last shall go,
 The dreary days, to fill it,
 Instead of lark or linnet,
 Shall whirl dead leaves and snow.

Had they been swallows only,
 Without the passion stronger
 That skyward longs and sings,— Woe's me, I shall be lonely
 When I can feel no longer
 The impatience of their wings!

A moment, sweet delusion, Like birds the brown leaves hover,

But it will not be long Before their wild confusion Fall wavering down to cover
 The poet and his song

AN OPIUM FANTASY

SOFT hangs the opiate in the brain,
 And lulling soothes the edge of pain,
 Till hardest sound, far off or near,
 Sings floating in its mellow sphere

What wakes me from my heavy dream?
 Or am I still asleep?
 Those long and soft vibrations seem A slumberous charm to keep

The graceful play, a moment stopped,
 Distance again unrolls,
 Like silver balls, that, softly dropped,
 Ring into golden bowls

10

I question of the poppies red,
 The fairy flaunting band,
 While I a weed, with drooping head, Within their phalanx stand

'Some airy one, with scarlet cap,
 The name unfold to me

Of this new minstrel, who can lap
 Sleep in his melody?' 20

Bright grew their scarlet-kerchiefed
 heads,
 As freshening winds had blown,
 And from their gently swaying beds
 They sang in undertone,

'Oh, he is but a little owl,
 The smallest of his kin,
 Who sits beneath the midnight's cowl,
 And makes this airy din'

'Deceitful tongues, of fiery tints, Far more than this you know,—
 That he is your enchanted prince, Doomed as an owl to go,

30

'Nor his fond play for years hath stopped,
 But nightly he unrolls
 His silver balls, that, softly dropped,
 Ring into golden bowls'

FROM THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO

THE FOUNDATION OF VERA CRUZ<sup>2</sup>

THERE IS NO situation which tries so severely the patience and discipline of the soldier, as a life of idleness in camp, where his thoughts, instead of being bent on enterprise and action, are fastened on himself and the inevitable privations and dangers of his condition. This was particularly the case in the present instance, where, in addition to the evils of a scanty subsistence, the troops suffered from excessive heat, swarms of venomous insects, and the other annoyances of a sultry climate. They were, moreover, far from possessing the character of regular forces, trained to subordination under a commander whom they had long been taught to reverence and obey. They were soldiers of fortune, embarked with him in an adventure in which all seemed to have an equal stake, and they regarded their captain—the captain of a day—as little more than an equal.

There was a growing discontent among the men at their longer residence in this strange land. They were still more dissatisfied on learning the general's intention to remove to the neighbourhood of the port discovered by Montejo. 'It was time to return,' they said, 'and report what had been done to the governor of Cuba, and not linger on these barren shores until they had brought the whole Mexican empire on their heads!' Cortés evaded their importunities as well as he could, assuring them there was no cause for despondency. 'Everything so far had gone on prosperously, and, when they had taken up a more favourable position, there was no reason to doubt they might still continue the same profitable intercourse with the natives.'

While this was passing, five Indians made their appearance in the camp one morning, and were brought to the general's tent. Their dress and whole appearance were different from those of the Mexicans

They wore rings of gold and gems of a bright blue stone in their ears and nostrils, while a gold leaf delicately wrought was attached to the under lip. Marina was unable to comprehend their language, but, on her addressing them in Aztec, two of them, it was found, could converse in that tongue. They said they were natives of Cempoalla, the chief town of the Totonacs, a powerful nation who had come upon the great plateau many centuries back, and, descending its eastern slope, settled along the sierras and broad plains which skirt the Mexican Gulf towards the north. Their country was one of the recent conquests of the Aztecs, and they experienced such vexatious oppressions from their conquerors as made them very impatient of the yoke. They informed Cortés of these and other particulars. The fame of the Spaniards had reached their master, who sent these messengers to request the presence of the wonderful strangers in his capital.

This communication was eagerly listened to by the general, who, it will be remembered, was possessed of none of those facts, laid before the reader, respecting the internal condition of the kingdom, which he had no reason to suppose other than strong and united. An important truth now flashed on his mind, as his quick eye descried in this spirit of discontent a potent lever, by the aid of which he might hope to overturn this barbaric empire.—He received the mission of the Totonacs most graciously, and, after informing himself, as far as possible, of their dispositions and resources, dismissed them with presents, promising soon to pay a visit to their lord.

Meanwhile, his personal friends, among whom may be particularly mentioned, Alonso Hernandez Puertocarrero, Cristóval de Olid, Alonso de Avila, Pedro de Alvarado and his brothers, were very busy in persuading the troops to take such measures as should enable Cortés to go forward in those ambitious plans for which he had no warrant from the powers of Velasquez. 'To return now,' they said, 'was to abandon the enterprise on the threshold, which, under such a leader, must conduct to glory and incalculable riches To return to Cuba would be to surrender to the greedy governor the little gains they had already got. The only way was to persuade the general to establish a permanent colony in the country, the government of which would take the conduct of matters into its own hands, and provide for the interests of its members It was true, Cortés had no such authority from Velasquez But the interests of the Sovereigns, which were paramount to every other, imperatively demanded it'

These conferences could not be conducted so secretly, though held by night, as not to reach the ears of the friends of Velasquez They remonstrated against the proceedings, as insidious and disloyal They accused the general of instigating them, and, calling on him to take measures without delay for the return of the troops to Cuba, announced their own intention to depart, with such followers as still remained true to the governor

Cortés, instead of taking umbrage at this high-handed proceeding, or even answering in the same haughty tone, mildly replied, 'that nothing was further from his desire than to exceed his instructions He, indeed, preferred to remain in the country and continue his profitable intercourse with the natives But, since the army thought otherwise, he should defer to their opinion, and give orders to return, as they desired.' On the following morning, proclamation was made for the troops to hold themselves in readiness to embark at once on board the fleet, which was to sail for Cuba

Great was the sensation caused by their general's order Even many of those before clamorous for it, with the usual caprice of men whose wishes are too easily gratified, now regretted it The partisans of Cortés were loud in their remonstrances 'They were betrayed by the general,' they cried, and, thronging round his tent, called on him to countermand his orders 'We came here,' said they, 'expecting to form a settlement, if the state of the country authorised it Now it seems you have no warrant from the governor to make one. But there are interests, higher than those of Velasquez, which demand it These territories are not his property, but were discovered for the Sovereigns, and it is necessary to plant a colony to watch over their interests, instead of wasting time in idle barter, or, still worse, of returning, in the present state of affairs, to Cuba If you refuse,' they concluded, 'we shall protest against your conduct as disloyal to their Highnesses'

Cortés received this remonstrance with the embarrassed air of one by whom it was altogether unexpected He modestly requested time for deliberation, and promised to give his answer on the following day. At the time appointed, he called the troops together, and made them a brief address 'There was no one,' he said, 'if he knew his own heart, more deeply devoted than himself to the welfare of his sovereigns, and the glory of the Spanish name He had not only expended his all, but incurred heavy debts, to meet the charges of this expedition, and had hoped to reimburse himself by continuing his traffic with the Mexicans But, if the soldiers thought a different course advisable, he was ready to postpone his own advantage to the good of the state' He concluded by declaring his willingness to take measures for settling a colony in the name of the Spanish Sovereigns, and to nominate a magistracy to preside over it.

For the alcaldes he selected Puertocarrero and Montejo, the former cavalier his fast friend, and the latter the friend of Velasquez, and chosen for that very reason, a stroke of policy which perfectly succeeded The regidores, alguacil, treasurer, and other functionaries, were then appointed, all of them his personal friends and adherents They were regularly sworn into office, and the new city received the title of Villa Rica de Vera Cruz, 'The Rich Town of the True Cross', a name which was considered as happily intimating that union of spiritual and temporal interests to which the arms of the Spanish adventurers in the New World were to be devoted Thus, by a single stroke of the pen, as it were, the camp was transformed into a civil community, and the whole framework and even title of the city were arranged, before the site of it had been settled.

The new municipality were not slow in coming together, when Cortés presented himself, cap in hand, before that august body, and, laying the powers of Velasquez on the table, respectfully tendered the resignation of his office of Captain-General, 'which, indeed,' he said, 'had necessarily expired, since the authority of the governor was now superseded by that of the magistracy of Villa Rica de Vera Cruz.' He then, with a profound obeisance, left the apartment.

The council, after a decent time spent in deliberation, again requested his presence. 'There was no one,' they said, 'who, on mature reflection, appeared to them so well qualified to take charge of the interests of the community, both in peace and in war, as himself, and they unanimously named him, in behalf of their Catholic Highnesses, Captain General and Chief Justice of the colony.' He was further empowered to draw, on his own account, one-fifth of the gold and silver which might hereafter be obtained by commerce or conquest from the natives. Thus clothed with supreme civil and military jurisdiction, Cortés was not backward in exerting his authority. He found speedy occasion for it.

The transactions above described had succeeded each other so rapidly, that the governor's party seemed to be taken by surprise, and had formed no plan of opposition. When the last measure was carried, however, they broke forth into the most indignant and opprobrious invectives, denouncing the whole as a systematic conspiracy against Velasquez. These accusations led to recrimination from the soldiers of the other side, until from words they nearly proceeded to blows. Some of the principal cavaliers, among them Velasquez de Leon, a kinsman of the governor, Escobar his page, and Diego de Ordaz, were so active in instigating these turbulent movements that Cortés took the bold measure of putting them all in irons, and sending them on board the vessels. He then dispersed the common file by detaching many of them, with a strong party under Alvarado, to forage the neighbouring country, and bring home provisions for the destitute camp.

During their absence, every argument that cupidity or ambition could suggest was used to win the refractory to his views. Promises, and even gold, it is said, were liberally lavished, till, by degrees, their understandings were opened to a clearer view of the merits of the case. And when the foraging party re-appeared with abundance of poultry and vegetables, and the cravings of the stomach—that great laboratory of disaffection, whether in camp or capital—were appeased, good-humour returned with good cheer, and the rival factions embraced one another as companions in arms, pledged to a common cause. Even the high-mettled hidalgos on board the vessels did not long withstand the general tide of reconciliation, but one by one gave in their adhesion to the new government. What is more remarkable is that this forced conversion was not a hollow one, but from this time forward several of these very cavaliers became the most steady and devoted partisans of Cortés.

Such was the address of this extraordinary man, and such the ascendancy which in a few months he had acquired over these wild and turbulent spirits! By this ingenious transformation of a military into a civil community, he had secured a new and effectual basis for future operations. He might now go forward without fear of check or control from a superior,—at least from any other superior than the Crown, under which alone he held his commission. In accomplishing this, instead of incurring the charge of usurpation, or of transcending his legitimate powers, he had transferred the responsibility, in a great measure, to those who had imposed on him the necessity of action. By this step, moreover, he had linked the fortunes of his followers indissolubly with his own. They had taken their chance with him, and, whether for weal or for woe, must abide the consequences. He was no longer limited to the narrow concerns of a sordid traffic, but, sure of their co-operation, might now boldly meditate, and gradually disclose, those lofty schemes which he had formed in his own bosom for the conquest of an empire.

Harmony being thus restored, Cortés sent his heavy guns on board the fleet, and ordered it to coast along the shore to the north as far as Chiahuitztla, the town near which the destined port of the new city was situated, proposing, himself, at the head of his troops, to visit Cempoalla, on the march. The road lay for some miles across the dreary plains in the neighbourhood of the modern Vera Cruz. In this sandy waste no signs of vegetation met their eyes, which, however, were occasionally refreshed by glimpses of the blue Atlantic, and by the distant view of the magnificent Orizaba, towering with his spotless diadem of snow far above his colossal brethren of the Andes. As they advanced, the country gradually assumed a greener and richer aspect. They crossed a river, probably a tributary of the Rio de la Antigua, with difficulty, on rafts, and on some broken canoes that were lying on the banks. They now came in view of very different scenery,—wide-rolling plains covered with a rich carpet of verdure, and overshadowed by groves of cocoas and feathery palms, among whose tall, slender stems were seen deer, and various wild animals with which the Spaniards were unacquainted. Some of the horsemen gave chase to the deer, and wounded, but did not succeed in killing them. They saw, also, pheasants and other birds, among them the wild turkey, the pride of the American forest, which the Spaniards described as a species of peacock.

On their route they passed through some deserted villages in which were Indian temples, where they found censers, and other sacred utensils, and manuscripts of the agave fibre, containing the picture-writing, in which, probably, their religious ceremonies were recorded. They now beheld, also, the hideous spectacle, with which they became afterwards familiar, of the mutilated corpses of victims who had been sacrificed to the accursed deities of the land. The Spaniards turned with loathing and indignation from a display of butchery, which formed so dismal a contrast to the fair scenes of nature by which they were surrounded.

They held their course along the banks of the river, towards its source, when they were met by twelve Indians, sent by the cacique of Cempoalla to show them the way to his residence. At night they bivouacked in an open meadow, where they were well supplied with provisions by their new friends. They left the stream on the following morning, and, striking northerly across the country, came upon a wide expanse of luxuriant plains and woodland, glowing in all the splendour of tropical vegetation. The branches of the stately trees were gaily festooned with clustering vines of the dark-purple grape, variegated convolvuli, and other flowering parasites of the most brilliant dyes. The undergrowth of prickly aloe, matted with wild rose and honeysuckle, made in many places an almost impervious thicket. Amid this wilderness of sweet-smelling buds and blossoms fluttered numerous birds of the parrot tribe, and clouds of butterflies, whose gaudy colours, nowhere so gorgeous as in the tierra caliente, rivalled those of the vegetable creation, while birds of exquisite song, the scarlet cardinal and the marvellous mocking-bird, that comprehends in his own notes the whole music of a forest, filled the air with delicious melody.—The hearts of the stern Conquerors were not very sensible to the beauties of nature. But the magical charms of the scenery drew forth unbounded expressions of delight, and as they wandered through this 'terrestrial paradise,' as they called it, they fondly compared it to the fairest regions of their own sunny land.

As they approached the Indian city, they saw abundant signs of cultivation in the trim gardens and orchards that lined both sides of the road. They were now met by parties of the natives of either sex, who increased in numbers with every step of their progress. The women, as well as men, mingled fearlessly among the soldiers, bearing bunches and wreaths of flowers, with which they decorated the neck of the general's charger, and hung a chaplet of roses about his helmet. Flowers were the delight of this people. They bestowed much care in their cultivation, in which they were well seconded by a climate of alternate heat and moisture, stimulating the soil to the spontaneous production of every form of vegetable life. The same refined taste, as we shall see, prevailed among the warlike Aztecs, and has survived the degradation of the nation in their descendants of the present day.

Many of the women appeared, from their richer dress and numerous attendants, to be persons of rank. They were clad in robes of fine cotton, curiously coloured, which reached from the neck—in the inferior orders, from the waist—to the ankles. The men wore a sort of mantle of the same material, à la Morisca, in the Moorish fashion, over their shoulders, and belts or sashes about the loins. Both sexes had jewels and ornaments of gold round their necks, while their ears and nostrils were perforated with rings of the same metal.

Just before reaching the town, some horsemen who had rode in advance returned with the amazing intelligence, 'that they had been near enough to look within the gates, and found the houses all plated with burnished silver!' On entering the place, the silver was found to be nothing more than a brilliant coating of stucco, with which the principal buildings were covered, a circumstance which produced much merriment among the soldiers at the expense of their credulous comrades. Such ready credulity is a proof of the exalted state of their imaginations, which were prepared to see gold and silver in every object around them. The edifices of the better kind were of stone and lime, or bricks dried in the sun, the poorer were of clay and earth. All were thatched with palm-leaves, which, though a flimsy roof, apparently, for such structures, were so nicely interwoven as to form a very effectual protection against the weather.

The city was said to contain from twenty to thirty thousand inhabitants. This is the most moderate computation, and not improbable. Slowly and silently the little army paced the narrow and now crowded streets of Cempoalla, inspiring the natives with no greater wonder than they themselves experienced at the display of a policy and refinement so far superior to anything they had witnessed in the New World. The cacique came out in front of his residence to receive them. He was a tall and very corpulent man, and advanced leaning on two of his attendants. He received Cortés and his followers with great courtesy, and, after a brief interchange of civilities, assigned the army its quarters in a neighbouring temple, into the spacious courtyard of which a number of apartments opened, affording excellent accommodations for the soldiery.

Here the Spaniards were well supplied with provisions, meat cooked after the fashion of the country, and maize made into bread-cakes. The general received, also, a present of considerable value from the cacique, consisting of ornaments of gold and fine cottons. Notwithstanding these friendly demonstrations, Cortés did not relax his habitual vigilance, nor neglect any of the precautions of a good soldier. On his route, indeed, he had always marched in order of battle, well prepared against surprise. In his present quarters, he stationed his sentinels with like care, posted his small artillery so as to command the entrance, and forbade any soldier to leave the camp without orders, under pain of death.

The following morning, Cortés, accompanied by fifty of his men, paid a visit to the lord of Cempoalla in his own residence. It was a building of stone and lime, standing on a steep terrace of earth, and was reached by a flight of stone steps. It may have borne resemblance in its structure to some of the ancient buildings found in Central America. Cortés, leaving his soldiers in the courtyard, entered the mansion with one of his officers, and his fair interpreter, Doña Marina. A long conference ensued, from which the Spanish general gathered much light respecting the state of the country. He first announced to the chief, that he was the subject of a great monarch who dwelt beyond the waters, that he had come to the Aztec shores, to abolish the inhuman worship which prevailed there, and to introduce the knowledge of the true God. The cacique replied, that their gods, who sent them the sunshine and the rain, were good enough for them, that he was the tributary of a powerful monarch also, whose capital stood on a lake far off among the mountains, a stern prince, merciless in his exactions, and, in case of resistance, or any offence, sure to wreak his vengeance by carrying off their young men and maidens to be sacrificed to his deities. Cortés assured him that he would never consent to such enormities, he had been sent by his sovereign to redress abuses and to punish the oppressor, and, if the Totonacs would be true to him, he would enable them to throw off the detested yoke of the Aztecs.

The cacique added, that the Totonac territory contained about thirty towns and villages, which could muster a hundred thousand warriors,—a number much exaggerated. There were other provinces of the empire, he said, where the Aztec rule was equally odious, and between him and the capital lay the warlike republic of Tlascala, which had always maintained its independence of Mexico. The fame of the Spaniards had gone before them, and he was well acquainted with their terrible victory at Tabasco. But still he looked with doubt and alarm to a rupture with 'the great Montezuma,' as he always styled him, whose armies, on the least provocation, would pour down from the mountain regions of the west, and, rushing over the plains like a whirlwind, sweep off the wretched people to slavery and sacrifice!

Cortés endeavoured to reassure him, by declaring that a single Spaniard was stronger than a host of Aztecs. At the same time, it was desirable to know what nations would co-operate with him, not so much on his account, as theirs, that he might distinguish friend from foe, and know whom he was to spare in this war of extermination. Having raised the confidence of the admiring chief by this comfortable and politic vaunt, he took an affectionate leave, with the assurance that he would shortly return and concert measures for their future operations, when he had visited his ships in the adjoining port, and secured a permanent settlement there.

The intelligence gained by Cortés gave great satisfaction to his mind. It confirmed his former views, and showed, indeed, the interior of the monarchy to be in a state far more distracted than he had supposed. If he had before scarcely shrunk from attacking the Aztec empire in the true spirit of a knight-errant, with his single arm, as it were, what had he now to fear, when one half of the nation could be thus marshalled against the other? In the excitement of the moment, his sanguine spirit kindled with an enthusiasm which overleaped every obstacle. He communicated his own feelings to the officers about him, and, before a blow was struck, they already felt as if the banners of Spain were waving in triumph from the towers of Montezuma! But many a bloody field was to be fought, many a peril and privation to be encountered, before that consummation could be attained.

Taking leave of the hospitable Indian on the following day, the Spaniards took the road to Chiahuitztlá, about four leagues distant, near which was the port discovered by Montejo, where their ships were now riding at anchor. They were provided by the cacique with four hundred Indian porters, tamanes, as they were called, to transport the baggage. These men easily carried fifty pounds' weight, five or six leagues in a day. They were in use all over the Mexican empire, and the Spaniards found them of great service, henceforth, in relieving the troops from this part of their duty. They passed through a country of the same rich, voluptuous character as that which they had lately traversed, and arrived early next morning at the Indian town, perched like a fortress on a bold, rocky eminence that commanded the Gulf. Most of the inhabitants had fled, but fifteen of the principal men remained, who received them in a friendly manner, offering the usual compliments of flowers and incense. The people of the place, losing their fears, gradually returned. While conversing with the chiefs, the Spaniards were joined by the worthy cacique of Cempoalla, borne by his men on a litter. He eagerly took part in their deliberations. The intelligence gained here by Cortés confirmed the accounts already gathered of the feelings and resources of the Totonac nation.

In the midst of their conference, they were interrupted by a movement among the people, and soon afterwards five men entered the great square or market-place, where they were standing. By their lofty port, their peculiar and much richer dress, they seemed not to be of the same race as these Indians. Their dark, glossy hair was tied in a knot on the top of the head. They had bunches of flowers in their hands, and were followed by several attendants, some bearing wands with cords, others fans, with which they brushed away the flies and insects from their lordly masters. As these persons passed through the place, they cast a haughty look on the Spaniards, scarcely deigning to return their salutations. They were immediately joined, in great confusion, by the Totonac chiefs, who seemed anxious to conciliate them by every kind of attention.

The general, much astonished, inquired of Marina what it meant. She informed him, they were Aztec nobles, empowered to receive the tribute for Montezuma. Soon after, the chiefs returned with dismay painted on their faces. They confirmed Marina's statement, adding, that the Aztecs greatly resented the entertainment afforded the Spaniards without the Emperor's permission; and demanded in expiation twenty young men and women for sacrifice to the gods. Cortés showed the strongest indignation at this insolence. He required the Totonacs not only to refuse the demand, but to arrest the persons of the collectors, and throw them into prison. The chiefs hesitated, but he insisted on it so peremptorily, that they at length complied, and the Aztecs were seized, bound hand and foot, and placed under a guard.

In the night, the Spanish general procured the escape of two of them, and had them brought secretly before him. He expressed his regret at the indignity they had experienced from the Totonacs, told them, he would provide means for their flight, and to-morrow would endeavour to obtain the release of their companions. He desired them to report this to their master, with assurances of the great regard the Spaniards entertained for him, notwithstanding his ungenerous behaviour in leaving them to perish from want on his barren shores. He then sent the Mexican nobles down to the port, whence they were carried to another part of the coast by water, for fear of the violence of the Totonacs. These were greatly incensed at the escape of the prisoners, and would have sacrificed the remainder at once, but for the Spanish commander, who evinced the utmost horror at the proposal, and ordered them to be sent for safe custody on board the fleet. Soon after, they were permitted to join their companions.—This artful proceeding, so characteristic of the policy of Cortés, had, as we shall see hereafter, all the effect intended on Montezuma. It cannot be commended, certainly, as in the true spirit of chivalry, yet it has not wanted its panegyrist among the national historians!

By order of Cortés, messengers were despatched to the Totonac towns, to report what had been done, calling on them to refuse the payment of further tribute to Montezuma. But there was no need of messengers. The affrighted attendants of the Aztec lords had fled in every direction, bearing the tidings, which spread like wildfire through the country, of the daring insult offered to the majesty of Mexico. The astonished Indians, cheered with the sweet hope of regaining their ancient liberty, came in numbers to Chahuiztla, to see and confer with the formidable strangers. The more timid, dismayed at the thoughts of encountering the power of Montezuma, recommended an embassy to avert his displeasure by timely concessions. But the dexterous management of Cortés had committed them too far to allow any reasonable expectation of indulgence from this quarter. After some hesitation, therefore, it was determined to embrace the protection of the Spaniards, and to make one bold effort for the recovery of freedom. Oaths of allegiance were taken by the chiefs to the Spanish sovereigns, and duly recorded by Godoy, the royal notary. Cortés, satisfied with the important acquisition of so many vassals to the crown, set out soon after for the destined port, having first promised to revisit Cempoalla, where his business was but partially accomplished.

The spot selected for the new city was only half a league distant, in a wide and fruitful plain, affording a tolerable haven for the shipping. Cortés was not long in determining the circuit of the walls, and the sites of the fort, granary, town-house, temple, and other public buildings. The friendly Indians eagerly assisted, by bringing materials, stone, lime, wood, and bricks dried in the sun. Every man put his hand to the work. The general laboured with the meanest of the soldiers, stimulating their exertions by his example, as well as voice. In a few weeks the task was accomplished, and a town rose up, which, if not quite worthy of the aspiring name it bore, answered most of the purposes for which it was intended. It served as a good point d'appui for future operations, a place of retreat for the disabled, as well as for the army in case of reverses, a magazine for stores, and for such articles as might be received from or sent to the mother country, a port for the shipping, a position of sufficient strength to overawe the adjacent country.

It was the first colony—the fruitful parent of so many others—in New Spain. It was hailed with satisfaction by the simple natives, who hoped to repose in safety under its protecting shadow. Alas! they could not read the future, or they would have found no cause to rejoice in this harbinger of a revolution more tremendous than any predicted by their bards and prophets. It was not the good Quetzalcoatl who had returned to claim his own again, bringing peace, freedom, and civilisation in his train. Their fetters, indeed, would be broken, and their wrongs be amply avenged on the proud head of the Aztec. But it was to be by that strong arm, which should bow down equally the oppressor and the oppressed. The light of civilisation would be poured on their land. But it would be the light of a consuming fire, before which their barbaric glory, their institutions, their very existence and name as a nation, would wither and become extinct! Their doom was sealed when the white man had set his foot on their soil.

FROM THE OREGON TRAIL

SCENES AT FORT LARAMIE <sup>1</sup>

'Tis true they are a lawless brood, But rough in form, nor mild in mood.

THE BRIDE OF ABYDOS

LOOKING back, after the expiration of a year, upon Fort Laramie and its inmates, they seem less like a reality than like some fanciful picture of the olden time, so different was the scene from any which this tamer side of the world can present. Tall Indians, enveloped in their white buffalorobes, were striding across the area or reclining at full length on the low roofs of the buildings which inclosed it. Numerous squaws, gayly bedizened, sat grouped in front of the apartments they occupied, their mongrel offspring, restless and vociferous, rambling in every direction through the fort; and the trappers, traders, and engagés of the establishment were busy at their labor or their amusements.

We were met at the gate, but by no means cordially welcomed. Indeed, we seemed objects of some distrust and suspicion, until Henry Chatillon explained that we were not traders, and we, in confirmation, handed to the bourgeois a letter of introduction from his principals. He took it, turned it upside down, and tried hard to read it, but his literary attainments not being adequate to the task, he applied for relief to the clerk, a sleek, smiling Frenchman, named Montalon. The letter read, Bordeaux (the bourgeois) seemed gradually to awaken to a sense of what was expected of him. Though not deficient in hospitable intentions, he was wholly unaccustomed to act as master of ceremonies. Discarding all formalities of reception, he did not honor us with a single word, but walked swiftly across the area, while we followed in some admiration to a railing and a flight of steps opposite the entrance. He signed to us that we had better fasten our horses to the railing, then he walked up the steps, tramped along a rude balcony, and kicking open a door displayed a large room, rather more elaborately finished than a barn. For furniture it had a rough bedstead, but no bed, two chairs, a chest of drawers, a tin pail to hold water, and a board to cut tobacco upon. A brass crucifix hung on the wall, and close at hand a recent scalp, with hair full a yard long, was suspended from a nail . . .

This apartment, the best in Fort Laramie, was that usually occupied by the legitimate bourgeois, Papin, in whose absence the command devolved upon Bordeaux. The latter, a stout, bluff little fellow, much inflated by a sense of his new authority, began to roar for buffalo-robies. These being brought and spread upon the floor formed our beds, much better ones than we had of late been accustomed to. Our arrangements made, we stepped out to the balcony to take a more leisurely survey of the long-looked-for haven at which we had arrived at last. Beneath us was the square area surrounded by little rooms, or rather cells, which opened upon it. These were devoted to various purposes, but served chiefly for the accommodation of the men employed at the fort, or of the equally numerous squaws whom they were allowed to maintain in it. Opposite to us rose the block-house above the gateway, it was adorned with a figure which even now haunts my memory—a horse at full speed, daubed upon the boards with red paint, and exhibiting a degree of skill that might rival that displayed by the Indians in executing similar designs upon their robes and lodges. A busy scene was enacting in the area. The wagons of Vaskiss, an old trader, were about to set out for a remote post in the mountains, and the Canadians were going through their preparations with all possible bustle, while here and there an Indian stood looking on with imperturbable gravity.

Fort Laramie is one of the posts established by the 'American Fur Company,' who well-nigh monopolize the Indian trade of this whole region. Here their officials rule with an absolute sway, the arm of the United States has little force, for when we were there, the extreme outposts of her troops were about seven hundred miles to the eastward. The little fort is built of bricks dried in the sun, and externally is of an oblong form, with bastions of clay, in the form of ordinary blockhouses, at two of the corners. The walls are about fifteen feet high, and surmounted by a slender palisade. The roofs of the apartments within, which are built close against the walls, serve the purpose of a banquette. Within, the fort is divided by a partition, on one side is the square area, surrounded by the store-rooms, offices, and apartments of the inmates, on the other is the corral, a narrow place, encompassed by the high clay walls, where at night, or in presence of dangerous Indians, the horses and mules of the fort are crowded for safe keeping. The main entrance has two gates, with an arched passage intervening. A little square window, quite high above the ground, opens laterally from an adjoining chamber into this passage, so that when the inner gate is closed and barred, a person without may still hold communication with those within, through this narrow aperture. This obviates the necessity of admitting suspicious Indians, for purposes of trading, into the body of the fort, for when danger is apprehended, the inner gate is shut fast, and all traffic is carried on by means of the little window. This precaution, though highly necessary at some of the Company's posts, is now seldom resorted to at Fort Laramie, where, though men are frequently killed in its neighborhood, no apprehensions are now entertained of any general designs of hostility from the Indians.

We did not long enjoy our new quarters undisturbed. The door was silently pushed open, and two eyeballs and a visage as black as night looked in upon us, then a red arm and shoulder intruded themselves, and a tall Indian, gliding in, shook us by the hand, grunted his salutation, and sat down on the floor. Others followed, with faces of the natural hue, and letting fall their heavy robes from their shoulders, they took their seats, quite at ease, in a semicircle before us. The pipe was now to be lighted and passed round from one to another, and thus was the only entertainment that at present they expected from us. These visitors were fathers, brothers, or other relatives of the squaws in the fort, where they were permitted to remain, loitering about in perfect idleness. All those who smoked with us were men of standing and repute. Two or three others dropped in also, young fellows who neither by their years nor their exploits were entitled to rank with the old men and warriors, and who, abashed in the presence of their superiors, stood aloof, never withdrawing their eyes from us. Their cheeks were adorned with vermillion, their ears with pendants of shell, and their necks with beads. Never yet having signalized themselves as hunters, or performed the honorable exploit of killing a man, they were held in slight esteem, and were diffident and bashful in proportion. Certain formidable inconveniences attended this influx of visitors. They were bent on inspecting everything in the room, our equipments and our dress alike underwent their scrutiny, for though the contrary has been carelessly asserted, few beings have more curiosity than Indians in regard to subjects within their ordinary range of thought. As to other matters, indeed, they seemed utterly indifferent. They will not trouble themselves to inquire into what they cannot comprehend, but are quite contented to place their hands over their mouths in token of wonder, and exclaim that it is 'great medicine.' With this comprehensive solution, an Indian never is at a loss. He never launches forth into speculation and conjecture, his reason moves in its beaten track. His soul is dormant, and no exertions of the missionaries, Jesuit or Puritan, of the Old World or of the New, have as yet availed to rouse it.

As we were looking, at sunset, from the wall, upon the wild and desolate plains that surround the fort, we observed a cluster of strange objects, like scaffolds, rising in the distance against the red western sky. They bore aloft some singular-looking burdens, and at their foot glimmered something white, like bones. This was the place of sepulture of some Dahcotah chiefs, whose remains their people are fond of placing in the vicinity of the fort, in the hope that they may thus be protected from violation at the hands of their enemies. Yet it has happened more than once, and quite recently, that war-parties of the Crow Indians, ranging through the country, have thrown the bodies from the scaffolds and broken them to pieces, amid the yells of the Dahcotahs, who remained pent up in the fort, too few to defend the honored relics from insult. The white objects upon the ground were buffalo skulls, arranged in the mystic circle commonly seen in Indian places of sepulture upon the prairie.

We soon discovered, in the twilight, a band of fifty or sixty horses approaching the fort. These were the animals belonging to the establishment, who having been sent out to feed, under the care of armed guards, in the meadows below, were now being driven into the corral for the night. A little gate opened into this inclosure, by the side of it stood one of the guards, an old Canadian, with gray bushy eyebrows, and a dragoon-pistol stuck into his belt, while his comrade, mounted on horseback, his rifle laid across the saddle in front of him, and his long hair blowing before his swarthy face, rode at the rear of the disorderly troop, urging them up the ascent. In a moment the narrow corral was thronged with the half-wild horses, kicking, biting, and crowding restlessly together.

The discordant jingling of a bell, rung by a Canadian in the area, summoned us to supper. This sumptuous repast was served on a rough table in one of the lower apartments of the fort, and consisted of cakes of bread and dried buffalo-meat—an excellent thing for strengthening the teeth. At this meal were seated the bourgeois and superior dignitaries of the establishment, among whom Henry Chatillon was worthily included. No sooner was it finished than the table was spread a second time (the luxury of bread being now, however, omitted), for the benefit of certain hunters and trappers of an inferior standing, while the ordinary Canadian engages were regaled on dried meat in one of their lodging rooms. By way of illustrating the domestic economy of Fort Laramie, it may not be amiss to introduce in this place a story current among the men when we were there.

There was an old man named Pierre, whose duty it was to bring the meat from the store-room for the men. Old Pierre, in the kindness of his heart, used to select the fattest and the best pieces for his companions. This did not long escape the keen-eyed bourgeois, who was greatly disturbed at such improvidence, and cast about for some means to stop it. At last he hit on a plan that exactly suited him. At the side of the meat-room, and separated from it by a clay partition, was another apartment, used for the storage of furs. It had no other communication with the fort, except through a square hole in the partition, and of course it was perfectly dark. One evening the bourgeois, watching for a moment when no one observed him, dodged into the meat-room, clambered through the hole, and ensconced himself among the furs and buffalo-robcs. Soon after, old Pierre came in with his lantern, and, muttering to himself, began to pull over the bales of meat and select the best pieces, as usual. But suddenly a hollow and sepulchral voice proceeded from the inner apartment: 'Pierre! Pierre! Let that fat meat alone! Take nothing but lean!' Pierre dropped his lantern and bolted out into the fort, screaming, in an agony of terror, that the devil was in the store-room, but tripping on the threshold, he pitched over upon the gravel and lay senseless, stunned by the fall. The Canadians ran out to the rescue. Some lifted the unlucky Pierre, and others, making an extempore crucifix out of two sticks, were proceeding to attack the devil in his stronghold, when the bourgeois, with a crestfallen countenance, appeared at the door. To add to the bourgeois' mortification, he was obliged to explain the whole stratagem to Pierre, in order to bring the latter to his senses.

We were sitting, on the following morning, in the passageway between the gates, conversing with the traders Vaskiss and May. These two men, together with our sleek friend, the clerk Montalon, were, I believe, the only persons then in the fort who could read and write. May was telling a curious story about the traveler Catlin, when an ugly, diminutive Indian, wretchedly mounted, came up at a gallop and rode past us into the fort. On being questioned, he said that Smoke's village was close at hand. Accordingly only a few minutes elapsed before the hills beyond the river were covered with a disorderly swarm of savages, on horseback and on foot. May finished his story, and by that time the whole array had descended to Laramie Creek, and commenced crossing it in a mass. I walked down to the bank. The stream is wide, and was then between three and four feet deep, with a very swift current. For several rods the water was alive with dogs, horses, and Indians. The long poles used in erecting the lodges are carried by the horses, being fastened by the heavier end, two or three on each side, to a rude sort of pack-saddle, while the other end drags on the ground. About a foot behind the horse, a kind of large basket or pannier is suspended between the poles, and firmly lashed in its place. On the back of the horse are piled various articles of luggage, the basket also is well filled with domestic utensils, or, quite as often, with a litter of puppies, a brood of small children, or a superannuated old man. Numbers of these curious vehicles, called, in the bastard language of the country, travaux, were now splashing together through the stream. Among them swam countless dogs, often burdened with miniature travaux, and dashing forward on horseback through the throng came the superbly formed warriors, the slender figure of some lynx-eyed boy clinging fast behind them. The women sat perched on the pack-saddles, adding not a little to the load of the already overburdened horses. The confusion was prodigious. The dogs yelled and howled in chorus, the puppies in the travaux set up a dismal whine as the water invaded their comfortable retreat, the little black-eyed children, from one year of age upward, clung fast with both hands to the edge of their baskets, and looked over in alarm at the water rushing so near them, sputtering and making wry mouths as it splashed against their faces. Some of the dogs, encumbered by their load, were carried down by the current, yelping piteously, and the old squaws would rush into the water, seize their favorites by the neck, and drag them out. As each horse gained the bank, he scrambled up as he could. Stray horses and colts came among the rest, often breaking away at full speed through the crowd, followed by the old hags, screaming, after their fashion, on all occasions of excitement. Buxom young squaws, blooming in all the charms of vermilion, stood here and there on the bank, holding aloft their master's lance as a signal to collect the scattered portions of his household. In a few moments the crowd melted away, each family, with its horses and equipage, filing off to the plain at the rear of the fort, and here, in the space of half an hour, arose sixty or seventy of their tapering lodges. Their horses were feeding by hundreds over the surrounding prairie, and their dogs were roaming everywhere. The fort was full of men, and the children were whooping and yelling incessantly under the walls.

These new-comers were scarcely arrived, when Bordeaux was running across the fort, shouting to his squaw to bring him his spy-glass. The obedient Marie, the very model of a squaw, produced the instrument, and Bordeaux hurried with it up to the wall. Pointing it to the eastward, he exclaimed, with an oath, that the families were coming. But a few moments elapsed before the heavy caravan of the emigrant wagons could be seen, steadily advancing from the hills. They gained the river, and without turning or pausing plunged in, they passed through, and slowly ascending the opposing bank, kept directly on their way past the fort and the Indian village, until, gaining a spot a quarter of a mile distant, they wheeled into a circle. For some time our tranquillity was undisturbed. The emigrants were preparing their encampment, but no sooner was this accomplished than Fort Laramie was fairly taken by storm. A crowd of broad-brimmed hats, thin visages, and staring eyes appeared suddenly at the gate. Tall, awkward men, in brown homespun, women with cadaverous faces and long lank figures, came thronging in together, and, as if inspired by the very demon of curiosity, ransacked every nook and corner of the fort. Dismayed at this invasion, we withdrew in all speed to our chamber, vainly hoping that it might prove an inviolable sanctuary. The emigrants prosecuted their investigations with untiring vigor. They penetrated the rooms, or rather dens, inhabited by the astonished squaws. They explored the apartments of the men, and even that of Marie and the bourgeois. At last a numerous deputation appeared at our door, but were immediately expelled. Being totally devoid of any sense of delicacy or propriety, they seemed resolved to search every mystery to the bottom.

Having at length satisfied their curiosity, they next proceeded to business. The men occupied themselves in procuring supplies for their onward journey, either buying them with money or giving in exchange superfluous articles of their own.

The emigrants felt a violent prejudice against the French Indians, as they called the trappers and traders. They thought, and with some justice, that these men bore them no good will. Many of them were firmly persuaded that the French were instigating the Indians to attack and cut them off. On visiting the encampment we were at once struck with the extraordinary perplexity and indecision that prevailed among the emigrants. They seemed like men totally out of their elements, bewildered and amazed, like a troop of school-boys lost in the woods. It was impossible to be long among them without being conscious of the high and bold spirit with which most of them were animated. But the forest is the home of the backwoodsman. On the remote prairie he is totally at a loss. He differs as much from the genuine 'mountain-man,' the wild prairie hunter, as a Canadian voyageur, paddling his canoe on the rapids of the Ottawa, differs from an American sailor among the storms of Cape Horn. Still my companion and I were somewhat at a loss to account for this perturbed state of mind. It could not be cowardice, these men were of the same stock with the volunteers of Monterey and Buena Vista. Yet, for the most part, they were the rudest and most ignorant of the frontier population, they knew absolutely nothing of the country and its inhabitants, they had already experienced much misfortune and apprehended more, they had seen nothing of mankind, and had never put their own resources to the test.

A full proportion of suspicion fell upon us. Being strangers, we were looked upon as enemies. Having occasion for a supply of lead and a few other necessary articles, we used to go over to the emigrant camps to obtain them. After some hesitation, some dubious glances, and fumbling of the hands in the pockets, the terms would be agreed upon, the price tendered, and the emigrant would go off to bring the article in question. After waiting until our patience gave out, we would go in search of him, and find him seated on the tongue of his wagon.

'Well, stranger,' he would observe, as he saw us approach, 'I reckon I won't trade.'

Some friend of his had followed him from the scene of the bargain, and suggested in his ear that clearly we meant to cheat him, and he had better have nothing to do with us.

This timorous mood of the emigrants was doubly unfortunate, as it exposed them to real danger. Assume, in the presence of Indians, a bold bearing, self-confident yet vigilant, and you will find them tolerably safe neighbors But your safety depends on the respect and fear you are able to inspire If you betray timidity or indecision, you convert them from that moment into insidious and dangerous enemies The Dahcotah saw clearly enough the perturbation of the emigrants, and instantly availed themselves of it They became extremely insolent and exacting in their demands It has become an established custom with them to go to the camp of every party, as it arrives in succession at the fort, and demand a feast Smoke's village had come with this express design, having made several days' journey with no other object than that of enjoying a cup of coffee and two or three biscuits So the 'feast' was demanded, and the emigrants dared not refuse it

One evening, about sunset, the village was deserted We met old men, warriors, squaws, and children in gay attire, trooping off to the encampment, with faces of anticipation, and, arriving here, they seated themselves in a semicircle Smoke occupied the center, with his warriors on either hand, the young men and boys next succeeded, and the squaws and children formed the horns of the crescent The biscuit and coffee were most promptly dispatched, the emigrants staring open-mouthed at their savage guests With each new emigrant party that arrived at Fort Laramie this scene was renewed, and every day the Indians grew more rapacious and presumptuous One evening they broke to pieces, out of mere wantonness, the cups from which they had been feasted, and thus so exasperated the emigrants that many of them seized their rifles and could scarcely be restrained from firing on the insolent mob of Indians Before we left the country, this dangerous spirit on the part of the Dahcotah had mounted to a yet higher pitch They began openly to threaten the emigrants with destruction, and actually fired upon one or two parties of whites A military force and military law are urgently called for in that perilous region, and unless troops are speedily stationed at Fort Laramie, or elsewhere in the neighborhood, both the emigrants and other travelers will be exposed to most imminent risks

The Ogillallah, the Brulé, and the other western bands of the Dahcotah are thorough savages, unchanged by any contact with civilization Not one of them can speak an European tongue, or has ever visited an American settlement Until within a year or two, when the emigrants began to pass through their country on the way to Oregon, they had seen no whites except the handful employed about the Fur Company's posts They esteemed them a wise people, inferior only to themselves, living in leather lodges, like their own, and subsisting on buffalo But when the swarm of Meneaska, with their oxen and wagons, began to invade them, their astonishment was unbounded They could scarcely believe that the earth contained such a multitude of white men Their wonder is now giving way to indignation, and the result, unless vigilantly guarded against, may be lamentable in the extreme

But to glance at the interior of a lodge. Shaw and I used often to visit them. Indeed, we spent most of our evenings in the Indian village, Shaw's assumption of the medical character giving us a fair pretext As a sample of the rest I will describe one of these visits The sun had just set, and the horses were driven into the corral The Prairie Cock, a noted beau, came in at the gate with a bevy of young girls, with whom he began a dance in the area, leading them round and round in a circle, while he jerked up from his chest a succession of monotonous sounds, to which they kept time in a rueful chant Outside the gate boys and young men were idly frolicking, and close by, looking grimly upon them, stood a warrior in his robe, with his face painted jet-black, in token that he had lately taken a Pawnee scalp Passing these, the tall dark lodges rose between us and the red western sky We repaired at once to the lodge of Old Smoke himself It was by no means better than the others, indeed, it was rather shabby, for in this democratic community the chief never assumes superior state Smoke sat cross-legged on a buffalo-robe, and his grunt of salutation as we entered was unusually cordial, out of respect, no doubt, to Shaw's medical character. Seated around the lodge were several squaws, and an abundance of children The complaint of Shaw's patients was, for the most part, a severe inflammation of the eyes, occasioned by exposure to the sun, a species of disorder which he treated with some success. He had brought with him a homœopathic medicine-chest, and was, I presume, the first who introduced that harmless system of treatment among the Ogillallah. No sooner had a robe been spread at the head of the lodge for our accommodation, and we had seated ourselves upon it, than a patient made her appearance: the chief's daughter herself, who, to do her justice, was the best-looking girl in the village. Being on excellent terms with the physician, she placed herself readily under his hands, and submitted with a good grace to his applications, laughing in his face during the whole process, for a squaw hardly knows how to smile. This case dispatched, another of a different kind succeeded. A hideous, emaciated old woman sat in the darkest corner of the lodge rocking to and fro with pain, and hiding her eyes from the light by pressing the palms of both hands against her face. At Smoke's command she came forward, very unwillingly, and exhibited a pair of eyes that had nearly disappeared from excess of inflammation. No sooner had the doctor fastened his grip upon her than she set up a dismal moaning, and writhed so in his grasp that he lost all patience, but being resolved to carry his point, he succeeded at last in applying his favorite remedies.

'It is strange,' he said, when the operation was finished, 'that I forgot to bring any Spanish flies with me, we must have something here to answer for a counter-irritant!'

So, in the absence of better, he seized upon a red-hot brand from the fire, and clapped it against the temple of the old squaw, who set up an unearthly howl, at which the rest of the family broke out into a laugh.

During these medical operations Smoke's eldest squaw entered the lodge, with a sort of stone mallet in her hand. I had observed some time before a litter of well-grown black puppies, comfortably nestled among some buffalo-ropes at one side, but this new-comer speedily disturbed their enjoyment, for, seizing one of them by the hind paw, she dragged him out, and carrying him to the entrance of the lodge, hammered him on the head till she killed him. Being quite conscious to what this preparation tended, I looked through a hole in the back of the lodge to see the next steps of the process. The squaw, holding the puppy by the legs, was swinging him to and fro through the blaze of a fire, until the hair was singed off. This done, she unsheathed her knife and cut him into small pieces, which she dropped into a kettle to boil. In a few moments a large wooden dish was set before us, filled with this delicate preparation. We felt conscious of the honor. A dog-feast is the greatest compliment a Dahcotah can offer to his guest, and knowing that to refuse eating would be an affront, we attacked the little dog and devoured him before the eyes of his unconscious parent. Smoke in the meantime was preparing his great pipe. It was lighted when we had finished our repast, and we passed it from one to another till the bowl was empty. This done, we took our leave without further ceremony, knocked at the gate of the fort, and, after making ourselves known, were admitted.

FROM TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST

THE FLOGGING <sup>1</sup>

FOR several days the captain seemed very much out of humor. Nothing went right, or fast enough for him. He quarrelled with the cook, and threatened to flog him for throwing wood on deck, and had a dispute with the mate about reeving a Spanish burton, the mate saying that he was right, and had been taught how to do it by a man who was a sailor<sup>1</sup>. This, the captain took in dudgeon, and they were at sword's points at once. But his displeasure was chiefly turned against a large, heavy-moulded fellow from the Middle States, who was called Sam. This man hesitated in his speech, and was rather slow in his motions, but was a pretty good sailor, and always seemed to do his best, but the captain took a dislike to him, thought he was surly, and lazy, and 'if you once give a dog a bad name'—as the sailor-phrase is—'he may as well jump overboard'. The captain found fault with everything this man did, and hazed him for dropping a marline-spike from the main-yard, where he was at work. This, of course, was an accident, but it was set down against him. The captain was on board all day Friday, and everything went on hard and disagreeably. 'The more you drive a man, the less he will do,' was as true with us as with any other people. We worked late Friday night, and were turned-to, early Saturday morning. About ten o'clock the captain ordered our new officer, Russell, who by this time had become thoroughly disliked by all the crew, to get the gig ready to take him ashore. John, the Swede, was sitting in the boat alongside, and Russell and myself were standing by the main hatchway, waiting for the captain, who was down in the hold, where the crew were at work, when we heard his voice raised in violent dispute with somebody, whether it was with the mate, or one of the crew, I could not tell, and then came blows and scuffling. I ran to the side and beckoned to John, who came up, and we leaned down the hatchway, and though we could see no one, yet we knew that the captain had the advantage, for his voice was loud and clear—

'You see your condition! You see your condition! Will you ever give me any more of your jaw?' No answer, and then came wrestling and heaving, as though the man was trying to turn him. 'You may as well keep still, for I have got you,' said the captain. Then came the question, 'Will you ever give me any more of your jaw?'

'I never gave you any, sir,' said Sam, for it was his voice that we heard, though low and half choked.

'That's not what I ask you. Will you ever be impudent to me again?'

'I never have been, sir,' said Sam.

'Answer my question, or I'll make a spread eagle of you! I'll flog you.'

'I'm no negro slave,' said Sam.

'Then I'll make you one,' said the captain, and he came to the hatchway, and sprang on deck, threw off his coat, and rolling up his sleeves, called out to the mate—'Seize that man up, Mr A—! Seize him up! Make a spread eagle of him! I'll teach you all who is master aboard!'

The crew and officers followed the captain up the hatchway, and after repeated orders the mate laid hold of Sam, who made no resistance, and carried him to the gangway.

'What are you going to flog that man for, sir?' said John, the Swede, to the captain.

Upon hearing this, the captain turned upon him, but knowing him to be quick and resolute, he ordered the steward to bring the irons, and calling upon Russell to help him, went up to John.

'Let me alone,' said John. 'I'm willing to be put in irons. You need not use any force,' and putting out his hands, the captain slipped the irons on, and sent him aft to the quarter-deck. Sam by this time was seized up, as it is called, that is, placed against the shrouds, with his wrists made fast to the shrouds, his jacket off, and his back exposed. The captain stood on the break of the deck, a few feet from him, and a little raised, so as to have a good swing at him, and held in his hand the bight of a thick, strong rope. The officers stood round, and the crew grouped together in the waist. All these preparations made me feel sick and almost faint, angry and excited as I was. A man—a human being, made in God's likeness—fastened up and flogged like a beast! A man, too, whom I had lived with and eaten with for months, and knew almost as well as a brother. The first and almost uncontrollable impulse was resistance. But what was to be done? The time for it had gone by. The two best men were fast, and there were only two beside myself, and a small boy of ten or twelve years of age. And then there were (beside the captain) three officers, steward, agent, and clerk. But beside the numbers, what is there for sailors to do? If they resist, it is mutiny, and if they succeed, and take the vessel, it is piracy. If they ever yield again, their punishment must come, and if they do not yield, they are pirates for life. If a sailor resist his commander, he resists the law, and piracy or submission are his only alternatives. Bad as it was, it must be borne. It is what a sailor ships for. Swinging the rope over his head, and bending his body so as to give it full force, the captain brought it down upon the poor fellow's back. Once, twice,—six times. 'Will you ever give me any more of your jaw?' The man writhed with pain, but said not a word. Three times more. This was too much, and he muttered something which I could not hear, this brought as many more as the man could stand, when the captain ordered him to be cut down, and to go forward.

'Now for you,' said the captain, making up to John and taking his irons off. As soon as he was loose, he ran forward to the fore-castle. 'Bring that man aft,' shouted the captain. The second mate, who had been a shipmate of John's, stood still in the waist, and the mate walked slowly forward, but our third officer, anxious to show his zeal, sprang forward over the windlass, and laid hold of John, but he soon threw him from him. At this moment I would have given worlds for the power to help the poor fellow, but it was all in vain. The captain stood on the quarter-deck, bare-headed, his eyes flashing with rage, and his face as red as blood, swinging the rope, and calling out to his officers, 'Drag him aft!—Lay hold of him! I'll sweeten him!' etc. The mate now went forward and told John quietly to go aft, and he, seeing resistance in vain, threw the blackguard third mate from him, said he would go aft of himself, that they should not drag him, and went up to the gangway and held out his hands, but as soon as the captain began to make him fast, the indignity was too much, and he began to resist, but the mate and Russell holding him, he was soon seized up. When he was made fast, he turned to the captain, who stood turning up his sleeves and getting ready for the blow, and asked him what he was to be flogged for. 'Have I ever refused my duty, sir? Have you ever known me to hang back, or to be insolent, or not to know my work?'

'No,' said the captain, 'it is not that that I flog you for, I flog you for your interference—for asking questions.'

'Can't a man ask a question here without being flogged?'

'No,' shouted the captain, 'nobody shall open his mouth aboard this vessel, but myself,' and began laying the blows upon his back, swinging half round between each blow, to give it full effect. As he went on, his passion increased, and he danced about the deck, calling out as he swung the rope, —'If you want to know what I flog you for I'll tell you. It's because I like to do it!—because I like to do it!—It suits me! That's what I do it for!'

The man writhed under the pain, until he could endure it no longer, when he called out, with an exclamation more common among foreigners than with us—'Oh, Jesus Christ! Oh, Jesus Christ!'

'Don't call on Jesus Christ,' shouted the captain, 'he can't help you. Call on Captain T— He's the man! He can help you! Jesus Christ can't help you now!'

At these words, which I never shall forget, my blood ran cold. I could look on no longer. Disgusted, sick, and horror-struck, I turned away and leaned over the rail, and looked down into the water. A few rapid thoughts of my own situation, and of the prospect of future revenge, crossed my mind, but the falling of the blows and the cries of the man called me back at once. At length they ceased, and turning round, I found that the mate, at a signal from the captain, had cut him down. Almost doubled up with pain, the man walked slowly forward, and went down into the fore-castle. Every one else stood still at his post, while the captain, swelling with rage and with the importance of his achievement, walked the quarter-deck, and at each turn, as he came forward, calling out to us,—‘You see your condition! You see where I’ve got you all, and you know what to expect!’—‘You’ve been mistaken in me—you didn’t know what I was! Now you know what I am!’—‘I’ll make you toe the mark, every soul of you, or I’ll flog you all, fore and aft, from the boy, up!’—‘You’ve got a driver over you! Yes, a slave-driver—a negro-driver! I’ll see who’ll tell me he isn’t a negro slave!’ With this and the like matter, equally calculated to quiet us, and to allay any apprehensions of future trouble, he entertained us for about ten minutes, when he went below. Soon after, John came aft, with his bare back covered with stripes and wales in every direction, and dreadfully swollen, and asked the steward to ask the captain to let him have some salve, or balsam, to put upon it. ‘No,’ said the captain, who heard him from below, ‘tell him to put his shirt on, that’s the best thing for him, and pull me ashore in the boat. Nobody is going to lay-up on board this vessel.’ He then called to Mr. Russell to take those two men and two others in the boat, and pull him ashore. I went for one. The two men could hardly bend their backs, and the captain called to them to ‘give way,’ ‘give way!’ but finding they did their best, he let them alone. The agent was in the stern sheets, but during the whole pull—a league or more—not a word was spoken. We landed, the captain, agent, and officer went up to the house, and left us with the boat. I, and the man with me, staid near the boat, while John and Sam walked slowly away, and sat down on rocks. They talked some time together, but at length separated, each sitting alone. I had some fears of John. He was a foreigner, and violently tempered, and under suffering, and he had his knife with him, and the captain was to come down alone to the boat. But nothing happened, and we went quietly on board. The captain was probably armed, and if either of them had lifted a hand against him they would have had nothing before them but flight, and starvation in the woods of California, or capture by the soldiers and Indian blood-hounds, whom the offer of twenty dollars would have set upon them.

After the day’s work was done, we went down into the fore-castle, and ate our plain supper, but not a word was spoken. It was Saturday night, but there was no song—no ‘sweethearts and wives.’ A gloom was over everything. The two men lay in their berths, groaning with pain, and we all turned in, but for myself, not to sleep. A sound coming now and then from the berths of the two men showed that they were awake, as awake they must have been, for they could hardly lie in one posture a moment, the dim, swinging lamp of the fore-castle shed its light over the dark hole in which we lived, and many and various reflections and purposes coursed through my mind. I thought of our situation, living under a tyranny, of the character of the country we were in, of the length of the voyage, and of the uncertainty attending our return to America, and then, if we should return, of the prospect of obtaining justice and satisfaction for these poor men, and vowed that if God should ever give me the means, I would do something to redress the grievances and relieve the sufferings of that poor class of beings, of whom I then was one.

FROM TYPEE TYPEE MORTARKEE<sup>1</sup>

I

TYPEE or Happar? A frightful death at the hands of the fiercest of cannibals, or a kindly reception from a gentler race of savages? Which? But it was too late now to discuss a question which would so soon be answered

The part of the valley in which we found ourselves appeared to be altogether uninhabited. An almost impenetrable thicket extended from side to side, without presenting a single plant affording the nourishment we had confidently calculated upon, and with this object, we followed the course of the stream, casting quick glances as we proceeded into the thick jungles on either hand

My companion—to whose solicitations I had yielded in descending into the valley—now that the step was taken, began to manifest a degree of caution I had little expected from him. He proposed that, in the event of our finding an adequate supply of fruit, we should remain in this unfrequented portion of the country—where we should run little chance of being surprised by its occupants, whoever they might be—until sufficiently recruited to resume our journey, when, laying in a store of food equal to our wants, we might easily regain the bay of Nukuheva, after the lapse of a sufficient interval to ensure the departure of our vessel

I objected strongly to this proposition, plausible as it was, as the difficulties of the route would be almost insurmountable, unacquainted as we were with the general bearings of the country, and I reminded my companion of the hardships which we had already encountered in our uncertain wanderings, in a word, I said that since we had deemed it advisable to enter the valley, we ought manfully to face the consequences, whatever they might be; the more especially as I was convinced there was no alternative left us but to fall in with the natives at once, and boldly risk the reception they might give us, and that as to myself, I felt the necessity of rest and shelter, and that until I had obtained them, I should be wholly unable to encounter such sufferings as we had lately passed through. To the justice of these observations Toby somewhat reluctantly assented.

We were surprised that, after moving as far as we had along the valley, we should still meet with the same impervious thickets, and thinking that although the borders of the stream might be lined for some distance with them, yet beyond there might be more open ground, I requested Toby to keep a bright look-out upon one side, while I did the same on the other, in order to discover some opening in the bushes, and especially to watch for the slightest appearance of a path or anything else that might indicate the vicinity of the islanders.

What furtive and anxious glances we cast into those dim-looking shades! With what apprehensions we proceeded, ignorant at what moment we might be greeted by the javelin of some ambushed savage! At last my companion paused, and directed my attention to a narrow opening in the foliage. We struck into it, and it soon brought us by an indistinctly traced path to a comparatively clear space, at the farther end of which we descried a number of the trees, the native name of which is 'annuee,' and which bear a most delicious fruit.

What a race! I hobbling over the ground like some decrepit wretch, and Toby leaping forward like a greyhound. He quickly cleared one of the trees on which there were two or three of the fruit, but to our chagrin they proved to be much decayed, the rinds partly opened by the birds, and their hearts half devoured. However, we quickly dispatched them, and no ambrosia could have been more delicious.

We looked about us uncertain whither to direct our steps, since the path we had so far followed appeared to be lost in the open space around us. At last we resolved to enter a grove near at hand, and had advanced a few rods, when, just upon its skirts, I picked up a slender bread-fruit shoot perfectly green, and with the tender bark freshly stript from it. It was still slippery with moisture, and appeared as if it had been but that moment thrown aside. I said nothing, but merely held it up to Toby, who started at this undeniable evidence of the vicinity of the savages.

The plot was now thickening—A short distance farther lay a little faggot of the same shoots bound together with a strip of bark. Could it have been thrown down by some solitary native, who, alarmed at seeing us, had hurried forward to carry the tidings of our approach to his countrymen?—Typee or Happar?—But it was too late to recede, so we moved on slowly, my companion in advance casting eager glances under the trees on either side, until all at once I saw him recoil as if stung by an adder. Sinking on his knee, he waved me off with one hand, while with the other he held aside some intervening leaves, and gazed intently at some object.

Disregarding his injunction, I quickly approached him and caught a glimpse of two figures partly hidden by the dense foliage, they were standing close together, and were perfectly motionless. They must have previously perceived us, and withdrawn into the depths of the wood to elude our observation.

My mind was at once made up. Dropping my staff, and tearing open the package of things we had brought from the ship, I unrolled the cotton cloth, and holding it in one hand, plucked with the other a twig from the bushes beside me, and telling Toby to follow my example, I broke through the covert and advanced, waving the branch in token of peace toward the shrinking forms before me.

They were a boy and a girl, slender and graceful, and completely naked, with the exception of a slight girdle of bark, from which depended at opposite points two of the russet leaves of the bread-fruit tree. An arm of the boy, half screened from sight by her wild tresses, was thrown about the neck of the girl, while with the other he held one of her hands in his, and thus they stood together, their heads inclined forward, catching the faint noise we made in our progress, and with one foot in advance, as if half inclined to fly from our presence.

As we drew near, their alarm evidently increased. Apprehensive that they might fly from us altogether, I stopped short and motioned them to advance and receive the gift I extended toward them, but they would not, I then uttered a few words of their language with which I was acquainted, scarcely expecting that they would understand me, but to show that we had not dropped from the clouds upon them. This appeared to give them a little confidence, so I approached nearer, presenting the cloth with one hand, and holding the bough with the other, while they slowly retreated. At last they suffered us to approach so near to them that we were enabled to throw the cotton cloth across their shoulders, giving them to understand that it was theirs, and by a variety of gestures endeavouring to make them understand that we entertained the highest possible regard for them.

The frightened pair now stood still, whilst we endeavoured to make them comprehend the nature of our wants. In doing this Toby went through with a complete series of pantomimic illustrations—opening his mouth from ear to ear, and thrusting his fingers down his throat, gnashing his teeth and rolling his eyes about, till I verily believe the poor creatures took us for a couple of white cannibals who were about to make a meal of them. When, however, they understood us, they showed no inclination to relieve our wants. At this juncture it began to rain violently, and we motioned them to lead us to some place of shelter. With this request they appeared willing to comply, but nothing could evince more strongly the apprehension with which they regarded us, than the way in which, whilst walking before us, they kept their eyes constantly turned back to watch every movement we made, and even our very looks.

'Typee or Happar, Toby?' asked I, as we walked after them.

'Of course, Happar,' he replied, with a show of confidence which was intended to disguise his doubts.

'We shall soon know,' I exclaimed, and at the same moment I stepped forward toward our guides, and pronouncing the two names interrogatively, and pointing to the lowest part of the valley, endeavoured to come to the point at once. They repeated the words after me again and again, but without giving any peculiar emphasis to either, so that I was completely at a loss to understand them, for a couple of wihier young things than we afterward found them to have been on this particular occasion never probably fell in any traveller's way

More and more curious to ascertain our fate, I now threw together in the form of a question the words 'Happar' and 'Mortar-kee,' the latter being equivalent to the word 'good.' The two natives interchanged glances of peculiar meaning with one another at this, and manifested no little surprise, but on the repetition of the question, after some consultation together, to the great joy of Toby, they answered in the affirmative. Toby was now in ecstasies, especially as the young savages continued to reiterate their answer with great energy, as though desirous of impressing us with the idea that being among the Happars, we ought to consider ourselves perfectly secure

Although I had some lingering doubts, I feigned great delight with Toby at this announcement, while my companion broke out into a pantomimic abhorrence of Typee, and immeasurable love for the particular valley in which we were, our guides all the while gazing uneasily at one another, as if at a loss to account for our conduct

They hurried on, and we followed them, until suddenly they set up a strange halloo, which was answered from beyond the grove through which we were passing, and the next moment we entered upon some open ground, at the extremity of which we descried a long, low hut, and in front of it were several young girls. As soon as they perceived us they fled with wild screams into the adjoining thickets, like so many startled fawns. A few moments after the whole valley resounded with savage outcries, and the natives came running toward us from every direction

Had an army of invaders made an irruption into their territory, they could not have evinced greater excitement. We were soon completely encircled by a dense throng, and in their eager desire to behold us, they almost arrested our progress, an equal number surrounding our youthful guides, who, with amazing volubility, appeared to be detailing the circumstances which had attended their meeting with us. Every item of intelligence appeared to redouble the astonishment of the islanders, and they gazed at us with inquiring looks

At last we reached a large and handsome building of bamboos, and were by signs told to enter it, the natives opening a lane for us through which to pass, on entering, without ceremony we threw our exhausted frames upon the mats that covered the floor. In a moment the slight tenement was completely full of people, whilst those who were unable to obtain admittance gazed at us through its open cane-work

It was now evening, and by the dim light we could just discern the savage countenances around us, gleaming with wild curiosity and wonder, the naked forms and tattooed limbs of brawny warriors, with here and there the slighter figures of young girls, all engaged in a perfect storm of conversation, of which we were of course the one only theme, whilst our recent guides were fully occupied in answering the innumerable questions which everyone put to them. Nothing can exceed the fierce gesticulation of these people when animated in conversation, and on this occasion they gave loose to all their natural vivacity, shouting and dancing about in a manner that well-nigh intimidated us

Close to where we lay, squatting upon their haunches, were some eight or ten noble-looking chiefs—for such they subsequently proved to be—who, more reserved than the rest, regarded us with a fixed and stern attention, which not a little discomposed our equanimity. One of them in particular, who appeared to be the highest in rank, placed himself directly facing me, looking at me with a rigidity of aspect under which I absolutely quailed. He never once opened his lips, but maintained his severe expression of countenance, without turning his face aside for a single moment. Never before had I been subjected to so strange and steady a glance, it revealed nothing of the mind of the savage, but it appeared to be reading my own absolutely nervous, with a view of diverting it if possible, and conciliating the good opinion of the warrior, I took some tobacco from the bosom of my frock, and offered it to him. He quietly rejected the proffered gift, and, without speaking, motioned me to return it to its place.

After undergoing this scrutiny till I grew

In my previous intercourse with the natives of Nukuheva and Tior, I had found that the present of a small piece of tobacco would have rendered any of them devoted to my service. Was this act of the chief a token of his enmity? Typee or Happar? I asked within myself I started, for at the same moment this identical question was asked by the strange being before me. I turned to Toby, the flickering light of a native taper showed me his countenance pale with trepidation at this fatal question. I paused for a second, and I know not by what impulse it was that I answered, 'Typee.' The piece of dusky statuary nodded in approval, and then murmured, 'Mortarkee?' 'Mortarkee,' said I, without further hesitation—'Typee mortarkee.'

What a transition! The dark figures around us leaped to their feet, clapped their hands in transport, and shouted again and again the talismanic syllables, the utterance of which appeared to have settled everything.

When this commotion had a little subsided, the principal chief squatted once more before me, and throwing himself into a sudden rage, poured forth a string of philippics, which I was at no loss to understand, from the frequent recurrence of the word Happar, as being directed against the natives of the adjoining valley. In all these denunciations my companion and I acquiesced, while we extolled the character of the warlike Typees. To be sure our panegyrics were somewhat laconic, consisting in the repetition of that name, united with the potent adjective 'mortarkee.' But this was sufficient, and served to conciliate the good-will of the natives, with whom our congeniality of sentiment on this point did more toward inspiring a friendly feeling than anything else that could have happened.

At last the wrath of the chief evaporated, and in a few moments he was as placid as ever. Laying his hand upon his breast, he now gave me to understand that his name was 'Mehevi,' and that, in return, he wished me to communicate my appellation. I hesitated for an instant, thinking that it might be difficult for him to pronounce my real name, and then, with the most praiseworthy intentions, intimated that I was known as 'Tom.' But I could not have made a worse selection, the chief could not master it. 'Tommo,' 'Tomma,' 'Tommee,' everything but plain 'Tom.' As he persisted in garnishing the word with an additional syllable, I compromised the matter with him at the word 'Tommo,' and by that name I went during the entire period of my stay in the valley. The same proceeding was gone through with Toby, whose mellifluous appellation was more easily caught.

An exchange of names is equivalent to a ratification of good-will and amity among these simple people, and as we were aware of this fact, we were delighted that it had taken place on the present occasion.

Reclining upon our mats, we now held a kind of levee, giving audience to successive troops of the natives, who introduced themselves to us by pronouncing their respective names, and retired in high good-humour on receiving ours in return. During the ceremony the greatest merriment prevailed, nearly every announcement on the part of the islanders being followed by a fresh sally of gaiety, which induced me to believe that some of them at least were innocently diverting the company at our expense, by bestowing upon themselves a string of absurd titles, of the humour of which we were, of course, entirely ignorant.

All this occupied about an hour, when the throng having a little diminished, I turned to Mehevi, and gave him to understand that we were in need of food and sleep. Immediately the attentive chief addressed a few words to one of the crowd, who disappeared, and returned in a few moments with a calabash of 'poe-poe,' and two or three young cocoa-nuts stripped of their husks, and with their shells partly broken. We both of us forthwith placed one of these natural goblets to our lips, and drained it in a moment of the refreshing draught it contained. The poe-poe was then placed before us, and even famished as I was, I paused to consider in what manner to convey it to my mouth

This staple article of food among the Marquese islanders is manufactured from the produce of the bread-fruit tree. It somewhat resembles in its plastic nature our bookbinders' paste, is of a yellow colour, and somewhat tart to the taste.

Such was the dish, the merits of which I was now eager to discuss. I eyed it wistfully for a moment, and then, unable any longer to stand on ceremony, plunged my hand into the yielding mass, and to the boisterous mirth of the natives drew it forth laden with the poee-poe, which adhered in lengthening strings to every finger. So stubborn was its consistency, that in conveying my heavily-freighted hand to my mouth, the connecting links almost raised the calabash from the mats on which it had been placed. This display of awkwardness—in which, by the by, Toby kept me company—convulsed the bystanders with uncontrollable laughter.

As soon as their merriment had somewhat subsided, Mehevi, motioning us to be attentive, dipped the forefinger of his right hand in the dish, and giving it a rapid and scientific twirl, drew it out coated smoothly with the preparation. With a second peculiar flourish he prevented the poee-poe from dropping to the ground as he raised it to his mouth, into which the finger was inserted, and drawn forth perfectly free from any adhesive matter. This performance was evidently intended for our instruction, so I again essayed the feat on the principles inculcated, but with very ill success.

A starving man, however, little heeds conventional proprieties, especially on a South Sea island, and accordingly Toby and I partook of the dish after our own clumsy fashion, beplastering our faces all over with the glutinous compound, and daubing our hands nearly to the wrist. This kind of food is by no means disagreeable to the palate of a European, though at first the mode of eating it may be. For my own part, after the lapse of a few days I became accustomed to its singular flavour, and grew remarkably fond of it.

So much for the first course, several other dishes followed it, some of which were positively delicious. We concluded our banquet by tossing off the contents of two more young cocoa-nuts, after which we regaled ourselves with the soothing fumes of tobacco, inhaled from a quaintly carved pipe which passed round the circle.

During the repast, the natives eyed us with intense curiosity, observing our minutest motions, and appearing to discover abundant matter for comment in the most trifling occurrence. Their surprise mounted the highest, when we began to remove our uncomfortable garments, which were saturated with rain. They scanned the whiteness of our limbs, and seemed utterly unable to account for the contrast they presented to the swarthy hue of our faces, embrowned from a six months' exposure to the scorching sun of the Line. They felt our skin, much in the same way that a silk mercer would handle a remarkably fine piece of satin, and some of them went so far in their investigation as to apply the olfactory organ.

Their singular behaviour almost led me to imagine that they never before had beheld a white man, but a few moments' reflection convinced me that this could not have been the case, and a more satisfactory reason for their conduct has since suggested itself to my mind.

Deterred by the frightful stories related of its inhabitants, ships never enter this bay, while their hostile relations with the tribes in the adjoining valleys prevent the Typees from visiting that section of the island where vessels occasionally lie. At long intervals, however, some intrepid captain will touch on the skirts of the bay, with two or three armed boats' crews, and accompanied by an interpreter. The natives who live near the sea descry the strangers long before they reach their waters, and aware of the purpose for which they come, proclaim loudly the news of their approach. By a species of vocal telegraph the intelligence reaches the inmost recesses of the vale in an inconceivably short space of time, drawing nearly its whole population down to the beach laden with every variety of fruit. The interpreter, who is invariably a 'tabooed kannaka,' leaps ashore with the goods intended for barter, while the boats, with their oars shipped, and every man on his thwart, lie just outside the surf, heading off from the shore, in readiness at the first untoward event to escape to the open sea. As soon as the traffic is concluded, one of the boats pulls in under cover of the muskets of the others, the fruit is quickly thrown into her, and the transient visitors precipitately retire from what they justly consider so dangerous a vicinity

The intercourse occurring with Europeans being so restricted, no wonder that the inhabitants of the valley manifested so much curiosity with regard to us, appearing as we did among them under such singular circumstances. I have no doubt that we were the first white men who ever penetrated thus far back into their territories, or at least the first who had ever descended from the head of the vale. What had brought us thither must have appeared a complete mystery to them, and from our ignorance of the language it was impossible for us to enlighten them. In answer to inquiries which the eloquence of their gestures enabled us to comprehend, all that we could reply was, that we had come from Nukuheva, a place, be it remembered, with which they were at open war. This intelligence appeared to affect them with the most lively emotions. 'Nukuheva mortar-kee?' they asked. Of course we replied most energetically in the negative.

They then plied us with a thousand questions, of which we could understand nothing more than that they had reference to the recent movements of the French, against whom they seemed to cherish the most fierce hatred. So eager were they to obtain information on this point, that they still continued to propound their queries long after we had shown that we were utterly unable to answer them. Occasionally we caught some indistinct idea of their meaning, when we would endeavour by every method in our power to communicate the desired intelligence. At such times their gratification was boundless, and they would redouble their efforts to make us comprehend them more perfectly. But all in vain, and in the end they looked at us despairingly, as if we were the receptacles of invaluable information, but how to come at it they knew not.

After a while the group around us gradually dispersed, and we were left about midnight (as we conjectured) with those who appeared to be permanent residents of the house. These individuals now provided us with fresh mats to lie upon, covered us with several folds of tappa, and then extinguishing the tapers that had been burning, threw themselves down beside us, and after a little desultory conversation were soon sound asleep.

10 VARIOUS and conflicting were the thoughts which oppressed me during the silent hours that followed the events related in the preceding chapter. Toby, wearied with the fatigues of the day, slumbered heavily by my side, but the pain under which I was suffering effectually prevented my sleeping, and I remained distressingly alive to all the fearful circumstances of our present situation. Was it possible that, after all our 20 vicissitudes, we were really in the terrible valley of Typee, and at the mercy of its inmates, a fierce and unrelenting tribe of savages?

Typee or Happar? I shuddered when I reflected that there was no longer any room for doubt, and that, beyond all hope of escape, we were now placed in those very circumstances from the bare thought of which I had recoiled with such abhorrence 30 but a few days before. What might not be our fearful destiny? To be sure, as yet, we had been treated with no violence, nay, had been even kindly and hospitably entertained. But what dependence could be placed upon the fickle passions which sway the bosom of a savage? His inconstancy and treachery are proverbial. Might it not be that, beneath these fair appearances, the islanders covered some perfidious design, 40 and that their friendly reception of us might only precede some horrible catastrophe? How strongly did these forebodings spring up in my mind, as I lay restlessly upon a couch of mats, surrounded by the dimly-revealed forms of those whom I so greatly dreaded.

From the excitement of these fearful thoughts, I sank, toward morning, into an uneasy slumber; and on awaking, with a 50 start, in the midst of an appalling dream, looked up into the eager countenances of a number of the natives, who were bending over me.

It was broad day, and the house was nearly filled with young females, fancifully decorated with flowers, who gazed upon me as I rose with faces in which childish delight and curiosity were vividly portrayed. After waking Toby, they seated themselves round us on the mats, and gave full play to that prying inquisitiveness which, time out of mind, has been attributed to the adorable sex.

As these unsophisticated young creatures were attended by no jealous duennas, their proceedings were altogether informal, and void of artificial restraint. Long and minute was the investigation with which they honoured us, and so uproarious their mirth, that I felt infinitely sheepish, and Toby was immeasurably outraged at their familiarity.

These lively young ladies were at the same time wonderfully polite and humane, fanning aside the insects that occasionally lighted on our brows, presenting us with food, and compassionately regarding me in the midst of my afflictions. But in spite of all their blandishments, my feelings of propriety were exceedingly shocked, for I could not but consider them as having overstepped the due limits of female decorum.

Having diverted themselves to their hearts' content, our young visitants now withdrew, and gave place to successive troops of the other sex, who continued flocking toward the house until near noon, by which time I have no doubt that the greater part of the inhabitants of the valley had bathed themselves in the light of our benignant countenances.

At last, when their numbers began to diminish, a superb-looking warrior stooped the towering plumes of his head-dress beneath the low portal, and entered the house. I saw at once that he was some distinguished personage, the natives regarding him with the utmost deference, and making room for him as he approached. His aspect was imposing. The splendid long drooping tail-feathers of the tropical bird, thickly interspersed with the gaudy plumage of the cock, were disposed in an immense upright semicircle upon his head, their lower extremities being fixed in a crescent of guinea-beads which spanned the forehead. Around his neck were several enormous necklaces of boars' tusks, polished like ivory, and disposed in such a manner as that the longest and largest were upon his capacious chest. Thrust forward through the large apertures in his ears were two small and finely-shaped sperm-whale teeth, presenting their cavities in front, stuffed with freshly-plucked leaves, and curiously wrought at the other end into strange little images and devices. These barbaric trinkets, garnished in this manner at their open extremities, and tapering and curving round to a point behind the ear, resembled not a little a pair of cornucopias.

The loins of the warrior were girt about with heavy folds of a dark-coloured tappa, hanging before and behind in clusters of braided tassels, while anklets and bracelets of curling human hair completed his unique costume. In his right hand he grasped a beautifully carved paddle-spear, nearly fifteen feet in length, made of the bright koa-wood, one end sharply pointed, and the other flattened like an oar-blade. Hanging obliquely from his girdle by a loop of sinuate, was a richly decorated pipe, the slender reed forming its stem was coloured with a red pigment, and round it, as well as the idol-bowl, fluttered little streamers of the thinnest tappa.

But that which was most remarkable in the appearance of this splendid islander was the elaborate tattooing displayed on every noble limb. All imaginable lines and curves and figures were delineated over his whole body, and in their grotesque variety and infinite profusion, I could only compare them to the crowded groupings of quaint patterns we sometimes see in costly pieces of lacework. The most simple and remarkable of all these ornaments was that which decorated the countenance of the chief. Two broad stripes of tattooing, diverging from the centre of his shaven crown, obliquely crossed both eyes—staining the lids—to a little below either ear, where they united with another stripe, which swept in a straight line along the lips, and formed the base of the triangle. The warrior, from the excellence of his physical proportions, might certainly have been regarded as one of nature's noblemen, and the lines drawn upon his face may possibly have denoted his exalted rank.

This warlike personage, upon entering the house, seated himself at some distance from the spot where Toby and myself reposed, while the rest of the savages looked alternately from us to him, as if in expectation of something they were disappointed in not perceiving. Regarding the chief attentively, I thought his lineaments appeared familiar to me. As soon as his full face was turned upon me, and I again beheld its extraordinary embellishment, and met the strange gaze to which I had been subjected the preceding night, I immediately, in spite of the alteration in his appearance, recognised the noble Mehevi. On addressing him, he advanced at once in the most cordial manner, and, greeting me warmly, seemed to enjoy not a little the effect his barbaric costume had produced upon me.

I forthwith determined to secure, if possible, the good-will of this individual, as I easily perceived he was a man of great authority in his tribe, and one who might exert a powerful influence upon our subsequent fate. In the endeavour I was not repulsed, for nothing could surpass the friendliness he manifested toward both my companion and myself. He extended his sturdy limbs by our side, and endeavoured to make us comprehend the full extent of the kindly feelings by which he was actuated. The almost insuperable difficulty in communicating to one another our ideas, affected the chief with no little mortification. He evinced a great desire to be enlightened with regard to the customs and peculiarities of the far-off country we had left behind us, and to which, under the name of Maneeka, he frequently alluded.

But that which more than any other subject engaged his attention, was the late proceedings of the 'Franee,' as he called the French, in the neighbouring bay of Nukuheva. This seemed a never-ending theme with him, and one concerning which he was never weary of interrogating us. All the information we succeeded in imparting to him on this subject was little more than that we had seen six men-of-war lying in the hostile bay at the time we had left it. When he received this intelligence, Mehevi, by the aid of his fingers, went through a long numerical calculation, as if estimating the number of Frenchmen the squadron might contain.

It was just after employing his faculties in this way that he happened to notice the swelling in my limb. He immediately examined it with the utmost attention, and after doing so, dispatched a boy, who happened to be standing by, with some message.

After the lapse of a few moments the stripling re-entered the house with an aged islander, who might have been taken for old Hippocrates himself. His head was as bald as the polished surface of a cocoa-nut shell, which article it precisely resembled in smoothness and colour, while a long silvery beard swept almost to his girdle of bark. Encircling his temples was a bandeau of the twisted leaves of the Omoo tree, pressed closely over the brows to shield his feeble vision from the glare of the sun. His tottering steps were supported by a long slim staff, resembling the wand with which a theatrical magician appears on the stage, and in one hand he carried a freshly-plaited fan of the green leaflets of the cocoa-nut tree. A flowing robe of tappa, knotted over the shoulder, hung loosely round his stooping form, and heightened the venerableness of his aspect.

Mehevi, saluting this old gentleman, motioned him to a seat between us, and then uncovering my limb, desired him to examine it. The leech gazed intently from me to Toby, and then proceeded to business. After diligently observing the ailing member, he commenced manipulating it, and on the supposition probably that the complaint had deprived the leg of all sensation, began to pinch and hammer it in such a manner that I absolutely roared with the pain. Thinking that I was as capable of making an application of thumps and pinches to the part as anyone else, I endeavoured to resist this species of medical treatment. But it was not so easy a matter to get out of the clutches of the old wizard, he fastened on the unfortunate limb as if it were something for which he had been long seeking, and muttering some kind of incantation continued his discipline, pounding it after a fashion that set me well-nigh crazy, while Mehevi, upon the same principle which prompts an affectionate mother to hold a struggling child in a dentist's chair, restrained me in his powerful grasp, and actually encouraged the wretch in this infliction of torture.

Almost frantic with rage and pain, I yelled like a bedlamite, while Toby, throwing himself into all the attitudes of a posture-master, vainly endeavoured to expostulate with the natives by signs and gestures To have looked at my companion, as, sympathising with my sufferings, he strove to put an end to them, one would have thought that he was the deaf and dumb alphabet incarnated. Whether my tormentor yielded to Toby's entreaties, or paused from sheer exhaustion, I do not know, but all at once he ceased his operations, and at the same time the chief relinquishing his hold upon me, I fell back, faint and breathless with the agony I had endured

My unfortunate limb was now left much in the same condition as a rump-steak after undergoing the castigating process which precedes cooking My physician, having recovered from the fatigues of his exertions, as if anxious to make amends for the pain to which he had subjected me, now took some herbs out of a little wallet that was suspended from his waist, and moistening them in water, applied them to the inflamed part, stooping over it at the same time, and either whispering a spell, or having a little confidential chat with some imaginary demon located in the calf of my leg My limb was now swathed in leafy bandages, and grateful to Providence for the cessation of hostilities, I was suffered to rest

Mehevi shortly after rose to depart, but before he went he spoke authoritatively to one of the natives, whom he addressed as Kory-Kory, and from the little I could understand of what took place, pointed him out to me as a man whose peculiar business thenceforth would be to attend upon my person I am not certain that I comprehended as much as this at the time, but the subsequent conduct of my trusty body-servant fully assured me that such must have been the case

I could not but be amused at the manner in which the chief addressed me upon this occasion, talking to me for at least fifteen or twenty minutes as calmly as if I could understand every word that he said I remarked this peculiarity very often afterward in many other of the islanders

Mehevi having now departed, and the family physician having likewise made his exit, we were left about sunset with the ten or twelve natives, who by this time I had ascertained composed the household of which Toby and I were members As the dwelling to which we had been first introduced was the place of my permanent abode while I remained in the valley, and as I was necessarily placed upon the most intimate footing with its occupants, I may as well here enter into a little description of it and its inhabitants This description will apply also to nearly all the other dwelling-places in the vale, and will furnish some idea of the generality of the natives

Near one side of the valley, and about midway up the ascent of a rather abrupt rise of ground waving with the richest verdure, a number of large stones were laid in successive courses, to the height of nearly eight feet, and disposed in such a manner that their level surface corresponded in shape with the habitation which was perched upon it A narrow space, however, was reserved in front of the dwelling, upon the summit of this pile of stones (called by the natives a 'pi-pi'), which, being enclosed by a little picket of canes, gave it somewhat the appearance of a verandah The frame of the house was constructed of large bamboos planted uprightly, and secured together at intervals by transverse stalks of the light wood of the hibiscus, lashed with thongs of bark The rear of the tenement—built up with successive ranges of cocoa-nut boughs bound one upon another, with their leaflets cunningly woven together—inclined a little from the vertical, and extended from the extreme edge of the 'pi-pi' to about twenty feet from its surface, whence the shelving roof—thatched with the long tapering leaves of the palmetto—sloped steeply off to within about five feet of the floor, leaving the eaves drooping with tassel-like appendages over the front of the habitation This was constructed of light and elegant canes, in a kind of open screen-work, tastefully adorned with bindings of variegated sinuate, which served to hold together its various parts The sides of the house were similarly built, thus presenting three-quarters for the circulation of the air, while the whole was impervious to the rain.

In length this picturesque building was perhaps twelve yards, while in breadth it could not have exceeded as many feet So much for the exterior, which, with its wire-like reed-twisted sides, not a little reminded me of an immense aviary

Stooping a little, you passed through a narrow aperture in its front, and facing you, on entering, lay two long, perfectly straight, and well-polished trunks of the cocoa-nut tree, extending the full length of the dwelling, one of them placed closely against the rear, and the other lying parallel with it some two yards distant, the interval 10 between them being spread with a multitude of gaily-worked mats, nearly all of a different pattern This space formed the common couch and lounging-place of the natives, answering the purpose of a divan in Oriental countries Here would they slumber through the hours of the night, and recline luxuriously during the greater part of the day The remainder of the floor presented only the cool shining surfaces of the large stones of which the 'pi-pi' 20 was composed

From the ridge-pole of the house hung suspended a number of large packages enveloped in coarse tappa, some of which contained festival dresses, and various other matters of the wardrobe, held in high estimation These were easily accessible by means of a line, which, passing over the ridge-pole, had one end attached to a 30 bundle, while with the other, which led to the side of the dwelling and was there secured, the package could be lowered or elevated at pleasure

Against the farther wall of the house were arranged in tasteful figures a variety of spears and javelins, and other implements of savage warfare Outside of the habitation, and built upon the piazza-like area in its front, was a little shed used as a sort of larder or pantry, and in which were 40 stored various articles of domestic use and convenience A few yards from the 'pi-pi' was a large shed built of cocoa-nut boughs, where the process of preparing the poe-poe was carried on, and all culinary operations attended to

Thus much for the house, and its appurtenances, and it will be readily acknowledged that a more commodious and appropriate dwelling for the climate and the people could not possibly be devised It was cool, free to admit the air, scrupulously clean, and elevated above the dampness and impurities of the ground

But now to sketch the inmates; and here I claim for my tried servitor and faithful valet Kory-Kory the precedence of a first description As his character will be gradually unfolded in the course of my narrative, I shall for the present content myself with delineating his personal appearance Kory-Kory, though the most devoted and best-natured serving-man in the world, was, 10 alas! a hideous object to look upon. He was some twenty-five years of age, and about six feet in height, robust and well made, and of the most extraordinary aspect. His head was carefully shaven, with the exception of two circular spots, about the size of a dollar, near the top of the cranium, where the hair, permitted to grow of an amazing length, was twisted up in two prominent knots, that gave him the appearance of being decorated with a pair of 20 horns His beard, plucked out by the root from every other part of his face, was suffered to droop in hairy pendants, two of which garnished his upper lip, and an equal number hung from the extremity of his chin

Kory-Kory, with the view of improving the handiwork of nature, and perhaps prompted by a desire to add to the engaging expression of his countenance, had seen fit to embellish his face with three broad longitudinal stripes of tattooing, which, like those country roads that go straight forward in defiance of all obstacles, crossed his nasal organ, descended into the hollow of his eyes, and even skirted the borders of his mouth Each completely spanned his physiognomy, one extending in a line with his eyes, another crossing the face in the vicinity of the nose, and the third sweeping 40 along his lips from ear to ear His countenance thus triply hooped, as it were, with tattooing, always reminded me of those unhappy wretches whom I have sometimes observed gazing out sentimentally from behind the grated bars of a prison window; whilst the entire body of my savage valet, covered all over with representations of birds and fishes, and a variety of most unaccountable-looking creatures, suggested to me the idea of a pictorial museum of natural history, or an illustrated copy of Goldsmith's Animated Nature

But it seems really heartless in me to write thus of the poor islander, when I owe

perhaps to his unremitting attentions the very existence I now enjoy Kory-Kory, I mean thee no harm in what I say in regard to thy outward adornings, but they were a little curious to my unaccustomed sight, and therefore I dilate upon them But to underrate or forget thy faithful services is something I could never be guilty of, even in the giddiest moment of my life

The father of my attached follower was a native of gigantic frame, and had once possessed prodigious physical powers, but the lofty form was now yielding to the inroads of time, though the hand of disease seemed never to have been laid upon the aged warrior Marheyo—for such was his name—appeared to have retired from all active participation in the affairs of the valley, seldom or never accompanying the natives in their various expeditions, and employing the greater part of his time in throwing up a little shed just outside the house, upon which he was engaged to my certain knowledge for four months, without appearing to make any sensible advance I suppose the old gentleman was in his dotage, for he manifested in various ways the characteristics which mark this particular stage of life

I remember in particular his having a choice pair of ear-ornaments, fabricated from the teeth of some sea-monster These he would alternately wear and take off at least fifty times in the course of the day, going and coming from his little hut on each occasion with all the tranquillity imaginable Sometimes slipping them through the slits in his ears, he would seize his spear—which in length and slowness resembled a fishing pole—and go stalking beneath the shadows of the neighbouring groves, as if about to give a hostile meeting to some cannibal knight But he would soon return again, and hiding his weapon under the projecting eaves of the house, and rolling his clumsy trinkets carefully in a piece of tappa, would resume his more pacific operations as quietly as if he had never interrupted them.

But despite his eccentricities, Marheyo was a most paternal and warm-hearted old fellow, and in this particular not a little resembled his son Kory-Kory The mother of the latter was the mistress of the family, and a notable housewife, and a most industrious old lady she was. If she did not understand the art of making jellies, jams, custards, tea-cakes, and such like trashy affairs, she was profoundly skilled in the mysteries of preparing 'amar,' 'poe-poe,' and 'kokoo,' with other substantial matters She was a genuine busybody, bustling about the house like a country landlady at an unexpected arrival, forever giving the young girls tasks to perform, which the little hussies as often neglected, poking into every corner, and rummaging over bundles of old tappa, or making a prodigious clatter among the calabashes Sometimes she might have been seen squatting upon her haunches in front of a huge wooden basin, and kneading poe-poe with terrific vehemence, dashing the stone pestle about as if she would shiver the vessel into fragments on other occasions, galloping about the valley in search of a particular kind of leaf, used in some of her recondite operations, and returning home, toiling and sweating, with a bundle of it, under which most women would have sunk

To tell the truth, Kory-Kory's mother was the only industrious person in all the valley of Typee, and she could not have employed herself more actively had she been left an exceedingly muscular and destitute widow, with an inordinate supply of young children, in the bleakest part of the civilised world There was not the slightest necessity for the greater portion of the labour performed by the old lady but she seemed to work from some irresistible impulse, her limbs continually swaying to and fro, as if there were some indefatigable engine concealed within her body which kept her in perpetual motion

Never suppose that she was a termagant or a shrew for all this, she had the kindest heart in the world, and acted toward me in particular in a truly maternal manner, occasionally putting some little morsel of choice food into my hand, some outlandish kind of savage sweetmeat or pastry, like a doting mother petting a sickly urchin with tarts and sugar-plums Warm indeed are my remembrances of the dear, good, affectionate old Tinor!

Besides the individuals I have mentioned, there belonged to the household three young men, dissipated, good-for-nothing, roystering blades of savages, who were either employed in prosecuting love affairs with the maidens of the tribe, or grew boozy on 'arva' and tobacco in the company of congenial spirits, the scapegraces of the valley

Among the permanent inmates of the house were likewise several lovely damsels, who instead of thrumming pianos and reading novels, like more enlightened young ladies, substituted for these employments the manufacture of a fine species of tappa; but for the greater portion of the time were skipping from house to house, gadding and gossiping with their acquaintances

From the rest of these, however, I must except the beauteous nymph Fayaway, who was my peculiar favourite Her free pliant figure was the very perfection of female grace and beauty Her complexion was a rich and mantling olive, and when watching the glow upon her cheeks I could almost swear that beneath the transparent medium there lurked the blushes of a faint vermilion The face of this girl was a rounded oval, and each feature as perfectly formed as the heart or imagination of a man could desire Her full lips, when parted with a smile, disclosed teeth of a dazzling whiteness, and when her rosy mouth opened with a burst of merriment, they looked like the milk-white seeds of the 'arta,' a fruit of the valley, which, when cleft in twain, shows them reposing in rows on either side, imbedded in the rich and juicy pulp Her hair of the deepest brown, parted irregularly in the middle, flowed in natural ringlets over her shoulders, and whenever she chanced to stoop, fell over and hid from view her lovely bosom Gazing into the depths of her strange blue eyes, when she was in a contemplative mood, they seemed most placid yet unfathomable, but when illuminated by some lively emotion, they beamed upon the beholder like stars The hands of Fayaway were as soft and delicate as those of any countess, for an entire exemption from rude labour marks the girlhood and even prime of a Typee woman's life Her feet, though wholly exposed, were as diminutive and fairly shaped as those which peep from beneath the skirts of a Lima lady's dress. The skin of this young creature, from continual ablutions and the use of mollifying ointments, was inconceivably smooth and soft.

I may succeed, perhaps, in particularising some of the individual features of Fayaway's beauty, but that general loveliness of appearance which they all contributed to produce I will not attempt to describe The easy unstudied graces of a child of nature like this, breathing from infancy an atmosphere of perpetual summer, and nurtured by the simple fruits of the earth, enjoying a perfect freedom from care and anxiety, and removed effectually from all injurious tendencies, strike the eye in a manner which cannot be portrayed This picture is no fancy sketch, it is drawn from the most vivid recollections of the person delineated

Were I asked if the beauteous form of Fayaway was altogether free from the hideous blemish of tattooing, I should be constrained to answer that it was not But the practitioners of the barbarous art, so remorseless in their inflictions upon the brawny limbs of the warriors of the tribe, seem to be conscious that it needs not the resources of their profession to augment the charms of the maidens of the vale

The females are very little embellished in this way, and Fayaway, with all the other young girls of her age, were even less so than those of their sex more advanced in years The reason of this peculiarity will be alluded to hereafter All the tattooing that the nymph in question exhibited upon her person may be easily described Three minute dots, no bigger than pinheads, decorated either lip, and at a little distance were not at all discernible Just upon the fall of the shoulder were drawn two parallel lines half an inch apart, and perhaps three inches in length, the interval being filled with delicately executed figures These narrow bands of tattooing, thus placed, always reminded me of those stripes of gold lace worn by officers in undress, and which were in lieu of epaulettes to denote their rank

Thus much was Fayaway tattooed. The audacious hand which had gone so far in its desecrating work stopping short, apparently wanting the heart to proceed

But I have omitted to describe the dress worn by this nymph of the valley.

Fayaway—I must avow the fact—for the most part clung to the primitive and summer garb of Eden. But how becoming the costume! It showed her fine figure to the best possible advantage, and nothing could have been better adapted to her peculiar style of beauty. On ordinary occasions she was habited precisely as I have described the two youthful savages whom we had met on first entering the valley. At other times, when rambling among the groves, or visiting at the houses of her acquaintances, she wore a tunic of white tappa, reaching from her waist to a little below the knees, and when exposed for any length of time to the sun, she invariably protected herself from its rays by a floating mantle of the same material, loosely gathered about the person. Her gala dress will be described hereafter.

As the beauties of our own land delight in bedecking themselves with fanciful articles of jewellery, suspending them from their ears, hanging them about their necks, and clasping them around their wrists, so Fayaway and her companions were in the habit of ornamenting themselves with similar appendages.

Flora was their jeweller. Sometimes they wore necklaces of small carnation flowers, strung like rubies upon a fibre of tappa, or displayed in their ears a single white bud, the stem thrust backward through the aperture, and showing in front the delicate petals folded together in a beautiful sphere, and looking like a drop of the purest pearl. Chaplets, too, resembling in their arrangement the strawberry coronal worn by an English peeress, and composed of intertwined leaves and blossoms, often crowned their temples, and bracelets and anklets of the same tasteful pattern were frequently to be seen. Indeed, the maidens of the island were passionately fond of flowers, and never wearied of decorating their persons with them, a lovely trait in their character, and one that ere long will be more fully alluded to.

Though in my eyes, at least, Fayaway was indisputably the loveliest female I saw in Typee, yet the description I have given of her will in some measure apply to nearly all the youthful portion of her sex in the valley. Judge ye then, reader, what beautiful creatures they must have been.

A Man-of-War's Man Shot At

THERE was a seaman belonging to the fore-top—a messmate, though not a topmate of mine, and no favourite of the captain's—who, for certain venial transgressions, had been prohibited from going ashore on liberty when the ship's company went. Enraged at the deprivation—for he had not touched earth in upward of a year—he, some nights after, lowered himself overboard, with the view of gaining a canoe, attached by a rope to a Dutch galliot some cables'-length distant. In this canoe he proposed paddling himself ashore. Not being a very expert swimmer, the commotion he made in the water attracted the ear of the sentry on that side of the ship, who, turning about in his walk, perceived the faint white spot where the fugitive was swimming in the frigate's shadow. He hailed it, but no reply.

'Give the word, or I fire!'

Not a word was heard.

The next instant there was a red flash, and, before it had completely ceased illuminating the night, the white spot was changed into crimson. Some of the officers, returning from a party at the Beach of the Flamingoes, happened to be drawing near the ship in one of her cutters. They saw the flash, and the bounding body it revealed. In a moment the topman was dragged into the boat, a handkerchief was used for a tourniquet, and the wounded fugitive was soon on board the frigate, when, the surgeon being called, the necessary attentions were rendered.

Now, it appeared, that at the moment the sentry fired, the topman—in order to elude discovery, by manifesting the completest quietude—was floating on the water, straight and horizontal, as if reposing on a bed. As he was not far from the ship at the time, and the sentry was considerably elevated above him—pacing his platform, on a level with the upper part of the hammock-nettings—the ball struck with great force, with a downward obliquity, entering the right thigh just above the knee, and, penetrating some inches, glanced upward along the bone, burying itself somewhere, so that it could not be felt by outward manipulation. There was no dusky discoloration to mark its internal track, as in the case when a partly spent ball—obliquely hitting—after entering the skin, courses on, just beneath the surface, without penetrating further. Nor was there any mark on the opposite part of the thigh to denote its place, as when a ball forces itself straight through a limb, and lodges, perhaps, close to the skin on the other side. Nothing was visible but a small, ragged puncture, bluish about the edges, as if the rough point of a tenpenny nail had been forced into the flesh, and withdrawn. It seemed almost impossible, that through so small an aperture, a musket bullet could have penetrated.

The extreme misery and general prostration of the man, caused by the great effusion of blood—though, strange to say, at first he said he felt no pain from the wound itself—induced the surgeon, very reluctantly, to forgo an immediate search for the ball, to extract it, as that would have involved the dilating of the wound by the knife, an operation which, at that juncture, would have been almost certainly attended with fatal results. A day or two, therefore, was permitted to pass, while simple dressings were applied.

The surgeons of the other American ships of war in harbour occasionally visited the Neversink, to examine the patient, and incidentally to listen to the expositions of our own surgeon, their senior in rank. But Cadwallader Cuticle, who, as yet, has been but incidentally alluded to, now deserves a chapter by himself.

The Surgeon of the Fleet

CADWALLADER CUTICLE, M D, and Honorary Member of the most distinguished Colleges of Surgeons both in Europe and America, was our Surgeon of the Fleet. Nor was he at all blind to the dignity of his position, to which, indeed, he was rendered peculiarly competent, if the reputation he enjoyed was deserved. He had the name of being the foremost surgeon in the Navy, a gentleman of remarkable science and a veteran practitioner.

He was a small, withered man, nearly, perhaps quite, sixty years of age. His chest was shallow, his shoulders bent, his pantaloons hung round skeleton legs, and his face was singularly attenuated. In truth, the corporeal vitality of this man seemed, in a good degree, to have died out of him. He walked abroad, a curious patchwork of life and death, with a wig, one glass eye, and a set of false teeth, while his voice was husky and thick, but his mind seemed undebilitated as in youth, it shone out of his remaining eye with basilisk brilliancy.

Like most old physicians and surgeons who have seen much service, and have been promoted to high professional place for their scientific attainments, this Cuticle was an enthusiast in his calling. In private, he had once been heard to say, confidentially, that he would rather cut off a man's arm than dismember the wing of the most delicate pheasant. In particular, the department of morbid anatomy was his peculiar love, and in his state-room below he had a most unsightly collection of Parisian casts, in plaster and wax, representing all imaginable malformations of the human members, both organic and induced by disease. Chief among these was a cast, often to be met with in the Anatomical Museums of Europe, and no doubt an unexaggerated copy of a genuine original, it was the head of an elderly woman, with an aspect singularly gentle and meek, but at the same time wonderfully expressive of a gnawing sorrow, never to be relieved. You would almost have thought it the face of some abbess, for some unspeakable crime voluntarily sequestered from human society, and leading a life of agonised penitence without hope, so marvellously sad and tearfully pitiable was this head. But when you first beheld it, no such emotions ever crossed your mind. All your eyes and all your horrified soul were fast fascinated and frozen by the sight of a hideous, crumpled horn, like that of a ram, downward growing out from the forehead, and partly shadowing the face, but as you gazed, the freezing fascination of its horribleness gradually waned, and then your whole heart burst with sorrow, as you contemplated those aged features, ashy pale and wan. The horn seemed the mark of a curse for some mysterious sin, conceived and committed before the spirit had entered the flesh. Yet that sin seemed something imposed, and not voluntarily sought, some sin growing out of the heartless necessities of the predestination of things, some sin under which the sinner sank in sinless woe

But no pang of pain, not the slightest touch of concern, ever crossed the bosom of Cuticle when he looked on this cast. It was immovably fixed to a bracket, against the partition of his state-room, so that it was the first object that greeted his eyes when he opened them from his nightly sleep. Nor was it to hide the face, that upon retiring he always hung his Navy cap upon the upward curling extremity of the horn, for that obscured it but little

The surgeon's cot-boy, the lad who made up his swinging bed and took care of his room, often told us of the horror he sometimes felt when he would find himself alone in his master's retreat. At times he was seized with the idea that Cuticle was a preternatural being, and once entering his room in the middle watch of the night, he started at finding it enveloped in a thick, bluish vapour, and stifling with the odours of brimstone. Upon hearing a low groan from the smoke, with a wild cry he darted from the place, and, rousing the occupants of the neighbouring state-rooms, it was found that the vapour proceeded from smouldering bunches of Lucifer matches, which had become ignited through the carelessness of the surgeon. Cuticle, almost dead, was dragged from the suffocating atmosphere, and it was several days ere he completely recovered from its effects. This accident took place immediately over the powder magazine, but as Cuticle, during his sickness, paid dearly enough for transgressing the laws prohibiting combustibles in the gun-room, the captain contented himself with privately remonstrating with him.

Well knowing the enthusiasm of the surgeon for all specimens of morbid anatomy, some of the ward-room officers used to play upon his credulity, though, in every case, Cuticle was not long in discovering their deceptions. Once, when they had some sago pudding for dinner, and Cuticle chanced to be ashore, they made up a neat parcel of this bluish-white, firm, jelly-like preparation, and placing it in a tin box, carefully sealed with wax, they deposited it on the gun-room table, with a note, purporting to come from an eminent physician in Rio, connected with the Grand National Museum on the Praca d'Acclamacao, begging leave to present to the scientific Senhor Cuticle—with the donor's compliments—an uncommonly fine specimen of a cancer.

Descending to the ward-room, Cuticle spied the note, and no sooner read it, than, clutching the case, he opened it, and exclaimed, 'Beautiful! splendid! I have never seen a finer specimen of this most interesting disease.'

'What have you there, Surgeon Cuticle?' said a lieutenant, advancing.

'Why, sir, look at it, did you ever see anything more exquisite?'

'Very exquisite, indeed, let me have a bit of it, will you, Cuticle?'

'Let you have a bit of it!' shrieked the surgeon, starting back. 'Let you have one of my limbs! I wouldn't mar so large a specimen for a hundred dollars, but what can you want of it? You are not making collections!'

'I'm fond of the article,' said the lieutenant; 'it's a fine cold relish to bacon or ham.'

You know, I was in New Zealand last cruise, Cuticle, and got into sad dissipation there among the cannibals, come, let's have a bit, if it's only a mouthful.'

'Why, you infernal Feejee!' shouted Cuticle, eyeing the other with a confounded expression, 'you don't really mean to eat a piece of this cancer?'

'Hand it to me, and see whether I will not,' was the reply.

'In God's name, take it!' cried the surgeon, putting the case into his hands, and then standing with his own uplifted.

'Steward!' cried the lieutenant, 'the castor—quick! I always use plenty of pepper with this dish, surgeon, it's oystery. Ah! this is really delicious,' he added, smacking his lips over a mouthful. 'Try it now, surgeon, and you'll never keep such a fine dish as this, lying uneaten on your hands, as a mere scientific curiosity.'

Cuticle's whole countenance changed, and, slowly walking up to the table, he put his nose close to the tin case, then touched its contents with his finger and tasted it. Enough. Buttoning up his coat, in all the tremblings of an old man's rage, he burst from the ward-room, and, calling for a boat, was not seen again for twenty-four hours.

But though, like all other mortals, Cuticle was subject at times to these fits of passion—at least under outrageous provocation—nothing could exceed his coolness when actually employed in his imminent vocation. Surrounded by moans and shrieks, by features distorted with anguish inflicted by himself, he yet maintained a countenance almost supernaturally calm; and unless the intense interest of the operation flushed his wan face with a momentary tinge of professional enthusiasm, he toiled away, untouched by the keenest misery coming under a fleet-surgeon's eye. Indeed, long habituation to the dissecting-room and the amputation-table had made him seemingly impervious to the ordinary emotions of humanity. Yet you could not say that Cuticle was essentially a cruel-hearted man. His apparent heartlessness must have been of a purely scientific origin. It is not to be imagined even that Cuticle would have harmed a fly, unless he could procure a microscope powerful enough to assist him in experimenting on the minute vitals of the creature.

But notwithstanding his marvellous indifference to the sufferings of his patients, and spite even of his enthusiasm in his vocation—not cooled by frosting old age itself—Cuticle, on some occasions, would affect a certain disrelish of his profession, and declaim against the necessity that forced a man of his humanity to perform a surgical operation. Especially was it apt to be thus with him, when the case was one of more than ordinary interest. In discussing it, previous to setting about it, he would veil his eagerness under an aspect of great circumspection, curiously marred, however, by continual sallies of unsuppressible impatience. But the knife once in his hand, the compassionless surgeon himself, undisguised, stood before you. Such was Cadwallader Cuticle, our Surgeon of the Fleet.

A Consultation of Man-of-War Surgeons

It seems customary for the Surgeon of the Fleet, when any important operation in his department is on the anvil, and there is nothing to absorb professional attention from it, to invite his brother surgeons, if at hand at the time, to a ceremonious consultation upon it. And this, in courtesy, his brother surgeons expect.

In pursuance of this custom, then, the surgeons of the neighbouring American ships of war were requested to visit the Neversink in a body, to advise concerning the case of the topman, whose situation had now become critical. They assembled on the half-deck, and were soon joined by their respected senior, Cuticle. In a body they bowed as he approached, and accosted him with deferential regard.

'Gentlemen,' said Cuticle, unostentatiously seating himself on a camp-stool, handed him by his cot-boy, 'we have here an extremely interesting case. You have all seen the patient, I believe. At first I had hopes that I should have been able to cut down to the ball, and remove it, but the state of the patient forbade. Since then, the inflammation and sloughing of the part has been attended with a copious suppuration, great loss of substance, extreme debility and emaciation. From this, I am convinced that the ball has shattered and deadened the bone, and now lies impacted in the medullary canal. In fact, there can be no doubt that the wound is incurable, and that amputation is the only resource. But, gentlemen, I find myself placed in a very delicate predicament. I assure you I feel no professional anxiety to perform the operation. I desire your advice, and if you will now again visit the patient with me, we can then return here, and decide what is best to be done. Once more let me say, that I feel no personal anxiety whatever to use the knife.'

The assembled surgeons listened to this address with the most serious attention, and, in accordance with their superior's desire, now descended to the sick-bay, where the patient was languishing. The examination concluded, they returned to the half-deck, and the consultation was renewed.

'Gentlemen,' began Cuticle, again seating himself, 'you have now just inspected the limb, you have seen that there is no resource but amputation, and now, gentlemen, what do you say? Surgeon Bandage, of the Mohawk, will you express your opinion?’

‘The wound is a very serious one,’ said Bandage—a corpulent man, with a high German forehead—shaking his head solemnly

‘Can anything save him but amputation?’ demanded Cuticle

‘His constitutional debility is extreme,’ observed Bandage, ‘but I have seen more dangerous cases’

‘Surgeon Wedge, of the Malay,’ said Cuticle, in a pet, ‘be pleased to give your opinion, and let it be definitive, I entreat’ this was said with a severe glance toward Bandage

‘If I thought,’ began Wedge, a very spare, tall man, elevating himself still higher on his toes, ‘that the ball had shattered and divided the whole femur, including the Greater and Lesser Trochanter, the Linear aspera, the Digital fossa, and the Intertrochanteric, I should certainly be in favour of amputation, but that, sir, permit me to observe, is not my opinion’

‘Surgeon Sawyer, of the Buccaneer,’ said Cuticle, drawing in his thin lower lip with vexation, and turning to a round-faced, florid, frank, sensible-looking man, whose uniform coat very handsomely fitted him, and was adorned with an unusual quantity of gold lace, ‘Surgeon Sawyer, of the Buccaneer, let us now hear your opinion, if you please. Is not amputation the only resource, sir?’

‘Excuse me,’ said Sawyer, ‘I am decidedly opposed to it, for if hitherto the patient has not been strong enough to undergo the extraction of the ball, I do not see how he can be expected to endure a far more severe operation. As there is no immediate danger of mortification, and you say the ball cannot be reached without making large incisions, I should support him, I think, for the present, with tonics, and gentle antiphlogistics, locally applied. On no account would I proceed to amputation until further symptoms are exhibited’

‘Surgeon Patella, of the Algerme,’ said Cuticle, in an ill-suppressed passion, abruptly turning round on the person addressed, ‘will you have the kindness to say whether you do not think that amputation is the only resource?’

Now Patella was the youngest of the company, a modest man, filled with a profound reverence for the science of Cuticle, and desirous of gaining his good opinion, yet not wishing to commit himself altogether by a decided reply, though, like Surgeon Sawyer, in his own mind he might have been clearly against the operation

‘What you have remarked, Mr Surgeon of the Fleet,’ said Patella, respectfully hemming, ‘concerning the dangerous condition of the limb, seems obvious enough, amputation would certainly be a cure to the wound, but then, as, notwithstanding his present debility, the patient seems to have a strong constitution, he might rally as it is, and by your scientific treatment, Mr Surgeon of the Fleet’—bowing—‘be entirely made whole, without risking an amputation. Still, it is a very critical case, and amputation may be indispensable, and, if it is to be performed, there ought to be no delay whatever. That is my view of the case, Mr Surgeon of the Fleet’

‘Surgeon Patella, then, gentlemen,’ said Cuticle, turning round triumphantly, ‘is clearly of opinion that amputation should be immediately performed. For my own part—individually, I mean, and without respect to the patient—I am sorry to have it so decided. But this settles the question, gentlemen—in my own mind, however, it was settled before. At ten o’clock to-morrow morning the operation will be performed. I shall be happy to see you all on the occasion, and also your juniors’ (alluding to the absent Assistant Surgeons) ‘Good morning, gentlemen, at ten o’clock, remember’

And Cuticle retreated to the ward-room

The Operation

NEXT morning, at the appointed hour, the surgeons arrived in a body. They were accompanied by their juniors, young men ranging in age from nineteen years to thirty. Like the senior surgeons, these young gentlemen were arrayed in their blue navy uniforms, displaying a profusion of bright buttons, and several broad bars of gold lace about the wristbands. As in honour of the occasion, they had put on their best coats, they looked exceedingly brilliant

The whole party immediately descended to the half-deck, where preparations had been made for the operation. A large garrison-ensign was stretched across the ship by the mainmast, so as completely to screen the space behind. This space included the whole extent aft to the bulkhead of the commodore's cabin, at the door of which the marine orderly paced, in plain sight, cutlass in hand.

Upon two gun-carriages, dragged amidships, the death-board (used for burials at sea) was horizontally placed, covered with an old royal-stun'-sail. Upon this occasion, to do duty as an amputation-table, it was widened by an additional plank. Two match-tubs, near by, placed one upon another, at either end supported another plank, distinct from the table, whereon was exhibited an array of saws and knives of various and peculiar shapes and sizes, also, a sort of steel, something like the dinner-table implement, together with long needles, crooked at the end for taking up the arteries, and large darning needles, thread, and bees-wax, for sewing up a wound.

At the end nearest the larger table was a tin basin of water, surrounded by small sponges, placed at mathematical intervals. From the long horizontal pole of a great-gun rammer—fixed in its usual place overhead—hung a number of towels, with 'U S' marked in the corners.

All these arrangements had been made by the 'surgeon's steward,' a person whose important functions in a man-of-war will, in a future chapter, be entered upon at large. Upon the present occasion, he was bustling about, adjusting and readjusting the knives, needles, and carver, like an over-conscientious butler fidgeting over a dinner-table just before the convivialists enter.

But by far the most striking object to be seen behind the ensign was a human skeleton, whose every joint articulated with wires. By a rivet at the apex of the skull, it hung dangling from a hammock hook fixed in a beam above. Why this object was here will presently be seen, but why it was placed immediately at the foot of the amputation-table only Surgeon Cuticle can tell.

While the final preparations were being made, Cuticle stood conversing with the assembled surgeons and assistant surgeons, his invited guests.

'Gentlemen,' said he, taking up one of the glittering knives, and artistically drawing the steel across it, 'Gentlemen, though these scenes are very unpleasant, and in some moods, I may say, repulsive to me—yet how much better for our patient to have the contusions and lacerations of his present wound—with all its dangerous symptoms—converted into a clean incision, free from these objections, and occasioning so much less subsequent anxiety to himself and the surgeon! Yes,' he added, tenderly feeling the edge of his knife, 'amputation is our only resource. Is it not so, Surgeon Patella?' turning toward that gentleman, as if relying upon some sort of an assent, however clogged with conditions.

'Certainly,' said Patella, 'amputation is your only resource, Mr. Surgeon of the Fleet, that is, I mean, if you are fully persuaded of its necessity.'

The other surgeons said nothing, maintaining a somewhat reserved air, as if conscious that they had no positive authority in the case, whatever might be their own private opinions, but they seemed willing to behold, and, if called upon, to assist at the operation, since it could not now be averted.

The young men, their assistants, looked very eager, and cast frequent glances of awe upon so distinguished a practitioner as the venerable Cuticle.

'They say he can drop a leg in one minute and ten seconds from the moment the knife touches it,' whispered one of them to another.

'We shall see,' was the reply, and the speaker clapped his hand to his fob, to see if his watch would be forthcoming when wanted.

'Are you all ready here?' demanded Cuticle, now advancing to his steward, 'have not those fellows got through yet?' pointing to three men of the carpenter's gang, who were placing bits of wood under the gun-carriages supporting the central table.

'They are just through, sir,' respectfully answered the steward, touching his hand to his forehead, as if there were a cap-front there.

'Bring up the patient, then,' said Cuticle. 'Young gentlemen,' he added, turning to the row of assistant surgeons, 'seeing you here reminds me of the classes of students once under my instruction at the Philadelphia College of Physicians and Surgeons. Ah, those were happy days!' he sighed, applying the extreme corner of his handkerchief to his glass eye. 'Excuse an old man's emotions, young gentlemen, but when I think of the numerous rare cases that then came under my treatment, I cannot but give way to my feelings. The town, the city, the metropolis, young gentlemen, is the place for you students, at least in these dull times of peace, when the Army and Navy furnish no inducements for a youth ambitious of rising in our honourable profession. Take an old man's advice, and if the war now threatening between the States and Mexico should break out, exchange your Navy commissions for commissions in the Army. From having no military marine herself, Mexico has always been backward in furnishing subjects for the amputation-tables of foreign navies. The cause of science has languished in her hands. The Army, young gentlemen, is your best school, depend upon it. You will hardly believe it, Surgeon Bandage,' turning to that gentleman, 'but this is my first important case of surgery in a nearly three years' cruise. I have been almost wholly confined in this ship to doctor's practice—prescribing for fevers and fluxes. True, the other day a man fell from the mizen-top-sail-yard, but that was merely an aggravated case of dislocations, and bones splintered and broken. No one, sir, could have made an amputation of it, without severely contusing his conscience. And mine—I may say it, gentlemen, without ostentation—is peculiarly susceptible.'

And so saying, the knife and carver touchingly dropped to his sides, and he stood for a moment fixed in a tender revery. But a commotion being heard beyond the curtain, he started, and, briskly crossing and recrossing the knife and carver, exclaimed, 'Ah, here comes our patient, surgeons, this side of the table, if you please, young gentlemen, a little further off, I beg. Steward, take off my coat—so, my neckerchief now, I must be perfectly unencumbered, Surgeon Patella, or I can do nothing whatever.'

These articles being removed, he snatched off his wig, placing it on the gun-deck capstan, then took out his set of false teeth, and placed it by the side of the wig, and, lastly, putting his forefinger to the inner angle of his blind eye, spirted out the glass optic with professional dexterity, and deposited that, also, next to the wig and false teeth.

Thus divested of nearly all inorganic appurtenances, what was left of the surgeon slightly shook itself, to see whether anything more could be spared to advantage.

'Carpenter's mates,' he now cried, 'will you never get through with that job?'

'Almost through, sir—just through,' they replied, staring round in search of the strange, unearthly voice that addressed them, for the absence of his teeth had not at all improved the conversational tones of the Surgeon of the Fleet.

With natural curiosity these men had purposely been lingering, to see all they could, but now, having no further excuse, they snatched up their hammers and chisels, and—like the stage-builders decamping from a public meeting at the eleventh hour, after just completing the rostrum in time for the first speaker—the carpenter's gang withdrew.

The broad ensign now lifted, revealing a glimpse of the crowd of man-of-war's men outside, and the patient, borne in the arms of two of his messmates, entered the place. He was much emaciated, weak as an infant, and every limb visibly trembled, or rather jarred, like the head of a man with the palsy. As if an organic and involuntary apprehension of death had seized the wounded leg, its nervous motions were so violent that one of the messmates was obliged to keep his hand upon it.

The topman was immediately stretched upon the table, the attendants steadying his limbs, when, slowly opening his eyes, he glanced about at the glittering knives and saws, the towels and sponges, the armed sentry at the commodore's cabin-door, the row of eager-eyed students, the meagre death's-head of a Cuticle, now with his shirt-sleeves rolled up upon his withered arms and knife in hand, and, finally, his eye settled in horror upon the skeleton, slowly vibrating and jingling before him, with the slow, slight roll of the frigate in the water.

'I would advise perfect repose of your every limb, my man,' said Cuticle, addressing him, 'the precision of an operation is often impaired by the inconsiderate restlessness of the patient. But if you consider, my good fellow,' he added, in a patronising and almost sympathetic tone, and slightly pressing his hand on the limb, 'if you consider how much better it is to live with three limbs than to die with four, and especially if you but knew to what torments both sailors and soldiers were subjected before the time of Celsus, owing to the lamentable ignorance of surgery then prevailing, you would certainly thank God from the bottom of your heart that your operation has been postponed to the period of this enlightened age, blessed with a Bell, a Brodie, and a Lally. My man, before Celsus's time, such was the general ignorance of our noble science, that, in order to prevent the excessive effusion of blood, it was deemed indispensable to operate with a red-hot knife'—making a professional movement toward the thigh—'and pour scalding oil upon the parts'—elevating his elbow, as if with a teapot in his hand—'still further to sear them, after amputation had been performed.'

'He is fainting!' said one of his messmates, 'quick! some water!' The steward immediately hurried to the topman with the basin.

Cuticle took the topman by the wrist, and feeling it awhile, observed, 'Don't be alarmed, men,' addressing the two messmates, 'he'll recover presently, this fainting very generally takes place.' And he stood for a moment, tranquilly eyeing the patient.

Now the Surgeon of the Fleet and the topman presented a spectacle which, to a reflecting mind, was better than a church-yard sermon on the mortality of man.

Here was a sailor, who, four days previous, had stood erect—a pillar of life—with an arm like a royal-mast, and a thigh like a windlass. But the slightest conceivable finger-touch of a bit of crooked trigger had eventuated in stretching him out, more helpless than an hour-old babe, with a blasted thigh, utterly drained of its brawn. And who was it that now stood over him like a superior being, and, as if clothed himself with the attributes of immortality, indifferently discoursed of carving up his broken flesh, and thus piecing out his abbreviated days? Who was it, that, in capacity of surgeon, seemed enacting the part of a Regenerator of life? The withered, shrunken, one-eyed, toothless, hairless Cuticle, with a trunk half dead—a memento mori to behold!

And while, in those soul-sinking and panic-striking premonitions of speedy death which almost invariably accompany a severe gun-shot wound, even with the most intrepid spirits, while thus drooping and dying, this once robust topman's eye was now waning in his head like a Lapland moon being eclipsed in clouds—Cuticle, who for years had still lived in his withered tabernacle of a body—Cuticle, no doubt sharing in the common self-delusion of old age—Cuticle must have felt his hold of life as secure as the grim hug of a grizzly bear. Verily, life is more awful than death, and let no man, though his live heart beat in him like a cannon—let him not hug his life to himself; for, in the predestinated necessities of things, that bounding life of his is not a whit more secure than the life of a man on his death-bed. To-day we inhale the air with expanding lungs, and life runs through us like a thousand Niles, but tomorrow we may collapse in death, and all our veins be dry as the brook Kedron in a drought.

'And now, young gentlemen,' said Cuticle, turning to the assistant surgeons, 'while the patient is coming to, permit me to describe to you the highly interesting operation I am about to perform.'

'Mr Surgeon of the Fleet,' said Surgeon Bandage, 'if you are about to lecture, permit me to present you with your teeth, they will make your discourse more readily understood.' And so saying, Bandage, with a bow, placed the two semicircles of ivory into Cuticle's hands.

'Thank you, Surgeon Bandage,' said Cuticle, and slipped the ivory into its place.

'In the first place, now, young gentlemen, let me direct your attention to the excellent preparation before you. I have had it unpacked from its case, and set up here from my state-room, where it occupies the spare berth, and all this for your express benefit, young gentlemen. This skeleton I procured in person from the Hunterian Department of the Royal College of Surgeons in London. It is a masterpiece of art But we have no time to examine it now Delicacy forbids that I should amplify at a juncture like this'—casting an almost benignant glance toward the patient, now beginning to open his eyes, 'but let me point out to you upon this thigh-bone'—disengaging it from the skeleton, with a gentle twist—'the precise place where I propose to perform the operation. Here, young gentlemen, here is the place You perceive it is very near the point of articulation with the trunk'

'Yes,' interposed Surgeon Wedge, rising on his toes, 'yes, young gentlemen, the point of articulation with the acetabulum of the os innominatum'

'Where's your Bell on Bones, Dick?' whispered one of the assistants to the student next him 'Wedge has been spending the whole morning over it, getting out the hard names.'

'Surgeon Wedge,' said Cuticle, looking round severely, 'we will dispense with your commentaries, if you please, at present Now, young gentlemen, you cannot but perceive, that the point of operation being so near the trunk and the vitals, it becomes an unusually beautiful one, demanding a steady hand and a true eye, and, after all, the patient may die under my hands'

'Quick, steward! water, water, he's fainting again!' cried the two messmates

'Don't be alarmed for your comrade, men,' said Cuticle, turning round 'I tell you it is not an uncommon thing for the patient to betray some emotion upon these occasions—most usually manifested by swooning, it is quite natural it should be so But we must not delay the operation Steward, that knife—no, the next one—there, that's it He is coming to, I think'—feeling the topman's wrist 'Are you all ready, sir?'

This last observation was addressed to one of the Never-sink's assistant surgeons, a tall, lank, cadaverous young man, arrayed in a sort of shroud of white canvas, pinned about his throat, and completely enveloping his person He was seated on a match-tub—the skeleton swinging near his head—at the foot of the table, in readiness to grasp the limb, as when a plank is being severed by a carpenter and his apprentice

'The sponges, steward,' said Cuticle, for the last time taking out his teeth, and drawing up his shirt-sleeve still further Then, taking the patient by the wrist, 'Stand by, now, you messmates, keep hold of his arms, pin him down. Steward, put your hand on the artery, I shall commence as soon as his pulse begins to—now, now! Letting fall the wrist, feeling the thigh carefully, and bowing over it an instant, he drew the fatal knife unerringly across the flesh As it first touched the part, the row of surgeons simultaneously dropped their eyes to the watches in their hands, while the patient lay, with eyes horribly distended, in a kind of waking trance Not a breath was heard, but as the quivering flesh parted in a long, lingering gash, a spring of blood welled up between the living walls of the wound, and two thick streams, in opposite directions, coursed down the thigh The sponges were instantly dipped in the purple pool, every face present was pinched to a point with suspense, the limb writhed, the man shrieked, his messmates pinioned him, while round and round the leg went the un pitying cut.

'The saw!' said Cuticle

Instantly it was in his hand

Full of the operation, he was about to apply it, when, looking up, and turning to the assistant surgeons, he said, 'Would any of you young gentlemen like to apply the saw? A splendid subject!'

Several volunteered, when, selecting one, Cuticle surrendered the instrument to him, saying, 'Don't be hurried, now, be steady'

While the rest of the assistants looked upon their comrade with glances of envy, he went rather timidly to work, and Cuticle, who was earnestly regarding him, suddenly snatched the saw from his hand

'Away, butcher! you disgrace the profession Look at me!'

For a few moments the thrilling rasping sound was heard, and then the topman seemed parted in twain at the hip, as the leg slowly slid into the arms of the pale, gaunt man in the shroud, who at once made away with it, and tucked it out of sight under one of the guns

'Surgeon Sawyer,' now said Cuticle, courteously turning to the surgeon of the Buccaneer, 'would you like to take up the arteries? They are quite at your service, sir'

'Do, Sawyer, be prevailed upon,' said Surgeon Bandage

Sawyer complied, and while, with some modesty, he was conducting the operation, Cuticle, turning to the row of assistants, said, 'Young gentlemen, we will now proceed with our illustration. Hand me that bone, steward.' And taking the thigh-bone in his still bloody hands, and holding it conspicuously before his auditors, the Surgeon of the Fleet began—

'Young gentlemen, you will perceive that precisely at this spot—here—to which I previously directed your attention—at the corresponding spot precisely—the operation has been performed. About here, young gentlemen, here'—lifting his hand some inches from the bone—'about here the great artery was. But you noticed that I did not use the tourniquet, I never do. The forefinger of my steward is far better than a tourniquet, being so much more manageable, and leaving the smaller veins uncompressed. But I have been told, young gentlemen, that a certain Seignior Seignioroni, a surgeon of Seville, has recently invented an admirable substitute for the clumsy, old-fashioned tourniquet. As I understand it, it is something like a pair of callipers, working with a small Archimedes screw—a very clever invention, according to all accounts. For the padded points at the end of the arches'—arching his forefinger and thumb—'can be so worked as to approximate in such a way, as to—but you don't attend to me, young gentlemen,' he added, all at once starting.

Being more interested in the active proceedings of Surgeon Sawyer, who was now threading a needle to sew up the overlapping of the stump, the young gentlemen had not scrupled to turn away their attention altogether from the lecturer.

A few moments more, and the topman, in a swoon, was removed below into the sick-bay. As the curtain settled again after the patient had disappeared, Cuticle, still holding the thigh-bone of the skeleton in his ensanguined hands, proceeded with his remarks upon it, and having concluded them, added, 'Now, young gentlemen, not the least interesting consequence of this operation will be the finding of the ball, which, in case of non-amputation, might have long eluded the most careful search. That ball, young gentlemen, must have taken a most circuitous route. Nor, in cases where the direction is oblique, is this at all unusual. Indeed, the learned Henner gives us a most remarkable—I had almost said an incredible—case of a soldier's neck, where the bullet entering at the part called Adam's Apple—'

'Yes,' said Surgeon Wedge, elevating himself, 'the pomum Adam.'

'Entering the point called Adam's Apple,' continued Cuticle, severely emphasising the last two words, 'ran completely round the neck, and, emerging at the same hole it had entered, shot the next man in the ranks. It was afterward extracted, says Henner, from the second man, and pieces of the other's skin were found adhering to it. But examples of foreign substances being received into the body with a ball, young gentlemen, are frequently observed. Being attached to a United States ship at the time, I happened to be near the spot of the battle of Ayacucho, in Peru. The day after the action, I saw in the barracks of the wounded a trooper, who having been severely injured in the brain, went crazy, and, with his own holster-pistol, committed suicide in the hospital. The ball drove inward a portion of his woollen nightcap—'

'In the form of a cul-de-sac, doubtless,' said the undaunted Wedge.

'For once, Surgeon Wedge, you use the only term that can be employed, and let me avail myself of this opportunity to say to you, young gentlemen, that a man of true science'—expanding his shallow chest a little—'uses but few hard words, and those only when none other will answer his purpose, whereas the smatterer in science'—slightly glancing toward Wedge—'thinks that by mouthing hard words he proves that he understands hard things. Let this sink deep in your minds, young gentlemen; and, Surgeon Wedge'—with a stiff bow—'permit me to submit the reflection to yourself. Well, young gentlemen, the bullet was afterward extracted by pulling upon the external parts of the cul-de-sac—a simple, but exceedingly beautiful operation. There is a fine example, somewhat similar, related in Guthrie, but, of course, you must have met with it, in so well known a work as his Treatise on Gun-shot Wounds. When, upward of twenty years ago, I was with Lord Cochrane, then admiral of the fleets of this very country'—pointing shoreward, out of a port-hole—'a sailor of the vessel to which I was attached, during the blockade of Bahia, had his leg—' But by this time the fidgets had completely taken possession of his auditors, especially of the senior surgeons; and turning upon them abruptly he added, 'But I will not detain you longer, gentlemen'—turning round upon all the surgeons—'your dinners must be waiting you on board your respective ships But, Surgeon Sawyer, perhaps you may desire to wash your hands before you go There is the basin, sir, you will find a clean towel on the rammer For myself, I seldom use them'—taking out his handkerchief 'I must leave you now, gentlemen,'—bowing 'To-morrow, at ten, the limb will be upon the table, and I shall be happy to see you all upon the occasion Who's there?' turning to the curtain, which then rustled

'Please, sir,' said the steward, entering, 'the patient is dead'

'The body, also, gentlemen, at ten precisely,' said Cuticle, once more turning round upon his guests 'I predicted that the operation might prove fatal, he was very much run down Good morning,' and Cuticle departed

'He does not, surely, mean to touch the body?' exclaimed Surgeon Sawyer, with much excitement

'Oh, no!' said Patella, 'that's only his way, he means, doubtless, that it may be inspected previous to being taken ashore for burial'

The assemblage of gold-laced surgeons now ascended to the quarter-deck, the second cutter was called away by the bugler, and, one by one, they were dropped aboard of their respective ships

The following evening the messmates of the topman rowed his remains ashore, and buried them in the ever-vernal Protestant cemetery, hard by the Beach of the Flamingoes, in plain sight from the bay

FROM MARDI

THE PHILOSOPHERS REGALE THEMSELVES WITH THEIR PIPES<sup>1</sup>

'Ho! mortals! mortals!' cried Media 'Go we to bury our dead? Awake, sons of men!

Cheer up, heirs of immortality! Ho, Vee-Vee! bring forth our pipes we'll smoke off this cloud'

Nothing so beguiling as the fumes of tobacco, whether inhaled through hookah, narghil, chibouque, Dutch porcelain, pure Principe, or Regalia And a great oversight had it been in King Media, to have omitted pipes among the appliances of this voyage that we went Tobacco in rouleaus we had none, cigar nor cigaret, which little the company esteemed Pipes were preferred, and pipes we often smoked, testify, oh! Vee-Vee, to that But not of the vile clay, of which mankind and Etruscan vases were made, were these jolly fine pipes of ours. But all in good time.

Now, the leaf called tobacco is of divers species and sorts Not to dwell upon vile Shag, Pig-tail, Plug, Nail-rod, Negro-head, Cavendish, and misnamed Lady's-twist, there are the following varieties—Gold-leaf, Oronoco, Cimarozza, Smyrna, Bird's-eye, James-river, Sweet-scented, Honeydew, Kentucky, Cnaster, Scarfalati, and famed Shiraz, or Persian Of all of which, perhaps the last is the best

But smoked by itself, to a fastidious wight, even Shiraz is not gentle enough It needs mitigation And the cunning craft of so mitigating even the mildest tobacco was well understood in the dominions of Media There, in plantations ever covered with a brooding, blue haze, they raised its fine leaf in the utmost luxuriance, almost as broad as the broad fans of the broad-bladed banana The stalks of the leaf withdrawn, the remainder they cut up, and mixed with soft willow-bark, and the aromatic leaves of the Betel

'Ho! Vee-Vee, bring forth the pipes,' cried Media And forth they came, followed by a quaint, carved cocoanut, agate-lidded, containing ammunition sufficient for many stout charges and primings.

Soon we were all smoking so hard that the canopied howdah, under which we reclined, sent up purple wreaths like a Michigan wigwam There we sat in a ring, all smoking in council—every pipe a halcyon pipe of peace.

And among those calumets, my lord Media's showed like the turbaned Grand Turk among his Bashaws It was an extraordinary pipe, be sure, of right royal dimensions Its mouthpiece an eagle's beak, its long stem, a bright, red-barked cherry-tree branch, partly covered with a close network of purple-dyed porcupine quills, and toward the upper end, streaming with pennons, like a Versailles flagstaff of a coronation day These pennons were managed by halyards, and after lighting his prince's pipe, it was little Vee-Vee's part to run them up toward the mast-head, or mouthpiece, in token that his lord was fairly under weigh

But Babbalanja's was of a different sort, an immense, black, serpentine stem of ebony, coiling this way and that, in endless convolutions, like an anaconda round a traveler in Brazil Smoking this hydra, Babbalanja looked as if playing upon the trombone

Next, gentle Yoomy's Its stem, a slender golden reed, like musical Pan's, its bowl very merry with tassels

Lastly, old Mohi the chronicler's Its Death's-head bowl forming its latter end, continually reminding him of his own Its shank was an ostrich's leg, some feathers still waving nigh the mouthpiece

'Here, Vee-Vee! fill me up again,' cried Media, through the blue vapours sweeping round his great gonfalon, like plumed Marshal Ney, waving his baton in the smoke of Waterloo, or thrice gallant Anglesea, crossing his wooden leg mid the reek and rack of the Apsley House banquet

Vee-Vee obeyed, and quickly, like a howitzer, the pipe-bowl was reloaded to the muzzle, and King Media smoked on

'Ah! this is pleasant indeed,' he cried 'Look, it's a calm on the waters, and a calm in our hearts, as we inhale these sedative odours'

'So calm,' said Babbalanja, 'the very gods must be smoking now'

'And thus,' said Media, 'we demi-gods hereafter shall cross-legged sit, and smoke out our eternities Ah, what a glorious puff! Mortals, methinks these pipe-bowls of ours must be petrifications of roses, so scented they seem But, old Mohi, you have smoked this many a long year, doubtless, you know something about their material—the Froth-of-the-Sea they call it, I think—ere my handicraft subjects obtain it, to work into bowls Tell us the tale'

'Delighted to do so, my lord,' replied

Mohi, slowly disentangling his mouthpiece from the braids of his beard 'I have devoted much time and attention to the study of pipe-bowls, and groped among many learned authorities, to reconcile the clashing opinions concerning the origin of the so-called Farnoo, or Froth-of-the-Sea.'

'Well, then, my old centenarian, give us the result of your investigations. But smoke away a word and a puff go on.'

'May it please you, then, my right worshipful lord, this Farnoo is an unctuous, argillaceous substance, in its natural state, soft, malleable, and easily worked as the cornelian-red clay from the famous pipe-quarries of the wild tribes to the north. But though mostly found buried in terra-firma, especially in the isles toward the East, this Farnoo, my lord, is sometimes thrown up by the ocean, in seasons of high sea, being plentifully found on the reefs. But, my lord, like amber, the precise nature and origin of this Farnoo are points widely mooted'

'Stop there!' cried Media, 'our mouthpieces are of amber, so, not a word more of the Froth-of-the-Sea, until something be said to clear up the mystery of amber What is amber, old man?'

'A still more obscure thing to trace than the other, my worshipful lord Ancient Plinnee maintained that originally it must be a juice, exuding from balsam firs and pines, Borhavo, that, like camphor, it is the crystallised oil of aromatic ferns, Berzilli, that it is the concreted scum of the lake Cephioris, and Vondendo, against scores of antagonists, stoutly held it a sort of bituminous gold, trickling from antediluvian smugglers' caves, nigh the sea.'

'Why, old Braid-Beard,' cried Media, placing his pipe in rest, 'you are almost as erudite as our philosopher here'

'Much more so, my lord,' said Babbalanja, 'for Mohi has somehow picked up all my worthless forgettings, which are more than my valuable rememberings'

'What say you, wise one?' cried Mohi, shaking his braids, like an enraged elephant with many trunks.

Said Yoomy 'My lord, I have heard that amber is nothing less than the congealed tears of broken-hearted mermaids'

'Absurd, minstrel,' cried Mohi 'Hark ye; I know what it is. All other authorities to the contrary, amber is nothing more than gold-fishes' brains, made waxy, then firm, by the action of the sea.'

'Nonsense!' cried Yoomy

'My lord,' said Braid-Beard, waving his pipe, 'this thing is just as I say. Imbedded in amber, do we not find little fishes' fins, porpoise-teeth, sea-gulls' beaks and claws, nay, butterflies' wings, and sometimes a topaz? And how could that be, unless the substance was first soft? Amber is gold-fishes' brains, I say.'

'For one,' said Babbalanja, 'I'll not believe that, till you prove to me, Braid-Beard, that ideas themselves are found imbedded therein.'

'Another of your crazy conceits, philosopher,' replied Mohi, disdainfully, 'yet, sometimes plenty of strange black-letter characters have been discovered in amber.' And throwing back his hoary old head, he jetted forth his vapours like a whale.

'Indeed?' cried Babbalanja. 'Then, my lord Media, it may be earnestly inquired, whether the gentle laws of the tribes before the Flood, were not sought to be embalmed and perpetuated between transparent and sweet-scented tablets of amber.'

'That, now, is not so unlikely,' said Mohi, 'for old King Rondo the Round once set about getting him a coffin-lid of amber, much desiring a famous mass of it owned by the ancestors of Donjalolo of Juam. But no navies could buy it. So Rondo had himself urned in a crystal.'

'And that immortalised Rondo, no doubt,' said Babbalanja. 'Ha! ha! pity he fared not like the fat porpoise frozen and tombed in an iceberg, its icy shroud drifting south, soon melted away, and down, out of sight, sank the dead.'

'Well, so much for amber,' cried Media. 'Now, Mohi, go on about Farnoo.'

'Know, then, my lord, that Farnoo is more like ambergris than amber.'

'Is it? then, pray, tell us something on that head. You know all about ambergris, too, I suppose.'

'Every thing about all things, my lord. Ambergris is found both on land and at sea. But especially, are lumps of it picked up on the spicy coasts of Jovanna, indeed, all over the atolls and reefs in the eastern quarter of Mardi.'

'But what is this ambergris, Braid-Beard?' said Babbalanja.

'Aquovi, the chymist, pronounced it the fragments of mushrooms growing at the bottom of the sea, Voluto held that, like naphtha, it springs from fountains down there. But it is neither.'

'I have heard,' said Yoomy, 'that it is the honey-comb of bees, fallen from flowery cliffs into the brine.'

'Nothing of the kind,' said Mohi. 'Do I not know all about it, minstrel? Ambergris is the petrified gallstones of crocodiles.'

'What?' cried Babbalanja, 'comes sweet-scented ambergris from those musky and chain-plated river cavalry? No wonder, then, their flesh is so fragrant, their upper jaws as the visors of vinaigrettes.'

'Nay, you are all wrong,' cried King Media.

Then, laughing to himself 'It's pleasant to sit by, a demi-god, and hear the surmings of mortals, upon things they know nothing about, theology, or amber, or ambergris, it's all the same. But then, did I always out with everything I know, there would be no conversing with these comical creatures.'

'Listen, old Mohi, ambergris is a morbid secretion of the spermaceti whale, for like you mortals, the whale is at times a sort of hypochondriac and dyspeptic. You must know, subjects, that in antediluvian times, the spermaceti whale was much hunted by sportsmen, that being accounted better pastime, than pursuing the behemoths on shore. Besides, it was a lucrative diversion. Now, sometimes upon striking the monster, it would start off in a dastardly fright, leaving certain fragments in its wake. These fragments the hunters picked up, giving over the chase for a while. For in those days, as now, a quarter-quintal of ambergris was more valuable than a whole ton of spermaceti.'

'Nor, my lord,' said Babbalanja, 'would it have been wise to kill the fish that dropped such treasures no more than to murder the noddie that laid the golden eggs.'

'Beshrew me! a noddie it must have been,' gurgled Mohi through his pipe-stem, 'to lay golden eggs for others to hatch.'

'Come, no more of that now,' cried

Media. 'Mohi, how long think you may one of these pipe-bowls last?'

'My lord, like one's cranium, it will endure till broken. I have smoked this one of mine more than half a century.'

'But unlike our craniums, stocked full of concretions,' said Babbalanja, 'our pipe-bowls never need clearing out.'

'True,' said Mohi, 'they absorb the oil of the smoke, instead of allowing it offensively to incrust.'

'Aye, the older the better,' said Media, 'and the more delicious the flavour imparted to the fumes inhaled.'

'Farnoos forever! my lord,' cried Yoomy. 'By much smoking, the bowl waxes russet and mellow, like the berry-brown cheek of a sunburnt brunette.'

'And as like smoked hams,' cried Braid-Beard, 'we veteran old smokers grow browner and browner, hugely do we admire to see our jolly noses and pipe-bowls mellowing together.'

'Well said, old man,' cried Babbalanja; 'for, like a good wife, a pipe is a friend and companion for life. And whoso weds with a pipe is no longer a bachelor. After many vexations, he may go home to that faithful counsellor, and ever find it full of kind consolations and suggestions. But not thus with cigars or cigarets the acquaintances of a moment, chatted with in by-places, whenever they come handy, their existence so fugitive, uncertain, unsatisfactory. Once ignited, nothing like longevity pertains to them. They never grow old. Why, my lord, the stump of a cigaret is an abomination; and two of them crossed are more of a memento mori than a brace of thigh-bones at right angles.'

'So they are, so they are,' cried King Media. 'Then, mortals, puff we away at our pipes. Puff, puff, I say. Ah! how we puff! But thus we demi-gods ever puff at our ease.'

'Puff, puff, how we puff,' cried Babbalanja. 'But life itself is a puff and a wheeze. Our lungs are two pipes which we constantly smoke.'

'Puff, puff! how we puff,' cried old Mohi. 'All thought is a puff.'

'Aye,' said Babbalanja, 'not more smoke in that skull-bowl of yours than in the skull on your shoulders both ends alike.'

'Puff! puff! how we puff,' cried Yoomy.

'But in every puff, there hangs a wreath. In every puff off flies a care.'

'Aye, there they go,' cried Mohi, 'there goes another—and there, and there,—this is the way to get rid of them, my worshipful lord, puff them aside.'

'Yoomy,' said Media, 'give us that pipe song of thine. Sing it, my sweet and pleasant poet. We'll keep time with the flageolets of ours.'

So with pipes and puffs for a chorus, thus Yoomy sang —

Care is all stuff —

Puff! Puff!

To puff is enough —

Puff! Puff!

More musky than snuff,

And warm is a puff —

Puff! Puff!

Here we sit mid our puffs,

Like old lords in their ruffs,

Snug as bears in their muffs —

Puff! Puff!

Then puff, puff, puff,

For care is all stuff,

Puffed off in a puff —

Puff! Puff!

'Aye, puff away,' cried Babbalanja, 'puff, puff, so we are born, and so die. Puff, puff, my volcanoes the great sun itself will yet go out in a snuff, and all Mardi smoke out its last wick.'

'Puffs enough,' said King Media, 'Vee-Vee! haul down my flag. There, lie down before me, oh Gonfalon! and, subjects, hear,—when I die, lay this spear on my right, and this pipe on my left, its colours at half-mast, so shall I be ambidexter, and sleep between eloquent symbols.'

FROM PIERRE

THE HISTORY OF AN AUTHOR <sup>1</sup>

I

Pierre Immaturely Attempts a Mature Work

WE are now to behold Pierre permanently lodged in three lofty adjoining chambers of

the Apostles' And passing on a little further in time, and overlooking the hundred and one domestic details, of how their internal arrangements were finally put into steady working order, how poor Delly, now giving over the sharper pangs of her grief, found in the lighter occupations of a handmaid and familiar companion to Isabel, the only practical relief from the memories of her miserable past, how Isabel herself in the otherwise occupied hours of Pierre, passed some of her time in mastering the chirographical incoherencies of his manuscripts, with a view to eventually copying them out in a legible hand for the printer, or went below-stairs to the rooms of the Millthorpes, and in the modest and amiable society of the three young ladies and their excellent mother, found some little solace for the absence of Pierre, or, when his day's work was done, sat by him in the twilight, and played her mystic guitar till Pierre felt chapter after chapter born of its wondrous suggestiveness, but alas! eternally incapable of being translated into words, for where the deepest words end, there music begins with its supersensuous and all-confounding intimations

Disowning now all previous exertions of his mind, and burning in scorn even those fine fruits of a care-free fancy, which, written at Saddle Meadows in the sweet legendary time of Lucy and her love, he had jealously kept from the publishers, as too true and good to be published, renouncing all his foregone self, Pierre was now engaged in a comprehensive compacted work, to whose speedy completion two tremendous motives unitedly impelled,—the burning desire to deliver what he thought to be new, or at least miserably neglected Truth to the world, and the prospective menace of being absolutely penniless, unless by the sale of his book, he could realize money.

of integrity among the complexities and ambiguities of society In the selection here used, he discusses the fallacies of contemporary searches for philosophical truth, and appears to analyse both the weaknesses of his earlier novels and his development as a writer The work, immaturely attempted, is probably Mardi, a critique of the thought of others, rather than a plumb-ing of his own soul

Pierre had broken outside the conventionalised circle about his family's home at Saddle meadows and Lucy his fiancée, and had come to New York to live with Isabel his half-sister and his father's child Isabel was the hostage of a similar venture that had failed

Swayed to universality of thought by the widely explosive mental tendencies of the profound events which had lately befallen him, and the unprecedented situation in which he now found himself, and perceiving, by presentiment, that most grand productions of the best human intellects ever are built round a circle, as atolls (i.e. the primitive coral islets which, raising themselves in the depths of profoundest seas, rise funnel-like to the surface, and present there a hoop of white rock, which though on the outside everywhere lashed by the ocean, yet excludes all tempests from the quiet lagoon within), digestively including the whole range of all that can be known or dreamed, Pierre was resolved to give the world a book, which the world should hail with surprise and delight A varied scope of reading, little suspected by his friends, and randomly acquired by a random but lynx-eyed mind, in the course of the multifarious, incidental, bibliographic encounterings of almost any civilised young inquirer after Truth, this poured one considerable contributory stream into that bottomless spring of original thought which the occasion and time had caused to burst out in himself Now he congratulated himself upon all his cursory acquisitions of this sort, ignorant that in reality to a mind bent on producing some thoughtful thing of absolute Truth, all mere reading is apt to prove but an obstacle hard to overcome, and not an accelerator helpfully pushing him along

While Pierre was thinking that he was entirely transplanted into a new and wonderful element of Beauty and Power, he was, in fact, but in one of the stages of the transition That ultimate element once fairly gained, then books no more are needed for buoys to our souls, our own strong limbs support us, and we float over all bottomlessnesses with a jeering impunity He did not see,—or if he did, he could not yet name the true cause for it,—that already, in the incipency of his work, the heavy unmalleable element of mere book-knowledge would not congenially weld with the wide fluidness and ethereal airiness of spontaneous creative thought He would climb Parnassus with a pile of folios on his back He did not see, that it was nothing at all to him, what other men had written, that though Plato was indeed a transcendently great man in himself, yet Plato must not be transcendently great to him (Pierre), so long as he (Pierre himself) would also do something transcendently great. He did not see that there is no such thing as a standard for the creative spirit, that no one great book must ever be separately regarded, and permitted to dominate with its own uniqueness upon the creative mind, but that all existing great works must be federated in the fancy, and so regarded as a miscellaneous and Pantheistic whole, and then,—without at all dictating to his own mind, or unduly biasing it any way,—thus combined, they would prove simply an exhilarative and provocative to him. He did not see, that even when thus combined, all was but one small mite, compared to the latent infiniteness and inexhaustibility in himself, that all the great books in the world are but the mutilated shadowings-forth of invisible and eternally unembodied images in the soul; so that they are but the mirrors, distortedly reflecting to us our own things, and never mind what the mirror may be, if we would see the object, we must look at the object itself, and not at its reflection.

But, as to the resolute traveller in Switzerland, the Alps do never in one wide and comprehensive sweep, instantaneously reveal their full awfulness of amplitude—their overawing extent of peak crowded on peak, and spur sloping on spur, and chain jammed behind chain, and all their wonderful battalions of might, so hath heaven wisely ordained, that on first entering into the Switzerland of his soul, man shall not at once perceive its tremendous immensity, lest illy prepared for such an encounter, his spirit should sink and perish in the lowermost snows. Only by judicious degrees, appointed of God, does man come at last to gain his Mont Blanc and take an overtopping view of these Alps, and even then, the tithe is not shown, and far over the invisible Atlantic, the Rocky Mountains and the Andes are yet unbeheld. Appalling is the soul of a man! Better might one be pushed off into the material spaces beyond the uttermost orbit of our sun, than once feel himself fairly afloat in himself!

But not now to consider these ulterior things, Pierre, though strangely and very newly alive to many before unregarded wonders in the general world, still, had he not as yet procured for himself that enchanter's wand of the soul, which but touching the humblest experiences in one's life, straightway it starts up all eyes, in every one of which are endless significances. Not yet had he dropped his angle into the well of his childhood, to find what fish might be there, for who dreams to find fish in a well? the running stream of the outer world, there doubtless swim the golden perch and the pickerel! Ten million things were as yet uncovered to Pierre. The old mummy lies buried in cloth on cloth, it takes time to unwrap this Egyptian king. Yet now, forsooth, because Pierre began to see through the first superficiality of the world, he fondly weens he has come to the unlayered substance. But, far as any geologist has yet gone down into the world, it is found to consist of nothing but surface stratified on surface. To its axis, the world being nothing but superinduced superficialities. By vast pains we mine into the pyramid, by horrible gropings we come to the central room, with joy we espy the sarcophagus, but we lift the lid—and no body is there!—appallingly vacant as vast is the soul of a man!

The Flower-Curtain Lifted from before a Tropical Author, with Some Remarks on the Transcendental Flesh-Brush Philosophy

SOME days passed after the fatal tidings from the Meadows, and at length, somewhat mastering his emotions, Pierre again sits down in his chamber, for grieve how he will, yet work he must. And now day succeeds day, and week follows week, and Pierre still sits in his chamber. The long rows of cooled brick-kilns around him scarce know of the change, but from the fair fields of his great-great-great-grandfather's manor, Summer hath flown like a swallow-guest, the perfidious wight, Autumn, hath peeped in at the groves of the maple, and under pretence of clothing them in rich russet and gold, hath stripped them at last of the slightest rag, and then run away laughing, prophetic icicles depend from the arbours round about the old manorial mansion—now locked up and abandoned, and the little, round, marble table in the viny summer-house where, of July mornings, he had sat chatting and drinking negus with his gay mother, is now spread with a shivering napkin of frost; sleety varnish hath encrusted that once gay mother's grave, preparing it for its final ceremonies of wrapping snow upon snow, wild howl the winds in the woods it is Winter Sweet Summer is done, and Autumn is done, but the book, like the bitter Winter, is yet to be finished

That season's wheat is long garnered, Pierre, that season's ripe apples and grapes are in, no crop, no plant, no fruit is out, the whole harvest is done Oh, woe to that belated winter-overtaken plant, which the summer could not bring to maturity! The drifting winter snows shall overwhelm it Think, Pierre, doth not thy plant belong to some other and tropical clime? Though transplanted to northern Maine, the orange-tree of the Floridas will put forth leaves in that parsimonious summer, and show some few tokens of fruitage, yet November will find no golden globes thereon, and the passionate old lumberman, December, shall peel the whole tree, wrench it off at the ground, and toss it for a faggot to some lime-kiln Ah, Pierre, Pierre, make haste! make haste! force thy fruitage, lest the winter force thee

Watch yon little toddler, how long it is learning to stand by itself! First it shrieks and implores, and will not try to stand at all, unless both father and mother uphold it, then a little more bold, it must, at least, feel one parental hand, else again the cry and the tremble, long time is it ere by degrees this child comes to stand without any support But, by and by, grown up to man's estate, it shall leave the very mother that bore it, and the father that begot it, and cross the seas, perhaps, or settle in far Oregon lands There now, do you see the soul In its germ on all sides it is closely folded by the world, as the husk folds the tenderest fruit, then it is born from the world-husk, but still now outwardly clings to it,—still clamours for the support of its mother the world, and its father the Deity But it shall yet learn to stand independent, though not without many a bitter wail, and many a miserable fall

That hour of the life of a man when first the help of humanity fails him, and he learns that in his obscurity and indigence humanity holds him a dog and no man, that hour is a hard one, but not the hardest. There is still another hour which follows, when he learns that in his infinite comparative minuteness and abjectness, the gods do likewise despise him, and own him not of their clan Divinity and humanity then are equally willing that he should starve in the street for all that either will do for him. Now cruel father and mother have both let go his hand, and the little soul-toddler, now you shall hear his shriek and his wail, and often his fall

When at Saddle Meadows, Pierre had wavered and trembled in those first wretched hours ensuing upon the receipt of Isabel's letter, then humanity had let go the hand of Pierre, and therefore his cry, but when at last inured to this, Pierre was seated at his book, willing that humanity should desert him, so long as he thought he felt a far higher support, then, ere long, he began to feel the utter loss of that other support, too, aye, even the paternal gods themselves did now desert Pierre, the toddler was toddling entirely alone, and not without shrieks

If man must wrestle, perhaps it is well that it should be on the nakedest possible plain

The three chambers of Pierre at the Apostles' were connecting ones The first—having a little retreat where Delly slept—was used for the more exacting domestic purposes here also their meals were taken, the second was the chamber of Isabel, the third was the closet of Pierre In the first—the dining-room, as they called it—there was a stove which boiled the water for their coffee and tea, and where Delly concocted their light repasts This was their only fire, for, warned again and again to economise to the uttermost, Pierre did not dare to purchase any additional warmth But by prudent management, a very little warmth may go a great way In the present case, it went some forty feet or more A horizontal pipe, after elbowing away from above the stove in the dining-room, pierced the partition wall, and passing straight through Isabel's chamber, entered the closet of Pierre at one corner, and then abruptly disappeared into the wall, where all further caloric—if any—went up through the chimney into the air, to help warm the December sun. Now, the great distance of Pierre's caloric stream from its fountain, sadly impaired it, and weakened it. It hardly had the flavour of heat. It would have had but very inconsiderable influence in raising the depressed spirits of the most mercurial thermometer, certainly it was not very elevating to the spirits of Pierre. Besides, this caloric stream, small as it was, did not flow through the room, but only entered it, to elbow right out of it, as some coquettish maidens enter the heart, moreover, it was in the furthest corner from the only place where, with a judicious view to the light, Pierre's desk-barrels and board could advantageously stand. Often, Isabel insisted upon his having a separate stove to himself, but Pierre would not listen to such a thing. Then Isabel would offer her own room to him, saying it was of no indispensable use to her by day, she could easily spend her time in the dining-room, but Pierre would not listen to such a thing, he would not deprive her of the comfort of a continually accessible privacy, besides, he was now used to his own room, and must sit by that particular window there, and no other. Then Isabel would insist upon keeping her connecting door open while Pierre was employed at his desk, that so the heat of her room might bodily go into his, but Pierre would not listen to such a thing; because he must be religiously locked up while at work, outer love and hate must alike be excluded then. In vain Isabel said she would make not the slightest noise, and muffle the point of the very needle she used. All in vain Pierre was inflexible here.

Yes, he was resolved to battle it out in his own solitary closet, though a strange, transcendental conceit of one of the more erratic and non-conforming Apostles,—who was also at this time engaged upon a profound work above-stars, and who denied himself his full sufficiency of food, in order to ensure an abundant fire,—the strange conceit of this Apostle, I say,—accidentally communicated to Pierre,—that, through all the kingdoms of Nature, caloric was the great universal producer and vivifier, and could not be prudently excluded from the spot where great books were in the act of creation, and therefore, he (the Apostle) for one, was resolved to plant his head in a hot-bed of stove-warmed air, and so force his brain to germinate and blossom, and bud, and put forth the eventual, crowning, victorious flower,—though indeed this conceit rather staggered Pierre—for in truth, there was no small smack of plausible analogy in it—yet one thought of his purse would wholly expel the unwelcome intrusion, and reinforce his own previous resolve.

However lofty and magnificent the movements of the stars, whatever celestial melodies they may thereby beget, yet the astronomers assure us that they are the most rigidly methodical of all the things that exist. No old housewife goes her daily domestic round with one-millionth part the precision of the great planet Jupiter in his stated and unalterable revolutions. He has found his orbit, and stays in it, he has timed himself, and adheres to his periods. So, in some degree with Pierre, now revolving in the troubled orbit of his book.

Pierre rose moderately early, and the better to inure himself to the permanent chill of his room, and to defy and beard to its face, the cruellest cold of the outer air, he would—behind the curtain—throw down the upper sash of his window, and on a square of old painted canvas, formerly wrapping some bale of goods in the neighbourhood, treat his limbs, of those early December mornings, to a copious ablution, in water thickened with incipient ice. Nor, in this stoic performance, was he at all without company,—not present, but adjointly sympathetic, for scarce an Apostle in all those scores and scores of chambers, but undeviatingly took his daily December bath. Pierre had only to peep out of his pane and glance round the multi-windowed, enclosing walls of the quadrangle, to catch plentiful half-glimpses, all round him, of many a lean, philosophical nudity, refreshing his meagre bones with crash-towel and cold water. 'Quick be the play,' was their motto. 'Lively our elbows, and nimble all our tenuityes.' Oh, the dismal echoings of the raspings of flesh-brushes, perverted to the filing and polishing of the merest ribs! Oh, the shuddersome splashings of pails of ice-water over feverish heads, not unfamiliar with aches! Oh, the rheumatal cracklings of rusted joints, in that defied air of December<sup>1</sup> for every thick-frosted sash was down, and every lean nudity courted the zephyr<sup>1</sup>

Among all the innate, hyena-like repellants to the reception of any set form of a spiritually minded and pure archetypal faith, there is nothing so potent in its sceptical tendencies, as that inevitable perverse ridiculousness, which so often bestreaks some of the essentially finest and noblest aspirations of those men, who disgusted with the common conventional quackeries, strive, in their clogged terrestrial humanities, after some imperfectly discerned, but heavenly ideals ideals, not only imperfectly discerned in themselves, but the path to them so little traceable, that no two minds will entirely agree upon it

Hardly a new-light Apostle, but who, in superaddition to his revolutionary scheme for the minds and philosophies of men, entertains some insane, heterodoxical notions about the economy of his body His soul, introduced by the gentlemanly gods into the supernal society, practically rejects that most sensible maxim of men of the world, who chancing to gain the friendship of any great character, never make that the ground of boring him with the supplemental acquaintance of their next friend, who perhaps is some miserable ninny Love me, love my dog, is only an adage for the old country women who affectionately kiss their cows. The gods love the soul of a man, often, they will frankly accost it, but they abominate his body, and will forever cut it dead, both here and hereafter So, if thou wouldst go to the gods, leave thy dog of a body behind thee And most importantly thou strivest with thy purifying cold baths, and thy diligent scrubblings with flesh-brushes, to prepare it as a meet offering for their altar Nor shall all thy Pythagorean and Shelleyan dietings on apple-parings, dried prunes, and crumbs of oatmeal cracker, ever fit thy body for heaven Feed all things with food convenient for them,—that is, if the food be procurable The food of thy soul is light and space, feed it then on light and space But the food of thy body is champagne and oysters, feed it then on champagne and oysters, and so shall it merit a joyful resurrection, if there is any to be Say, wouldst thou rise with a lantern jaw and a spavined knee? Rise with brawn on thee, and a most royal corporation before thee, so shalt thou in that day claim respectful attention Know this that while many a consumptive dietarian has but produced the merest literary flatulencies to the world, convivial authors have alike given utterance to the sublimest wisdom, and created the least gross and most ethereal forms And for men of demonstrative muscle and action, consider that right royal epitaph which Cyrus the Great caused to be engraved on his tomb—‘I could drink a great deal of wine, and it did me a great deal of good’ Ah, foolish<sup>1</sup> to think that by starving thy body, thou shalt fatten thy soul<sup>1</sup> Is yonder ox fatted because yonder lean fox starves in the winter wood? And prate not of despising thy body, while still thou flourisheth thy flesh-brush<sup>1</sup> The finest houses are most cared for within, the outer walls are freely left to the dust and the soot Put venison in thee, and so wit shall come out of thee It is one thing in the mill, but another in the sack

Now it was the continual, quadrangular example of those forlorn fellows, the Apostles, who, in this period of his half-developments and transitions, had deluded Pierre into the Flesh-Brush Philosophy, and had almost tempted him into the Apple-Parings Dialectics For all the long wards, corridors, and multitudinous chambers of the Apostles’ were scattered with the stems of apples, the stones of prunes, and the shells of peanuts They went about huskily muttering the Kantian Categories through teeth and lips dry and dusty as any miller’s, with the crumbs of Graham crackers A tumbler of cold water was the utmost welcome to their reception rooms, at the grand supposed Sanhedrim presided over by one of the deputies of Plotinus Plinlimmon, a huge jug of Adam’s Ale, and a bushel-basket of Graham crackers were the only convivia Continually bits of cheese were dropping from their pockets, and old shiny apple parchments were ignorantly exhibited every time they drew out a manuscript to read you Some were curious in the vintages of waters, and in three glass decanters set before you, Fairmount, Croton, and Cochituate, they hold that Croton was the most potent, Fairmount a gentle tonic, and Cochituate the mildest and least inebriating of all Take some more of the Croton, my dear sir<sup>1</sup> Be brisk with the Fairmount! Why stops that Cochituate? So on their philosophical tables went round their Port, their Sherry, and their Claret

Some, further advanced, rejected mere water in the bath, as altogether too coarse an element, and so, took to the Vapour-baths, and steamed their lean ribs every morning. The smoke which issued from their heads, and overspread their pages, was prefigured in the mists that issued from under their door-sills and out of their windows. Some could not sit down of a morning until after first applying the Vapour-bath outside, and then thoroughly rinsing out their interiors with five cups of cold Croton. They were as faithfully replenished fire-buckets, and could they, standing in one cordon, have consecutively pumped themselves into each other, then the great fire of 1835 had been far less wide-spread and disastrous

Ah! ye poor lean ones! ye wretched Soakites and Vapourites! have not your niggardly fortunes enough rinsed ye out, and wizened ye, but ye must still be dragging the hose-pipe, and throwing still more cold Croton on yourselves and the world? Ah! attach the screw of your hose-pipe to some fine old butt of Madeira! pump us some sparkling wine into the world! see, see, already, from all eternity, two-thirds of it have lain helplessly soaking!

With cheek rather pale, then, and lips rather blue, Pierre sits down to his plank

But is Pierre packed in the mail for St Petersburg this morning? Over his boots are his moccasins, over his ordinary coat is his surtout, and over that, a cloak of Isabel's. Now he is squared to his plank, and at his hint, the affectionate Isabel gently pushes his chair closer to it, for he is so muffled, he can hardly move of himself. Now Delly comes in with bricks hot from the stove, and now Isabel and she with devoted solicitude pack away these comforting stones in the folds of an old blue cloak, a military garment of the grandfather of Pierre, and tenderly arrange it both over and under his feet, but putting the warm flagging beneath. Then Delly brings still another hot brick to put under his ink-stand, to prevent the ink from thickening. Then Isabel drags the camp-bedstead nearer to him, on which are the two or three books he may possibly have occasion to refer to that day, with a biscuit or two, and some water, and a clean towel, and a basin. Then she leans against the plank by the elbow of Pierre, a crook-ended stick. Is Pierre a shepherd, or a bishop, or a cripple? No, but he has in effect, reduced himself to the miserable condition of the last. With the crook-ended cane, Pierre—unable to rise without sadly impairing his manifold intrenchments, and admitting the cold air into their innermost nooks,—Pierre, if in his solitude, he should chance to need anything beyond the reach of his arm, then the crook-ended cane drags it to his immediate vicinity

Pierre glances slowly all round him, everything seems to be right, he looks up with a grateful, melancholy satisfaction at Isabel, a tear gathers in her eye, but she conceals it from him by coming very close to him, stooping over, and kissing his brow. 'Tis her lips that leave the warm moisture there, not her tears, she says

'I suppose I must go now, Pierre. Now don't, don't be so long to-day. I will call thee at half-past four. Thou shalt not strain thine eyes in the twilight.'

'We will see about that,' says Pierre, with an unobserved attempt at a very sad pun. 'Come, thou must go. Leave me.'

And there he is left

Pierre is young, heaven gave him the divinest, freshest form of a man, put light into his eye, and fire into his blood, and brawn into his arm, and a joyous, jubilant, overflowing, upbubbling, universal life in him everywhere. Now look around in that most miserable room, and at that most miserable of all the pursuits of a man, and say if here be the place, and this be the trade, that God intended him for. A rickety chair, two hollow barrels, a plank, paper, pens, and infernally black ink, four leprously dingy white walls, no carpet, a cup of water, and a dry biscuit or two. Oh, I hear the leap of the Texan Comanche, as at this moment he goes crashing like a wild deer through the green underbrush, I hear his glorious whoop of savage and untamable health, and then I look in at Pierre. If physical, practical unreason make the savage, which is he? Civilisation, Philosophy, Ideal Virtue! behold your victim!

Some hours pass Let us peep over the shoulder of Pierre, and see what it is he is writing there, in that most melancholy closet. Here, topping the reeking pile by his side, is the last sheet from his hand, the frenzied ink not yet entirely dry It is much to our purpose, for in this sheet, he seems to have directly plagiarised from his own experiences, to fill out the mood of his apparent author-hero, Vivia, who thus soliloquises 'A deep-down, unutterable mournfulness is in me Now I drop all humorous or indifferent disguises, and all philosophical pretensions I own myself a brother of the clod, a child of the Primeval Gloom Hopelessness and despair are over me, as pall on pall Away, ye chattering apes of a sophomorean Spinoza and Plato, who once didst all but delude me that the night was day, and pain only a tickle Explain this darkness, exorcise this devil, ye cannot Tell me not, thou inconceivable coxcomb of a Goethe, that the universe cannot spare thee and thy immortality, so long as—like a hired waiter—thou makest thyself "generally useful" Already the universe gets on without thee, and could still spare a million more of the same identical kidney Corporations have no souls, and thy Pantheism, what was that? Thou wert but the pretentious, heartless part of a man Lo! I hold thee in this hand, and thou art crushed in it like an egg from which the meat hath been sucked'

Here is a slip from the floor

'Whence flow the panegyrical melodies that precede the march of these heroes? From what but from a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal!'

And here is a second

'Cast thy eye in there on Vivia, tell me why those four limbs should be clapped in a dismal jail—day out, day in—week out, week in—month out, month in—and himself the voluntary jailor! Is this the end of philosophy? This the larger, and spiritual life? This your boasted empyrean? Is it for this that a man should grow wise, and leave off his most excellent and calumniated folly?'

And here is a third

'Cast thy eye in there on Vivia, he, who in the pursuit of the highest health of virtue and truth, shows but a pallid cheek! Weigh his heart in thy hand, oh, thou gold-laced, virtuoso Goethe! and tell me whether it does not exceed thy standard weight!'

And here is a fourth

'Oh God, that man should spoil and rust on the stalk, and be wilted and threshed ere the harvest hath come! And oh God, that men that call themselves men should still insist on a laugh! I hate the world, and could trample all lungs of mankind as grapes, and heel them out of their breath, to think of the woe and the cant,—to think of the Truth and the Lie! Oh! blessed be the twenty-first day of December, and cursed be the twenty-first day of June!'

From these random slips, it would seem that Pierre is quite conscious of much that is so anomalously hard and bitter in his lot, of much that is so black and terrific in his soul Yet that knowing his fatal condition does not one whit enable him to change or better his condition Conclusive proof that he has no power over his condition For in tremendous extremities human souls are like drowning men, well enough they know they are in peril, well enough they know the causes of that peril, nevertheless, the sea is the sea, and these drowning men do drown

From eight o'clock in the morning till half-past four in the evening, Pierre sits there in his room,—eight hours and a half!

From throbbing neck-bands, and swinging belly-bands of gay-hearted horses, the sleigh-bells chimingly jingle,—but Pierre sits there in his room, Thanksgiving comes, with its glad thanks, and crisp turkeys,—but Pierre sits there in his room, soft through the snows, on tinted Indian moccasins, Merry Christmas comes stealing,—but Pierre sits there in his room, it is New Year's, and like a great flagon, the vast city over-brims at all curb-stones, wharves, and piers, with bubbling jublations,—but Pierre sits there in his room —Nor jingling sleigh-bells at throbbing neck-band, or swinging belly-band, nor glad thanks, and crisp turkeys of Thanksgiving; nor tinted Indian moccasin of Merry Christmas softly stealing through the snows, nor New Year's curb-stones, wharves, and piers, over-brimming with bubbling jublations —Nor jingling sleigh-bells, nor glad Thanksgiving, nor Merry Christmas, nor jubilating New Year's —Nor Bell, Thank, Christ, Year,—none of these are for Pierre In the midst of the merriments of the mutations of Time, Pierre hath ringed himself in with the grief of Eternity. Pierre is a peak inflexible in the heart of Time, as the isle-peak, Piko, stands unassailable in the midst of waves.

He will not be called to, he will not be stirred. Sometimes the intent ear of Isabel in the next room, overhears the alternate silence, and then the long lonely scratch of his pen. It is as if she heard the busy claw of some midnight mole in the ground. Sometimes she hears a low cough, and sometimes the scrape of his crook-handled cane.

Here surely is a wonderful stillness of eight hours and a half, repeated day after day. In the heart of such silence, surely something is at work. Is it creation, or destruction? Builds Pierre the noble world of a new book? or does the Pale Haggardness unbuild the lungs and the life in him?—Unutterable, that a man should be thus!

When in the meridian flush of the day, we recall the black apex of night, then night seems impossible; this sun can never go down. Oh that the memory of the uttermost gloom as an already tasted thing to the dregs, should be no security against its return. One may be passably well one day, but the next, he may sup at black broth with Pluto.

Is there then all this work to one book, which shall be read in a very few hours, and, far more frequently, utterly skipped in one second, and which, in the end, whatever it be, must undoubtedly go to the worms?

Not so, that which now absorbs the time and the life of Pierre, is not the book, but the primitive elementalising of the strange stuff, which in the act of attempting that book, has upheaved and upgushed in his soul. Two books are being writ, of which the world shall only see one, and that the bungled one. The larger book, and the infinitely better, is for Pierre's own private shelf. That it is, whose unfathomable cravings drink his blood; the other only demands his ink. But circumstances have so decreed, that the one cannot be composed on the paper, but only as the other is writ down in his soul. And the one of the soul is elephantinely sluggish, and will not budge at a breath. Thus Pierre is fastened on by two leeches;—how then can the life of Pierre last? Lo! he is fitting himself for the highest life, by thinning his blood and collapsing his heart. He is learning how to live, by rehearsing the part of death.

Who shall tell all the thoughts and feelings of Pierre in that desolate and shivering room, when at last the idea obtruded, that the wiser and the profounder he should grow, the more and the more he lessened the chances for bread, that could he now hurl his deep book out of the window, and fall to on some shallow nothing of a novel composable in a month at the longest, then could he reasonably hope for both appreciation and cash. But the devouring profundities, now opened up in him, consume all his vigour, would he, he could not now be entertainingly and profitably shallow in some pellucid and merry romance. Now he sees, that with every accession of the personal divine to him, some great land-slide of the general surrounding divineness slips from him, and falls crashing away. Said I not that the gods, as well as mankind, had unhanded themselves from this Pierre? So now in him you behold the baby toddler I spoke of, forced now to stand and toddle alone.

Now and then he turns to the camp-bed, and wetting his towel in the basin, presses it against his brow. Now he leans back in his chair, as if to give up, but again bends over and plods.

Twilight draws on, the summons of Isabel is heard from the door, the poor, frozen, blue-lipped, soul-shivering traveler for St. Petersburg is unpacked, and for a moment stands toddling on the floor. Then his hat, and his cane, and out he sallies for fresh air. A most comfortless staggering of a stroll! People gaze at him passing, as at some imprudent sick man, wilfully burst from his bed. If an acquaintance is met, and would say a pleasant news-monger's word in his ear, that acquaintance turns from him, affronted at his hard aspect of icy discourtesy. 'Bad-hearted,' mutters the man, and goes on.

He comes back to his chambers, and sits down at the neat table of Delly, and Isabel soothingly eyes him, and presses him to eat and be strong. But his is the famishing which loathes all food. He cannot eat but by force. He has assassinated the natural day, how then can he eat with an appetite?

If he lays him down, he cannot sleep, he has waked the infinite wakefulness in him, then how can he slumber? Still his book, like a vast lumbering planet, revolves in his aching head. He cannot command the thing out of its orbit, fain would he behead himself, to gain one night's repose. At last the heavy hours move on, and sheer exhaustion overtakes him, and he lies still—not asleep as children and day-labourers sleep—but he lies still from his throbbings, and for that interval holdingly sheathes the beak of the vulture in his hand, and lets it not enter his heart.

Morning comes, again the dropped sash, the icy water, the flesh-brush, the breakfast, the hot bricks, the ink, the pen, the from-eight-o'clock-to-half-past-four, and the whole general inclusive hell of the same departed day.

Ah! shivering thus day after day in his wrappers and cloaks, is this the warm lad that once sung to the world of the Tropical Summer?

FROM MOBY DICK <sup>1</sup>

THE SYMPHONY

It was a clear steel-blue day. The firmaments of air and sea were hardly separable in that all-pervading azure, only, the pen-

<sup>1</sup> The selections are from Moby Dick, 1bid., VIII, 326-67. A key to the symbolism of Ahab's quest may be found in the sermon by Father Mapple, which the narrator heard before setting sail. 'But oh! shipmate! on the starboard hand of every woe, there is a sure delight, and higher the top of that delight, than the bottom of the woe is deep. Delight is to him—a far, far upward, and inward delight—who against the proud gods and commodores of this earth, ever stands forth his own inexorable self. Delight is to him whose strong arms yet support him, when the ship of this base treacherous world has gone down beneath him. Delight is to him, who gives no quarter in the truth, and kills, burns, and destroys all sin though he pluck it out from under the robes of Senators and Judges. Delight, —top gallant delight is to him who acknowledges no law or lord, but the Lord his God, and is only a patriot to heaven. Delight is to him, whom all the waves of the billows of the seas of the boisterous mob can never shake from this sure Keel of the Ages. And eternal delight and deliciousness will be his, who coming to lay him down, can say with his final breath—O Father!—chiefly known to me by Thy rod—mortal or immortal, here I die. I have striven to be Thine, more than to be this world's, or mine own. Yet this is nothing. I leave eternity to Thee, for what is man that he should live out the lifetime of his God?' 1bid., VII, 59.

sive air was transparently pure and soft, with a woman's look, and the robust and man-like sea heaved with long, strong, lingering swells, as Samson's chest in his sleep.

Hither and thither, on high, glided the snow-white wings of small, unspeckled birds, these were the gentle thoughts of the feminine air, but to and fro in the deeps, far down in the bottomless blue, rushed mighty leviathans, sword-fish, and sharks, and these were the strong, troubled, murderous thinkings of the masculine sea.

But though thus contrasting within, the contrast was only in shades and shadows without, those two seemed one, it was only the sex, as it were, that distinguished them.

Aloft, like a royal czar and king, the sun seemed giving this gentle air to this bold and rolling sea, even as bride to groom. And at the girdling line of the horizon, a soft and tremulous motion—most seen here at the Equator—denoted the fond, throbbing trust, the living alarms, with which the poor bride gave her bosom away.

Tied up and twisted, gnarled and knotted with wrinkles, haggardly firm and unyielding, his eyes glowing like coals, that still glow in the ashes of ruin, untottering Ahab stood forth in the clearness of the morn, lifting his splintered helmet of a brow to the fair girl's forehead of heaven.

Oh, immortal infancy and innocence of the azure! Invisible winged creatures that frolic all round us! Sweet childhood of air and sky! how oblivious were ye of old Ahab's close-coiled woe! But so have I seen little Miriam and Martha, laughing-eyed elves, heedlessly gambol around their old sire, sporting with the circle of singed locks which grew on the marge of that burnt-out crater of his brain.

Slowly crossing the deck from the scuttle, Ahab leaned over the side, and watched how his shadow in the water sank and sank to his gaze, the more and the more that he strove to pierce the profundity. But the lovely aromas in that enchanted air did at last seem to dispel, for a moment, the cancerous thing in his soul. That glad, happy air, that winsome sky, did at last stroke and caress him, the stepmother world, so long cruel—forbidding—now threw affectionate arms round his stubborn neck, and did seem to joyously sob over him, as if over one, that however wilful and erring, she could yet find it in her heart to save and to bless. From beneath his slouched hat Ahab dropped a tear into the sea, nor did all the Pacific contain such wealth as that one wee drop.

Starbuck saw the old man, saw him, how he heavily leaned over the side, and he seemed to hear in his own true heart the measureless sobbing that stole out of the centre of the serenity around. Careful not to touch him, or be noticed by him, he yet drew near to him, and stood there.

Ahab turned

'Starbuck!'

'Sir'

'Oh, Starbuck! it is a mild, mild wind, and a mild-looking sky. On such a day—very much such a sweetness as this—I struck my first whale—a boy-harpooneer of eighteen! Forty—forty—forty years ago!—ago! Forty years of continual whaling! forty years of privation, and peril, and storm-time! forty years on the pitiless sea! for forty years has Ahab forsaken the peaceful land, for forty years to make war on the horrors of the deep! Aye and yes, Starbuck, out of those forty years I have not spent three ashore. When I think of this life I have led, the desolation of solitude it has been, the masoned, walled-town of a captain's exclusiveness, which admits but small entrance to any sympathy from the green country without—oh, weariness! heaviness! Guinea-coast slavery of solitary command!—when I think of all this, only half suspected, not so keenly known to me before—and how for forty years I have fed upon dry salted fare—fit emblem of the dry nourishment of my soul!—when the poorest landsman has had fresh fruit to his daily hand, and broken the world's fresh bread to my mouldy crusts—away, whole oceans away, from that young girl-wife I wedded past fifty, and sailed for Cape Horn the next day, leaving but one dent in my marriage pillow—wife? wife?—rather a widow with her husband alive! Aye, I widowed that poor girl when I married her, Starbuck, and then, the madness, the frenzy, the boiling blood and the smoking brow, with which, for a thousand lowerings old Ahab has furiously, foamingly chased his prey—more a demon than a man—aye, aye! what a forty years' fool—fool—old fool, has old Ahab been! Why this strife of the chase? why weary and palsy the arm at the oar, and the iron, and the lance? how the richer or better is Ahab now? Behold. Oh, Starbuck! is it not hard, that with this weary load I bear, one poor leg should have been snatched from under me? Here, brush this old hair aside, it blinds me, that I seem to weep. Locks so grey did never grow but from out some ashes! But do I look very old, so very, very old, Starbuck? I feel deadly faint, bowed, and humped, as though I were Adam, staggering beneath the piled centuries since Paradise. God! God! God!—crack my heart!—stave my brain!—mockery! mockery! bitter, biting mockery of grey hairs, have I lived enough joy to wear ye, and seem and feel thus intolerably old? Close! stand close to me, Starbuck, let me look into a human eye, it is better than to gaze into the sea or sky, better than to gaze upon God. By the green land, by the bright hearthstone! this is the magic glass, man, I see my wife and my child in thine eye. No, no; stay on board, on board!—lower not when I do, when branded Ahab gives chase to Moby Dick. That hazard shall not be thine. No, no! not with the far-away home I see in that eye!

'Oh, my Captain! my Captain! noble soul! grand old heart, after all! why should any one give chase to that hated fish! Away with me! let us fly these deadly waters! let us home! Wife and child, too, are Starbuck's—wife and child of his brotherly, sisterly, playfellow youth, even as thine, sir, are the wife and child of thy loving, long-ling, paternal old age! Away! let us away!—this instant let me alter the course! How cheerily, how hilariously, oh my Captain, would we bowl on our way to see old Nantucket again! I think, sir, they have some such mild blue days, even as this, in Nantucket.'

'They have, they have. I have seen them—some summer days in the morning. About this time—yes, it is his noon nap now—the boy vivaciously wakes, sits up in bed; and his mother tells him of me, of cannibal old me, how I am abroad upon the deep, but will yet come back to dance him again.'

'Tis my Mary, my Mary herself! She promised that my boy, every morning, should be carried to the hill to catch the first glimpse of his father's sail! Yes, yes! no more! it is done! we head for Nantucket! Come, my Captain, study out the course, and let us away! See, see! the boy's face from the window! the boy's hand on the hull!

But Ahab's glance was averted, like a blighted fruit tree he shook, and cast his last, cindered apple to the soil.

'What is it, what nameless, inscrutable, unearthly thing is it, what cozening, hidden lord and master, and cruel, remorseless emperor commands me, that against all natural lovings and longings, I so keep pushing, and crowding, and jamming myself on all the time, recklessly making me ready to do what in my own proper, natural heart, I durst not so much as dare? Is Ahab, Ahab? Is it I, God, or who, that lifts this arm? But if the great sun move not of himself, but is as an errand-boy in heaven, nor one single star can revolve, but by some invisible power, how then can this one small heart beat, this one small brain think thoughts, unless God does that beating, does that thinking, does that living, and not I By heaven, man, we are turned round and round in this world, like yonder windlass, and Fate is the handspike And all the time, lo! that smiling sky, and this unsounded sea! Look! see yon albicore! who put it into him to chase and fang that flying-fish? Where do murderers go, man? Who's to doom, when the judge himself is dragged to the bar? But it is a mild, mild wind, and a mild-looking sky, and the air smells now, as if it blew from a far-away meadow, they have been making hay somewhere under the slopes of the Andes, Starbuck, and the mowers are sleeping among the new-mown hay Sleeping? Aye, toil we how we may, we all sleep at last on the field Sleep? Aye, and rust amid greenness, as last year's scythes flung down, and left in the half-cut swaths—Starbuck!'

But blanched to a corpse's hue with despair, the mate had stolen away.

Ahab crossed the deck to gaze over on the other side, but started at two reflected, fixed eyes in the water there Fedallah was motionlessly leaning over the same rail.

THE CHASE—FIRST DAY

THAT night, in the mid-watch, when the old man—as his wont at intervals—stepped forth from the scuttle in which he leaned, and went to his pivot-hole, he suddenly thrust out his face fiercely, snuffing up the sea air as a sagacious ship's dog will, in drawing nigh to some barbarous isle He declared that a whale must be near Soon that peculiar odour, sometimes to a great distance given forth by the living sperm whale, was palpable to all the watch, nor was any mariner surprised when, after inspecting the compass, and then the dog-vane, and then ascertaining the precise bearing of the odour as nearly as possible, Ahab rapidly ordered the ship's course to be slightly altered, and the sail to be shortened

The acute policy dictating these movements was sufficiently vindicated at day-break by the sight of a long sleek on the sea directly and lengthwise ahead, smooth as oil, and resembling in the pleated watery wrinkles bordering it, the polished metallic-like marks of some swift tide-rip, at the mouth of a deep, rapid stream

'Man the mast-heads! Call all hands!'

Thundering with the butts of three clubbed handspikes on the forecastle deck, Daggoo roused the sleepers with such judgment claps that they seemed to exhale from the scuttle, so instantaneously did they appear with their clothes in their hands

'What d'ye see?' cried Ahab, flattening his face to the sky

'Nothing, nothing, sir!' was the sound hailing down in reply

'T'-gallant-sails!—stun'-sails! aloof and aloft, and on both sides!'

All sail being set, he now cast loose the life-line, reserved for swaying him to the main royal-mast-head, and in a few moments they were hoisting him thither, when, while but two-thirds of the way aloft, and while peering ahead through the horizontal vacancy between the main-top-sail and top-gallant-sail, he raised a gull-like cry in the air, 'There she blows!—there she blows! A hump like a snow-hill!—It is Moby Dick!'

Fired by the cry which seemed simultaneously taken up by the three lookouts, the men on deck rushed to the rigging to behold the famous whale they had so long been pursuing Ahab had now gained his final perch, some feet above the other lookouts, Tashtego standing just beneath him on the cap of the top-gallant-mast, so that the Indian's head was almost on a level with Ahab's heel. From this height the whale was now seen some mile or so ahead, at every roll of the sea revealing his high sparkling hump, and regularly jetting his silent spout into the air. To the credulous mariners it seemed the same silent spout they had so long ago beheld in the moonlit Atlantic and Indian Oceans.

'And did none of ye see it before?' cried Ahab, hailing the perched men all around him.

'I saw him almost that same instant, sir, that Captain Ahab did, and I cried out,' said Tashtego.

'Not the same instant, not the same—no, the doubloon is mine. Fate reserved the doubloon for me. I only, none of ye could have raised the White Whale first. There she blows! there she blows!—there she blows! There again!—there again!' he cried, in long-drawn, lingering, methodic tones, attuned to the gradual prolongings of the whale's visible jets. 'He's going to sound! In stun'-sails! Down top-gallant-sails! Stand by three boats. Mr Starbuck, remember, stay on board, and keep the ship. Helm there! Luff, luff a point! So, steady, man, steady! There go flukes! No, no, only black water! All ready the boats there? Stand by, stand by! Lower me, Mr Starbuck, lower, lower,—quick, quicker!' and he slid through the air to the deck.

'He is heading straight to leeward, sir,' cried Stubb, 'right away from us, cannot have seen the ship yet.'

'Be dumb, man! Stand by the braces! Hard down the helm!—brace up! Shiver her!—shiver her!—So, well that! Boats, boats!'

Soon all the boats but Starbuck's were dropped, all the boat-sails set—all the paddles plying, with rippling swiftness, shooting to leeward, and Ahab heading the onset. A pale, death-glummer lit up Fedallah's sunken eyes, a hideous motion gnawed his mouth.

Like noiseless nautilus shells, their light prow sped through the sea, but only slowly they neared the foe. As they neared him, the ocean grew still more smooth; seemed drawing a carpet over its waves; seemed a noon meadow, so serenely it spread. At length the breathless hunter came so nigh his seemingly unsuspecting prey, that his entire dazzling hump was distinctly visible, sliding along the sea as if an isolated thing, and continually set in a revolving ring of finest, fleecy, greenish foam. He saw the vast, involved wrinkles of the slightly projecting head beyond. Before it, far out on the soft Turkish-rugged waters, went the glistening white shadow from his broad, milky forehead, a musical rippling playfully accompanying the shade, and behind, the blue waters interchangeably flowed over into the moving valley of his steady wake, and on either hand bright bubbles arose and danced by his side. But these were broken again by the light toes of hundreds of gay fowl softly feathering the sea, alternate with their fitful flight, and like to some flagstaff rising from the painted hull of an argosy, the tall but shattered pole of a recent lance projected from the White Whale's back, and at intervals one of the cloud of soft-toed fowls hovering, and to and fro skimming like a canopy over the fish, silently perched and rocked on this pole, the long tail feathers streaming like pennons.

A gentle joyousness—a mighty mildness of repose in swiftness—invested the gliding whale. Not the white bull Jupiter swimming away with ravished Europa clinging to his graceful horns, his lovely, leering eyes sideways intent upon the maid, with smooth bewitching fleetness, rippling straight for the nuptial bower in Crete, not Jove, not that great majesty Supreme! did surpass the glorified White Whale as he so divinely swam.

On each soft side—coincident with the parted swell, that but once leaving him, then flowed so wide away—on each bright side, the whale shed off enticings. No wonder there had been some among the hunters who, namelessly transported and allured by all this serenity, had ventured to assail it, but had fatally found that quietude but the vesture of tornadoes. Yet calm, enticing calm, oh, whale! thou glidest on, to all who for the first time eye thee, no matter how many in that same way thou may'st have bejuggled and destroyed before.

And thus, through the serene tranquilities of the tropical sea, among waves whose hand-clappings were suspended by exceeding rapture, Moby Dick moved on, still withholding from sight the full terrors of his submerged trunk, entirely hiding the wrenched hideousness of his jaw. But soon the fore part of him slowly rose from the water, for an instant his whole marbled body formed a high arch, like Virginia's Natural Bridge, and warningly waving his bannered flukes in the air, the grand god revealed himself, sounded, and went out of sight. Hoveringly halting, and dipping on the wing, the white sea-fowls longingly lingered over the agitated pool that he left.

With oars apeak, and paddles down, the sheets of their sails adrift, the three boats now stilly floated, awaiting Moby Dick's reappearance.

'An hour,' said Ahab, standing rooted in his boat's stern, and he gazed beyond the whale's place, toward the dim blue spaces and wide wooing vacancies to leeward. It was only an instant, for again his eyes seemed whirling round in his head as he swept the watery circle. The breeze now freshened, the sea began to swell.

'The birds!—the birds!' cried Tashtego.

In long Indian file, as when herons take wing, the white birds were now all flying toward Ahab's boat, and when within a few yards began fluttering over the water there, wheeling round and round, with joyous, expectant cries. Their vision was keener than man's, Ahab could discover no sign in the sea. But suddenly as he peered down and down into its depths, he profoundly saw a white living spot no bigger than a white weasel, with wonderful celerity uprising, and magnifying as it rose, till it turned, and then there were plainly revealed two long crooked rows of white, glistening teeth, floating up from the undiscoverable bottom. It was Moby Dick's open mouth and scrolled jaw, his vast, shadowed bulk still half blending with the blue of the sea. The glittering mouth yawned beneath the boat like an open-doored marble tomb, and giving one side-long sweep with his steering-oar, Ahab whirled the craft aside from this tremendous apparition. Then, calling upon Fedallah to change places with him, went forward to the bows, and seizing Perth's harpoon, commanded his crew to grasp their oars and stand by to stern.

Now, by reason of this timely spinning round the boat upon its axis, its bow, by anticipation, was made to face the whale's head while yet under water. But as if perceiving this stratagem, Moby Dick, with that malicious intelligence ascribed to him, sidelingly transplanted himself, as it were, in an instant, shooting his plated head lengthwise beneath the boat.

Through and through, through every plank and each rib, it thrilled for an instant, the whale obliquely lying on his back, in the manner of a biting shark, slowly and feelingly taking its bows full within his mouth, so that the long, narrow, scrolled lower jaw curled high up into the open air, and one of the teeth caught in a rowlock. The bluish pearl-white of the inside of the jaw was within six inches of Ahab's head, and reached higher than that. In this attitude the White Whale now shook the slight cedar as a mildly cruel cat her mouse. With unastonished eyes Fedallah gazed, and crossed his arms, but the tiger-yellow crew were tumbling over each other's heads to gain the uttermost stern.

And now, while both elastic gunwales were springing in and out, as the whale dalled with the doomed craft in this devilish way, and from his body being submerged beneath the boat, he could not be darted at from the bows, for the bows were almost inside of him, as it were, and while the other boats involuntarily paused, as before a quick crisis impossible to withstand, then it was that monomaniac Ahab, furious with this tantalising vicinity of his foe, which placed him all alive and helpless in the very jaws he hated, frenzied with all this, he seized the long bone with his naked hands, and wildly strove to wrench it from its grip. As now he thus vainly strove, the jaw slipped from him, the frail gunwales bent in, collapsed, and snapped, as both jaws, like an enormous shears, sliding further aft, bit the craft completely in twain, and locked themselves fast again in the sea, midway between the two floating wrecks. These floated aside, the broken ends drooping, the crew at the stern-wreck clinging to the gunwales, and striving to hold fast to the oars to lash them across.

At that prelude moment, ere the boat was yet snapped, Ahab, the first to perceive the whale's intent, by the crafty upraising of his head, a movement that loosed his hold for the time, at that moment his hand had made one final effort to push the boat out of the bite. But only slipping further into the whale's mouth, and tilting over sideways as it slipped, the boat had shaken off his hold on the jaw, spilled him out of it, as he leaned to the push, and so he fell flat-faced upon the sea.

Ripplingly withdrawing from his prey, Moby Dick now lay at a little distance, vertically thrusting his oblong white head up and down in the billows, and at the same time slowly revolving his whole spindled body, so that when his vast wrinkled forehead rose—some twenty or more feet out of the water—the now rising swells, with all their confluent waves, dazzlingly broke against it, vindictively tossing their shivered spray still higher into the air. So, in a gale, the but half-baffled Channel billows only recoil from the base of the Eddystone, triumphantly to overleap its summit with their scud.

But soon resuming his horizontal attitude, Moby Dick swam swiftly round and round the wrecked crew, sideways churning the water in his vengeful wake, as if lashing himself up to still another and more deadly assault. The sight of the splintered boat seemed to madden him, as the blood of grapes and mulberries cast before Antiochus's elephants in the book of Maccabees. Meanwhile Ahab, half smothered in the foam of the whale's insolent tail, and too much of a cripple to swim,—though he could still keep afloat, even in the heart of such a whirlpool as that, helpless Ahab's head was seen, like a tossed bubble which the least chance shock might burst. From the boat's fragmentary stern, Fedallah incuriously and mildly eyed him, the clinging crew, at the other drifting end, could not succour him, more than enough was it for them to look to themselves. For so revolvingly appalling was the White Whale's aspect, and so planetarily swift the ever-contracting circles he made, that he seemed horizontally swooping upon them. And though the other boats, unharmed, still hovered hard by, still they dared not pull into the eddy to strike, lest that should be the signal for the instant destruction of the jeopardised castaways, Ahab and all, nor in that case could they themselves hope to escape. With straining eyes, then, they remained on the outer edge of the direful zone, whose centre had now become the old man's head.

Meantime, from the beginning all this had been descried from the ship's masts, and squaring her yards, she had borne down upon the scene, and was now so nigh, that Ahab in the water hailed her,—‘Sail on the’—but that moment a breaking sea dashed on him from Moby Dick, and 10 whelmed him for the time. But struggling out of it again, and chancing to rise on a towering crest, he shouted,—‘Sail on the whale!—Drive him off!’

The Pequod's prows were pointed, and breaking up the charmed circle, she effectually parted the White Whale from his victim. As he sullenly swam off, the boats flew to the rescue.

Dragged into Stubb's boat with blood-shot, blinded eyes, the white brine caking in his wrinkles, the long tension of Ahab's bodily strength did crack, and helplessly he yielded to his body's doom for a time, lying all crushed in the bottom of Stubb's boat, like one trodden under foot of herds of elephants. Far inland, nameless wails came from him, as desolate sounds from out ravines.

But this intensity of his physical prostration did but so much the more abbreviate it. In an instant's compass, great hearts sometimes condense to one deep pang, the sum-total of those shallow pains kindly diffused through feeble men's whole lives. And so, such hearts, though summary in each one suffering, still, if the gods decree it, in their lifetime aggregate a whole age of woe, wholly made up of instantaneous intensities, for even in their pointless centres, those noble natures contain the entire circumferences of inferior souls.

‘The harpoon,’ said Ahab, half-way rising, and draggingly leaning on one bended arm—‘is it safe?’

‘Aye, sir, for it was not darted, this is it,’ said Stubb, showing it.

‘Lay it before me,—any missing men?’

‘One, two, three, four, five,—there were five oars, sir, and here are five men.’

‘That's good —Help me, man, I wish to stand. So, so, I see him! there! there! going to leeward still, what a leaping spout!—Hands off from me! The eternal sap runs up in Ahab's bones again! Set the sail, out oars, the helm!’

It is often the case that when a boat is stove, its crew, being picked up by another boat, help to work that second boat; and the chase is thus continued with what is called double-banked oars. It was thus now. But the added power of the boat did not equal the added power of the whale, for he seemed to have treble-banked his every fin, swimming with a velocity which plainly showed, that if now, under these circumstances, pushed on, the chase would prove an indefinitely prolonged, if not a hopeless one, nor could any crew endure for so long a period, such an unintermitted, intense straining at the oar, a thing barely tolerable only in some one brief vicissitude. The ship itself, then, as it sometimes happens, offered the most promising intermediate means of overtaking the chase. Accordingly, the boats now made for her, and were soon swayed up to their cranes—the two parts of the wrecked boat having been previously secured by her—and then hoisting everything to her side, and stacking her canvas high up, and sideways outstretching it with stun'-sails, like the double-jointed wings of an albatross, the Pequod bore down in the leeward wake of Moby Dick. At the well-known, methodic intervals, the whale's glittering spout was regularly announced from the manned mast-heads, and when he would be reported as just gone down, Ahab would take the time, and then pacing the deck, binnacle-watch in hand, so soon as the last second of the allotted hour expired, his voice was heard—"Whose is the doubloon now? D'ye see him?" and if the reply was, "No, sir!" straightway he commanded them to lift him to his perch. In this way the day wore on, Ahab, now aloft and motionless, anon, unrestingly pacing the planks.

As he was thus walking, uttering no sound, except to hail the men aloft, or to bid them hoist a sail still higher, or to spread one to a still greater breadth—thus to and fro pacing, beneath his slouched hat, at every turn he passed his own wrecked boat, which had been dropped upon the quarter-deck, and lay there reversed, broken bow to shattered stern. At last he paused before it; and as in an already over-clouded sky fresh troops of clouds will sometimes sail across, so over the old man's face there now stole some such added gloom as this

Stubb saw him pause, and perhaps intending, not vainly, though, to evince his own unabated fortitude, and thus keep up a valiant place in his captain's mind, he advanced, and eyeing the wreck exclaimed—"The thistle the ass refused, it pricked his mouth too keenly, sir, ha! ha!"

"What soulless thing is this that laughs before a wreck? Man, man! did I not know thee brave as fearless fire (and as mechanical) I could swear thou wert a poltroon. Groan nor laugh should be heard before a wreck."

"Aye, sir," said Starbuck, drawing near, "tis a solemn sight, an omen, and an ill one."

"Omen? omen?—the dictionary! If the gods think to speak outright to man, they will honourably speak outright, not shake their heads, and give an old wives' darkling hint—Begone! Ye two are the opposite poles of one thing, Starbuck is Stubb reversed, and Stubb is Starbuck, and ye two are all mankind, and Ahab stands alone among the millions of the peopled earth, nor gods nor men his neighbours! Cold, cold—I shiver!—How now? Aloft there! D'ye see him? Sing out for every spout, though he spout ten times a second!"

The day was nearly done, only the hem of his golden robe was rustling. Soon, it was almost dark, but the look-out men still remained unset.

"Can't see the spout now, sir,—too dark!"—cried a voice from the air.

"How heading when last seen?"

"As before, sir,—straight to leeward."

"Good! he will travel slower now 'tis night. Down royals and top-gallant stunsails, Mr Starbuck. We must not run over him before morning, he's making a passage now, and may heave-to a while. Helm there! keep her full before the wind!—Aloft! come down!—Mr Stubb, send a fresh hand to the foremast-head, and see it manned till morning."—Then advancing toward the doubloon in the mainmast—"Men, this gold is mine, for I earned it, but I shall let it abide here till the White Whale is dead, and then, whosoever of ye first raises him, upon the day he shall be killed, this gold is that man's, and if on that day I shall again raise him, then ten times its sum shall be divided among all of ye! Away now!—the deck is thine, sir."

And so saying, he placed himself half-way within the scuttle, and slouching his hat, stood there till dawn, except when at intervals rousing himself to see how the night wore on

THE CHASE—SECOND DAY

AT daybreak, the three mast-heads were punctually manned afresh

'D'ye see him?' cried Ahab, after allowing a little space for the light to spread

'See nothing, sir'

'Turn up all hands and make sail! he travels faster than I thought for,—the top-gallant-sails!—aye, they should have been kept on her all night But no matter—'tis but resting for the rush'

Here be it said, that this pertinacious pursuit of one particular whale, continued through day into night, and through night into day, is a thing by no means unprecedented in the South Sea fishery For such is the wonderful skill, prescience of experience, and invincible confidence acquired by some great natural geniuses among the Nantucket commanders, that from the simple observation of a whale when last descried, they will, under certain given circumstances, pretty accurately foretell both the direction in which he will continue to swim for a time, while out of sight, as well as his probable rate of progression during that period And, in these cases, somewhat as a pilot, when about losing sight of a coast, whose general trending he well knows, and which he desires shortly to return to again, but at some further point, like as this pilot stands by his compass, and takes the precise bearing of the cape at present visible, in order the more certainly to hit aright the remote, unseen headland, eventually to be visited so does the fisherman, at his compass, with the whale, for after being chased, and diligently marked, through several hours of daylight, then, when night obscures the fish, the creature's future wake through the darkness is almost as established to the sagacious mind of the hunter, as the pilot's coast is to him So that to this hunter's wondrous skill, the proverbial evanescence of a thing writ in water, a wake, is to all desired purposes well-nigh as reliable as the steadfast land And as the mighty iron leviathan of the modern railway is so familiarly known in its every pace, that, with watches in their hands, men time his rate as doctors that of a baby's pulse, and lightly say of it, the up train or the down train will reach such or such a spot, at such or such an hour, even so, almost, there are occasions when these Nantucketers time that other leviathan of the deep, according to the observed humour of his speed, and say to themselves, so many hours hence this whale will have gone two hundred miles, will have about reached this or that degree of latitude or longitude. But to render this acuteness at all successful in the end, the wind and the sea must be the whaleman's allies, for of what present avail to the becalmed or windbound mariner is the skill that assures him he is exactly ninety-three leagues and a quarter from his port? Inferable from these statements are many collateral subtle matters touching the chase of whales

The ship tore on, leaving such a furrow in the sea as when a cannon-ball, missent, becomes a ploughshare and turns up the level field

'By salt and hemp!' cried Stubb, 'but this swift motion of the deck creeps up one's legs and tangles at the heart This ship and I are two brave fellows!—Ha! ha! Some one take me up, and launch me, spine-wise, on the sea,—for by live-oaks! my spine's a keel Ha, ha! we go the gait that leaves no dust behind!'

'There she blows—she blows!—she blows!—right ahead!' was now the mast-head cry

'Aye, aye!' cried Stubb, 'I knew it—ye can't escape—blow on and split your spout, O whale! the mad fiend himself is after yel blow your trump—blister your lungs!—Ahab will dam off your blood, as a miller shuts his water-gate upon the stream!'

And Stubb did but speak out for well-nigh all that crew The frenzies of the chase had by this time worked them bubblingly up, like old wine worked anew. Whatever pale fears and forebodings some of them might have felt before, these were not only now kept out of sight through the growing awe of Ahab, but they were broken up, and on all sides routed, as timid prairie hares that scatter before the bounding bison The hand of Fate had snatched all their souls, and by the stirring perils of the previous day; the rack of the past night's suspense, the fixed, unfearing, blind, reckless way in which their wild craft went plunging toward its flying mark, by all these things, their hearts were bowled along. The wind that made great bellies of their sails, and rushed the vessel on by arms invisible as irresistible, this seemed the symbol of that unseen agency which so enslaved them to the race.

They were one man, not thirty. For as the one ship that held them all, though it was put together of all contrasting things—oak, and maple, and pine wood, iron, and pitch, and hemp—yet all these ran into each other in the one concrete hull, which shot on its way, both balanced and directed by the long central keel, even so, all the individualities of the crew, this man's valour, that man's fear, guilt and guiltiness, all varieties were welded into oneness, and were all directed to that fatal goal which Ahab their one lord and keel did point to.

The rigging lived. The mast-heads, like the tops of tall palms, were outspreadingly tufted with arms and legs. Clinging to a spar with one hand, some reached forth the other with impatient wavings, others, shading their eyes from the vivid sunlight, sat far out on the rocking yards, all the spars in full bearing of mortals, ready and ripe for their fate. Ah! how they still strove through that infinite blueness to seek out the thing that might destroy them!

'Why sing ye not out for him, if ye see him?' cried Ahab, when, after the lapse of some minutes since the first cry, no more had been heard. 'Sway me up, men, ye have been deceived, not Moby Dick casts one odd jet that way, and then disappears.'

It was even so, in their headlong eagerness, the men had mistaken some other thing for the whale-spout, as the event itself soon proved, for hardly had Ahab reached his perch, hardly was the rope belayed to its pin on deck, when he struck the key-note to an orchestra, that made the air vibrate as with the combined discharges of rifles. The triumphant halloo of thirty buckskin lungs was heard, as—much nearer to the ship than the place of the imaginary jet, less than a mile ahead—Moby Dick bodily burst into view! For not by any calm and indolent spoutings, not by the peaceable gush of that mystic fountain in his head, did the White Whale now reveal his vicinity, but by the far more wondrous phenomenon of breaching. Rising with his utmost velocity from the furthest depths, the sperm whale thus booms his entire bulk into the pure element of air, and piling up a mountain of dazzling foam, shows his place to the distance of seven miles and more. In those moments, the torn, enraged waves he shakes off seem his mane, in some cases this breaching is his act of defiance.

'There she breaches! there she breaches!' was the cry, as in his immeasurable bravadoes the White Whale tossed himself salmon-like to heaven. So suddenly seen in the blue plain of the sea, and relieved against the still bluer margin of the sky, the spray that he raised, for the moment, intolerably glittered and glared like a glacier, and stood there gradually fading and fading away from its first sparkling intensity, to the dim mistiness of an advancing shower in a vale.

'Aye, breach your last to the sun, Moby Dick!' cried Ahab, 'thy hour and thy harpoon are at hand!—Down! down all of ye, but one man at the fore. The boats!—stand by!'

Unmindful of the tedious rope-ladders of the shrouds, the men, like shooting stars, slid to the deck, by the isolated backstays and halyards, while Ahab, less dartingly, but still rapidly, was dropped from his perch.

'Lower away,' he cried, so soon as he had reached his boat—a spare one, rigged the afternoon previous. 'Mr Starbuck, the ship is thine—keep away from the boats, but keep near them. Lower, all!'

As if to strike a quick terror into them, by this time being the first assailant himself, Moby Dick had turned, and was now coming for the three crews. Ahab's boat was central, and cheering his men, he told them he would take the whale head-and-head,—that is, pull straight up to his forehead,—a not uncommon thing, for when within a certain limit, such a course excludes the coming onset from the whale's sidelong vision. But ere that close limit was gained, and while yet all three boats were plain as the ship's three masts to his eye, the White Whale, churning himself into furious speed, almost in an instant as it were, rushing among the boats with open jaws, and a lashing tail, offered appalling battle on every side, and heedless of the irons darted at him from every boat, seemed only intent on annihilating each separate plank of which those boats were made. But skilfully manœuvred, incessantly wheeling like trained charges in the field, the boats for a while eluded him, though, at times, but by a plank's breadth, while all the time, Ahab's unearthly slogan tore every other cry but his to shreds.

But at last in his untraceable evolutions, the White Whale so crossed and recrossed, and in a thousand ways entangled the slack of the three lines now fast to him, that they foreshortened, and, of themselves, warped the devoted boats toward the planted irons in him, though now for a moment the whale drew aside a little, as if to rally for a more tremendous charge. Seizing that opportunity, Ahab first paid out more line and then was rapidly hauling and jerking in upon it again—hoping that way to disencumber it of some snarls—when lo!—a sight more savage than the embattled teeth of sharks!

Caught and twisted—corkscrewed in the mazes of the line—loose harpoons and lances, with all their bristling barbs and points, came flashing and dripping up to the chocks in the bows of Ahab's boat. Only one thing could be done. Seizing the boat-knife, he critically reached within—through—and then, without—the rays of steel, dragged in the line beyond, passed it, inboard, to the bowsman, and then, twice sundering the rope near the chocks—dropped the intercepted fagot of steel into the sea, and was all fast again. That instant, the White Whale made a sudden rush among the remaining tangles of the other lines, by so doing, irresistibly dragged the more involved boats of Stubb and Flask toward his flukes, dashed them together like two rolling husks on a surf-beaten beach, and then, diving down into the sea, disappeared in a boiling maelstrom, in which, for a space, the odorous cedar chips of the wrecks danced round and round, like the grated nutmeg in a swiftly stirred bowl of punch.

While the two crews were yet circling in the waters, reaching out after the revolving line-tubs, oars, and other floating furniture, while aslope little Flask bobbed up and down like an empty vial, twitching his legs upward to escape the dreaded jaws of sharks, and Stubb was lustily singing out for some one to ladle him up, and while the old man's line—now parting—admitted of his pulling into the creamy pool to rescue whom he could—in that wild simultaneousness of a thousand concreted perils,—Ahab's yet unstricken boat seemed drawn up toward heaven by invisible wires,—as, arrow-like, shooting perpendicularly from the sea, the White Whale dashed his broad forehead against its bottom, and sent it, turning over and over, into the air, till it fell again—gunwale downward—and Ahab and his men struggled out from under it, like seals from a seaside cave.

The first uprising momentum of the whale—modifying its direction as he struck the surface—involuntarily launched him along it, to a little distance from the centre of the destruction he had made, and with his back to it, he now lay for a moment slowly feeling with his flukes from side to side, and whenever a stray oar, bit of plank, the least chip or crumb of the boats touched his skin, his tail swiftly drew back, and came sideways smiting the sea. But soon, as if satisfied that his work for that time was done, he pushed his plaited forehead through the ocean, and trailing after him the intertangled lines, continued his leeward way at a traveller's methodic pace.

As before, the attentive ship having desisted the whole fight, again came bearing down to the rescue, and dropping a boat, picked up the floating mariners, tubs, oars, and whatever else could be caught at, and safely landed them on her decks. Some sprained shoulders, wrists, and ankles, livid contusions, wrenched harpoons and lances, inextricable intricacies of rope, shattered oars and planks, all these were there, but no fatal or even serious ill seemed to have befallen any one. As with Fedallah the day before, so Ahab was now found grimly clinging to his boat's broken half, which afforded a comparatively easy float, nor did it so exhaust him as the previous day's mishap.

But when he was helped to the deck, all eyes were fastened upon him, as instead of standing by himself he still half-hung upon the shoulder of Starbuck, who had thus far been the foremost to assist him. His ivory leg had been snapped off, leaving but one short sharp splinter

'Aye, aye, Starbuck, 'tis sweet to lean sometimes, be the leaner who he will, and would old Ahab had leaned oftener than he has'

'The ferrule has not stood, sir,' said the carpenter, now coming up; 'I put good work into that leg'

'But no bones broken, sir, I hope,' said Stubb with true concern

'Aye!' and all splintered to pieces, Stubb!—d'ye see it—But even with a broken bone, old Ahab is untouched, and I account no living bone of mine one jot more me, than this dead one that's lost Nor white whale, nor man, nor fiend, can so much as graze old Ahab in his own proper and inaccessible being Can any lead touch yonder floor, any mast scrape yonder roof?—Aloft there! which way?' 20

'Dead to leeward, sir.'

'Up helm, then, pile on the sail again, shipkeepers! down the rest of the spare boats and rig them—Mr Starbuck, away, and muster the boat's crews'

'Let me first help thee towards the bulwarks, sir'

'Oh, oh, oh! how this splinter gores me now! Accursed fate! that the unconquerable captain in the soul should have such a craven mate!' 30

'Sir?'

'My body, man, not thee Give me something for a cane—there, that shivered-lance will do Muster the men Surely I have not seen him yet By heaven, it cannot be!—missing?—quick! call them all'

The old man's hunted thought was true Upon mustering the company, the Parsee was not there. 40

'The Parsee!' cried Stubb—'he must have been caught in—'

'The black vomit wrench thee!—run all of ye above, aloft, cabin, forecabin—find him—not gone—not gone!'

But quickly they returned to him with the tidings that the Parsee was nowhere to be found

'Aye, sir,' said Stubb—'caught among the tangles of your line—I thought I saw him dragging under' 50

'My line? my line? Gone?—gone? What means that little word?—What death-knell rings in it, that old Ahab shakes as if he were the belfry. The harpoon, too!—toss over the litter there,—d'ye see it?—the forged iron, men, the White Whale's—no, no, no,—blistered fool! this hand did dart it!—'tis in the fish!—Aloft there! Keep him nailed—Quick!—all hands to the rigging of the boats—collect the oars—harpooneers! the irons, the irons!—hoist the royals higher—a pull on all the sheets!—helm there! steady, steady for your life! I'll ten times girdle the unmeasured globe, yea and dive straight through it, but I'll slay him yet!"

'Great God! but for one single instant show thyself,' cried Starbuck, 'never never wilt thou capture him, old man—In Jesus' name no more of this, that's worse than devil's madness Two days chased, twice stove to splinters, thy very leg once more snatched from under thee, thy evil shadow gone—all good angels mobbing thee with warnings—what more wouldst thou have?—Shall we keep chasing this murderous fish till he swamps the last man? Shall we be dragged by him to the bottom of the sea? Shall we be towed by him to the infernal world? Oh, oh,—Impiety and blasphemy to hunt him more!"

'Starbuck, of late I've felt strangely moved to thee, ever since that hour we both saw—thou know'st what, in one another's eyes But in this matter of the whale, be the front of thy face to me as the palm of this hand—a lipless, unfeatured blank Ahab is for ever Ahab, man This whole act's immutably decreed 'Twas rehearsed by thee and me a billion years before this ocean rolled Fool! I am the Fates' lieutenant, I act under orders Look thou, underling! that thou obeyest mine,—stand round me, men Ye see an old man cut down to the stump, leaning on a shivered lance, propped up on a lonely foot 'Tis Ahab—his body's part, but Ahab's soul's a centipede, that moves upon a hundred legs I feel strained, half-stranded, as ropes that tow dismasted frigates in a gale, and I may look so But ere I break, ye'll hear me crack, and till ye hear that, know that Ahab's hawser tows his purpose yet Believe ye, men, in the things called omens? Then laugh aloud, and cry encore! For ere they drown, drowning things will twice rise to the surface, then rise again, to sink for evermore So with Moby Dick—two days he's floated—to-morrow will be the third Aye, men, he'll rise once more—but only to spout his last! D'ye feel brave men, brave?

'As fearless fire,' cried Stubb.

'And as mechanical,' muttered Ahab. Then as the men went forward, he muttered on—'The things called omens! And yesterday I talked the same to Starbuck there, concerning my broken boat. Oh! how valiantly I seek to drive out of others' hearts what's clinched so fast in mine!—The Parsee—the Parsee!—gone, gone? and he was to go before—but still was to be seen again ere I could perish—How's that?—There's a riddle now might baffle all the lawyers backed by the ghosts of the whole line of judges—like a hawk's beak it pecks my brain I'll, I'll solve it, though!'<sup>1</sup>

When dusk descended, the whale was still in sight to leeward.

So once more the sail was shortened, and everything passed nearly as on the previous night, only, the sound of hammers and the hum of the grindstone was heard till nearly daylight, as the men toiled by lanterns in the complete and careful rigging of the spare boats and sharpening their fresh

1 Cf Started from his slumbers, Ahab, face to face, saw the Parsee, and hooped round by the gloom of the night they seemed the last men in a flooded world. 'I have dreamed it again,' said he

'Of the hearses? Have I not said, old man, that neither hearse nor coffin can be thine?'

'And who are hearsed that die on the sea?'

'But I said, old man, that ere thou couldst die on this voyage, two hearses must verily be seen by thee on the sea, the first not made by mortal hands, and the visible wood of the last one must be grown in America.'

'Aye, aye! a strange sight that, Parsee,—a hearse and its plumes floating over the ocean with the waves for the pall-bearers. Ha! Such a sight we shall not soon see.'

'Believe it or not, thou canst not die till it be seen, old man.'

'And what was that saying about thyself?'

'Though it come to the last, I shall still go before thee thy pilot.'

'And when thou art so gone before—if that ever befall—then ere I can follow, thou must still appear to me, to pilot me still?—Was it not so? Well, then, did I believe all ye say, oh my pilot! I have seen here two pledges that I shall yet slay Moby Dick and survive it.'

'Take another pledge, old man,' said the Parsee, as his eyes lighted up like fire-flies in the gloom—'Hemp only can kill thee.'

'The gallows, ye mean—I am immortal then, on land and on sea,' cried Ahab, with a laugh of derision,—'Immortal on land and on sea!'

Both were silent again, as one man Ibid, VIII, 271—weapons for the morrow. Meantime, of the broken keel of Ahab's wrecked craft the carpenter made him another leg, while still as on the night before, slouched Ahab stood fixed within his scuttle, his hid, heliotrope glance anticipatively gone backward on its dial, set due eastward for the earliest sun.

THE CHASE—THIRD DAY

THE morning of the third day dawned fair and fresh, and once more the solitary night-man at the foremast-head was relieved by crowds of the daylight lookouts, who dotted every mast and almost every spar.

'D'ye see him?' cried Ahab, but the whale was not yet in sight

'In his infallible wake, though, but follow that wake, that's all Helm there; steady, as thou goest, and hast been going. What a lovely day again! were it a new-made world, and made for a summer-house to the angels, and this morning the first of its throwing open to them, a fairer day could not dawn upon that world. Here's food for thought, had Ahab time to think, but Ahab never thinks, he only feels, feels, feels, that's tingling enough for mortal man! to think's audacity. God only has that right and privilege. Thinking is, or ought to be, a coolness and a calmness, and our poor hearts throb, and our poor brains beat too much for that. And yet, I've sometimes thought my brain was very calm—frozen calm, this old skull cracks so, like a glass in which the contents turn to ice, and shiver it. And still this hair is growing now, this moment growing, and heat must breed it, but no, it's like that sort of common grass that will grow anywhere, between the earthy clefts of Greenland ice or in Vesuvius lava. How the wild winds blow it, they whip it about me as the torn shreds of split sails lash the tossed ship they cling to. A vile wind that has no doubt blown ere this through prison corridors and cells, and wards of hospitals, and ventilated them, and now comes blowing hither as innocent as fleeces. Out upon it!—it's taunted. Were I the wind, I'd blow no more on such a wicked, miserable world. I'd crawl somewhere to a cave, and slunk there. And yet, 'tis a noble and heroic thing, the wind! who ever conquered it? In every fight it has the last and bitterest blow. Run tilting at it, and you but run through it

Ha! a coward wind that strikes stark-naked men, but will not stand to receive a single blow Even Ahab is a braver thing—a nobler thing than that Would now the wind but had a body, but all the things that most exasperate and outrage mortal man, all these things are bodiless, but only bodiless as objects, not as agents There's a most special, a most cunning, oh, a most malicious difference! And yet, I say again, and swear it now, that there's something all glorious and gracious in the wind These warm Trade Winds, at least, that in the clear heavens blow straight on, in strong and steadfast, vigorous mildness, and veer not from their mark, however the baser currents of the sea may turn and tack, and mightiest Mississippis of the land shift and swerve about, uncertain where to go at last And by the eternal Poles! these same Trades that so directly blow my good ship on, these Trades, or something like them—something so unchangeable, and full as strong, blow my keeled soul along! To it! Aloft there! What d'ye see?

'Nothing, sir'

'Nothing! and noon at hand! The doubloon goes a-begging! See the sun! Aye, aye, it must be so I've over-sailed him How, got the start? Aye, he's chasing me now, not I, him—that's bad, I might have known it, too Fool! the lines—the harpoons he's towing Aye, aye, I have run him by last night About! about! Come down, all of ye, but the regular lookouts! Man the braces!'

Steering as she had done, the wind had been somewhat on the Pequod's quarter, so that now being pointed in the reverse direction, the braced ship sailed hard upon the breeze as she recharged the cream in her own white wake

'Against the wind he now steers for the open jaw,' murmured Starbuck to himself, as he coiled the new-hauled main-brace upon the rail 'God keep us, but already my bones feel damp within me, and from the inside wet my flesh I misdoubt me that I disobey my God in obeying him!'

'Stand by to sway me up!' cried Ahab, advancing to the hempen basket 'We should meet him soon'

'Aye, aye, sir,' and straightway Starbuck did Ahab's bidding, and once more Ahab swung on high

A whole hour now passed, gold-beaten out to ages. Time itself now held long breaths with keen suspense But at last, some three points off the weather-bow, Ahab descried the spout again, and instantly from the three mast-heads three shrieks went up as if the tongues of fire had voiced it

'Forehead to forehead I meet thee, this third time, Moby Dick! On deck there!—brace sharper up, crowd her into the wind's eye He's too far off to lower yet, Mr Starbuck The sails shake! Stand over that helmsman with a top-maul! So, so, he travels fast, and I must down But let me have one more good round look aloft here at the sea, there's time for that An old, old sight, and yet somehow so young, aye, and not changed a wink since I first saw it, a boy, from the sandhills of Nantucket! The same!—the same!—the same to Noah as to me There's a soft shower to leeward Such lovely leewardings! They must lead somewhere—to something else than common land, more palmy than the palms Leeward! the White Whale goes that way, look to windward, then, the better if the bitterer quarter But good-bye, good-bye, old mast-head! What's this?—green? aye, tiny mosses in these warped cracks No such green weather-stains on Ahab's head! There's the difference now between man's old age and matter's But aye, old mast, we both grow old together, sound in our hulls, though, are we not, my ship? Aye, minus a leg, that's all By heaven! this dead wood has the better of my live flesh every way I can't compare with it, and I've known some ships made of dead trees outlast the lives of men made of the most vital stuff of vital fathers What's that he said? he should still go before me, my pilot, and yet to be seen again? But where? Will I have eyes at the bottom of the sea, supposing I descend those endless stairs? and all night I've been sailing from him, wherever he did sink to Aye, aye, like many more thou told'st direful truth as touching thyself, O Parsee, but, Ahab, there thy shot fell short Good-bye, mast-head—keep a good eye upon the whale, the while I'm gone We'll talk to-morrow, nay, to-night, when the White Whale lies down there, tied by head and tail'

He gave the word, and still gazing round him, was steadily lowered through the cloven blue air to the deck

In due time the boats were lowered, but as standing in his shallop's stern, Ahab just hovered upon the point of the descent, he waved to the mate,—who held one of the tackle-ropes on deck—and bade him pause ‘Starbuck!’

‘Sir?’

‘For the third time my soul’s ship starts upon this voyage, Starbuck’

‘Aye, sir, thou wilt have it so’

‘Some shups sail from their ports, and ever afterward are missing, Starbuck!’

‘Truth, sir’ saddest truth’

‘Some men die at ebb tide, some at low water, some at the full of the flood,—and I feel now like a billow that’s all one crested comb, Starbuck I am old,—shake hands with me, man’

Their hands met, their eyes fastened, Starbuck’s tears the glue

‘Oh, my Captain, my Captain!—noble heart—go not—go not!—see, it’s a brave man that weeps, how great the agony of the persuasion then!’

‘Lower away!’—cried Ahab, tossing the mate’s arm from him ‘Stand by, the crew!’

In an instant the boat was pulling round close under the stern

‘The sharks! the sharks!’ cried a voice from the low cabin-window there, ‘O master, my master, come back!’

But Ahab heard nothing, for his own voice was high-lifted then, and the boat leaped on

Yet the voice spake true, for scarce had he pushed from the ship, when numbers of sharks, seemingly rising from out the dark waters beneath the hull, maliciously snapped at the blades of the oars, every time they dipped in the water, and in this way accompanied the boat with their bites. It is a thing not uncommonly happening to the whale-boats in those swarming seas, the sharks at times apparently following them in the same prescient way that vultures hover over the banners of marching regiments in the east. But these were the first sharks that had been observed by the Pequod since the White Whale had been first descried, and whether it was that Ahab’s crew were all such tiger-yellow barbarians, and therefore their flesh more musky to the senses of the sharks—a matter sometimes well known to affect them,—however it was, they seemed to follow that one boat without molesting the others

‘Heart of wrought steel!’ murmured Starbuck, gazing over the side, and following with his eyes the receding boat—‘canst thou yet ring boldly to that sight?—lowering thy keel among ravening sharks, and followed by them, open-mouthed, to the chase, and this the critical third day?—For when three days flow together in one continuous intense pursuit, be sure the first is the morning, the second the noon, and the third the evening and the end of that thing—be that end what it may Oh! my God! what is this that shoots through me, and leaves me so deadly calm, yet expectant,—fixed at the top of a shudder! Future things swim before me, as in empty outlines and skeletons, all the past is somehow grown dim Mary, girl! thou fadest in pale glories behind me, boy! I seem to see but thy eyes grown wondrous blue Strangest problems of life seem clearing, but clouds sweep between—Is my journey’s end coming? My legs feel faint, like his who has footed it all day Feel thy heart,—beats it yet?—Stir thyself, Starbuck!—stave it off—move, move! speak aloud!—Mast-head there! See ye my boy’s hand on the hull?—Crazed,—aloft there!—keep thy keenest eye upon the boats—mark well the whale!—Ho! again!—drive off that hawk! see! he pecks—he tears the vane’—pointing to the red flag flying at the main-truck—‘Ha! he soars away with it!—Where’s the old man now? see’st thou that sight, oh Ahab!—shudder, shudder!’

The boats had not gone very far, when by a signal from the mast-heads—a downward-pointed arm, Ahab knew that the whale had sounded, but intending to be near him at the next rising, he held on his way a little sideways from the vessel, the becharmed crew maintaining the profoundest silence, as the head-beat waves hammered and hammered against the opposing bow

‘Drive, drive in your nails, oh ye waves! to their uttermost heads drive them in! ye but strike a thing without a lid, and no coffin and no hearse can be mine—and hemp only can kill me! Ha! ha!’

Suddenly the waters around them slowly swelled in broad circles, then quickly upheaved, as if sideways sliding from a submerged berg of ice, swiftly rising to the surface. A low rumbling sound was heard, a subterraneous hum, and then all held their breaths, as bedraggled with trailing ropes, and harpoons, and lances, a vast form shot lengthwise, but obliquely, from the sea. Shrouded in a thin drooping veil of mist, it hovered for a moment in the rainbowed air, and then fell swamping back into the deep. Crushed thirty feet upward, the waters flashed for an instant like heaps of fountains, then brokenly sank in a shower of flakes, leaving the circling surface creamed like new milk round the marble trunk of the whale.

'Give way!' cried Ahab to the oarsmen, and the boats darted forward to the attack, but maddened by yesterday's fresh irons that corroded in him, Moby Dick seemed combinedly possessed by all the angels that fell from heaven. The wide tiers of welded tendons overspreading his broad white forehead, beneath the transparent skin, looked knitted together, as head on, he came churning his tail among the boats, and once more flailed them apart, spilling out the irons and lances from the two mates' boats, and dashing in one side of the upper part of their bows, but leaving Ahab's almost without a scar.

While Daggoo and Queequeg were stopping the strained planks, and as the whale swimming out from them, turned, and showed one entire flank as he shot by them again, at that moment a quick cry went up. Lashed round and round to the fish's back, pinioned in the turns upon turns in which, during the past night, the whale had reeled the involutions of the lines around him, the half-torn body of the Parsee was seen, his sable raiment frayed to shreds, his distended eyes turned full upon old Ahab.

The harpoon dropped from his hand.

'Befooled, befooled!'—drawing in a long lean breath—'Aye, Parsee! I see thee again—Aye, and thou goest before, and this, this then is the hearse that thou didst promise. But I hold thee to the last letter of thy word. Where is the second hearse? Away, mates, to the ship! those boats are useless now, repair them if ye can in time, and return to me, if not, Ahab is enough to die—Down men! the first thing that but offers to jump from this boat I stand in, that thrug I harpoon. Ye are not other men, but my arms and my legs, and so obey me.—Where's the whale? gone down again?'

But he looked too nigh the boat, for as if bent upon escaping with the corpse he bore, and as if the particular place of the last encounter had been but a stage in his leeward voyage, Moby Dick was now again steadily swimming forward, and had almost passed the ship,—which thus far had been sailing in the contrary direction to him, though for the present her headway had been stopped. He seemed swimming with his utmost velocity, and now only intent upon pursuing his own straight path in the sea.

'Oh! Ahab,' cried Starbuck, 'not too late is it, even now, the third day, to desist. See! Moby Dick seeks thee not. It is thou, thou, that madly seekest him!'

Setting sail to the rising wind, the lonely boat was swiftly impelled to leeward, by both oars and canvas. And at last when Ahab was sliding by the vessel, so near as plainly to distinguish Starbuck's face as he leaned over the rail, he hailed him to turn the vessel about, and follow him, not too swiftly, at a judicious interval. Glancing upward, he saw Tashtego, Queequeg, and Daggoo, eagerly mounting to the three mast-heads, while the oarsmen were rocking in the two staved boats which had just been hoisted to the side, and were busily at work in repairing them. One after the other, through the port-holes, as he sped, he also caught flying glimpses of Stubb and Flask, busying themselves on deck among bundles of new irons and lances. As he saw all this, as he heard the hammers in the broken boats, far other hammers seemed driving a nail into his heart. But he rallied. And now marking that the vane or flag was gone from the main mast-head, he shouted to Tashtego, who had just gained that perch, to descend again for another flag, and a hammer and nails, and so nail it to the mast.

Whether fagged by the three days' running chase, and the resistance to his swimming in the knotted hamper he bore, or whether it was some latent deceitfulness and malice in him: whichever was true, the White Whale's way now began to abate, as it seemed, from the boat so rapidly nearing him once more, though indeed the whale's last start had not been so long a one as before. And still as Ahab glided over the waves the un pitying sharks accompanied him, and so pertinaciously stuck to the boat, and so continually bit at the plying oars, that the blades became jagged and crunched, and left small splinters in the sea, at almost every dip

'Heed them not! those teeth but give new rowlocks to your oars Pull on! 'tis the better rest, the shark's jaw than the yielding water'

'But at every bite, sir, the thin blades grow smaller and smaller'

'They will last long enough! pull on!—But who can tell'—he muttered—'whether these sharks swim to feast on the whale or on Ahab?—But pull on! Aye, all alive, now—we near him The helm! take the helm! let me pass,'—and so saying, two of the oarsmen helped him forward to the bows of the still flying boat.

At length as the craft was cast to one side, and ran ranging along with the White Whale's flank, he seemed strangely oblivious of its advance—as the whale sometimes will—and Ahab was fairly within the smoky mountain mist, which, thrown off from the whale's spout, curled round his great, Monadnock hump He was even thus close to him, when, with body arched back, and both arms lengthwise high-lifted to the poise, he darted his fierce iron, and his far fiercer curse, into the hated whale As both steel and curse sank to the socket, as if sucked into a morass, Moby Dick sideways writhed, spasmodically rolled his nigh flank against the bow, and, without staving a hole in it, so suddenly canted the boat over, that had it not been for the elevated part of the gunwale to which he then clung, Ahab would once more have been tossed into the sea. As it was, three of the oarsmen—who foreknew not the precise instant of the dart, and were therefore unprepared for its effects—these were flung out, but so fell, that, in an instant two of them clutched the gunwale again, and rising to its level on a combing wave, hurled themselves bodily inboard again, the third man helplessly dropping astern, but still afloat and swimming

Almost simultaneously, with a mighty volition of ungraduated, instantaneous swiftness, the White Whale darted through the weltering sea But when Ahab cried out to the steersman to take new turns with the line, and hold it so; and commanded the crew to turn round on their seats, and tow the boat up to the mark, the moment the treacherous line felt that double strain and tug, it snapped in the empty air!

'What breaks in me? Some sinew cracks! —'tis whole again, oars! oars! Burst in upon him!'

Hearing the tremendous rush of the sea-crashing boat, the whale wheeled round to present his blank forehead at bay, but in that evolution, catching sight of the nearing black hull of the ship, seemingly seeing in it the source of all his persecutions, bethinking it—it may be—a larger and nobler foe, of a sudden, he bore down upon its advancing prow, smiting his jaws amid fiery showers of foam

Ahab staggered, his hand smote his forehead 'I grow blind, hands! stretch out before me that I may yet grope my way Is't night?'

'The whale! The ship!' cried the cringing oarsmen

'Oars! oars! Slope downward to thy depths, O sea, that ere it be for ever too late, Ahab may slide this last, last time upon his mark! I see the ship! the ship! Dash on, my men! Will ye not save my ship?'

But as the oarsmen violently forced their boat through the sledge-hammering seas, the before whale-smitten bow-ends of two planks burst through, and in an instant almost the temporarily disabled boat lay nearly level with the waves, its half-wading, splashing crew trying hard to stop the gap and bale out the pouring water

Meantime, for that one beholding instant, Tashtego's mast-head hammer remained suspended in his hand, and the red flag, half-wrapping him as with a plaid, then streamed itself straight out from him, as his own forward-flowing heart, while Starbuck and Stubb, standing upon the bowsprit beneath, caught sight of the downcoming monster just as soon as he

'The whale, the whale! Up helm, up helm! Oh, all ye sweet powers of air, now hug me close! Let not Starbuck die, if die he must, in a woman's fainting fit Up helm, I say—ye fools, the jaw! the jaw! Is this the end of all my bursting prayers? all my life-long fidelities? Oh, Ahab, Ahab, lo, thy work Steady! helmsman, steady Nay, nay! Up helm again! He turns to meet us! Oh, his unappeasable brow drives on toward one, whose duty tells him he cannot depart. My God, stand by me now!'

'Stand not by me, but stand under me, whoever you are that will now help Stubb, for Stubb, too, sticks here. I grin at thee, thou grinning whale! Who ever helped Stubb, or kept Stubb awake, but Stubb's own unwinking eye? And now poor Stubb goes to bed upon a mattress that is all too soft, would it were stuffed with brushwood! I grin at thee, thou grinning whale! Look ye, sun, moon, and stars! I call ye assassins of as good a fellow as ever spouted up his ghost. For all that, I would yet ring glasses with ye, would ye but hand the cup! Oh, oh! oh, oh! thou grinning whale, but there'll be plenty of gulping soon! Why fly ye not, O, Ahab? For me, off shoes and jacket to it, let Stubb die in his drawers! A most mouldy and over-salted death, though,—cherries! cherries! cherries! Oh, Flask, for one red cherry ere we die!'

'Cherries? I only wish that we were where they grow. Oh, Stubb, I hope my poor mother's drawn my part-pay ere this, if not, few coppers will come to her now, for the voyage is up.'

From the ship's bows, nearly all the seamen now hung inactive, hammers, bits of plank, lances, and harpoons, mechanically retained in their hands, just as they had darted from their various employments, all their enchanted eyes intent upon the whale, which from side to side strangely vibrating his predestinating head, sent a broad band of overspreading semicircular foam before him as he rushed. Retribution, swift vengeance, eternal malice were in his whole aspect, and spite of all that mortal man could do, the solid white buttress of his forehead smote the ship's starboard bow, till men and timbers reeled. Some fell flat upon their faces. Like dislodged trucks, the heads of the harpooneers aloft shook on their bull-like necks. Through the breach, they heard the waters pour, as mountain torrents down a flume.

'The ship! The hearse!—the second hearse!' cried Ahab from the boat, 'its wood could only be American!'

Diving beneath the settling ship, the whale ran quivering along its keel, but turning under water, swiftly shot to the surface again, far off the other bow, but within a few yards of Ahab's boat, where, for a time, he lay quiescent.

'I turn my body from the sun. What ho, Tashtego! let me hear thy hammer. Oh! ye three unsundered spires of mine, thou uncracked keel, and only god-bullied hull, thou firm deck, and haughty helm, and Pole-pointed prow,—death-glorious ship! must ye then perish, and without me? Am I cut off from the last fond pride of meanest shipwrecked captains? Oh, lonely death on lonely life! Oh, now I feel my topmost greatness lies in my topmost grief. Ho, ho! from all your furthest bounds, pour ye now in, ye bold billows of my whole foregone life, and top this one piled comber of my death! Toward thee I roll, thou all-destroying but unconquering whale, to the last I grapple with thee, from hell's heart I stab at thee, for hate's sake I spit my last breath at thee. Sink all coffins and all hearses to one common pool! and since neither can be mine, let me then tow to pieces, while still chasing thee, though tied to thee, thou damned whale! Thus, I give up the spear!'

The harpoon was darted, the stricken whale flew forward, with igniting velocity the line ran through the groove, ran foul. Ahab stopped to clear it, he did clear it, but the flying turn caught him round the neck, and voicelessly as Turkish mutes bowstring their victim, he was shot out of the boat, ere the crew knew he was gone. Next instant, the heavy eye-splice in the rope's final end flew out of the stark-empty tub, knocked down an oarsman, and smiting the sea, disappeared in its depths.

For an instant, the tranced boat's crew stood still, then turned. 'The ship? Great God, where is the ship?' Soon they through dim, bewildering mediums saw her sidelong fading phantom, as in the gaseous Fata Morgana, only the uppermost masts out of water, while fixed by infatuation, or fidelity, or fate, to their once lofty perches, the pagan harpooneers still maintained their sinking lookouts on the sea. And now, concentric circles seized the lone boat itself, and all its crew, and each floating oar, and every lance-pole, and spinning, animate and inanimate, all round and round in one vortex, carried the smallest chip of the Pequod to it of sight.

But as the last whelmings intermixingly poured themselves over the sunken head of the Indian at the main-mast, leaving a few inches of the erect spar yet visible, together with long streaming yards of the flag, which calmly undulated, with ironical coincidings, over the destroying billows they almost touched—at that instant, a red arm and a hammer hovered backwardly uplifted in the open air, in the act of nailing the flag faster and yet faster to the subsiding spar. A sky-hawk that tauntingly had followed the main-truck downward from its natural home among the stars, pecking at the flag, and incommoding Tashtego there, this bird now chanced to intercept its broad fluttering wing between the hammer and the wood, and simultaneously feeling that ethereal thrill, the submerged savage beneath, in his death-gasp, kept his hammer frozen there, and so the bird of heaven, with arch-angelic shrieks, and his imperial beak thrust upward, and his whole captive form folded in the flag of Ahab, went down with his ship, which, like Satan, would not sink to hell till she had dragged a living part of heaven along with her, and helmeted herself with it.

Now small fowls flew screaming over the yet yawning gulf, a sullen white surf beat against its steep sides, then all collapsed, and the great shroud of the sea rolled on as it rolled five thousand years ago.

THE SONG

FAR off in the sea is Marlana,
A land of shades and streams,
A land of many delights
Dark and bold, thy shores, Marlana,
But green, and timorous, thy soft knolls, Crouching behind the woodlands
All shady thy hills, all gleaming thy springs,
Like eyes in the earth looking at you.
How charming thy haunts, Marlana!— 9
Oh, the waters that flow through Onimoo.
Oh, the leaves that rustle through Ponoo
Oh, the roses that blossom in Tarma.
Come, and see the valley of Vina
How sweet, how sweet, the Isles from Hina:
'Tis aye afternoon of the full, full moon,
And ever the season of fruit,
And ever the hour of flowers,
And never the time of rains and gales,
All in and about Marlana.

Soft sigh the boughs in the stilly air, 20
Soft lap the beach the billows there;
And in the woods or by the streams,
You needs must nod in the Land of Dreams

10 HA, ha, gods and kings, fill high, one and all,
Drink, drink! shout and drink! mad respond to the call!
Fill fast, and fill full, 'gainst the goblet ne'er
sin,
Quaff there, at high tide, to the uttermost rim —
Flood-tide, and soul-tide to the brim!

20 Who with wine in him fears? who thinks of his cares?
Who sighs to be wise, when wine in him flares?
Water sinks down below, in currents full slow,
But wine mounts on high with its genial glow —
Welling up, till the brain overflow! 10

30 As the spheres, with a roll, some fiery of
soul,
Others golden, with music, revolve round the pole,
So let our cups, radiant with many-hued wines,
Round and round in groups circle, our Zodiac's Signs —
Round reeling, and ringing their chimes!

Then drink, gods and kings, wine merriment brings,
It bounds through the veins, there, jubilant sings
Let it ebb, then, and flow, wine never grows dim,
Drain down that bright tide at the foam beaded rim —
Fill up, every cup, to the brim! 20

QUACK! QUACK! QUACK!

QUACK! Quack! Quack!
With a too-rooloo whack,
Hack away, merry men, hack away.

Who would not die brave,
 His ear smote by a stave?
 Thwack away, merry men, thwack away!
 'Tis glory that calls,
 To each hero that falls,
 Hack away, merry men, hack away!
 Quack! Quack! Quack! 10
 Quack! Quack!
 Quack!

SHERIDAN AT CEDAR CREEK

(OCTOBER 1864)

SHOE the steed with silver
 That bore him to the fray,
 When he heard the guns at dawning—
 Miles away,
 When he heard them calling, calling—Mount! nor stay.
 Quick, or all is lost, They've surprised and stormed the post,
 They push your routed host—Gallop! retrieve the day 10
 House the horse in ermine—
 For the foam-flake blew White through the red October,
 He thundered into view,
 They cheered him in the looming, Horseman and horse they knew
 The turn of the tide began,
 The rally of bugles ran,
 He swung his hat in the van,
 The electric hoof-spark flew. 20

Wreath the steed and lead him—
 For the charge he led Touched and turned the cypress
 Into amaranths for the head Of Philip, king of riders,
 Who raised them from the dead
 The camp (at dawning lost),
 By eve, recovered—forced,
 Rang with laughter of the host
 At belated Early fled. 30

Shroud the horse in sable—
 For the mounds they heap!
 There is firing in the Valley,
 And yet no strife they keep;
 It is the parting volley,
 It is the pathos deep.

There is glory for the brave
 Who lead, and nobly save,
 But no knowledge in the grave
 Where the nameless followers sleep. 40

IN THE PRISON PEN

(1864)

LISTLESS he eyes the palisades
 And sentries in the glare,
 'Tis barren as a pelican-beach—
 But his world is ended there

Nothing to do, and vacant hands
 Bring on the idiot-pain,
 He tries to think—to recollect.
 But the blur is on his brain

Around him swarm the plaining ghosts
 Like those on Virgil's shore— 10
 A wilderness of faces dim,
 And pale ones gashed and hoar

A smiting sun No shed, no tree,
 He totters to his lair—
 A den that sick hands dug in earth
 Ere famine wasted there,

Or, dropping in his place, he swoons,
 Walled in by throngs that press, Till forth from the throngs they bear him dead—
 Dead in his meagreness. 20

FROM CLAREL <sup>1</sup>

THE GOLDEN AGE

'SEEDSMEN of old Saturn's land,
 Love and peace went hand in hand,
 And sowed the Era Golden!

'Golden time for man and mead Title none, nor tittle-deed, Nor any slave, nor Soldan.

'Venus burned both large and bright,
 Honey-moon from night to night,
 Nor bride, nor groom waxed olden.

<sup>1</sup> The selections, to which the titles of the first and third have been given by the editors, are, respectively, from ibid., xv, 98–99, 42–44, 70

'Big the tears, but ruddy ones, 10
Crushed from grapes in vats and tuns
Of vineyards green and golden!

'Sweet to sour did never sue,
None repented ardour true—
Those years did so embolden.

'Glum Don Graveairs slunk in den—Frankly roved the gods with men In gracious talk and golden.

'Thrill it, cymbals of my rhyme, Power was love, and love in prime, 20
Nor revel to toil beholden.

'Back, come back, good age, and reign, Goodly age, and long remain—Saturnian Age, the Golden!'

OF MONASTERIES

THE lake ink-black mid slopes of snow—
The dead-house for the frozen, barred—
And the stone hospice, chill they show Monastic in thy pass, Bernard Apostle of the Alps storm-riven,
How lone didst build so near the heaven!

Anchored in seas of Nitria's sand,
The desert convent of the Copt—
No aerolite can more command
The sense of dead detachment, dropped 10
All solitary from the sky

The herdsmen of Olympus lie
In summer when the eve is won Viewing white Spermos lower down,
The mountain-convent, and winds bear
The chimes that bid the monks to prayer,
Nor man-of-war hawk sole in sky
O'er lonely ship sends lonelier cry.

The Grand Chartreuse with crystal peaks

Mid pines—the wintry Paradise 20
Of soul which but a Saviour seeks—
The mountains round all slabbed with ice;
May well recall the founder true,
St Bruno, who to heaven has gone
And proved his motto—that whereto
Each locked Carthusian yet adheres:
Troubled I was, but spake I none,
I kept in mind the eternal years

And Vallombrosa—in, shut in,
And Montserrat—ensiled aloft, 30

With many more the verse might win, Solitudes all, austere or soft.

But Saba! Of retreats where heart
Longing for more than downy rest, Fit place would find from world apart,
Saba abides the loneliest Saba, that with an eagle's theft
Seizeth and dwelleth in the cleft

Aloof the monks their aerie keep,
Down from their hanging cells they peep,
Like samphure-gatherers o'er the bay 41
Faint hearing there the hammering deep
Of surf that smites the ledges gray.

But up and down, from grot to shrine,
Along the gorge, hard by the brink File the gowned monks in even line,
And never shrink!

With litany or dirge they wend
Where nature as in travail dwells,
And the worn grots and pensive dells 50
In wail for wail responses send—Echoes in plaintive syllables

With mystic silvery brede divine, Saint Basil's banner of Our Lord
(In lieu of crucifix adored By Greeks which images decline), Stained with the five small wounds and red, Down through the darkling gulf is led—
By night oft-times, while tapers glow
Small in the depths, as stars may show 60 Reflected far in well profound.

Full fifteen hundred years have wound
Since cenobite first harboured here,
The bones of men, deemed martyrs crowned,
To fossils turn in mountain near,
Nor less while now lone scribe may write,
Even now, in living dead of night,
In Saba's lamps the flames aspire—
The votaries tend the far-transmitted fire

WHAT IS BEAUTY?

WHAT is beauty? 'tis a dream
Dispensing still with gladness
The dolphin haunteth not the shoal,
And deeps there be in sadness

The rose-leaves, see, disbanded be—Blowing, about me blowing,
But on the death-bed of the rose
My amaranths are growing

FROM BRIDEGROOM DICK

(1876)

WHERE's Commander All-a-Tanto?
 Where's Orlop Bob singing up from below?
 Where's Rhyming Ned? has he spun his last canto?
 Where's Jewsharp Jim? Where's Rigadoon
     Joe?
 Ah, for the music over and done,
 The band all dismissed save the droned trombone! 350
 Where's Glen o' the gun-room, who loved Hot-Scotch—
 Glen, prompt and cool in a perilous watch?
 Where's flaxen-haired Phil? a grey lieutenant?
 Or rubicund, flying a dignified pennant?
 But where sleeps his brother?—the cruise it was o'er,
 But ah, for death's grip that welcomed him ashore!
 Where's Sid, the cadet, so frank in his brag, Whose toast was audacious—'Here's Sid,
     and Sid's flag!'
 Like holiday craft that have sunk unknown,
 May a lark of a lad go lonely down? 360
 Who takes the census under the sea?
 Can others like old ensigns be,
 Bunting I hoisted to flutter at the gaff—Rags in end that once were flags Gallant streaming from the staff?
 Such scurvy doom could the chances deal
 To Top-Gallant Harry and Jack Genteel?
 Lo, Genteel Jack in hurricane weather,
 Shagged like a bear, like a red lion roaring,
 But O, so fine in his chapeau and feather,
 In port to the ladies never once jawing; 371 All bland politesse, how urbane was he—
 'Ou, mademoiselle!'—'Ma chere ame!'
 'Twas Jack got up the ball at Naples, Gay in the old Ohio glorious,
 His hair was curled by the berth-deck barber,
 Never you'd deemed him a cub of rude Boreas,
 In tight little pumps, with the grand dames in rout,
 A-flinging his shapely foot all about,
 His watch-chain with love's jewelled tokens abounding, 380
 Curls ambrosial shaking out odours,

Waltzing along the batteries, astounding
 The gunner glum and the grim-visaged loaders.

Wife, where be all these blades, I wonder,
 Pennoned fine fellows, so strong, so gay?
 Never their colours with a dip dived under,
 Have they hauled them down in a lack-lustre
     day,
 Or beached their boats in the Far, Far
     Away?
 Hither and thither, blown wide asunder,
 Where's this fleet, I wonder and wonder 390
 Slipt their cables, rattled their adieu (Whereaway pointing? to what rendezvous?),
 Out of sight, out of mind, like the crack Constitution,
 And many a keel time never shall renew—
Bon Homme Dick o' the buff Revolution, The Black Cockade and the staunch True-
     Blue.

Doff hats to Decatur! But where is his blazon?
 Must merited fame endure time's wrong—
 Glory's ripe grape wizen up to a raisin?
 Yes! For Nature teems, and the years are strong, 400
 And who can keep the tally o' the names that fleet along?

But his frigate, wife, his bride? Would blacksmiths brown
 Into smuthereens smute the solid old renown?

Riveting the bolts in the ironclad's shell,
 Hark to the hammers with a rat-tat-tat,
 'Handier a Derby than a laced cocked hat!
 The Monitor was ugly, but she served us right well,
 Better than the Cumberland, a beauty and the belle '
 Better than the Cumberland!—Heart alive in
     me!
 That battlemented hull, Tantallon o' the
     sea, 410
 Kicked in, as at Boston the taxed chests o' tea!
 Aye, spurned by the ram, once a tall, shapely craft,
 But lopped by the Rebs to an iron-beaked raft—
 A blacksmith's unicorn in armour cap-à-pie.

Under the water-line a ram's blow is dealt.
And foul fall the knuckles that strike below the belt
Nor brave the inventions that serve to replace
The openness of valour while dismantling the grace.

Aloof from all this and the never-ending game,
Tantamount to teetering, plot and counter-plot, 420
Impenetrable armour—all-perforating shot, Aloof, bless God, ride the warships of old,
A grand fleet moored in the roadstead of fame,
Not submarine sneaks with them are enrolled,
Their long shadows dwarf us, their flags are as flame

Don't fidget so, wife, an old man's passion Amounts to no more than this smoke that I puff,
There, there, now, buss me in good old fashion,
A died-down candle will flicker in the snuff.

FROM THE HAGLETS

THERE, peaked and grey, three haglets fly,
And follow, follow fast in wake 50
Where slides the cabin-lustre shy,
And sharks from man a glamour take,
Seething along the line of light In lane that endless rules the warship's flight

The sea-fowl here, whose hearts none
know,
They followed late the flagship quelled, (As now the victor one) and long Above her gurgling grave, shrill held With screams their wheeling rites—then sped
Direct in silence where the victor led 60
Now winds less fleet, but fairer, blow,
A ripple laps the coppered side,
While phosphor sparks make ocean gleam,
Like camps lit up in triumph wide,
With lights and tinkling cymbals meet Acclaiming seas the advancing conqueror greet

But who a flattering tide may trust,
Or favouring breeze, or aught in end?—

Careening under startling blasts
The sheeted towers of sails impend, 70
While, gathering bale, behind is bred
A livid storm-bow, like a rainbow dead.

At trumpet-call the topmen spring,
And, urged by after-call in stress,
Yet other tribes of tars ascend
The rigging's howling wilderness,
But ere yard-ends alert they win, Hell rules in heaven with hurricane-fire and din

The spars, athwart at spiry height,
Like quaking Lima's crosses rock, 80
Like bees the clustering sailors cling Against the shrouds, or take the shock
Flat on the swept yard-arms aslant, Dipped like the wheeling condor's pinions gaunt

A lull! and tongues of languid flame
Lick every boom, and lambent show
Electric 'gainst each face aloft,
The herds of clouds with bellowings go.
The black ship rears—beset—harassed, Then plunges far with luminous antlers
vast 90

In trim betimes they turn from land,
Some shivered sails and spars they stow
One watch, dismissed, they troll the can,
While loud the billow thumps the bow—
Vies with the fist that smites the board, Obstreperous at each reveller's jovial
word

Of royal oak by storms confirmed,
The tested hull her lineage shows Vainly the plungings whelm her prow—
She rallies, rears, she sturdier grows, 100 Each shot-hole plugged, each storm-sail home,
With batteries housed she rams the watery dome

MONODY

To have known him, to have loved him
After loneliness long,
And then to be estranged in life,
And neither in the wrong,
And now for death to set his seal—
Ease me, a little ease, my song!

By wintry hills his hermit-mound
The sheeted snow-drifts drape,
And houseless there the snow-bird flits
Beneath the fir-trees' crape 10

Glazed now with ice the cloistral vine
That hid the shyest grape

IN THE PAUPER'S TURNIP-FIELD

Crow, in pulpit lone and tall
Of yon charred hemlock, grimly dead,
Why on me in preachment call—Me, by nearer preachment led Here in homily of my hoe.
The hoe, the hoe,
My heavy hoe
That earthward bows me to foreshow
A mattock heavier than the hoe.

ART

In placid hours well pleased we dream
Of many a brave unbodied scheme.
But form to lend, pulsed life create,
What unlike things must meet and mate:
A flame to melt—a wind to freeze;
Sad patience—joyous energies,
Humility—yet pride and scorn,
Instinct and study, love and hate,
Audacity—reverence These must mate
And fuse with Jacob's mystic heart, 10
To wrestle with the angel—Art

DIRGE

FOR ONE WHO FELL IN BATTLE

Room for a Soldier! lay him in the clover, He loved the fields, and they shall be his cover,
Make his mound with hers who called him once her lover
Where the rain may rain upon it,
Where the sun may shine upon it,
Where the lamb hath lain upon it,
And the bee will dine upon it Bear him to no dismal tomb under city churches,
Take him to the fragrant fields, by the silver birches,
Where the whip-poor-will shall mourn, where the oriole perches 10
Make his mound with sunshine on it,
Where the bee will dine upon it,
Where the lamb hath lain upon it,
And the rain will rain upon it Busy as the bee was he, and his rest should be the clover,
Gentle as the lamb was he, and the fern should be his cover,

Fern and rosemary shall grow my soldier's pillow over
Where the rain may rain upon it,
Where the sun may shine upon it,
Where the lamb hath lain upon it, 20
And the bee will dine upon it

Sunshine in his heart, the rain would come full often
Out of those tender eyes which evermore did soften
He never could look cold till we saw him in his coffin
Make his mound with sunshine on it,
Plant the lordly pine upon it,
Where the moon may stream upon it,
And memory shall dream upon it.

'Captain or Colonel,'—whatever invocation Suit our hymn the best, no matter for thy station,— 30
On thy grave the rain shall fall from the eyes of a mighty nation!
Long as the sun doth shine upon it Shall glow the goodly pine upon it,
Long as the stars do gleam upon it Shall memory come to dream upon it

FROM THE RIVER-FIGHT

(MISSISSIPPI RIVER, APRIL 24, 1862)

WOULD you hear of the River-Fight? 90
It was two, of a soft spring night—
God's stars looked down on all,
And all was clear and bright
But the low fog's chilling breath—
Up the River of Death Sailed the Great Admiral.

On our high poop-deck he stood,
And round him ranged the men
Who have made their birthright good Of manhood, once and again— 100
Lords of helm and of sail,
Tried in tempest and gale,
Bronzed in battle and wreck—Bell and Bailey grandly led Each his Line of the Blue and Red—Wainwright stood by our starboard rail,
Thornton fought the deck

And I mind me of more than they,
Of the youthful, steadfast ones,
That have shown them worthy sons 110
Of the Seamen passed away—(Tyson conned our helm that day, Watson stood by his guns )

What thought our Admiral then,
Looking down on his men?
Since the terrible day,
(Day of renown and tears!)
When at anchor the Essex lay,
Holding her foes at bay,
When, a boy, by Porter's side he stood 120 Till deck and plank-shear were dyed with blood,
'Tis a half a hundred years—
Half a hundred years, to-day!

Who could fail, with him?
Who reckon of life or limb?
Not a pulse but beat the higher!
There had you seen, by the star-light dim,
Five hundred faces strong and grim—
The Flag is going under fire!
Right up by the fort, with her helm hard-a-port, 130
The Hartford is going under fire!

The way to our work was plain,
Caldwell had broken the chain, (Two hulks swung down amain, Soon as 'twas sundered)—
Under the night's dark blue,
Steering steady and true,
Ship after ship went through—Till, as we hove in view,
Jackson out-thundered. 140

Back echoed Philip!—ah, then,
Could you have seen our men,
How they sprung, in the dim night haze,
To their work of toil and of clamor!
How the loaders, with sponge and rammer,
And their captains, with cord and hammer,
Kept every muzzle ablaze!
How the guns, as with cheer and shout
Our tackle-men hurled them out,
Brought up on the water-ways! 150

First, as we fired at their flash,
'Twas lightning and black eclipse,
With a bellowing roll and crash—
But soon, upon either bow, What with forts, and fire-rafts, and ships—
(The whole fleet was hard at it now, All pounding away!)—and Porter Still thundering with shell and mortar—
'Twas the mighty sound and form Of an Equatorial storm! 160

(Such you see in the Far South, After long heat and drouth,
As day draws nigh to even—Arching from North to South, Blinding the tropic sun,
The great black bow comes on,
Till the thunder-veil is riven,
When all is crash and levin,
And the cannonade of heaven Rolls down the Amazon!) 170

But, as we worked along higher,
Just where the river enlarges,
Down came a pyramid of fire—
It was one of your long coal barges.
(We had often had the like before)—
'Twas coming down on us to larboard,
Well in with the eastern shore—

And our pilot, to let it pass round, (You may guess we never stopped to sound,)
 Giving us a rank sheer to starboard, 180
   Ran the Flag hard and fast aground!

'Twas nigh abreast of the Upper Fort,
   And straightway a rascal Ram
   (She was shaped like the devil's dam)
 Puffed away for us, with a snort,
   And shoved it with spiteful strength,
 Right alongside of us, to port—
   It was all of our ship's length,
 A huge crackling Cradle of the Pit, Pitch-pine knots to the brim, 190 Belching flame red and grim—
 What a roar came up from it!

Well, for a little it looked bad—
   But these things are, somehow, shorter
   In the acting than the telling—
   There was no singing-out nor yelling, Nor any fussing and fretting,
   No stampede, in short—
 But there we were, my lad,
   All a-fire on our port quarter! 200
   Hammocks a-blaze in the netting, Flames spouting in at every port—
   Our Fourth Cutter burning at the davit, (No chance to lower away and save it)

In a twinkling, the flames had risen
 Halfway to main top and mizzen, Darting up the shrouds like snakes!
 Ah, how we clanked at the brakes,
   And the deep steam-pumps throbbed under,
   Sending a ceaseless flow— 210
 Our top-men, a dauntless crowd,

Swarmed in rigging and shroud—
   There, ('twas a wonder!)
 The burning ratlines and strands They quenched with their bare hard hands—

But the great guns below
 Never silenced their thunder!

At last, by backing and sounding,
 When we were clear of grounding,
   And under head-way once more, 220
 The whole rebel fleet came rounding
   The point — if we had it hot before,
   'Twas now, from shore to shore,
   One long, loud thundering roar—
 Such crashing, splintering, and pounding,
   And smashing as you never heard before!

But that we fought foul wrong to wreck,
   And to save the Land we loved so well,
 You might have deemed our long gun deck
   Two hundred feet of hell! 230

For all above was battle, Broadside, and blaze, and rattle,
   Smoke and thunder alone—
 (But, down in the sick-bay,
 Where our wounded and dying lay,
   There was scarce a sob or a moan)

And at last, when the dim day broke,
 And the sullen sun awoke,
   Drearly blinking
 O'er the haze and the cannon-smoke, 240
 That ever such morning dulls—
 There were thirteen traitor hulls
   On fire and sinking!

FARRAGUT

(MOBILE BAY, 5 AUGUST, 1864)

FARRAGUT, Farragut,
   Old Heart of Oak,
 Daring Dave Farragut,
   Thunderbolt stroke,
 Watches the hoary mist
   Lift from the bay,
 Till his flag, glory-kissed,
   Greets the young day.

Far, by gray Morgan's walls,
   Looms the black fleet 10
 Hark, deck to rampart calls
   With the drums' beat!
 Buoy your chains overboard,
   While the steam hums;
 Men! to the battlement, Farragut comes.

See, as the hurricane Hurtles in wrath

Squadrons of clouds amain
Back from its path! 20
Back to the parapet,
To the guns' lips,
Thunderbolt Farragut
Hurls the black ships.

Now through the battle's roar
Clear the boy sings,
'By the mark fathoms four,'
While his lead swings Steady the wheelmen five
'Nor' by East keep her,' 30
'Steady,' but two alive
How the shells sweep her!

Lashed to the mast that sways
Over red decks,
Over the flame that plays
Round the torn wrecks,
Over the dying lips

Framed for a cheer, Farragut leads his ships,
Guides the line clear. 40

On by heights cannon-browed,
While the spars quiver, Onward still flames the cloud
Where the hulks shiver.
See, yon fort's star is set,
Storm and fire past.
Cheer him, lads—Farragut,
Lashed to the mast!

Oh! while Atlantic's breast
Bears a white sail, 50
While the Gulf's towering crest
Tops a green vale,
Men thy bold deeds shall tell,
Old Heart of Oak,
Daring Dave Farragut,
Thunderbolt stroke!

SHERIDAN'S RIDE

Up from the South at break of day, Bringing to Winchester fresh dismay,
The affrighted air with a shudder bore,
Like a herald in haste, to the chieftain's
door,
The terrible grumble, and rumble, and roar,
Telling the battle was on once more,
And Sheridan twenty miles away

And wider still those billows of war,
Thundered along the horizon's bar;
And louder yet into Winchester rolled 10
The roar of that red sea uncontrolled,
Making the blood of the listener cold,
As he thought of the stake in that fiery fray
And Sheridan twenty miles away.

But there is a road from Winchester town,
A good broad highway leading down,
And there, through the flush of the morning
light,
A steed as black as the steeds of night,
Was seen to pass, as with eagle flight,
As if he knew the terrible need, 20
He stretched away with his utmost speed,

Hills rose and fell, but his heart was gay,
With Sheridan fifteen miles away

Still sprung from those swift hoofs, thundering South,
The dust, like smoke from the cannon's mouth,
Or the trail of a comet, sweeping faster and faster,
Foreboding to traitors the doom of disaster.
The heart of the steed, and the heart of the master
Were beating like prisoners assaulting their walls,
Impatient to be where the battle-field calls, 30
Every nerve of the charger was strained to full play,
With Sheridan only ten miles away.

Under his spurning feet the road
Like an arrowy Alpine river flowed,
And the landscape sped away behind
Like an ocean flying before the wind,
And the steed, like a bark fed with furnace ire,
Swept on, with his wild eye full of fire.
But lo! he is nearing his heart's desire;

He is snuffing the smoke of the roaring fray,
With Sheridan only five miles away

The first that the general saw were the groups
Of stragglers, and then the retreating troops,
What was done? what to do? a glance told him both,
Then striking his spurs, with a terrible oath, He dashed down the line, 'mid a storm of huzzas,
And the wave of retreat checked its course there, because
The sight of the master compelled it to pause
With foam and with dust, the black charger was gray,

By the flash of his eye, and the red nostril's play, 50
He seemed to the whole great army to say,
'I have brought you Sheridan all the way From Winchester, down to save the day!'

Hurrah! hurrah for Sheridan!
Hurrah! hurrah for horse and man!
And when their statues are placed on high,
Under the dome of the Union sky,
The American soldiers' Temple of Fame,
There with the glorious general's name,
Be it said, in letters both bold and bright,
'Here is the steed that saved the day, 61
By carrying Sheridan into the fight,
From Winchester, twenty miles away!'

DIRGE FOR A SOLDIER

IN MEMORY OF GENERAL PHILIP KEARNY
KILLED SEPTEMBER 1, 1862

CLOSE his eyes, his work is done!
What to him is friend or foeman,
Rise of moon, or set of sun,
Hand of man, or kiss of woman?
Lay him low, lay him low,
In the clover or the snow!
What cares he? he cannot know.
Lay him low!

As man may, he fought his fight,
Proved his truth by his endeavor,      ro
Let him sleep in solemn night, Sleep forever and forever
Lay him low, lay him low,
In the clover or the snow!
What cares he? he cannot know:
Lay him low!

Fold him in his country's stars,
Roll the drum and fire the volley!
What to him are all our wars,
What but death bemoeking folly?
Lay him low, lay him low,
In the clover or the snow!
What cares he? he cannot know.
Lay him low!

Leave him to God's watching eye,
 Trust him to the hand that made him Mortal love weeps idly by God alone has power to aid him.
 Lay him low, lay him low,
 In the clover or the snow!
 What cares he? he cannot know.
 Lay him low!

THE HIGH TIDE AT GETTYSBURG<sup>1</sup>

A CLOUD possessed the hollow field,
The gathering battle's smoky shield
    Athwart the gloom the lightning flashed,
    And through the cloud some horseman dashed,
And from the heights the thunder pealed.

Then at the brief command of Lee Moved out that matchless infantry,
    With Pickett leading grandly down,
    To rush against the roaring crown
Of those dread heights of destiny. 10

Far heard above the angry guns
A cry across the tumult runs,—
    The voice that rang through Shiloh's woods
    And Chickamauga's solitudes,
The fierce South cheering on her sons!

Ah, how the withering tempest blew Against the front of Pettigrew!
    A Khamsin wind that scorched and singed
    Like that infernal flame that fringed
The British squares at Waterloo! 20

A thousand fell where Kemper led,
A thousand died where Garnett bled
    In blinding flame and strangling smoke
    The remnant through the batteries broke And crossed the works with Armistead.

'Once more in Glory's van with me!
Virginia cried to Tennessee,
    'We two together, come what may,
    Shall stand upon these works to-day!
(The reddest day in history) 30

Brave Tennessee! In reckless way Virginia heard her comrade say
    'Close round this rent and riddled rag!
    What time she set her battle-flag
Amid the guns of Doubleday

<sup>1</sup> The poem was delivered by Thompson, a Confederate veteran, at the twenty-fifth anniversary celebration of the Battle of Gettysburg, on 4 July 1888

But who shall break the guards that wait
Before the awful face of Fate?
    The tattered standards of the South
    Were shriveled at the cannon's mouth,
And all her hopes were desolate. 40

In vain the Tennessean set His breast against the bayonet!
    In vain Virginia charged and raged,
    A tigress in her wrath uncaged,
Till all the hill was red and wet!

Above the bayonets, mixed and crossed,
Men saw a gray, gigantic ghost Receding through the battle-cloud,
    And heard across the tempest loud
The death-cry of a nation lost! 50

The brave went down! Without disgrace
They leaped to Ruin's red embrace
    They only heard Fame's thunders wake,
    And saw the dazzling sun-burst break
In smiles on Glory's bloody facet

They tell, who lifted up a hand
And bade the sun in heaven to stand!
    They smote and fell, who set the bars
    Against the progress of the stars,
And stayed the march of Motherland! 60

They stood, who saw the future come
On through the fight's delirium!
    They smote and stood, who held the hope Of nations on that slippery slope
Amid the cheers of Christendom

God lives! He forged the iron will That clutched and held that trembling hill.
    God lives and reigns! He built and lent
    The heights for Freedom's battlement
Where floats her flag in triumph still! 70

Fold up the banners! Smelt the guns!
Love rules Her gentler purpose runs.
    A mighty mother turns in tears
    The pages of her battle years, Lamenting all her fallen sons!

KEENAN'S CHARGE (CHANCELLORSVILLE, MAY, 1863)

I

THE sun had set,
The leaves with dew were wet
Down fell a bloody dusk
On the woods, that second of May, Where Stonewall's corps, like a beast of prey,
Tore through, with angry tusk.

'They've trapped us, boys!'— Rose from our flank a voice.
With a rush of steel and smoke
On came the rebels straight,
Eager as love and wild as hate,
And our line reeled and broke,

Broke and fled
No one stayed—but the dead!
With curses, shrieks, and cries,
Horses and wagons and men Tumbled back through the shuddering glen,
And above us the fading skies

There's one hope, still—Those batteries parked on the hull!
'Battery, wheel!' ('mud the roar)
'Pass pieces, fix prolonge to fire Retiring Trot!' In the panic dire
A bugle rings 'Trot!'—and no more.

The horses plunged,
The cannon lurched and lunged,
To join the hopeless rout
But suddenly rode a form Calmly in front of the human storm,
With a stern, commanding shout

'Align those guns!'
(We knew it was Pleasanton's )
The cannoneers bent to obey,
And worked with a will at his word And the black guns moved as if they had heard
But ah, the dread delay!

'To wait is crime,
O God, for ten minutes' time!'

The General looked around.
There Keenan sat, like a stone, 40
With his three hundred horse alone,
Less shaken than the ground.

'Major, your men?'
'Are soldiers, General ' 'Then Charge, Major! Do your best Hold the enemy back, at all cost, Till my guns are placed,—else the army is lost.
You die to save the rest!'

2

By the shrouded gleam of the western skies, Brave Keenan looked into Pleasanton's 10
eyes 50
For an instant—clear, and cool, and still,
Then, with a smile, he said 'I will '

'Cavalry, charge!' Not a man of them shrank Their sharp, full cheer, from rank on rank, Rose joyously, with a willing breath—
Rose like a greeting hail to death Then forward they sprang, and spurred and clashed,

Shouted the officers, crimson-sashed, Rode well the men, each brave as his 20 fellow, 59
In their faded coats of the blue and yellow,
And above in the air, with an instinct true,
Like a bird of war their pennon flew

With clank of scabbards and thunder of steeds,
'And blades that shine like sunlit reeds,
And strong brown faces bravely pale
For fear their proud attempt shall fail, Three hundred Pennsylvanians close
On twice ten thousand gallant foes

Line after line the troopers came To the edge of the wood that was ring'd with flame, 70
Rode in and sabred and shot—and fell,
Nor came one back his wounds to tell
And full in the midst rose Keenan, tall
In the gloom like a martyr awaiting his fall, While the circle-stroke of his sabre, swung 'Round his head, like a halo there, luminous hung.

Line after line, aye, whole platoons, Struck dead in their saddles—of brave dragoons
 By the maddened horses were onward
     borne
 And into the vortex flung, trampled and torn,
 As Keenan fought with his men, side by side
 So they rode, till there were no more to ride.
 But over them, lying there shattered and mute,
 What deep echo rolls?—'Tis a death-salute

From the cannon in place; for, heroes, you braved
 Your fate not in vain: the army was saved!
 Over them now—year following year—
 Over their graves the pine-cones fall,
 And the whip-poor-will chants his spectrecall,
 But they stir not again: they raise no cheer.
 They have ceased: But their glory shall never cease,
 Nor their light be quenched in the light of
     peace
 The rush of their charge is resounding still That saved the army at Chancellorsville

THE GETTYSBURG ADDRESS

DELIVERED AT THE DEDICATION OF THE NATIONAL CEMETERY, NOVEMBER 19, 1863

FOURSCORE and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, 10 testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate 20
 —we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow —this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us —that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion, that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain, that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

WALT WHITMAN

1819–1892

A BACKWARD GLANCE O'ER
 TRAVEL'D ROADS<sup>1</sup>

PERHAPS the best of songs heard, or of any and all true love, or life's fairest episodes, or sailors', soldiers' trying scenes on land or sea, is the résumé of them, or any of them,

<sup>1</sup> The essay served as preface to November Boughs (Philadelphia, 1888)

long afterwards, looking at the actualities away back past, with all their practical excitations gone. How the soul loves to float amid such reminiscences!

So here I sit gossiping in the early candle-light of old age—I and my book—casting backward glances over our travel'd road. After completing, as it were, the journey—(a varied jaunt of years, with many halts and gaps of intervals—or some lengthen'd ship-voyage, wherein more than once the last hour had apparently arrived, and we seem'd certainly going down—yet reaching port in a sufficient way through all discomfitures at last)—After completing my poems, I am curious to review them in the light of their own (at the time unconscious, or mostly unconscious) intentions, with certain unfoldings of the thirty years they seek to embody. These lines, therefore, will probably blend the web of first purposes and speculations, with the warp of that experience afterwards, always bringing strange developments

Result of seven or eight stages and struggles extending through nearly thirty years, (as I nigh my three-score-and-ten I live largely on memory,) I look upon Leaves of Grass, now finish'd to the end of its opportunities and powers, as my definitive carte visite to the coming generations of the New World,<sup>1</sup> if I may assume to say so. That I have not gain'd the acceptance of my own time, but have fallen back on fond dreams of the future—anticipations—('still lives the song, though Regnar dies')—That from a worldly and business point of view Leaves of Grass has been worse than a failure—that public criticism on the book and myself as author of it yet shows mark'd anger and contempt more than anything else—('I find a solid line of enemies to you everywhere,'—letter from W S K, Boston, May 28, 1884)—And that solely for publishing it I have been the object of two or three pretty serious special official buffetings—is all probably no more than I ought to have expected. I had my choice when I commenc'd. I bid neither for soft eulogies, big money returns, nor the approbation of existing schools and conventions. As fulfill'd, or partially fulfill'd, the best comfort of the whole business (after a small band of the dearest friends and upholders ever vouchsafed to man or cause—doubtless all the more faithful and uncompromising—this little phalanx<sup>1</sup>—for being so few) is that, unstopp'd and unwarp'd by any influence outside the soul within me, I have had my say entirely my own way, and put it unerringly on record—the value thereof to be decided by time

In calculating that decision, William O'Connor and Dr Bucke are far more peremptory than I am. Behind all else that can be said, I consider Leaves of Grass and its theory experimental—as, in the deepest sense, I consider our American republic itself to be, with its theory (I think I have at least enough philosophy not to be too absolutely certain of anything, or any results). In the second place, the volume is a sortie—whether to prove triumphant, and conquer its field of aim and escape and construction, nothing less than a hundred years from now can fully answer. I consider the point that I have positively gain'd a hearing, to far more than make up for any and all other lacks and withholdings. Essentially, that was from the first, and has remain'd throughout, the main object. Now it seems to be achiev'd, I am certainly contented to waive any otherwise momentous drawbacks, as of little account. Candidly and dispassionately reviewing all my intentions, I feel that they were creditable—and I accept the result, whatever it may be.

After continued personal ambition and effort, as a young fellow, to enter with the rest into competition for the usual rewards, business, political, literary, &c—to take part in the great mêlée, both for victory's prize itself and to do some good—After years of those aims and pursuits, I found myself remaining possess'd, at the age of thirty-one to thirty-three, with a special desire and conviction. Or rather, to be quite exact, a desire that had been flitting through my previous life, or hovering on the flanks, mostly indefinite hitherto, had steadily advanced to the front, defined itself, and finally dominated everything else. This was a feeling or ambition to articulate and faithfully express in literary or poetic form, and uncompromisingly, my own physical, emotional, moral, intellectual, and æsthetic Personality, in the midst of, and tallying, the momentous spirit and facts of its immediate days, and of current America—and to exploit that Personality, identified with place and date, in a far more candid and comprehensive sense than any hitherto poem or book.

Perhaps this is in brief, or suggests, all I

have sought to do Given the Nineteenth Century, with the United States, and what they furnish as area and points of view, Leaves of Grass is, or seeks to be, simply a faithful and doubtless self-will'd record In the midst of all, it gives one man's—the author's—identity, ardors, observations, faiths, and thoughts, color'd hardly at all with any decided coloring from other faiths or other identities Plenty of songs had been sung—beautiful, matchless songs—adjusted to other lands than these—another spirit and stage of evolution, but I would sing, and leave out or put in, quite solely with reference to America and to-day Modern science and democracy seem'd to be throwing out their challenge to poetry to put them in its statements in contradistinction to the songs and myths of the past As I see it now (perhaps too late,) I have unwittingly taken up that challenge and made an attempt at such statements—which I certainly would not assume to do now, knowing more clearly what it means

For grounds for Leaves of Grass, as a poem, I abandon'd the conventional themes, which do not appear in it none of the stock ornamentation, or choice plots of love or war, or high, exceptional person-ages of Old-World song, nothing, as I may say, for beauty's sake—no legend, or myth, or romance, nor euphemism, nor rhyme But the broadest average of humanity and its identities in the now ripening Nineteenth Century, and especially in each of their countless examples and practical occupations in the United States to-day

One main contrast of the ideas behind every page of my verses, compared with establish'd poems, is their different relative attitude towards God, towards the objective universe, and still more (by reflection, confession, assumption, &c.) the quite changed attitude of the ego, the one chanting or talking, towards himself and towards his fellow-humanity It is certainly time for America, above all, to begin this readjustment in the scope and basic point of view of verse, for everything else has changed As I write, I see in an article on Wordsworth, in one of the current English magazines, the lines, 'A few weeks ago an eminent French critic said that, owing to the special tendency to science and to its all-devouring force, poetry would cease to be read in fifty years' But I anticipate the very contrary Only a firmer, vastly broader, new area begins to exist—nay, is already form'd—to which the poetic genius must emigrate Whatever may have been the case in years gone by, the true use for the imaginative faculty of modern times is to give ultimate vivification to facts, to science, and to common lives, endowing them with the glows and glories and final illustriousness which belong to every real thing, and to real things only Without that ultimate vivification—which the poet or other artist alone can give—reality would seem incomplete, and science, democracy, and life itself, finally in vain

Few appreciate the moral revolutions of our age, which have been profounder far than the material or inventive or war-produced ones The Nineteenth Century, now well towards its close (and ripening into fruit the seeds of the two preceding centuries<sup>1</sup>)—the uprisings of national masses and shiftings of boundary-lines—the historical and other prominent facts of the United States—the war of attempted Secession—the stormy rush and haste of nebulous forces—never can future years witness more excitement and din of action—never completer change of army front along the whole line, the whole civilized world For all these new and evolutionary facts, meanings, purposes, new poetic messages, new forms and expressions, are inevitable

My Book and I—what a period we have presumed to span! those thirty years from 1850 to '80—and America in them! Proud, proud indeed may we be, if we have cull'd enough of that period in its own spirit to worthily waft a few live breaths of it to the future!

Let me not dare, here or anywhere, for my own purposes, or any purposes, to attempt the definition of Poetry, nor answer the question what it is Like Religion, Love, Nature, while those terms are indis-

<sup>1</sup> 'The ferment and germination even of the United States to-day, dating back to, and in my opinion mainly founded on, the Elizabethan age in English history, the age of Francis Bacon and Shakspeare Indeed, when we pursue it, what growth or advent is there that does not date back, back, until lost—perhaps its most tantalizing clues lost—in the receded horizons of the past?' Author's note, ibid, 8

pensable, and we all give a sufficiently accurate meaning to them, in my opinion no definition that has ever been made sufficiently encloses the name Poetry, nor can any rule or convention ever so absolutely obtain but some great exception may arise and disregard and overturn it

Also it must be carefully remember'd that first-class literature does not shine by any luminosity of its own, nor do its poems. They grow of circumstances, and are evolutionary. The actual living light is always curiously from elsewhere—follows unaccountable sources, and is lunar and relative at the best. There are, I know, certain controlling themes that seem endlessly appropriated to the poets—as war, in the past—in the Bible, religious rapture and adoration—always love, beauty, some fine plot, or pensive or other emotion. But, strange as it may sound at first, I will say there is something striking far deeper and towering far higher than those themes for the best elements of modern song

Just as all the old imaginative works rest, after their kind, on long trains of presuppositions, often entirely unmention'd by themselves, yet supplying the most important bases of them, and without which they could have had no reason for being, so Leaves of Grass, before a line was written, presupposed something different from any other, and, as it stands, is the result of such presupposition. I should say, indeed, it were useless to attempt reading the book without first carefully tallying that preparatory background and quality in the mind. Think of the United States to-day—the facts of these thirty-eight or forty empires solder'd in one—sixty or seventy millions of equals, with their lives, their passions, their future—these incalculable, modern, American, seething multitudes around us, of which we are inseparable parts! Think, in comparison, of the petty environage and limited area of the poets of past or present Europe, no matter how great their genius. Think of the absence and ignorance, in all cases hitherto, of the multitudinousness, vitality, and the unprecedented stimulants of to-day and here. It almost seems as if a poetry with cosmic and dynamic features of magnitude and limitlessness suitable to the human soul, were never possible before. It is certain that a poetry of absolute faith and equality for the use of the democratic masses never was ✓ In estimating first-class song, a sufficient Nationality, or, on the other hand, what may be call'd the negative and lack of it, (as in Goethe's case, it sometimes seems to me,) is often, if not always, the first element. One needs only a little penetration to see, at more or less removes, the material facts of their country and radius, with the coloring of the moods of humanity at the time, and its gloomy or hopeful prospects, behind all poets and each poet, and forming their birth-marks. I know very well that my Leaves could not possibly have emerged or been fashion'd or completed, from any other era than the latter half of the Nineteenth Century, nor any other land than democratic America, and from the absolute triumph of the National Union arms

And whether my friends claim it for me or not, I know well enough, too, that in respect to pictorial talent, dramatic situations, and especially in verbal melody and all the conventional technique of poetry, not only the divine works that to-day stand ahead in the world's reading, but dozens more, transcend (some of them immeasurably transcend) all I have done, or could do. But it seem'd to me, as the objects in Nature, the themes of æstheticism, and all special exploitations of the mind and soul, involve not only their own inherent quality, but the quality, just as inherent and important, of their point of view,<sup>1</sup> the time had come to reflect all themes and things, old and new, in the lights thrown on them by the advent of America and democracy—to chant those themes through the utterance of one, not only the grateful and reverent legatee of the past, but the born child of the New World—to illustrate all through the genesis and ensemble of to-day, and that such illustration and ensemble are the chief demands of America's prospective imaginative literature. Not to carry out, in the approved style, some choice plot of fortune or misfortune, or fancy, or fine thoughts, or incidents, or courtesies—all of which has been done overwhelmingly and well, probably never to be excell'd—but that while in such æsthetic presentation of objects, passions, plots, thoughts, &c, our lands and days do not want, and probably will never have, anything better than they already possess from the bequests of the past, it still remains to be said that there is even towards all those a subjective and contemporary point of view appropriate to ourselves alone, and to our new genius and environments, different from anything hitherto, and that such conception of current or gone-by life and art is for us the only means of their assimilation consistent with the Western world

Indeed, and anyhow, to put it specifically, has not the time arrived when, (if it must be plainly said, for democratic America's sake, if for no other) there must imperatively come a readjustment of the whole theory and nature of Poetry? The question is important, and I may turn the argument over and repeat it Does not the best thought of our day and Republic conceive of a birth and spirit of song superior to anything past or present? To the effectual and moral consolidation of our lands (already, as materially establish'd, the greatest factors in known history, and far, far greater through what they prelude and necessitate, and are to be in future)—to conform with and build on the concrete realities and theories of the universe furnish'd by science, and henceforth the only irrefragable basis for anything, verse included—to root both influences in the emotional and imaginative action of the modern time, and dominate all that precedes or opposes them—is not either a radical advance and step forward, or a new verteber of the best song indispensable?

The New World receives with joy the poems of the antique, with European feudalism's rich fund of epics, plays, ballads—seeks not in the least to deaden or displace those voices from our ear and area—holds them indeed as indispensable studies, influences, records, comparisons But though the dawn-dazzle of the sun of literature is in those poems for us of to-day—though perhaps the best parts of current character in nations, social groups, or any man's or woman's individuality, Old World or New, are from them—and though if I were ask'd to name the most precious bequest to current American civilization from all the hitherto ages, I am not sure but I would name those old and less old songs ferried hither from east and west—some serious words and debits remain, some acrid considerations demand a hearing Of the great poems receiv'd from abroad and from the ages, and to-day enveloping and penetrating America, is there one that is consistent with these United States, or essentially applicable to them as they are and are to be? Is there one whose underlying basis is not a denial and insult to democracy? What a comment it forms, anyhow, on this era of literary fulfilment, with the splendid day-rise of science and resuscitation of history, that our chief religious and poetical works are not our own, nor adapted to our light, but have been furnish'd by far-back ages out of their arriere and darkness, or, at most, twilight dimness! What is there in those works that so imperiously and scornfully dominates all our advanced civilization, and culture?

Even Shakspeare, who so suffuses current letters and art (which indeed have in most degrees grown out of him,) belongs essentially to the buried past Only he holds the proud distinction for certain important phases of that past, of being the loftiest of the singers life has yet given voice to All, however, relate to and rest upon conditions, standards, politics, sociologies, ranges of belief, that have been quite eliminated from the Eastern hemisphere, and never existed at all in the Western As authoritative types of song they belong in America just about as much as the persons and institutes they depict True, it may be said, the emotional, moral, and æsthetic natures of humanity have not radically changed—that in these the old poems apply to our times and all times, irrespective of date, and that they are of incalculable value as pictures of the past I willingly make those admissions, and to their fullest extent, then advance the points herewith as of serious, even paramount importance.

I have indeed put on record elsewhere my reverence and eulogy for those never-to-be-excell'd poetic bequests, and their indescribable preciousness as heirlooms for America Another and separate point must now be candidly stated If I had not stood before those poems with uncover'd head, fully aware of their colossal grandeur and beauty of form and spirit, I could not have written Leaves of Grass My verdict and conclusions as illustrated in its pages are arrived at through the temper and inculcation of the old works as much as through anything else—perhaps more than through anything else As America fully and fairly construed is the legitimate result and evolutionary outcome of the past, so I would dare to claim for my verse. Without stopping to qualify the averment, the Old World has had the poems of myths, fictions, feudalism, conquest, caste, dynastic wars, and splendid exceptional characters and affairs, which have been great, but the New World needs the poems of realities and science and of the democratic average and basic equality, which shall be greater In the centre of all, and object of all, stands the Human Being, towards whose heroic and spiritual evolution poems and everything directly or indirectly tend, Old World or New

Continuing the subject, my friends have more than once suggested—or may be the garrulity of advancing age is possessing me—some further embryonic facts of Leaves of Grass, and especially how I entered upon them Dr Bucke has, in his volume, already fully and fairly described the preparation of my poetic field, with the particular and general plowing, planting, seeding, and occupation of the ground, till everything was fertilized, rooted, and ready to start its own way for good or bad Not till after all this, did I attempt any serious acquaintance with poetic literature Along in my sixteenth year I had become possessor of a stout, well-cramm'd one thousand page octavo volume (I have it yet,) containing Walter Scott's poetry entire—an inexhaustible mine and treasury of poetic forage (especially the endless forests and jungles of notes)—has been so to me for fifty years, and remains so to this day<sup>1</sup>

Later, at intervals, summers and falls, I used to go off, sometimes for a week at a stretch, down in the country, or to Long Island's seashores—there, in the presence of outdoor influences, I went over thoroughly the Old and New Testaments, and absorb'd (probably to better advantage for me than in any library or indoor room—it makes such difference where you read,) Shakspeare, Ossian, the best translated versions I could get of Homer, Eschylus, Sophocles, the old German Nibelungen, the ancient Hindoo poems, and one or two other masterpieces, Dante's among them As it happen'd, I read the latter mostly in an old wood. The Iliad (Buckley's prose version) I read first thoroughly on the peninsula of Orient, northeast end of Long Island, in a shelter'd hollow of rocks and sand, with the sea on each side (I have wonder'd since why I was not overwhelmed by those mighty masters Likely because I read them, as described, in the full presence of Nature, under the sun, with the far-spreading landscape and vistas, or the sea rolling in )

Toward the last I had among much else look'd over Edgar Poe's poems—of which I was not an admirer, tho' I always saw that beyond their limited range of melody (like perpetual cummes of music bells, ringing from lower b flat up to g) they were melodious expressions, and perhaps never excell'd ones, of certain pronounc'd phases of human morbidity (The Poetic area is very spacious—has room for all—has so many 'mansions') But I was repaid in Poe's prose by the idea that (at any rate for our occasions, our day) there can be no such thing as a long poem The same thought had been haunting my mind before, but Poe's argument, though short, work'd the sum out and proved it to me

Another point had an early settlement, clearing the ground greatly I saw, from the time my enterprise and questionings positively shaped themselves (how best can I express my own distinctive era and surroundings, America, Democracy?) that the trunk and centre whence the answer was to radiate, and to which all should and copious revisions and annotations (All the poems were thoroughly read by me, but the ballads of the "Border Minstrelsy" over and over again ) Author's note, ibid, 12

return from straying however far a distance, must be an identical body and soul, a personality—which personality, after many considerations and ponderings I deliberately settled should be myself—indeed could not be any other I also felt strongly (whether I have shown it or not) that to the true and full estimate of the Present both the Past and the Future are main considerations

These, however, and much more might have gone on and come to naught (almost positively would have come to naught,) if a sudden, vast, terrible, direct and indirect stimulus for new and national declamatory expression had not been given to me It is certain, I say, that, although I had made a start before, only from the occurrence of the Secession War, and what it show'd me as by flashes of lightning, with the emotional depths it sounded and arous'd (of course, I don't mean in my own heart only, I saw it just as plainly in others, in millions) —that only from the strong flare and provocation of that war's sights and scenes the final reasons-for-being of an autochthonic and passionate song definitely came forth

I went down to the war fields in Virginia (end of 1862), lived thenceforward in camp —saw great battles and the days and nights afterward—partook of all the fluctuations, gloom, despair, hopes again arous'd, courage evoked—death readily risk'd—the cause, too—along and filling those agonistic and lurid following years, 1863-'64-'65—the real parturition years (more than 1776-'83) of this henceforth homogeneous Union Without those three or four years and the experiences they gave, Leaves of Grass would not now be existing

But I set out with the intention also of indicating or hunting some point-characteristics which I since see (though I did not then, at least not definitely) were bases and object-urgings toward those Leaves from the first The word I myself put primarily for the description of them as they stand at last, is the word Suggestiveness. I round and finish little, if anything; and could not, consistently with my scheme The reader will always have his or her part to do, just as much as I have had mine I seek less to state or display any theme or thought, and more to bring you, reader, into the atmosphere of the theme or thought—there to pursue your own flight Another impetus-word is Comradeship as for all lands, and in a more commanding and acknowledg'd sense than hitherto Other word signs would be Good Cheer, Content, and Hope.

The chief trait of any given poet is always the spirit he brings to the observation of Humanity and Nature—the mood out of which he contemplates his subjects What kind of temper and what amount of faith report these things? Up to how recent a date is the song carried? What the equipment, and special raciness of the singer—what his tinge of coloring? The last value of artistic expressers, past and present—Greek æsthetes, Shakspeare—or in our own day Tennyson, Victor Hugo, Carlyle, Emerson—is certainly involv'd in such questions I say the profoundest service that poems or any other writings can do for their reader is not merely to satisfy the intellect, or supply something polish'd and interesting, nor even to depict great passions, or persons or events, but to fill him with vigorous and clean manliness, religiousness, and give him good heart as a radical possession and habit The educated world seems to have been growing more and more ennuy'd for ages, leaving to our time the inheritance of it all Fortunately there is the original inexhaustible fund of buoyancy, normally resident in the race, forever eligible to be appeal'd to and relied on

As for native American individuality, though certain to come, and on a large scale, the distinctive and ideal type of Western character (as consistent with the operative political and even money-making features of United States' humanity in the Nineteenth Century as chosen knights, gentlemen and warriors were the ideals of the centuries of European feudalism) it has not yet appear'd I have allow'd the stress of my poems from beginning to end to bear upon American individuality and assist it—not only because that is a great lesson in Nature, amid all her generalizing laws, but as counterpoise to the leveling tendencies of Democracy—and for other reasons Defiant of ostensible literary and other conventions, I avowedly chant 'the great pride of man in himself,' and permit it to be more or less a motif of nearly all my verse I think this pride indispensable to an American I think it not inconsistent with obedience, humility, deference, and self-questioning

Democracy has been so retarded and jeopardized by powerful personalities, that its first instincts are fain to clip, conform, bring in stragglers, and reduce everything to a dead level While the ambitious thought of my song is to help the forming of a great aggregate Nation, it is, perhaps, altogether through the forming of myriads of fully develop'd and enclosing individuals Welcome as are equality's and fraternity's doctrines and popular education, a certain liability accompanies them all, as we see That primal and interior something in man, in his soul's abysms, coloring all, and, by exceptional fruitions, giving the last majesty to him—something continually touch'd upon and attain'd by the old poems and ballads of feudalism, and often the principal foundation of them—modern science and democracy appear to be endangering, perhaps eliminating But that forms an appearance only, the reality is quite different The new influences, upon the whole, are surely preparing the way for grander individualities than ever To-day and here personal force is behind everything, just the same The times and depictions from the Iliad to Shakspeare inclusive can happily never again be realized—but the elements of courageous and lofty manhood are unchanged

Without yielding an inch the working-man and working-woman were to be in my pages from first to last The ranges of heroism and loftiness with which Greek and feudal poets endow'd their god-like or lordly born characters—indeed prouder and better based and with fuller ranges than those—I was to endow the democratic averages of America I was to show that we, here and to-day, are eligible to the grandest and the best—more eligible now than any times of old were I will also want my utterances (I said to myself before beginning) to be in spirit the poems of the morning. (They have been founded and mainly written in the sunny forenoon and early midday of my life) I will want them to be the poems of women entirely as much as men I have wish'd to put the complete

Union of the States in my songs without any preference or partiality whatever. Henceforth, if they live and are read, it must be just as much South as North—just as much along the Pacific as Atlantic—in the valley of the Mississippi, in Canada, up in Maine, down in Texas, and on the shores of Puget Sound

From another point of view Leaves of Grass is avowedly the song of Sex and Amateness, and even Animality—though meanings that do not usually go along with those words are behind all, and will duly emerge, and all are sought to be lifted into a different light and atmosphere Of this feature, intentionally palpable in a few lines, I shall only say the espousing principle of those lines so gives breath of life to my whole scheme that the bulk of the pieces might as well have been left unwritten were those lines omitted Difficult as it will be, it has become, in my opinion, imperative to achieve a shifted attitude from superior men and women towards the thought and fact of sexuality, as an element in character, personality, the emotions, and a theme in literature I am not going to argue the question by itself, it does not stand by itself The vitality of it is altogether in its relations, bearings, significance—like the clef of a symphony At last analogy the lines I allude to, and the spirit in which they are spoken, permeate all Leaves of Grass, and the work must stand or fall with them, as the human body and soul must remain as an entirety

Universal as are certain facts and symptoms of communities or individuals all times, there is nothing so rare in modern conventions and poetry as their normal recognizance. Literature is always calling in the doctor for consultation and confession, and always giving evasions and swathing suppressions in place of that 'heroic nudity' <sup>1</sup> on which only a genuine diagnosis of serious cases can be built And in respect to editions of Leaves of Grass in time to come (if there should be such) I take occasion now to confirm those lines with the settled convictions and deliberate renewals of thirty years, and to hereby prohibit, as far as word of mine can do so, any elision of them.

Then still a purpose enclosing all, and over and beneath all Ever since what might be call'd thought, or the budding of thought, fairly began in my youthful mind, I had had a desire to attempt some worthy record of that entire faith and acceptance ('to justify the ways of God to man' is Milton's well-known and ambitious phrase) which is the foundation of moral America I felt it all as positively then in my young days as I do now in my old ones, to formulate a poem whose every thought or fact should directly or indirectly be or connive at an implicit belief in the wisdom, health, mystery, beauty of every process, every concrete object, every human or other existence, not only consider'd from the point of view of all, but of each

While I cannot understand it or argue it out, I fully believe in a clue and purpose in Nature, entire and several, and that invisible spiritual results, just as real and definite as the visible, eventuate all concrete life and all materialism, through Time My book ought to emanate buoyancy and gladness legitimately enough, for it was grown out of those elements, and has been the comfort of my life since it was originally commenced

One main genesis-motive of the Leaves was my conviction (just as strong to-day as ever) that the crowning growth of the United States is to be spiritual and heroic. To help start and favor that growth—or even to call attention to it, or the need of it—is the beginning, middle and final purpose of the poems (In fact, when really cipher'd out and summ'd to the last, plowing up in earnest the interminable average fallows of humanity—not 'good government' merely, in the common sense—is the justification and main purpose of these United States )

Isolated advantages in any rank or grace or fortune—the direct or indirect threads of all the poetry of the past—are in my opinion distasteful to the republican genius, and offer no foundation for its fitting verse Establish'd poems, I know, have the very great advantage of chanting the already perform'd, so full of glories, reminiscences dear to the minds of men But my volume is a candidate for the future 'All original art,' says Taine, anyhow, 'is self-regulated, and no original art can be regulated from without, it carries its own counterpoise, and does not receive it from elsewhere—lives on its own blood'—a solace to my frequent bruises and sulky vanity.

As the present is perhaps mainly an attempt at personal statement or illustration, I will allow myself as further help to extract the following anecdote from a book, Annals of Old Painters, conn'd by me in youth Rubens, the Flemish painter, in one of his wanderings through the galleries of old convents, came across a singular work. After looking at it thoughtfully for a good while, and listening to the criticisms of his suite of students, he said to the latter, in answer to their questions (as to what school the work implied or belong'd,) 'I do not believe the artist, unknown and perhaps no longer living, who has given the world this legacy, ever belong'd to any school, or ever painted anything but this one picture, which is a personal affair—a piece out of a man's life'

Leaves of Grass indeed (I cannot too often reiterate) has mainly been the outcropping of my own emotional and other personal nature—an attempt, from first to last, to put a Person, a human being (myself, in the latter half of the Nineteenth Century, in America,) freely, fully and truly on record I could not find any similar personal record in current literature that satisfied me But it is not on Leaves of Grass distinctively as literature, or a specimen thereof, that I feel to dwell, or advance claims No one will get at my verses who insists upon viewing them as a literary performance, or attempt at such performance, or as aiming mainly toward art or æstheticism

I say no land or people or circumstances ever existed so needing a race of singers and poems differing from all others, and rigidly their own, as the land and people and circumstances of our United States need such singers and poems to-day, and for the future Still further, as long as the States continue to absorb and be dominated by the poetry of the Old World, and remain unsupplied with autochthonous song, to express, vitalize and give color to and define their material and political success, and minister to them distinctively, so long will they stop short of first-class Nationality and remain defective.

In the free evening of my day I give to you, reader, the foregoing garrulous talk, thoughts, reminiscences,

As idly drifting down the ebb, Such ripples, half-caught voices, echo from the shore

Concluding with two items for the imaginative genius of the West, when it worthily rises—First, what Herder taught to the young Goethe, that really great poetry is always (like the Homeric or Biblical canticles) the result of a national spirit, and not the privilege of a polish'd and select few, Second, that the strongest and sweetest songs yet remain to be sung

FROM SPECIMEN DAYS

A Happy Hour's Command

Down in the Woods, July 2d, 1882—If I do it at all I must delay no longer Incongruous and full of skips and jumps as is that huddle of diary-jottings, war-memoranda of 1862-'65, Nature-notes of 1877-'81, with Western and Canadian observations afterwards, all bundled up and tied by a big string, the resolution and indeed mandate comes to me this day, this hour,—(and what a day! what an hour just passing! the luxury of riant grass and blowing breeze, with all the shows of sun and sky and perfect temperature, never before so filling me, body and soul),—to go home, unne the bundle, reel out diary-scraps and memoranda, just as they are, large or small, one after another, into print-pages,<sup>2</sup> and

1 These impressionistic jottings are selections from the first section of Whitman's Specimen Days and Collect (Philadelphia, 1882-83). The title has been given by the editors

2 ' Following, I give some gloomy experiences. The war of attempted secession has, of course, been the distinguishing event of my time. I commenced at the close of 1862 and continued steadily through '63, '64 and '65, to visit the sick and wounded of the army, both on the field and in the hospitals in and around Washington city. From the first I kept little note books for impromptu jottings in pencil to refresh my memory of names and circumstances, and what was especially wanted &c. In these, I brief'd cases, persons, sights, let the melange's lackings and wants of connection take care of themselves. It will illustrate one phase of humanity anyhow, how few of life's days and hours (and they not by relative value or proportion, but by chance) are ever noted. Probably another point, too, how we give long preparations for some object, planning and delving and fashioning, and then, when the actual hour for doing arrives, find ourselves still quite unprepared, and tumble the thing together, letting hurry and crudeness tell the story better than fine work. At any rate I obey my happy hour's command, which seems curiously imperative. May-be, if I don't do anything else, I shall send out the most wayward, spontaneous, fragmentary book ever printed

20 A Night Battle, Over a Week Since

May 12—There was part of the late battle at Chancellorsville, (second Fredericksburgh,) a little over a week ago, Saturday, Saturday night and Sunday, under Gen. Joe Hooker, I would like to give just a glimpse of—(a moment's look in a terrible storm at sea—of which a few suggestions are enough, and full details impossible.) The fighting had been very hot during the day, and after an intermission the latter part, was resumed at night, and kept up with furious energy till 3 o'clock in the morning. That afternoon (Saturday) an attack sudden and strong by Stonewall Jackson had gain'd a great advantage to the southern army, and broken our lines, enter-occurrences in camp, by the bed side and not seldom by the corpses of the dead. Some were scratch'd down from narratives I heard and itemized while watching, or waiting, or tending somebody amid those scenes.

I leave them just as I threw them by after the war, blotch'd here and there with more than one blood-stain, hurriedly written, sometimes at the clinique, not seldom amid the excitement of uncertainty, or defeat, or of action, or getting ready for it, or a march.

Very different are most of the memoranda that follow. Some time after the war ended I had a paralytic stroke, which prostrated me for several years. In 1876 I began to get over the worst of it. From this date, portions of several seasons, especially summers, I spent at a secluded haunt down in Camden county, New Jersey—Timber creek, quite a little river (it enters from the great Delaware, twelve miles away)—with primitive solitudes, winding stream, recluse and woody banks, sweet-feeding springs, and all the charms that birds, grass, wild flowers, rabbits and squirrels, old oaks, walnut trees, &c., can bring. Author's note, Specimen Days and Collect, Complete Prose Works (Boston, 1898), 1-2

ing us like a wedge, and leaving things in that position at dark But Hooker at 11 at night made a desperate push, drove the secesh forces back, restored his original lines, and resumed his plans This night scrimmage was very exciting, and afforded countless strange and fearful pictures The fighting had been general both at Chancellorsville and northeast at Fredericksburgh (We hear of some poor fighting, episodes, skedaddling on our part I think not of it I think of the fierce bravery, the general rule) One corps, the 6th, Sedgewick's, fights four dashing and bloody battles in thirty-six hours, retreating in great jeopardy, losing largely but maintaining itself, fighting with the sternest desperation under all circumstances, getting over the Rappahannock only by the skin of its teeth, yet getting over It lost many, many brave men, yet it took vengeance, ample vengeance

But it was the tug of Saturday evening, and through the night and Sunday morning, I wanted to make a special note of It was largely in the woods, and quite a general engagement The night was very pleasant, at times the moon shining out full and clear, all Nature so calm in itself, the early summer grass so rich, and foliage of the trees—yet there the battle raging, and many good fellows lying helpless, with new accessions to them, and every minute amid the rattle of muskets and crash of cannon, (for there was an artillery contest too,) the red life-blood oozing out from heads or trunks or limbs upon that green and dew-cool grass Patches of the woods take fire, and several of the wounded, unable to move, are consumed—quite large spaces are swept over, burning the dead also—some of the men have their hair and beards singed—some, burns on their faces and hands—others holes burnt in their clothing The flashes of fire from the cannon, the quick flaring flames and smoke, and the immense roar—the musketry so general, the light nearly bright enough for each side to see the other—the crashing, tramping of men—the yelling—close quarters—we hear the secesh yells—our men cheer loudly back, especially if Hooker is in sight—hand to hand conflicts, each side stands up to it, brave, determin'd as demons, they often charge upon us—a thousand deeds are done worth to write newer greater poems on—and still the woods on fire—still many are not only scorch'd—too many, unable to move, are burn'd to death

Then the camps of the wounded—O heavens, what scene is this?—is this indeed humanity—these butchers' shambles? There are several of them There they lie, in the largest, in an open space in the woods, from 200 to 300 poor fellows—the groans and screams—the odor of blood, mixed with the fresh scent of the night, the grass, the trees—that slaughter-house! O well is it their mothers, their sisters cannot see them—cannot conceive, and never conceiv'd, these things One man is shot by a shell, both in the arm and leg—both are amputated—there lie the rejected members Some have their legs blown off—some bullets through the breast—some indescribably horrid wounds in the face or head, all mutilated, sickening, torn, gouged out—some in the abdomen—some mere boys—many rebels, badly hurt—they take their regular turns with the rest, just the same as any—the surgeons use them just the same Such is the camp of the wounded—such a fragment, a reflection afar off of the bloody scene—while all over the clear, large moon comes out at times softly, quietly shining Amid the woods, that scene of fitting souls—amid the crack and crash and yelling sounds—the impalpable perfume of the woods—and yet the pungent, stifling smoke—the radiance of the moon, looking from heaven at intervals so placid—the sky so heavenly—the clear—obscure up there, those buoyant upper oceans—a few large placid stars beyond, coming silently and languidly out, and then disappearing—the melancholy, draped night above, around And there, upon the roads, the fields, and in those woods, that contest, never one more desperate in any age or land—both parties now in force—masses—no fancy battle, no semi-play, but fierce and savage demons fighting there—courage and scorn of death the rule, exceptions almost none

What history, I say, can ever give—for who can know—the mad, determin'd tussle of the armies, in all their separate large and little squads—as this—each steep'd from crown to toe in desperate, mortal purports? Who know the conflict, hand-to-hand—the many conflicts in the dark, those shadowy-tangled, flashing moonbeam'd woods—the writhing groups and squads—the cries, the din, the cracking guns and pistols—the distant cannon—the cheers and calls and threats and awful music of the oaths—the indescribable mix—the officers' orders, persuasions, encouragements—the devils fully rous'd in human hearts—the strong shout, Charge, men, charge—the flash of the naked sword, and rolling flame and smoke? And still the broken, clear and clouded heaven—and still again the moonlight pouring silvery soft its radiant patches over all Who paint the scene, the sudden partial panic of the afternoon, at dusk? Who paint the irrepressible advance of the second division of the Third corps, under Hooker himself, suddenly order'd up—those rapid-filing phantoms through the woods? Who show what moves there in the shadows, fluid and firm—to save, (and it did save,) the army's name, perhaps the nation? as there the veterans hold the field (Brave Berry falls not yet—but death has mark'd him—soon he falls )

Unnamed Remains the Bravest Soldier.

Of scenes like these, I say, who writes—whoe'er can write the story? Of many a score—aye, thousands, north and south, of unwrit heroes, unknown heroisms, incredible, impromptu, first-class desperations—who tells? No history ever—no poem sings, no music sounds, those bravest men of all—those deeds No formal general's report, nor book in the library, nor column in the paper, embalms the bravest, north or south, east or west Unnamed, unknown, remain, and still remain, the bravest soldiers Our manliest—our boys—our hardy darlings, no picture gives them Likely, the typic one of them (standing, no doubt, for hundreds, thousands,) crawls aside to some bush-clump, or ferny tuft, on receiving his death-shot—there sheltering a little while, soaking roots, grass and soil, with red blood—the battle advances, retreats, flits from the scene, sweeps by—and there, haply with pain and suffering (yet less, far less, than is supposed,) the last lethargy winds like a serpent round him—the eyes glaze in death—none recks—perhaps the burial-squads, in truce, a week afterwards, search not the secluded spot—and there, at last, the Bravest Soldier crumbles in mother earth, unburied and unknown.

Some Specimen Cases

June 18th—In one of the hospitals I find Thomas Haley, company M, 4th New York cavalry—a regular Irish boy, a fine specimen of youthful physical manliness—shot through the lungs—inevitably dying—came over to this country from Ireland to enlist—has not a single friend or acquaintance here—is sleeping soundly at this moment, (but it is the sleep of death)—has a bullet-hole straight through the lung I saw Tom when first brought here, three days since, and didn't suppose he could live twelve hours—(yet he looks well enough in the face to a casual observer) He lies there with his frame exposed above the waist, all naked, for coolness, a fine built man, the tan not yet bleach'd from his cheeks and neck It is useless to talk to him, as with his sad hurt, and the stimulants they give him, and the utter strangeness of every object, face, furniture, &c , the poor fellow, even when awake, is like some frighten'd, shy animal Much of the time he sleeps, or half sleeps (Sometimes I thought he knew more than he show'd ) I often come and sit by him in perfect silence, he will breathe for ten minutes as softly and evenly as a young babe asleep Poor youth, so handsome, athletic, with profuse beautiful shining hair One time as I sat looking at him while he lay asleep, he suddenly, without the least start, awaken'd, open'd his eyes, gave me a long steady look, turning his face very slightly to gaze easier—one long, clear, silent look—a slight sigh—then turn'd back and went into his doze again Little he knew, poor death-stricken boy, the heart of the stranger that hover'd near

W H E , Co F , 2nd N Y—His disease is pneumonia He lay sick at the wretched hospital below Aqua creek, for seven or eight days before brought here He was detail'd from his regiment to go there and help as nurse, but was soon taken down himself. Is an elderly, sallow-faced, rather gaunt, gray-hair'd man, a widower, with children He express'd a great desire for good, strong green tea An excellent lady, Mrs W , of Washington, soon sent him a package, also a small sum of money The doctor said give him the tea at pleasure, it lay on the table by his side, and he used it every day. He slept a great deal, could not talk much, as he grew deaf. Occupied bed 15, ward I, Armory (The same lady above, Mrs W, sent the men a large package of tobacco.)

J G lies in bed 52, ward I, is of company B, 7th Pennsylvania. I gave him a small sum of money, some tobacco, and envelopes. To a man adjoining also gave twenty-five cents, he flush'd in the face when I offer'd it—refused at first, but as I found he had not a cent, and was very fond of having the daily papers to read, I prest it on him. He was evidently very grateful, but said little.

J T L, of company F, 9th New Hampshire, lies in bed 37, ward I. Is very fond of tobacco. I furnish him some, also with a little money. Has gangrene of the feet, a pretty bad case, will surely have to lose three toes. Is a regular specimen of an old-fashion'd, rude, hearty, New England countryman, impressing me with his likeness to that celebrated singed cat, who was better than she look'd.

Bed 3, ward E, Armory, has a great hankering for pickles, something pungent. After consulting the doctor, I gave him a small bottle of horse-radish, also some apples, also a book. Some of the nurses are excellent. The woman-nurse in this ward I like very much (Mrs Wright—a year afterwards I found her in Mansion house hospital, Alexandria—she is a perfect nurse.)

In one bed a young man, Marcus Small, company K, 7th Maine—sick with dysentery and typhoid fever—pretty critical case—I talk with him often—he thinks he will die—looks like it indeed. I write a letter for him home to East Livermore, Maine—I let him talk to me a little, but not much, advise him to keep very quiet—do most of the talking myself—stay quite a while with him, as he holds on to my hand—talk to him in a cheering, but slow, low and measured manner—talk about his furlough, and going home as soon as he is able to travel.

Thomas Lindly, 1st Pennsylvania cavalry, shot very badly through the foot—poor young man, he suffers horribly, has to be constantly dosed with morphine, his face ashy and glazed, bright young eyes—I give him a large handsome apple, lay it in sight, tell him to have it roasted in the morning, as he generally feels easier then, and can eat a little breakfast. I write two letters for him.

Opposite, an old Quaker lady sits by the side of her son, Amer Moore, 2d U S artillery—shot in the head two weeks since, very low, quite rational—from hips down paralyzed—he will surely die. I speak a very few words to him every day and evening—he answers pleasantly—wants nothing—he told me soon after he came about his home affairs, his mother had been an invalid, and he fear'd to let her know his condition.) He died soon after she came.

Death of President Lincoln.

April 16, '65—I find in my notes of the time, this passage on the death of Abraham Lincoln. He leaves for America's history and biography, so far, not only its most dramatic reminiscence—he leaves, in my opinion, the greatest, best, most characteristic, artistic, moral personality. Not but that he had faults, and show'd them in the Presidency, but honesty, goodness, shrewdness, conscience, and (a new virtue, unknown to other lands, and hardly yet really known here, but the foundation and tie of all, as the future will grandly develop,) UNIONISM, in its truest and amplest sense, form'd the hard-pan of his character. These he seal'd with his life. The tragic splendor of his death, purging, illuminating all, throws round his form, his head, an aureole that will remain and will grow brighter through time, while history lives, and love of country lasts. By many has this Union been help'd, but if one name, one man, must be pick'd out, he, most of all, is the conservator of it, to the future. He was assassinated—but the Union is not assassinated—ça ira! One falls and another falls. The soldier drops, sinks like a wave—but the ranks of the ocean eternally press on. Death does its work, obliterates a hundred, a thousand—President, general, captain, private,—but the Nation is immortal.

Three Years Summ'd Up

During those three years in hospital, camp or field, I made over six hundred visits or tours, and went, as I estimate, counting all, among from eighty thousand to a hundred thousand of the wounded and sick, as sustainer of spirit and body in some degree, in time of need. These visits varied from an hour or two, to all day or night, for with dear or critical cases I generally watch'd all night. Sometimes I took up my quarters in the hospital, and slept or watch'd there several nights in succession. Those three years I consider the greatest privilege and satisfaction, (with all their feverish excitements and physical deprivations and lamentable sights), and, of course, the most profound lesson of my life. I can say that in my ministrings I comprehended all, whoever came in my way, northern or southern, and slighted none. It arous'd and brought out and decided undream'd-of depths of emotion. It has given me my most fervent views of the true ensemble and extent of the States. While I was with wounded and sick in thousands of cases from the New England States, and from New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and from Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and all the Western States, I was with more or less from all the States, North and South, without exception. I was with many from the border States, especially from Maryland and Virginia, and found, during those lurid years 1862-63, far more Union southerners, especially Tennesseans, than is supposed. I was with many rebel officers and men among our wounded and gave them always what I had, and tried to cheer them the same as any. I was among the army teamsters considerably, and, indeed, always found myself drawn to them. Among the black soldiers, wounded or sick, and in the contraband camps, I also took my way whenever in their neighborhood, and did what I could for them.

The Million Dead, Too, Summ'd Up

The dead in this war—there they lie, strewing the fields and woods and valleys and battlefields of the south—Virginia, the Peninsula—Malvern hill and Fair Oaks—the banks of the Chickahominy—the terraces of Fredericksburgh—Antietam bridge—the grisly ravines of Manassas—the bloody promenade of the Wilderness—the varieties of the strayed dead, (the estimate of the War department is 25,000 national soldiers kill'd in battle and never buried at all, 5,000 drown'd—15,000 inhumed by strangers, or on the march in haste, in hitherto unfound localities—2,000 graves cover'd by sand and mud by Mississippi freshets, 3,000 carried away by caving-in of banks, &c.)—Gettysburgh, the West, Southwest—Vicksburgh—Chattanooga—the trenches of Petersburg—the numberless battles, camps, hospitals everywhere—the crop reap'd by the mighty reapers, typhoid, dysentery, inflammations—and blackest and loathesomest of all, the dead and living burial-pits, the prison-pens of Andersonville, Salisbury, Belle-Isle, &c., (not Dante's pictured hell and all its woes, its degradations, filthy torments, excell'd those prisons)—the dead, the dead, the dead—our dead—or South or North, ours all, (all, all, all, finally dear to me)—or East or West—Atlantic coast or Mississippi valley—somewhere they crawl'd to die, alone, in bushes, low gullies, or on the sides of hills—(there, in secluded spots, their skeletons, bleach'd bones, tufts of hair, buttons, fragments of clothing, are occasionally found yet)—our young men once so handsome and so joyous, taken from us—the son from the mother, the husband from the wife, the dear friend from the dear friend—the clusters of camp graves, in Georgia, the Carolinas, and in Tennessee—the single graves left in the woods or by the roadside, (hundreds, thousands, obliterated)—the corpses floated down the rivers, and caught and lodged, (dozens, scores, floated down the upper Potomac, after the cavalry engagements, the pursuit of Lee, following Gettysburgh)—some lie at the bottom of the sea—the general million, and the special cemeteries in almost all the States—the infinite dead—(the land entire saturated, perfumed with their impalpable ashes' exhalation in Nature's chemistry distill'd, and shall be so forever, in every future grain of wheat and ear of corn, and every flower that grows, and every breath we draw)—not only Northern dead leavening Southern soil—thousands, aye tens of thousands, of Southerners, crumble to-day in Northern earth.

And everywhere among these countless graves—everywhere in the many soldier

Cemeteries of the Nation, (there are now, I believe, over seventy of them)—as at the time in the vast trenches, the depositories of slain, Northern and Southern, after the great battles—not only where the scathing trail passed those years, but radiating since in all the peaceful quarters of the land—we see, and ages yet may see, on monuments and gravestones, singly or in masses, to thousands or tens of thousands, the significant word UNKNOWN

(In some of the cemeteries nearly all the dead are unknown At Salisbury, N C, for instance, the known are only 85, while the unknown are 12,027, and 11,700 of these are buried in trenches A national monument has been put up here, by order of Congress, to mark the spot—but what visible, material monument can ever fittingly commemorate that spot?)

The Real War Will Never Get in the Books

And so good-bye to the war I know not how it may have been, or may be, to others—to me the main interest I found, (and still, on recollection, find,) in the rank and file of the armies, both sides, and in those specimens amid the hospitals, and even the dead on the field To me the points illustrating the latent personal character and eligibilities of these States, in the two or three millions of American young and middle-aged men, North and South, embodied in those armies—and especially the one-third or one-fourth of their number, stricken by wounds or disease at some time in the course of the contest—were of more significance even than the political interests involved (As so much of a race depends on how it faces death, and how it stands personal anguish and sickness As, in the glints of emotions under emergencies, and the indirect traits and asides in Plutarch, we get far profounder clues to the antique world than all its more formal history)

Future years will never know the seething hell and the black infernal background of countless minor scenes and interiors, (not the official surface-courteousness of the Generals, not the few great battles) of the Secession war, and it is best they should not—the real war will never get in the books In the mushy influences of current times, too, the fervid atmosphere and typical events of those years are in danger of being totally forgotten I have at night watch'd by the side of a sick man in the hospital, one who could not live many hours I have seen his eyes flash and burn as he raised himself and recurr'd to the cruelties on his surrender'd brother, and mutilations of the corpse afterward (See in the preceding pages, the incident at Upperville—the seventeen kill'd as in the description, were left there on the ground. After they dropt dead, no one touch'd them—all were made sure of, however The carcasses were left for the citizens to bury or not, as they chose)

Such was the war It was not a quadrille in a ball-room Its interior history will not only never be written—its practicalty, minutæ of deeds and passions, will never be even suggested The actual soldier of 1862-'65, North and South, with all his ways, his incredible dauntlessness, habits, practices, tastes, language, his fierce friendship, his appetite, rankness, his superb strength and animality, lawless gait, and a hundred unnamed lights and shades of camp, I say, will never be written—perhaps must not and should not be

The preceding notes may furnish a few stray glimpses into that life, and into those lurid interiors, never to be fully convey'd to the future The hospital part of the drama from '61 to '65, deserves indeed to be recorded Of that many-threaded drama, with its sudden and strange surprises, its confounding of prophecies, its moments of despair, the dread of foreign interference, the interminable campaigns, the bloody battles, the mighty and cumbrous and green armies, the drafts and bounties—the immense money expenditure, like a heavy-pouring constant rain—with, over the whole land, the last three years of the struggle, an unending, universal mourning-wail of women, parents, orphans—the marrow of the tragedy concentrated in those Army Hospitals—(it seem'd sometimes as if the whole interest of the land, North and South, was one vast central hospital, and all the rest of the affair but flanges)—those forming the untold and unwritten history of the war—ininitely greater (like life's) than the few scraps and distortions that are ever told or written Think how much, and of importance, will be—how much, civic and military, has already been—buried in the grave, in eternal darkness

An Interregnum Paragraph

Several years now elapse before I resume my diary. I continued at Washington working in the Attorney-General's department through '66 and '67, and some time afterward. In February '73 I was stricken down by paralysis, gave up my desk, and migrated to Camden, New Jersey, where I lived during '74 and '75, quite unwell—but after that began to grow better, commenc'd going for weeks at a time, even for months, down in the country, to a charmingly reclusive and rural spot along Timber creek, twelve or thirteen miles from where it enters the Delaware river. Domicil'd at the farm-house of my friends, the Staffords, near by, I lived half the time along this creek and its adjacent fields and lanes. And it is to my life here that I, perhaps, owe partial recovery (a sort of second wind, or semi-renewal of the lease of life) from the prostration of 1874-'75. If the notes of that outdoor life could only prove as glowing to you, reader dear, as the experience itself was to me. Doubtless in the course of the following, the fact of invalidism will crop out, (I call myself a half-Paralytic these days, and reverently bless the Lord it is no worse,) between some of the lines—but I get my share of fun and healthy hours, and shall try to indicate them. (The trick is, I find, to tone your wants and tastes low down enough, and make much of negatives, and of mere daylight and the skies.)

New Themes Entered Upon

1876, '77 —I find the woods in mid-May and early June my best places for composition.<sup>1</sup> Seated on logs or stumps there, or resting on rails, nearly all the following memoranda have been jotted down. Wherever I go, indeed, winter or summer, <sup>1</sup> 'Without apology for the abrupt change of field and atmosphere, —temporary episodes, thank heaven! —I restore my book to the bracing and buoyant equilibrium of concrete outdoor Nature, the only permanent reliance for sanity of book or human life.

'Who knows, (I have it in my fancy, my ambition,) but the pages now ensuing may carry ray of sun, or smell of grass or corn, or call of bird, or gleam of stars by night, or snow-flakes falling fresh and mystic, to deruzen of heated city house, or tired workman or workwoman?—or may be in sick-room or prison—to serve as cooling breeze, or Nature's aroma, to some fever'd mouth or latent pulse.' Author's note, ibid, 75-76 city or country, alone at home or traveling, I must take notes—(the ruling passion strong in age and disablement, and even the approach of—but I must not say it yet.) Then underneath the following excerpts—crossing the r's and dotting the i's of certain moderate movements of late years—I am fain to fancy the foundations of quite a lesson learn'd. After you have exhausted what there is in business, politics, conviviality, love, and so on—have found that none of these finally satisfy, or permanently wear—what remains? Nature remains, to bring out from their torpid recesses, the affinities of a man or woman with the open air, the trees, fields, the changes of seasons—the sun by day and the stars of heaven by night. We will begin from these convictions. Literature flies so high and is so hotly spiced, that our notes may seem hardly more than breaths of common air, or draughts of water to drink. But that is part of our lesson.

Dear, soothing, healthy, restoration-hours—after three confining years of paralysis—after the long strain of the war, and its wounds and death

Summer Sights and Indolences

June 10th —As I write, 5½ P M, here by the creek, nothing can exceed the quiet splendor and freshness around me. We had a heavy shower, with brief thunder and lightning, in the middle of the day, and since, overhead, one of those not uncommon yet indescribable skies (in quality, not details or forms) of limpid blue, with rolling silver-fringed clouds, and a pure-dazzling sun. For underlay, trees in fulness of tender foliage—liquid, reedy, long-drawn notes of birds—based by the fretful mew-ing of a querulous cat-bird, and the pleasant chippering-shriek of two kingfishers. I have been watching the latter the last half hour, on their regular evening frolic over and in the stream, evidently a spree of the liveliest kind. They pursue each other, whirling and wheeling around, with many a jocund downward dip, splashing the spray in jets of diamonds—and then off they swoop, with slanting wings and graceful flight, sometimes so near me I can plainly see their dark-gray feather-bodies and milk-white necks.

A July Afternoon by the Pond

The fervent heat, but so much more endurable in this pure air—the white and pink pond-blossoms, with great heart-shaped leaves, the glassy waters of the creek, the banks, with dense bushery, and the picturesque beeches and shade and turf, the tremulous, reedy call of some bird from recesses, breaking the warm, indolent, half-voluptuous silence, an occasional wasp, 10 hornet, honey-bee or bumble (they hover near my hands or face, yet annoy me not, nor I them, as they appear to examine, find nothing, and away they go)—the vast space of the sky overhead so clear, and the buzzard up there sailing his slow whirl in majestic spirals and discs, just over the surface of the pond, two large slate-color'd dragon-flies, with wings of lace, circling and darting and occasionally balancing themselves quite still, their wings quivering all the time, (are they not showing off for my amusement?)—the pond itself, with the sword-shaped calamus, the water snakes—occasionally a flitting blackbird, with red dabs on his shoulders, as he darts slantingly by—the sounds that bring out the solitude, warmth, light and shade—the quawk of some pond duck—the crickets and grasshoppers are mute in the noon heat, but I hear the song of the first cicadas,)—then at some distance the rattle and whirr of a reaping machine as the horses draw it on a rapid walk through a rye field on the opposite side of the creek—(what was the yellow or light-brown bird, large as a young hen, with short neck and long-stretch'd legs I just saw, in flapping and awkward flight over there through the trees?)—the prevailing delicate, yet pal- 20 pable, spicy, grassy, clovery perfume to my nostrils, and over all, encircling all, to my sight and soul, the free space of the sky, transparent and blue—and hovering there in the west, a mass of white-gray fleecy clouds the sailors call 'shoals of mackerel'—the sky, with silver swirls like locks of toss'd hair, spreading, expanding—a vast voiceless, formless simulacrum—yet maybe the most real reality and formulator of 30 everything—who knows?

Autumn Side-Bits.

Sept 20—Under an old black oak, glossy and green, exhaling aroma—amid a grove the Albic druids might have chosen—envelop'd in the warmth and light of the noonday sun, and swarms of flitting insects—with the harsh cawing of many crows a hundred rods away—here I sit in solitude, absorbing, enjoying all The corn, stack'd in its cone-shaped stacks, russet-color'd and sere—a large field spotted thick with scarlet-gold pumpkins—an adjoining one of cabbages, showing well in their green and pearl, mottled by much light and shade—melon patches, with their bulging ovals, and great silver-streak'd, ruffled, broad-edged leaves—and many an autumn sight and sound beside—the distant scream of a flock of guinea-hens—and pour'd over all the September breeze, with pensive cadence through the tree tops

Another Day—The ground in all directions strew'd with débris from a storm Timber creek, as I slowly pace its banks, has ebb'd low, and shows reaction from the turbulent swell of the late equinoctial As I look around, I take account of stock— 20 weeds and shrubs, knolls, paths, occasional stumps, some with smooth'd tops, (several I use as seats of rest, from place to place, and from one I am now jotting these lines,)—frequent wild-flowers, little white, star-shaped things, or the cardinal red of the lobelia, or the cherry-ball seeds of the perennial rose, or the many-threaded vines winding up and around trunks of trees

Oct 1, 2 and 3—Down every day in the solitude of the creek A serene autumn sun and westerly breeze to-day (3d) as I sit here, the water surface prettily moving in wind-ripples before me On a stout old beech at the edge, decayed and slanting, almost 40 fallen to the stream, yet with life and leaves in its mossy limbs, a gray squirrel, exploring, runs up and down, flirts his tail, leaps to the ground, sits on his haunches upright as he sees me, (a Darwinian hint?) and then races up the tree again

Oct 4—Cloudy and coolish, signs of incipient winter Yet pleasant here, the leaves thick-falling, the ground brown with them already, rich coloring, yellows of all hues, pale and dark-green, shades from lightest to richest red—all set in and toned down by the prevailing brown of the earth and gray of the sky So, winter is coming, and I yet in my sickness I sit here amid all these fair sights and vital influences, and abandon myself to that thought, with its wandering trains of speculation

The Sky—Days and Nights—Happiness

Oct 20 —A clear, crispy day—dry and breezy air, full of oxygen Out of the sane, silent, beauteous miracles that envelope and fuse me—trees, water, grass, sunlight, and early frost—the one I am looking at most to-day is the sky It has that delicate, transparent blue, peculiar to autumn, and the only clouds are little or larger white ones, giving their still and spiritual motion to the great concave All through the earlier day (say from 7 to 11) it keeps a pure, yet vivid blue But as noon approaches the color gets lighter, quite gray for two or three hours—then still paler for a spell, till sun-down—which last I watch dazzling through the interstices of a knoll of big trees—darts of fire and a gorgeous show of light-yellow, liver-color and red, with a vast silver glaze askant on the water—the transparent shadows, shafts, sparkle, and vivid colors beyond all the paintings ever made

I don't know what or how, but it seems to me mostly owing to these skies, (every now and then I think, while I have of course seen them every day of my life, I never really saw the skies before,) I have had this autumn some wondrously contented hours—may I not say perfectly happy ones? As I've read, Byron just before his death told a friend that he had known but three happy hours during his whole existence Then there is the old German legend of the king's bell, to the same point While I was out there by the wood, that beautiful sunset through the trees, I thought of Byron's and the bell story, and the notion started in me that I was having a happy hour (Though perhaps my best moments I never jot down, when they come I cannot afford to break the charm by inditing memoranda I just abandon myself to the mood, and let it float on, carrying me in its placid ecstasy)

What is happiness, anyhow? Is this one of its hours, or the like of it?—so impalpable—a mere breath, an evanescent tinge? I am not sure—so let me give myself the benefit of the doubt Hast Thou, pellucid, in Thy azure depths, medicine for case like mine? (Ah, the physical shatter and troubled spirit of me the last three years )

And dost Thou subtly mystically now drip it through the air invisibly upon me?

Night of Oct 28 —The heavens unusually transparent—the stars out by myriads—the great path of the Milky Way, with its branch, only seen of very clear nights—Jupiter, setting in the west, looks like a huge hap-hazard splash, and has a little star for companion

Clothed in his white garments,
Into the round and clear arena slowly entered the brahmin,
Holding a little child by the hand,
Like the moon with the planet Jupiter in a cloudless night-sky

Old Hindu Poem

Early in November —At its farther end the lane already described opens into a broad grassy upland field of over twenty acres, slightly sloping to the south Here I am accustom'd to walk for sky views and effects, either morning or sundown To-day from this field my soul is calm'd and expanded beyond description, the whole forenoon by the clear blue arching over all, cloudless, nothing particular, only sky and daylight Their soothing accompaniments, autumn leaves, the cool dry air, the faint aroma—crows cawing in the distance—two great buzzards wheeling gracefully and slowly far up there—the occasional murmur of the wind, sometimes quite gently, then threatening through the trees—a gang of farm-laborers loading corn-stalks in a field in sight, and the patient horses waiting

Colors—A Contrast

Such a play of colors and lights, different seasons, different hours of the day—the lines of the far horizon where the faint-tinged edge of the landscape loses itself in the sky As I slowly hobble up the lane toward day-close, an incomparable sunset shooting in molten sapphire and gold, shaft after shaft, through the ranks of the long-leaved corn, between me and the west

Another day —The rich dark green of the tulip-trees and the oaks, the gray of the swamp-willows, the dull hues of the sycamores and black-walnuts, the emerald of the cedars (after rain,) and the light yellow of the beeches

Sea-Shore Fancies

Even as a boy, I had the fancy, the wish, to write a piece, perhaps a poem, about the sea-shore—that suggesting, dividing line, contact, junction, the solid marrying the liquid—that curious, lurking something, (as doubtless every objective form finally becomes to the subjective spirit,) which means far more than its mere first sight, grand as that is—blending the real and ideal, and each made portion of the other Hours, days, in my Long Island youth and early manhood, I haunted the shores of Rockaway or Coney island, or away east to the Hamptons or Montauk Once, at the latter place, (by the old lighthouse, nothing but sea-tossings in sight in every direction as far as the eye could reach.) I remember well, I felt that I must one day write a book expressing this liquid, mystic theme Afterward, I recollect, how it came to me that instead of any special lyrical or epical or literary attempt, the sea-shore should be an invisible influence, a pervading gauge and tally for me, in my composition (Let me give a hint here to young writers I am not sure but I have unwittingly follow'd out the same rule with other powers besides sea and shores—avoiding them, in the way of any dead set at poetizing them, as too big for formal handling—quite satisfied if I could indirectly show that we have met and fused, even if only once, but enough—that we have really absorb'd each other and understand each other)

There is a dream, a picture, that for years at intervals, (sometimes quite long ones, but surely again, in time,) has come noiselessly up before me, and I really believe, fiction as it is, has enter'd largely into my practical life—certainly into my writings, and shaped and color'd them It is nothing more or less than a stretch of interminable white-brown sand, hard and smooth and broad, with the ocean perpetually, grandly, rolling in upon it, with slow-measured sweep, with rustle and hiss and foam, and many a thump as of low bass drums This scene, this picture, I say, has risen before me at times for years Sometimes I wake at night and can hear and see it plainly

An Hour on Kenosha Summit

Jottings from the Rocky Mountains, mostly pencill'd during a day's trip over the South Park R R, returning from Leadville, and especially the hour we were detain'd, (much to my satisfaction,) at Kenosha summit As afternoon advances, novelties, far-reaching splendors, accumulate under the bright sun in this pure air But I had better commence with the day

The confronting of Platte cañon just at dawn, after a ten miles' ride in early darkness on the rail from Denver—the seasonable stoppage at the entrance of the cañon, and good breakfast of eggs, trout, and nice griddle-cakes—then as we travel on, and get well in the gorge, all the wonders, beauty, savage power of the scene—the wild stream of water, from sources of snows, brawling continually in sight one side—the dazzling sun, and the morning lights on the rocks—such turns and grades in the track, squirring around corners, or up and down hills—far glimpses of a hundred peaks, titanic necklaces, stretching north and south—the huge rightly-named Dome-rock—and as we dash along, others similar, simple, monolithic, elephantine

An Egotistical 'Find'

'I have found the law of my own poems,' was the unspoken but more-and-more decided feeling that came to me as I pass'd, hour after hour, amid all this grim yet joyous elemental abandon—this plenitude of material, entire absence of art, untram-mel'd play of primitive Nature—the chasm, the gorge, the crystal mountain stream, repeated scres, hundreds of miles—the broad handling and absolute uncrampedness—the fantastic forms, bathed in transparent browns, faint reds and grays, towering sometimes a thousand, sometimes two or three thousand feet high—at their tops now and then huge masses pois'd, and mixing with the clouds, with only their outlines, hazed in misty lilac, visible ('In Nature's grandest shows,' says an old Dutch writer, an ecclesiastic, 'amid the ocean's depth, if so might be, or countless worlds rolling above at night, a man thinks of them, weighs all, not for themselves or the abstract, but with reference to his own personality, and how they may affect him or color his destinies')

New Senses · New Joys

We follow the stream of amber and bronze brawling along its bed, with its frequent cascades and snow-white foam Through the cañon we fly—mountains not only each side, but seemingly, till we get near, right in front of us—every rood a new view flashing, and each flash defying description—on the almost perpendicular sides, clinging pines, cedars, spruces, crimson sumach bushes, spots of wild grass—10 but dominating all, those towering rocks, rocks, rocks, bathed in delicate var-colors, with the clear sky of autumn overhead. New senses, new joys, seem develop'd Talk as you like, a typical Rocky Mountain cañon, or a limitless sea-like stretch of the great Kansas or Colorado plains, under favoring circumstances, tallies, perhaps expresses, certainly awakes, those grandest and subtlest element-emotions in the human soul, that all the marble temples and sculptures from Phidias to Thorwaldsen—all paintings, poems, reminiscences, or even music, probably never can

After Trying a Certain Book

I tried to read a beautifully printed and scholarly volume on 'the Theory of Poetry,' received by mail this morning from Eng-30 land—but gave it up at last for a bad job Here are some capricious pencillings that follow'd, as I find them in my notes

In youth and maturity Poems are charged with sunshine and varied pomp of day, but as the soul more and more takes precedence, (the sensuous still included,) the Dusk becomes the poet's atmosphere. I too have sought, and ever seek, the brilliant sun, and make my songs according. But as 40 I grow old, the half-lights of evening are far more to me

The play of Imagination, with the sensuous objects of Nature for symbols and Faith—with Love and Pride as the unseen impetus and moving-power of all, make up the curious chess-game of a poem

Common teachers or critics are always asking 'What does it mean?' Symphony of fine musician, or sunset, or sea-waves rolling up the beach—what do they mean? Undoubtedly in the most subtle-elusive sense they mean something—as love does, and religion does, and the best poem,—but who shall fathom and define those meanings? (I do not intend this as a warrant for wildness and frantic escapades—but to justify the soul's frequent joy in what cannot be defined to the intellectual part, or to calculation)

At its best, poetic lore is like what may be heard of conversation in the dusk, from speakers far or hid, of which we get only a few broken murmurs. What is not gather'd 10 is far more—perhaps the main thing

Grandest poetic passages are only to be taken at free removes, as we sometimes look for stars at night, not by gazing directly toward them, but off one side

(To a poetic student and friend)—I only seek to put you in rapport. Your own brain, heart, evolution, must not only understand the matter, but largely supply it

Final Confessions—Literary Tests

So draw near their end these garrulous notes. There have doubtless occur'd some repetitions, technical errors in the consecutiveness of dates, in the minutæ of botanical, astronomical, &c, exactness, and perhaps elsewhere,—for in gathering up, writing, peremptorily dispatching copy, this hot weather, (last of July and through August, '82,) and delaying not the printers, 30 I have had to hurry along, no time to spare. But in the deepest veracity of all—in reflections of objects, scenes, Nature's outpourings, to my senses and receptivity, as they seem'd to me—in the work of giving those who care for it, some authentic glints, specimen-days of my life—and in the bona fide spirit and relations, from author to reader, on all the subjects design'd, and as far as they go, I feel to make unmitigated 40 claims

The synopsis of my early life, Long Island, New York city, and so forth, and the diary-jottings in the Secession war, tell their own story. My plan in starting what constitutes most of the middle of the book, was originally for hints and data of a Nature-poem that should carry one's experiences a few hours, commencing at noon-flush, and so through the after-part of the day—I suppose led to such idea by my 50 own life-afternoon now arrived. But I soon found I could move at more ease, by giving the narrative at first hand. (Then there is a humiliating lesson one learns, in serene hours, of a fine day or night. Nature seems to look on all fixed-up poetry and art as something almost impertinent )

Thus I went on, years following, various seasons and areas, spinning forth my thought beneath the night and stars, (or as I was confined to my room by half-sickness,) or at midday looking out upon the sea, or far north steaming over the Saguenay's black breast, jotting all down in the loosest sort of chronological order, and here printing from my impromptu notes, hardly even the seasons group'd together, or anything corrected—so afraid of dropping what smack of outdoors or sun or starlight might cling to the lines, I dared not try to meddle with or smooth them Every now and then, (not often, but for a foil,) I carried a book in my pocket—or perhaps tore out from some broken or cheap edition a bunch of loose leaves, most always had something of the sort ready, but only took it out when the mood demanded In that way, utterly out of reach of literary conventions, I re-read many authors

I cannot divest my appetite of literature, yet I find myself eventually trying it all by Nature—first premises many call it, but really the crowning results of all, laws, tallies and proofs (Has it never occur'd to any one how the last deciding tests applicable to a book are entirely outside of technical and grammatical ones, and that any truly first-class production has little or nothing to do with the rules and calibres of ordinary critics? or the bloodless chalk of Allibone's Dictionary? I have fancied the ocean and the daylight, the mountain and the forest, putting their spirit in a judgment on our books I have fancied some disembodied human soul giving its verdict )

Nature and Democracy—Morality

Democracy most of all affiliates with the open air, is sunny and hardy and sane only with Nature—just as much as Art is Something is required to temper both—to check them, restrain them from excess, morbidity I have wanted, before departure, to bear special testimony to a very old lesson and requisite American Democracy, in its myriad personalities, in factories, workshops, stores, offices—through the dense streets and houses of cities, and all their manifold sophisticated life—must either be fibred, vitalized, by regular contact with out-door light and air and growths, farm-scenes, animals, fields, trees, birds, sun-warmth and free skies, or it will certainly dwindle and pale We cannot have grand races of mechanics, work people, and commonalty, (the only specific purpose of America,) on any less terms I conceive of no flourishing and heroic elements of Democracy in the United States, or of Democracy maintaining itself at all, without the Nature-element forming a main part—to be its health-element and beauty-element—to really underlie the whole politics, sanity, religion and art of the New World

Finally, the morality 'Virtue,' said Marcus Aurelius, 'what is it, only a living and enthusiastic sympathy with Nature?' Perhaps indeed the efforts of the true poets, founders, religions, literatures, all ages, have been, and ever will be, our time and times to come, essentially the same—to bring people back from their persistent strayings and sickly abstractions, to the costless average, divine, original concrete

ONE'S-SELF I SING

ONE'S-SELF I sing, a simple separate person, Yet utter the word Democratic, the word En-Masse

Of physiology from top to toe I sing, Not physiognomy alone nor brain alone is worthy for the Muse, I say the Form complete is worthier far,
The Female equally with the Male I sing.

Of Life immense in passion, pulse, and power, Cheerful, for freest action form'd under the laws divine,
The Modern Man I sing

1867

I HEAR AMERICA SINGING

I HEAR America singing, the varied carols I hear,
 Those of mechanics, each one singing his as it should be blithe and strong,
 The carpenter singing his as he measures his plank or beam,
 The mason singing his as he makes ready for work, or leaves off work, The boatman singing what belongs to him in his boat, the deck-hand singing on the steamboat deck,
 The shoemaker singing as he sits on his bench, the hatter singing as he stands,
 The wood-cutter's song, the ploughboy's on his way in the morning, or at noon intermission or at sundown,
 The delicious singing of the mother, or of the young wife at work, or of the girl sewing or washing,
 Each singing what belongs to him or her and to none else,
 The day what belongs to the day—at night the party of young fellows, robust, friendly, 10
 Singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs

SONG OF MYSELF

I

I CELEBRATE myself, and sing myself,
 And what I assume you shall assume,
 For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you.

I loafe and invite my soul,
 I lean and loafe at my ease observing a spear of summer grass

My tongue, every atom of my blood, form'd from this soil, this air, Born here of parents born here from parents the same, and their parents the same,
 I, now thirty-seven years old in perfect health begin,
 Hoping to cease not till death

Creeds and schools in abeyance, 10
 Retiring back a while sufficed at what they are, but never forgotten,
 I harbor for good or bad, I permit to speak at every hazard, Nature without check with original energy

2

Houses and rooms are full of perfumes, the shelves are crowded with perfumes,
 I breathe the fragrance myself and know it and like it,
 The distillation would intoxicate me also, but I shall not let it

The atmosphere is not a perfume, it has no taste of the distillation, it is odorless,
 It is for my mouth forever, I am in love with it,
 I will go to the bank by the wood and become undisguised and naked,
 I am mad for it to be in contact with me 20

The smoke of my own breath,
 Echoes, ripples, buzz'd whispers, love-root, silk-thread, crotch and vine, My respiration and inspiration, the beating of my heart, the passing of blood and air through my lungs,
 The sniff of green leaves and dry leaves, and of the shore and dark-color'd sea-rocks, and of hay in the barn,
 The sound of the belch'd words of my voice loos'd to the eddies of the wind,

A few light kisses, a few embraces, a reaching around of arms,
 The play of shine and shade on the trees as the supple boughs wag,
 The delight alone or in the rush of the streets, or along the fields and hill-sides,
 The feeling of health, the full-noon trill, the song of me rising from bed and meeting the sun.

Have you reckon'd a thousand acres much? have you reckon'd the earth much? 30
 Have you practis'd so long to learn to read?
 Have you felt so proud to get at the meaning of poems?

Stop this day and night with me and you shall possess the origin of all poems,
 You shall possess the good of the earth and sun, (there are millions of suns left,) You shall no longer take things at second or third hand, nor look through the eyes of the dead, nor feed on the spectres in books,
 You shall not look through my eyes either, nor take things from me,
 You shall listen to all sides and filter them from your self.

3

I have heard what the talkers were talking, the talk of the beginning and the end,
 But I do not talk of the beginning or the end.

There was never any more inception than there is now, 40
 Nor any more youth or age than there is now,
 And will never be any more perfection than there is now, Nor any more heaven or hell than there is now

Urge and urge and urge,
 Always the procreant urge of the world
 Out of the dimness opposite equals advance, always substance and increase, always sex, Always a knit of identity, always distinction, always a breed of life

To elaborate is no avail, learn'd and unlearn'd feel that it is so

Sure as the most certain sure, plumb in the uprights, well entretied, braced in the beams, Stout as a horse, affectionate, haughty, electrical, 50
 I and this mystery here we stand.

Clear and sweet is my soul, and clear and sweet is all that is not my soul.

Lack one lacks both, and the unseen is proved by the seen, Till that becomes unseen and receives proof in its turn.

Showing the best and dividing it from the worst age vexes age, Knowing the perfect fitness and equanimity of things, while they discuss I am silent, and go bathe and admire myself

Welcome is every organ and attribute of me, and of any man hearty and clean,
 Not an inch nor a particle of an inch is vile, and none shall be less familiar than the rest.

I am satisfied—I see, dance, laugh, sing, As the hugging and loving bed-fellow sleeps at my side through the night, and withdraws at the peep of the day with stealthy tread, 60 Leaving me baskets cover'd with white towels swelling the house with their plenty, Shall I postpone my acceptation and realization and scream at my eyes,
 That they turn from gazing after and down the road,

And forthwith cipher and show me to a cent,
Exactly the value of one and exactly the value of two, and which is ahead?

4

Trippers and askers surround me,
People I meet, the effect upon me of my early life or the ward and city I live in, or the nation,
The latest dates, discoveries, inventions, societies, authors old and new,
My dinner, dress, associates, looks, compliments, dues,
The real or fancied indifference of some man or woman I love, 70
The sickness of one of my folks or of myself, or ill-doing or loss or lack of money, or depressions or exaltations,
Battles, the horrors of fratricidal war, the fever of doubtful news, the fitful events,
These come to me days and nights and go from me again,
But they are not the Me myself

Apart from the pulling and hauling stands what I am, Stands amused, complacent, compassionating, idle, unitary,
Looks down, is erect, or bends an arm on an impalpable certain rest, Looking with side-curved head curious what will come next,
Both in and out of the game and watching and wondering at it

Backward I see in my own days where I sweated through fog with linguists and contenders, 80
I have no mockings or arguments, I witness and wait

5

I believe in you my soul, the other I am must not abase itself to you, And you must not be abased to the other

Loafe with me on the grass, loose the stop from your throat,
Not words, not music or rhyme I want, not custom or lecture, not even the best,
Only the lull I like, the hum of your valvèd voice

I mind how once we lay such a transparent summer morning,
How you settled your head athwart my hips and gently turn'd over upon me,
And parted the shirt from my bosom-bone, and plunged your tongue to my bare-stript heart,
And reach'd till you felt my beard, and reach'd till you held my feet 90

Swiftly arose and spread around me the peace and knowledge that pass all the argument of the earth,

And I know that the hand of God is the promise of my own,
And I know that the spirit of God is the brother of my own,
And that all the men ever born are also my brothers, and the women my sisters and lovers,
And that a kelson of the creation is love,
And limitless are leaves stiff or drooping in the fields,
And brown ants in the little wells beneath them,
And mossy scabs of the worm fence, heap'd stones, elder, mullein and poke-weed.

6

A child said What is the grass? fetching it to me with full hands, How could I answer the child? I do not know what it is any more than he 100

I guess it must be the flag of my disposition, out of hopeful green stuff woven.

Or I guess it is the handkerchief of the Lord,
A scented gift and remembrancer designedly dropt,

Bearing the owner's name someway in the corners, that we may see and remark, and say Whose?

Or I guess the grass is itself a child, the produced babe of the vegetation.

Or I guess it is a uniform hieroglyphic,
 And it means, Sprouting alike in broad zones and narrow zones, Growing among black folks as among white, Kanuck, Tuckahoe, Congressman, Cuff, I give them the same, I receive them the same.

And now it seems to me the beautiful uncut hair of graves

110

Tenderly will I use you curling grass,
 It may be you transpire from the breasts of young men,
 It may be if I had known them I would have loved them,
 It may be you are from old people, or from offspring taken soon out of their mothers' laps,
 And here you are the mothers' laps

This grass is very dark to be from the white heads of old mothers, Darker than the colorless beards of old men,
 Dark to come from under the faint red roofs of mouths
 O I perceive after all so many uttering tongues,
 And I perceive they do not come from the roofs of mouths for nothing

120

I wish I could translate the hints about the dead young men and women,
 And the hints about old men and mothers, and the offspring taken soon out of their laps.

What do you think has become of the young and old men?
 And what do you think has become of the women and children?

They are alive and well somewhere,
 The smallest sprout shows there is really no death,
 And if ever there was it led forward life, and does not wait at the end to arrest it,
 And ceas'd the moment life appear'd

All goes onward and outward, nothing collapses,
 And to die is different from what any one supposed, and luckier.

130

7

Has any one supposed it lucky to be born?
 I hasten to inform him or her it is just as lucky to die, and I know it

I pass death with the dying and birth with the new-wash'd babe, and am not contain'd between my hat and boots,
 And peruse manifold objects, no two alike and every one good,
 The earth good and the stars good, and their adjuncts all good

I am not an earth nor an adjunct of an earth,
 I am the mate and companion of people, all just as immortal and fathomless as myself, (They do not know how immortal, but I know )

Every kind for itself and its own, for me mine male and female,
 For me those that have been boys and that love women,
 For me the man that is proud and feels how it stings to be slighted,
 For me the sweet-heart and the old maid, for me mothers and the mothers of mothers,

140

For me lips that have smiled, eyes that have shed tears,
For me children and the begetters of children

Undrape! you are not guilty to me, nor stale nor discarded,
I see through the broadcloth and gingham whether or no,
And am around, tenacious, acquisitive, tireless, and cannot be shaken away.

8

The little one sleeps in its cradle,
I lift the gauze and look a long time, and silently brush away flies with my hand.

The youngster and the red-faced girl turn aside up the bushy hill,
I peeringly view them from the top 150

The suicide sprawls on the bloody floor of the bedroom,
I witness the corpse with its dabbled hair, I note where the pistol has fallen.

The blab of the pave, tires of carts, sluff of boot-soles, talk of the promenaders, The heavy omnibus, the driver with his interrogating thumb, the clank of the shod horses on the granite floor,

The snow-sleighs, clinking, shouted jokes, pelts of snow-balls,
The hurrahs for popular favorites, the fury of rous'd mobs,
The flap of the curtain'd litter, a sick man inside borne to the hospital,
The meeting of enemies, the sudden oath, the blows and fall,
The excited crowd, the policeman with his star quickly working his passage to the centre of the crowd, 160

The impassive stones that receive and return so many echoes,
What groans of over-fed or half-starv'd who fall sunstruck or in fits,
What exclamations of women taken suddenly who hurry home and give birth to babes,
What living and buried speech is always vibrating here, what howls restrain'd by decorum, Arrests of criminals, slights, adulterous offers made, acceptances, rejections with convex lips,
I mind them or the show or resonance of them—I come and I depart

9

The big doors of the country barn stand open and ready,
The dried grass of the harvest-time loads the slow-drawn wagon,
The clear light plays on the brown gray and green intertinged,
The armfuls are pack'd to the sagging mow 170

I am there, I help, I came stretch'd atop of the load,
I felt its soft jolts, one leg reclined on the other,
I jump from the cross-beams and seize the clover and timothy,
And roll head over heels and tangle my hair full of wisps.

10

Alone far in the wilds and mountains I hunt, Wandering amazed at my own lightness and glee,
In the late afternoon choosing a safe spot to pass the night, Kindling a fire and broiling the fresh-kill'd game,
Falling asleep on the gather'd leaves with my dog and gun by my side.

The Yankee clipper is under her sky-sails, she cuts the sparkle and scud,
My eyes settle the land, I bend at her prow or shout joyously from the deck. 180

The boatmen and clam-diggers arose early and stopt for me,
 I tuck'd my trowser-ends in my boots and went and had a good time;
 You should have been with us that day round the chowder-kettle

I saw the marriage of the trapper in the open air in the far west, the bride was a red girl, Her father and his friends sat near cross-legged and dumbly smoking, they had moccasins to their feet and large thick blankets hanging from their shoulders, On a bank lounged the trapper, he was drest mostly in skins, his luxuriant beard and curls protected his neck, he held his bride by the hand, She had long eyelashes, her head was bare, her coarse straight locks descended upon her voluptuous limbs and reach'd to her feet.

The runaway slave came to my house and stopt outside,
 I heard his motions crackling the twigs of the woodpile, 190
 Through the swung half-door of the kitchen I saw him limpsy and weak,
 And went where he sat on a log and led him in and assured him,
 And brought water and fill'd a tub for his sweated body and bruise'd feet,
 And gave him a room that enter'd from my own, and gave him some coarse clean clothes,
 And remember perfectly well his revolving eyes and his awkwardness,
 And remember putting plasters on the galls of his neck and ankles,
 He staid with me a week before he was recuperated and pass'd north,
 I had him sit next me at table, my fire-lock lean'd in the corner.

II

Twenty-eight young men bathe by the shore, Twenty-eight young men and all so friendly; 200
 Twenty-eight years of womanly life and all so lonesome.

She owns the fine house by the rise of the bank,
 She hides handsome and richly drest aft the blinds of the window.

Which of the young men does she like the best?
 Ah the homeliest of them is beautiful to her

Where are you off to, lady? for I see you,
 You splash in the water there, yet stay stock still in your room.

Dancing and laughing along the beach came the twenty-ninth bather,
 The rest did not see her, but she saw them and loved them

The beards of the young men glisten'd with wet, it ran from their long hair, 210
 Little streams pass'd all over their bodies

An unseen hand also pass'd over their bodies,
 It descended tremblingly from their temples and ribs

The young men float on their backs, their white bellies bulge to the sun, they do not ask who seizes fast to them,
 They do not know who puffs and declines with pendant and bending arch,
 They do not think whom they souse with spray

12

The butcher-boy puts off his killing-clothes, or sharpens his knife at the stall in the market,
 I loiter enjoying his repartee and his shuffle and break-down.

Blacksmiths with grimed and hairy chests environ the anvil,
Each has his main-sledge, they are all out, there is a great heat in the fire.

220

From the cinder-strew'd threshold I follow their movements,
The lithe sheer of their waists plays even with their massive arms, Overhand the hammers swing, overhand so slow, overhand so sure,
They do not hasten, each man hits in his place

13

The negro holds firmly the reins of his four horses, the block swags underneath on its tied-over chain,
The negro that drives the long dray of the stone-yard, steady and tall he stands pois'd on one leg on the string-piece,
His blue shirt exposes his ample neck and breast and loosens over his hip-band,
His glance is calm and commanding, he tosses the slouch of his hat away from his forehead,
The sun falls on his crispy hair and mustache, falls on the black of his polish'd and perfect limbs

I behold the picturesque giant and love him, and I do not stop there,
I go with the team also 230

In me the caresser of life wherever moving, backward as well as forward slung,
To niches aside and junior bending, not a person or object missing, Absorbing all to myself and for this song

Oxen that rattle the yoke and chain or halt in the leafy shade, what is that you express in your eyes?
It seems to me more than all the print I have read in my life

My tread scares the wood-drake and wood-duck on my distant and day-long ramble,
They rise together, they slowly circle around

I believe in those wing'd purposes,
And acknowledge red, yellow, white, playing within me,
And consider green and violet and the tufted crown intentional,
And do not call the tortoise unworthy because she is not something else,
And the jay in the woods never studied the gamut, yet trills pretty well to me,
And the look of the bay mare shames silliness out of me

240

14

The wild gander leads his flock through the cool night, Ya-honk he says, and sounds it down to me like an invitation,
The pert may suppose it meaningless, but I listening close,
Find its purpose and place up there toward the wintry sky

The sharp-hoof'd moose of the north, the cat on the house-sill, the chuckadee, the prairie-dog,
The litter of the grunting sow as they tug at her teats,
The brood of the turkey-hen and she with her half-spread wings,
I see in them and myself the same old law

The press of my foot to the earth springs a hundred affections,
They scorn the best I can do to relate them

I am enamour'd of growing out-doors,
Of men that live among cattle or taste of the ocean or woods,

Of the builders and steerers of ships and the wielders of axes and mauls, and the drivers of horses,
I can eat and sleep with them week in and week out.

What is commonest, cheapest, nearest, easiest, is Me, Me going in for my chances, spending for vast returns, 260
Adorning myself to bestow myself on the first that will take me, Not asking the sky to come down to my good will,
Scattering it freely forever.

15

The pure contralto sings in the organ loft,
The carpenter dresses his plank, the tongue of his foreplane whistles its wild ascending lisp,
The married and unmarried children ride home to their Thanksgiving dinner,
The pilot seizes the king-pin, he heaves down with a strong arm,
The mate stands braced in the whale-boat, lance and harpoon are ready,
The duck-shooter walks by silent and cautious stretches, 270
The deacons are ordain'd with cross'd hands at the altar,
The spinning-girl retreats and advances to the hum of the big wheel,
The farmer stops by the bars as he walks on a First-day loafe and looks at the oats and rye,
The lunatic is carried at last to the asylum a confirm'd case, (He will never sleep any more as he did in the cot in his mother's bed-room,)
The jour printer with gray head and gaunt jaws works at his case,
He turns his quid of tobacco while his eyes blurr with the manuscript,
The malform'd limbs are tied to the surgeon's table,
What is removed drops horribly in a pail,
The quadroon girl is sold at the auction-stand, the drunkard nods by the bar-room stove,
The machinist rolls up his sleeves, the policeman travels his beat, the gate-keeper marks who 280 pass,
The young fellow drives the express-wagon, (I love him, though I do not know him,)
The half-breed straps on his light boots to compete in the race,
The western turkey-shooting draws old and young, some lean on their rifles, some sit on logs,
Out from the crowd steps the marksman, takes his position, levels his piece,
The groups of newly-come immigrants cover the wharf or levee,
As the woolly-pates hoe in the sugar-field, the overseer views them from his saddle,
The bugle calls in the ball-room, the gentlemen run for their partners, the dancers bow to each other,
The youth lies awake in the cedar-roof'd garret and harks to the musical rain,
The Wolverine sets traps on the creek that helps fill the Huron,
The squaw wrapt in her yellow-hemm'd cloth is offering moccasins and bead-bags for sale,
The connoisseur peers along the exhibition-gallery with half-shut eyes bent sideways, 291
As the deck-hands make fast the steamboat the plank is thrown for the shore-going passengers,
The young sister holds out the skein while the elder sister winds it off in a ball, and stops now and then for the knots,
The one-year wife is recovering and happy having a week ago borne her first child,
The clean-hair'd Yankee girl works with her sewing-machine or in the factory or mill,
The paving-man leans on his two-handed rammer, the reporter's lead flies swiftly over the note-book, the sign-painter is lettering with blue and gold,
The canal boy trots on the tow-path, the book-keeper counts at his desk, the shoemaker waxes his thread,
The conductor beats time for the band and all the performers follow him,
The child is baptized, the convert is making his first professions,
The regatta is spread on the bay, the race is begun, (how the white sails sparkle!) 300
The drover watching his drove sings out to them that would stray,

The pedler sweats with his pack on his back, (the purchaser higgling about the odd cent;)
 The bride unrumples her white dress, the minute-hand of the clock moves slowly,
 The opium-eater reclines with rigid head and just-open'd lips,
 The prostitute draggles her shawl, her bonnet bobs on her tipsy and pimpled neck,
 The crowd laugh at her blackguard oaths, the men jeer and wink to each other, (Miserable! I do not laugh at your oaths nor jeer you,)
 The President holding a cabinet council is surrounded by the great Secretaries,
 On the piazza walk three matrons stately and friendly with twined arms,
 The crew of the fish-smack pack repeated layers of halibut in the hold, 310
 The Missourian crosses the plains toting his wares and his cattle,
 As the fare-collector goes through the train he gives notice by the jingling of loose change,
 The floor-men are laying the floor, the tanners are tanning the roof, the masons are calling for mortar,
 In single file each shouldering his hod pass onward the laborers, Seasons pursuing each other the indescribable crowd is gather'd, it is the fourth of Seventh-month, (what salutes of cannon and small arms!) Seasons pursuing each other the plougher ploughs, the mower mows, and the winter-grain falls in the ground,
 Off on the lakes the pike-fisher watches and waits by the hole in the frozen surface,
 The stumps stand thick round the clearing, the squatter strikes deep with his axe, Flatboatmen make fast towards dusk near the cotton-wood or pecan-trees, Coon-seekers go through the regions of the Red river or through those drain'd by the Tennessee, or through those of the Arkansas, 320 Torches shone in the dark that hangs on the Chatahooche or Altamahaw, Patriarchs sit at supper with sons and grandsons and great grandsons around them,
 In walls of adobie, in canvas tents, rest hunters and trappers after their day's sport,
 The city sleeps and the country sleeps,
 The living sleep for their time, the dead sleep for their time,
 The old husband sleeps by his wife and the young husband sleeps by his wife,
 And these tend inward to me, and I tend outward to them,
 And such as it is to be of these more or less I am,
 And of these one and all I weave the song of myself.

16

I am of old and young, of the foolish as much as the wise, 330
 Regardless of others, ever regardful of others, Maternal as well as paternal, a child as well as a man, Stuff'd with the stuff that is coarse and stuff'd with the stuff that is fine,
 One of the Nation of many nations, the smallest the same and the largest the same,
 A Southerner soon as a Northerner, a planter nonchalant and hospitable down by the Oconee
 I live,
 A Yankee bound my own way ready for trade, my joints the limberest joints on earth and the sternest joints on earth,
 A Kentuckian walking the vale of the Elkhorn in my deer-skin leggings, a Lousianian or Georgian,
 A boatman over lakes or bays or along coasts, a Hoosier, Badger, Buckeye,
 At home on Kanadian snow-shoes or up in the bush, or with fishermen off Newfoundland,
 At home in the fleet of ice-boats, sailing with the rest and tacking, 340
 At home on the hills of Vermont or in the woods of Maine, or the Texan ranch, Comrade of Californians, comrade of free North-Westerners, (loving their big proportions,) Comrade of raftsmen and coalmen, comrade of all who shake hands and welcome to drink and meat,
 A learner with the simplest, a teacher of the thoughtfulest,
 A novice beginning yet experient of myriads of seasons,
 Of every hue and caste am I, of every rank and religion,

A farmer, mechanic, artist, gentleman, sailor, quaker, Prisoner, fancy-man, rowdy, lawyer, physician, priest.

I resist any thing better than my own diversity, Breathe the air but leave plenty after me,
And am not stuck up, and am in my place

350

(The moth and the fish-eggs are in their place,
The bright suns I see and the dark suns I cannot see are in their place,
The palpable is in its place and the impalpable is in its place.)

17

These are really the thoughts of all men in all ages and lands, they are not original with me,
If they are not yours as much as mine they are nothing, or next to nothing,
If they are not the riddle and the untying of the riddle they are nothing,
If they are not just as close as they are distant they are nothing

This is the grass that grows wherever the land is and the water is, Thus the common air that bathes the globe

360

18

With music strong I come, with my cornets and my drums,
I play not marches for accepted victors only, I play marches for conquer'd and slain persons

Have you heard that it was good to gain the day?
I also say it is good to fall, battles are lost in the same spirit in which they are won.

I beat and pound for the dead,
I blow through my embouchures my loudest and gayest for them.

Vivas to those who have fail'd!
And to those whose war-vessels sank in the sea!
And to those themselves who sank in the sea!
And to all generals that lost engagements, and all overcome heroes!
And the numberless unknown heroes equal to the greatest heroes known!

370

19

This is the meal equally set, this the meat for natural hunger,
It is for the wicked just the same as the righteous, I make appointments with all,
I will not have a single person slighted or left away,
The kept-woman, sponger, thief, are hereby invited,
The heavy-lipp'd slave is invited, the venerealee is invited,
There shall be no difference between them and the rest

This is the press of a bashful hand, this the float and odor of hair,
This the touch of my lips to yours, this the murmur of yearning,
This the far-off depth and height reflecting my own face,
This the thoughtful merge of myself, and the outlet again

380

Do you guess I have some intricate purpose?
Well I have, for the Fourth-month showers have, and the mica on the side of a rock has.

Do you take it I would astonish?
Does the daylight astonish? does the early redstart twittering through the woods?
Do I astonish more than they?

This hour I tell things in confidence,
I might not tell everybody, but I will tell you.

20

Who goes there? hankering, gross, mystical, nude;
How is it I extract strength from the beef I eat?

390

What is a man anyhow? what am I? what are you?

All I mark as my own you shall offset it with your own, Else it were time lost listening to me

I do not snivel that snivel the world over,
That months are vacuums and the ground but wallow and filth

Whimpering and truckling fold with powders for invalids, conformity goes to the fourthremov'd,
I wear my hat as I please indoors or out

Why should I pray? why should I venerate and be ceremonious?

Having pried through the strata, analyzed to a hair, counsel'd with doctors and calculated close,
I find no sweeter fat than sticks to my own bones

400

In all people I see myself, none more and not one a barley-corn less,
And the good or bad I say of myself I say of them

I know I am solid and sound,
To me the converging objects of the universe perpetually flow,
All are written to me, and I must get what the writing means

I know I am deathless,
I know this orbit of mine cannot be swept by a carpenter's compass,
I know I shall not pass like a child's carlacue cut with a burnt stick at night

I know I am august,
I do not trouble my spirit to vindicate itself or be understood, I see that the elementary laws never apologize, (I reckon I behave no prouder than the level I plant my house by, after all )

410

I exist as I am, that is enough,
If no other in the world be aware I sit content,
And if each and all be aware I sit content

One world is aware and by far the largest to me, and that is myself,
And whether I come to my own to-day or in ten thousand or ten million years,
I can cheerfully take it now, or with equal cheerfulness I can wait

My foothold is tenon'd and mortis'd in granite,
I laugh at what you call dissolution,
And I know the amplitude of time

21

I am the poet of the Body and I am the poet of the Soul,
The pleasures of heaven are with me and the pains of hell are with me,

The first I graft and increase upon myself, the latter I translate into a new tongue.

I am the poet of the woman the same as the man,
And I say it is as great to be a woman as to be a man,
And I say there is nothing greater than the mother of men

I chant the chant of dilation or pride,
We have had ducking and deprecating about enough,
I show that size is only development

430

Have you outstript the rest? are you the President?
It is a trifle, they will more than arrive there every one, and still pass on.

I am he that walks with the tender and growing night,
I call to the earth and sea half-held by the night.

Press close bare-bosom'd night—press close magnetic nourishing night!
Night of south winds—night of the large few stars!
Still nodding night—mad naked summer night.

Smile O voluptuous cool-breath'd earth!
Earth of the slumbering and liquid trees!
Earth of departed sunset—earth of the mountains misty-topt!
Earth of the vitreous pour of the full moon just tinged with blue!
Earth of shine and dark mottling the tide of the river!
Earth of the limpid gray of clouds brighter and clearer for my sake!
Far-swooping elbow'd earth—rich apple-blossom'd earth!
Smile, for your lover comes 440

Prodigal, you have given me love—therefore I to you give love!
O unspeakable passionate love.

22

You sea! I resign myself to you also—I guess what you mean,
I behold from the beach your crooked inviting fingers,
I believe you refuse to go back without feeling of me,
We must have a turn together, I undress, hurry me out of sight of the land, Cushion me soft, rock me in billowy drowse, Dash me with amorous wet, I can repay you 450

Sea of stretch'd ground-swells,
Sea breathing broad and convulsive breaths,
Sea of the brine of life and of unshovell'd yet always-ready graves, Howler and scooper of storms, capricious and dainty sea,
I am integral with you, I too am of one phase and of all phases

Partaker of influx and efflux, I, extoller of hate and conciliation, Extoller of armies and those that sleep in each others' arms,

460

I am he attesting sympathy, (Shall I make my list of things in the house and skip the house that supports them?)

I am not the poet of goodness only, I do not decline to be the poet of wickedness also

What blurt is this about virtue and about vice?

Evil propels me and reform of evil propels me, I stand indifferent,
 My gait is no fault-finder's or rejecter's gait,
 I moisten the roots of all that has grown

Did you fear some scrofula out of the unflagging pregnancy?
 Did you guess the celestial laws are yet to be work'd over and rectified?

I find one side a balance and the antipodal side a balance, Soft doctrine as steady help as stable doctrine, Thoughts and deeds of the present our rouse and early start.

470

This minute that comes to me over the past decillions,
 There is no better than it and now

What behaved well in the past or behaves well to-day is not such a wonder,
 The wonder is always and always how there can be a mean man or an infidel.

23

Endless unfolding of words of ages!
 And mine a word of the modern, the word En-Masse

A word of the faith that never balks,
 Here or henceforward it is all the same to me, I accept Time absolutely

480

It alone is without flaw, it alone rounds and completes all,
 That mystic baffling wonder alone completes all

I accept Reality and dare not question it, Materialism first and last imbuing.

Hurrah for positive science! long live exact demonstration!
 Fetch stonecrop mixt with cedar and branches of lilac,
 This is the lexicographer, this the chemist, this made a grammar of the old cartouches,
 These mariners put the ship through dangerous unknown seas,
 This is the geologist, this works with the scalpel, and this is a mathematician.

Gentlemen, to you the first honors always!
 Your facts are useful, and yet they are not my dwelling,
 I but enter by them to an area of my dwelling 490

Less the reminders of properties told my words,
 And more the reminders they of life untold, and of freedom and extrication,
 And make short account of neuters and geldings, and favor men and women fully equipt.
 And beat the gong of revolt, and stop with fugitives and them that plot and conspire.

24

Walt Whitman, a kosmos, of Manhattan the son, Turbulent, fleshy, sensual, eating, drinking and breeding,
 No sentimentalist, no stander above men and women or apart from them,
 No more modest than immodest.

500

Unscrew the locks from the doors!
 Unscrew the doors themselves from their jambs!

Whoever degrades another degrades me,
And whatever is done or said returns at last to me.

Through me the afflatus surging and surging, through me the current and index.

I speak the pass-word primeval, I give the sign of democracy,
By God! I will accept nothing which all cannot have their counterpart of on the same terms.

Through me many long dumb voices,
Voices of the interminable generations of prisoners and slaves, Voices of the diseas'd and despairing and of thieves and dwarfs, 510 Voices of cycles of preparation and accretion,
And of the threads that connect the stars, and of wombs and of the father-stuff,
And of the rights of them the others are down upon,
Of the deform'd, trivial, flat, foolish, despised,
Fog in the air, beetles rolling balls of dung.

Through me forbidden voices,
Voices of sexes and lusts, voices veil'd and I remove the veil, Voices indecent by me clarified and transfigur'd.

I do not press my fingers across my mouth,
I keep as delicate around the bowels as around the head and heart, 520 Copulation is no more rank to me than death is.

I believe in the flesh and the appetites,
Seeing, hearing, feeling, are miracles, and each part and tag of me is a miracle.

Divine am I inside and out, and I make holy whatever I touch or am touch'd from,
The scent of these arm-pits aroma finer than prayer,
This head more than churches, bibles, and all the creeds

If I worshop one thing more than another it shall be the spread of my own body, or any part of it, Translucent mould of me it shall be you!
Shaded ledges and rests it shall be you!
Firm masculine colter it shall be you! 530
Whatever goes to the tulth of me it shall be you!
You my rich blood! your milky stream pale strippings of my life!
Breast that presses against other breasts it shall be you!
My brain it shall be your occult convolutions!
Root of wash'd sweet-flag! timorous pond-snipe! nest of guarded duplicate eggs! it shall be you!

Mix'd tussled hay of head, beard, brawn, it shall be you!
Trickling sap of maple, fibre of manly wheat, it shall be you!
Sun so generous it shall be you!
Vapors lighting and shading my face it shall be you!
You sweaty brooks and dews it shall be you! 540
Winds whose soft-tickling genitals rub against me it shall be you!
Broad muscular fields, branches of live oak, loving lounge in my winding paths, it shall be you!
Hands I have taken, face I have kiss'd, mortal I have ever touch'd, it shall be you.

I dote on myself, there is that lot of me and all so luscious, Each moment and whatever happens thrills me with joy,
I cannot tell how my ankles bend, nor whence the cause of my faintest wish,
Nor the cause of the friendship I emit, nor the cause of the friendship I take again

That I walk up my stoop, I pause to consider if it really be,
A morning-glory at my window satisfies me more than the metaphysics of books

To behold the day-break!

55c

The little light fades the immense and diaphanous shadows,
The air tastes good to my palate

Hefts of the moving world at innocent gambols silently rising, freshly exuding, Scooting obliquely high and low

Something I cannot see puts upward libidinous prongs, Seas of bright juice suffuse heaven

The earth by the sky staid with, the daily close of their junction,
The heav'd challenge from the east that moment over my head,
The mocking taunt, See then whether you shall be master!

25

Dazzling and tremendous how quick the sun-rise would kill me, If I could not now and always send sun-rise out of me

56c

We also ascend dazzling and tremendous as the sun,
We found our own O my soul in the calm and cool of the daybreak

My voice goes after what my eyes cannot reach,
With the swirl of my tongue I encompass worlds and volumes of worlds

Speech is the twin of my vision, it is unequal to measure itself,
It provokes me forever, it says sarcastically,
Wait you contain enough, why don't you let it out then?

Come now I will not be tantalized, you conceive too much of articulation,
Do you not know O speech how the buds beneath you are folded?
Waiting in gloom, protected by frost,
The dirt receding before my prophetic screams,
I underlying causes to balance them at last,
My knowledge my live parts, it keeping tally with the meaning of all things, Happiness, (which whoever hears me let him or her set out in search of this day )

570

My final merit I refuse you, I refuse putting from me what I really am, Encompass worlds, but never try to encompass me,
I crowd your sleekest and best by simply looking toward you.

Writing and talk do not prove me,
I carry the plenum of proof and every thing else in my face,
With the hush of my lips I wholly confound the skeptic

58c

26

Now I will do nothing but listen,
To accrue what I hear into this song, to let sounds contribute toward it

I hear bravuras of birds, bustle of growing wheat, gossip of flames, clack of sticks cooking m; meals
I hear the sound I love, the sound of the human voice,
I hear all sounds running together, combined, fused or following,

Sounds of the city and sounds out of the city, sounds of the day and night, Talkative young ones to those that like them, the loud laugh of work-people at their meals,
 The angry base of disjointed friendship, the faint tones of the sick,
 The judge with hands tight to the desk, his pallid lips pronouncing a death-sentence, 590
 The heave'e'yo of stevedores unlading ships by the wharves, the refrain of the anchor-lifters, The ring of alarm-bells, the cry of fire, the whirr of swift-streaking engines and hose-carts with premonitory tinkles and color'd lights,
 The steam-whistle, the solid roll of the train of approaching cars,
 The slow march play'd at the head of the association marching two and two,
 (They go to guard some corpse, the flag-tops are draped with black muslin.)

I hear the violoncello, ('tis the young man's heart's complaint),
 I hear the key'd cornet, it glides quickly in through my ears,
 It shakes mad-sweet pangs through my belly and breast

I hear the chorus, it is a grand opera,
 Ah this indeed is music—this suits me

600

A tenor large and fresh as the creation fills me,
 The orbic flex of his mouth is pouring and filling me full.

I hear the train'd soprano (what work with hers is this?)
 The orchestra whirls me wider than Uranus flies,
 It wrenches such ardors from me I did not know I possess'd them,
 It sails me, I dab with bare feet, they are lick'd by the indolent waves,
 I am cut by bitter and angry hail, I lose my breath, Steep'd amid honey'd morphine, my windpipe throttled in fakes of death,
 At length let up again to feel the puzzle of puzzles,
 And that we call Being 610

27

To be in any form, what is that?
 (Round and round we go, all of us, and ever come back thither,) If nothing lay more develop'd the quahaug in its callous shell were enough.

Mine is no callous shell,
 I have instant conductors all over me whether I pass or stop,
 They seize every object and lead it harmlessly through me

I merely stir, press, feel with my fingers, and am happy,
 To touch my person to some one else's is about as much as I can stand.

28

Is this then a touch? quivering me to a new identity, Flames and ether making a rush for my veins, 620 Treacherous tip of me reaching and crowding to help them,
 My flesh and blood playing out lightning to strike what is hardly different from myself,
 On all sides prurient provokers stuffing my limbs, Straining the udder of my heart for its withheld drip,
 Behaving licentious toward me, taking no denial, Depriving me of my best as for a purpose,
 Unbuttoning my clothes, holding me by the bare waist, Deluding my confusion with the calm of the sunlight and pasture-fields, Immodestly sliding the fellow-senses away,
 They bribed to swap off with touch and go and graze at the edges of me, 630
 No consideration, no regard for my draining strength or my anger,

Fetching the rest of the herd around to enjoy them a while,
Then all uniting to stand on a headland and worry me.

The sentries desert every other part of me,
They have left me helpless to a red marauder,
They all come to the headland to witness and assist against me.

I am given up by traitors,
I talk wildly, I have lost my wits, I and nobody else am the greatest traitor,
I went myself first to the headland, my own hands carried me there.

You villain touch! what are you doing? my breath is tight in its throat, Unclench your floodgates, you are too much for me.

640

29

Blind loving wrestling touch, sheath'd hooded sharp-tooth'd touch!
Did it make you ache so, leaving me?

Parting track'd by arriving, perpetual payment of perpetual loan, Rich showering rain, and recompense richer afterward

Sprouts take and accumulate, stand by the curb prolific and vital, Landscapes projected masculine, full-sized and golden.

30

All truths wait in all things,
They neither hasten their own delivery nor resist it,
They do not need the obstetric forceps of the surgeon,
The insignificant is as big to me as any,
(What is less or more than a touch?)

650

Logic and sermons never convince,
The damp of the night drives deeper into my soul

(Only what proves itself to every man and woman is so, Only what nobody denies is so )

A minute and a drop of me settle my brain,
I believe the soggy clods shall become lovers and lamps,
And a compend of compends is the meat of a man or woman,
And a summit and flower there is the feeling they have for each other,
And they are to branch boundlessly out of that lesson until it becomes omnific,
And until one and all shall delight us, and we them.

660

31

I believe a leaf of grass is no less than the journey-work of the stars,
And the pismire is equally perfect, and a grain of sand, and the egg of the wren,
And the tree-toad is a chef-d'œuvre for the highest,
And the running blackberry would adorn the parlors of heaven,
And the narrowest hinge in my hand puts to scorn all machinery,
And the cow crunching with depress'd head surpasses any statue,
And a mouse is miracle enough to stagger sextillions of infidels

I find I incorporate gneiss, coal, long-threaded moss, fruits, grains, esculent roots,
And am stucco'd with quadrupeds and birds all over,

670

And have distanced what is behind me for good reasons,
But call any thing back again when I desire it

In vain the speeding or shyness,
In vain the plutonic rocks send their old heat against my approach,
In vain the mastodon retreats beneath its own powder'd bones,
In vain objects stand leagues off and assume manifold shapes,
In vain the ocean settling in hollows and the great monsters lying low,
In vain the buzzard houses herself with the sky,
In vain the snake slides through the creepers and logs,
In vain the elk takes to the inner passes of the woods,
In vain the razor-bill'd auk sails far north to Labrador,
I follow quickly, I ascend to the nest in the fissure of the cliff

680

32

I think I could turn and live with animals, they're so placid and self-contain'd, I stand and look at them long and long

They do not sweat and whine about their condition,
They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins,
They do not make me sick discussing their duty to God,
Not one is dissatisfied, not one is demented with the mania of owning things,
Not one kneels to another, nor to his kind that lived thousands of years ago,
Not one is respectable or unhappy over the whole earth

690

So they show their relations to me and I accept them,
They bring me tokens of myself, they evince them plainly in their possession.

I wonder where they get those tokens,
Did I pass that way huge times ago and negligently drop them?

Myself moving forward then and now and forever,
Gathering and showing more always and with velocity, Infinite and omnigenous, and the like of these among them,
Not too exclusive toward the reachers of my remembrancers, Picking out here one that I love, and now go with him on brotherly terms.

700

A gigantic beauty of a stallion, fresh and responsive to my caresses, Head high in the forehead, wide between the ears, Limbs glossy and supple, tail dusting the ground,
Eyes full of sparkling wickedness, ears finely cut, flexibly moving

His nostrils dilate as my heels embrace him,
His well-built limbs tremble with pleasure as we race around and return.

I but use you a minute, then I resign you, stallion, Why do I need your paces when I myself out-gallop them?
Even as I stand or sit passing faster than you

33

Space and Time! now I see it is true, what I guess'd at,
What I guess'd when I loaf'd on the grass,
What I guess'd while I lay alone in my bed,
And again as I walk'd the beach under the paling stars of the morning.

710

My ties and ballasts leave me, my elbows rest in sea-gaps,
 I skirt sierras, my palms cover continents,
 I am afoot with my vision

By the city's quadrangular houses—in log huts, camping with lumbermen, Along the ruts of the turnpike, along the dry gulch and rivulet bed, Weeding my onion-patch or hoeing rows of carrots and parsnips, crossing savannas, trailing in forests,
 Prospecting, gold-digging, girdling the trees of a new purchase, 720
 Scorch'd ankle-deep by the hot sand, hauling my boat down the shallow river, Where the panther walks to and fro on a limb overhead, where the buck turns furiously at the hunter,
 Where the rattlesnake suns his flabby length on a rock, where the otter is feeding on fish,
 Where the alligator in his tough pimples sleeps by the bayou, Where the black bear is searching for roots or honey, where the beaver pats the mud with his paddle-shaped tail,
 Over the growing sugar, over the yellow-flower'd cotton plant, over the rice in its low moist field,
 Over the sharp-peak'd farm house, with its scallop'd scum and slender shoots from the gutters,
 Over the western persimmon, over the long-leav'd corn, over the delicate blue-flower flax,
 Over the white and brown buckwheat, a hummer and buzzer there with the rest,
 Over the dusky green of the rye as it ripples and shades in the breeze, 730 Scaling mountains, pulling myself cautiously up, holding on by low scragged limbs, Walking the path worn in the grass and beat through the leaves of the brush,
 Where the quail is whistling betwixt the woods and the wheat-lot, Where the bat flies in the Seventh-month eve, where the great gold-bug drops through the dark,
 Where the brook puts out of the roots of the old tree and flows to the meadow, Where cattle stand and shake away flies with the tremulous shuddering of their hides, Where the cheese-cloth hangs in the kitchen, where andirons straddle the hearth-slab, where cobwebs fall in festoons from the rafters, Where trip-hammers crash, where the press is whirling its cylinders,
 Where the human heart beats with terrible throes under its ribs, Where the pear-shaped balloon is floating aloft, (floating in it myself and looking composedly
 down,) 740
 Where the life-car is drawn on the slip-noose, where the heat hatches pale-green eggs in the dented sand,
 Where the she-whale swims with her calf and never forsakes it,
 Where the steam-ship trails hind-ways its long pennant of smoke,
 Where the fin of the shark cuts like a black chip out of the water,
 Where the half-burn'd brig is riding on unknown currents,
 Where shells grow to her slimy deck, where the dead are corrupting below,
 Where the dense-starr'd flag is borne at the head of the regiments, Approaching Manhattan up by the long-stretching island, Under Niagara, the cataract falling like a veil over my countenance, Upon a door-step, upon the horse-block of hard wood outside, 750
 Upon the race-course, or enjoying picnics or jugs or a good game of base-ball,
 At he-festivals, with blackguard gibes, ironical license, bull-dances, drinking, laughter,
 At the cider-mill tasting the sweets of the brown mash, sucking the juice through a straw,
 At apple-peelings wanting kisses for all the red fruit I find,
 At musters, beach-parties, friendly bees, huskings, house-raising,
 Where the mocking-bird sounds his delicious gurgles, cackles, screams, weeps, Where the hay-rick stands in the barn-yard, where the dry-stalks are scatter'd, where the brood-cow waits in the hovel,

Where the bull advances to do his masculine work, where the stud to the mare, where the cock is treading the hen,

Where the heifers browse, where geese nip their food with short jerks,

Where sun-down shadows lengthen over the limitless and lonesome prairie, 760

Where herds of buffalo make a crawling spread of the square miles far and near,

Where the humming-bird summers, where the neck of the long-lived swan is curving and winding,

Where the laughing-gull scoots by the shore, where she laughs her near-human laugh,

Where bee-hives range on a gray bench in the garden half hid by the high weeds,

Where band-neck'd partridges roost in a ring on the ground with their heads out,

Where burial coaches enter the arch'd gates of a cemetery,

Where winter wolves bark amid wastes of snow and iced trees,

Where the yellow-crown'd heron comes to the edge of the marsh at night and feeds upon small crabs,

Where the splash of swimmers and divers cools the warm noon,

Where the katy-did works her chromatic reed on the walnut-tree over the well, 770

Through patches of citrons and cucumbers with silver-wired leaves,

Through the salt-lick or orange glade, or under conical firs,

Through the gymnasium, through the curtain'd saloon, through the office or public hall,

Pleas'd with the native and pleas'd with the foreign, pleas'd with the new and old,

Pleas'd with the homely woman as well as the handsome,

Pleas'd with the quakeress as she puts off her bonnet and talks melodiously,

Pleas'd with the tune of the choir of the whitewash'd church,

Pleas'd with the earnest words of the sweating Methodist preacher, impress'd seriously at the camp-meeting,

Looking in at the shop-windows of Broadway the whole forenoon, flattening the flesh of my nose on the thick plate glass,

Wandering the same afternoon with my face turn'd up to the clouds, or down a lane or along the beach, 780

My right and left arms round the sides of two friends, and I in the middle,

Coming home with the silent and dark-cheek'd bush-boy, (behind me he rides at the drape of the day,)

Far from the settlements studying the print of animals' feet, or the moccasin print,

By the cot in the hospital reaching lemonade to a feverish patient,

Nigh the coffin'd corpse when all is still, examining with a candle,

Voyaging to every port to dicker and adventure,

Hurrying with the modern crowd as eager and fickle as any,

Hot toward one I hate, ready in my madness to knife him,

Solitary at midnight in my back yard, my thoughts gone from me a long while,

Walking the old hills of Judæa with the beautiful gentle God by my side, 790

Speeding through space, speeding through heaven and the stars,

Speeding amid the seven satellites and the broad ring, and the diameter of eighty thousand miles,

Speeding with tail'd meteors, throwing fire-balls like the rest,

Carrying the crescent child that carries its own full mother in its belly,

Storming, enjoying, planning, loving, cautioning,

Backing and filling, appearing and disappearing,

I tread day and night such roads.

I visit the orchards of spheres and look at the product,

And look at quintillions ripen'd and look at quintillions green.

I fly those flights of a fluid and swallowing soul,

My course runs below the soundings of plummets

I help myself to material and immaterial,
No guard can shut me off, no law prevent me.

I anchor my ship for a little while only,
My messengers continually cruise away or bring their returns to me

I go hunting polar furs and the seal, leaping chasms with a pike-pointed staff, clinging to topples of brittle and blue

I ascend to the foretruck,
I take my place late at night in the crow's-nest,
We sail the arctic sea, it is plenty light enough,
Through the clear atmosphere I stretch around on the wonderful beauty, 810
The enormous masses of ice pass me and I pass them, the scenery is plain in all directions,
The white-topped mountains show in the distance, I fling out my fancies toward them,
We are approaching some great battle-field in which we are soon to be engaged,
We pass the colossal outposts of the encampment, we pass with still feet and caution,
Or we are entering by the suburbs some vast and ruin'd city,
The blocks and fallen architecture more than all the living cities of the globe

I am a free companion, I bivouac by invading watchfires,
I turn the bridegroom out of bed and stay with the bride myself,
I tighten her all night to my thighs and lips

My voice is the wife's voice, the screech by the rail of the stairs, 820
They fetch my man's body up dripping and drown'd.

I understand the large hearts of heroes,
The courage of present times and all times, How the skipper saw the crowded and rudderless wreck of the steamship, and Death chasing it up and down the storm, How he knuckled tight and gave not back an inch, and was faithful of days and faithful of nights,
And chalk'd in large letters on a board, Be of good cheer, we will not desert you,
How he follow'd with them and tack'd with them three days and would not give it up,
How he saved the drifting company at last,
How the lank loose-gown'd women look'd when boated from the side of their prepared graves,
How the silent old-faced infants and the lifted sick, and the sharp-lipp'd unshaved men, 830
All this I swallow, it tastes good, I like it well, it becomes mine, I am the man, I suffer'd, I was there

The disdain and calmness of martyrs,
The mother of old, condemn'd for a witch, burnt with dry wood, her children gazing on,
The hounded slave that flags in the race, leans by the fence, blowing, cover'd with sweat, The twinges that sting like needles his legs and neck, the murderous buckshot and the bullets,
All these I feel or am.

I am the hounded slave, I wince at the bite of the dogs, Hell and despair are upon me, crack and again crack the marksmen,
I clutch the rails of the fence, my gore dribs, thunn'd with the ooze of my skin, 840
I fall on the weeds and stones,
The riders spur their unwilling horses, haul close,
Taunt my dizzy ears and beat me violently over the head with whip-stocks.

Agonies are one of my changes of garments
 I do not ask the wounded person how he feels, I myself become the wounded person,
 My hurts turn livid upon me as I lean on a cane and observe

I am the mash'd fireman with breast-bone broken, Tumbling walls buried me in their debris,
 Heat and smoke I inspired, I heard the yelling shouts of my comrades,
 I heard the distant click of their picks and shovels, 850
 They have clear'd the beams away, they tenderly lift me forth
 I lie in the night air in my red shirt, the pervading hush is for my sake, Painless after all I lie exhausted but not so unhappy, White and beautiful are the faces around me, the heads are bared of their fire-caps,
 The kneeling crowd fades with the light of the torches.

Distant and dead resuscitate,
 They show as the dial or move as the hands of me, I am the clock myself.

I am an old artilleryist, I tell of my fort's bombardment,
 I am there again

Again the long roll of the drummers, 860
 Again the attacking cannon, mortars,
 Again to my listening ears the cannon responsive.

I take part, I see and hear the whole,
 The cries, curses, roar, the plaudits for well-aim'd shots,
 The ambulance slowly passing trailing its red drip,
 Workmen searching after damages, making indispensable repairs,
 The fall of grenades through the rent roof, the fan-shaped explosion,
 The whizz of limbs, heads, stone, wood, iron, high in the air

Again gurgles the mouth of my dying general, he furiously waves with his hand,
 He gasps through the clot Mind not me—mind—the entrenchments. 870

Now I tell what I knew in Texas in my early youth, (I tell not the fall of Alamo,
 Not one escaped to tell the fall of Alamo,
 The hundred and fifty are dumb yet at Alamo,)
 'Tis the tale of the murder in cold blood of four hundred and twelve young men.

Retreating they had form'd in a hollow square with their baggage for breastworks, Nine hundred lives out of the surrounding enemy's, nine times their number, was the price they took in advance,
 Their colonel was wounded and their ammunition gone, They treated for an honorable capitulation, receiv'd writing and seal, gave up their arms and march'd back prisoners of war.

They were the glory of the race of rangers, 880
 Matchless with horse, rifle, song, supper, courtship, Large, turbulent, generous, handsome, proud, and affectionate, Bearded, sunburnt, drest in the free costume of hunters,
 Not a single one over thirty years of age.

The second First-day morning they were brought out in squads and massacred, it was beautiful early summer,
 The work commenced about five o'clock and was over by eight

None obey'd the command to kneel,
 Some made a mad and helpless rush, some stood stark and straight,
 A few fell at once, shot in the temple or heart, the living and dead lay together,
 The maim'd and mangled dug in the dirt, the new-comers saw them there, 890
 Some half-kill'd attempted to crawl away,
 These were despatch'd with bayonets or batter'd with the blunts of muskets
 A youth not seventeen years old seiz'd his assassin till two more came to release him,
 The three were all torn and cover'd with the boy's blood.

At eleven o'clock began the burning of the bodies,
 That is the tale of the murder of the four hundred and twelve young men.

35

Would you hear of an old-time sea-fight?
 Would you learn who won by the light of the moon and stars?
 List to the yarn, as my grandmother's father the sailor told it to me

Our foe was no skulk in his ship I tell you, (said he,) 900 His was the surly English pluck, and there is no tougher or truer, and never was, and never will be,
 Along the lower'd eve he came horribly raking us

We closed with him, the yards entangled, the cannon touch'd,
 My captain lash'd fast with his own hands

We had receiv'd some eighteen pound shots under the water, On our lower-gun-deck two large pieces had burst at the first fire, killing all around and blowing up overhead

Fighting at sun-down, fighting at dark, Ten o'clock at night, the full moon well up, our leaks on the gain, and five feet of water reported,
 The master-at-arms loosing the prisoners confined in the after-hold to give them a chance for themselves

The transit to and from the magazine is now stopt by the sentinels, 910
 They see so many strange faces they do not know whom to trust

Our frigate takes fire,
 The other asks if we demand quarter?
 If our colors are struck and the fighting done?

Now I laugh content, for I hear the voice of my little captain,
We have not struck, he composedly cries, we have just begun our part of the fighting.

Only three guns are in use,
 One is directed by the captain himself against the enemy's main-mast,
 Two well serv'd with grape and canister silence his musketry and clear his decks.

The tops alone second the fire of this little battery, especially the main-top, 920
 They hold out bravely during the whole of the action

Not a moment's cease,
The leaks gain fast on the pumps, the fire eats toward the powder-magazine.

One of the pumps has been shot away, it is generally thought we are sinking.

Serene stands the little captain,
He is not hurried, his voice is neither high nor low,
His eyes give more light to us than our battle-lanterns

Toward twelve there in the beams of the moon they surrender to us

36

Stretch'd and still lies the midnight,
Two great hulls motionless on the breast of the darkness, 930
Our vessel riddled and slowly sinking, preparations to pass to the one we have conquer'd, The captain on the quarter-deck coldly giving his orders through a countenance white as a sheet,
Near by the corpse of the child that serv'd in the cabin,
The dead face of an old salt with long white hair and carefully curl'd whiskers,
The flames spite of all that can be done flickering aloft and below,
The husky voices of the two or three officers yet fit for duty, Formless stacks of bodies and bodies by themselves, dabs of flesh upon the masts and spars, Cut of cordage, dangle of rigging, slight shock of the soothe of waves, Black and impassive guns, litter of powder-parcels, strong scent,
A few large stars overhead, silent and mournful shining, 940 Delicate snuffs of sea-breeze, smells of sedgy grass and fields by the shore, death-messages given in charge to survivors,
The hiss of the surgeon's knife, the gnawing teeth of his saw,
Wheeze, cluck, swash of falling blood, short wild scream, and long, dull, tapering groan,
These so, these irretrievable

37

You laggards there on guard! look to your arms!
In at the conquer'd doors they crowd! I am possess'd!
Embody all presences outlaw'd or suffering,
See myself in prison shaped like another man,
And feel the dull unintermitted pain,

For me the keepers of convicts shoulder their carbines and keep watch, 950
It is I let out in the morning and barr'd at night

Not a mutineer walks handcuff'd to jail but I am handcuff'd to him and walk by his side, (I am less the jolly one there, and more the silent one with sweat on my twitching lips )

Not a youngster is taken for larceny but I go up too, and am tried and sentenced

Not a cholera patient lies at the last gasp but I also lie at the last gasp,
My face is ash-color'd, my sinews gnarl, away from me people retreat

Askers embody themselves in me and I am embodied in them,
I project my hat, sit shame-faced, and beg

38

Enough! enough! enough!
Somehow I have been stunn'd Stand back!

Give me a little time beyond my cuff'd head, slumbers, dreams, gaping,
I discover myself on the verge of a usual mistake.

That I could forget the mockers and insults!
That I could forget the trickling tears and the blows of the bludgeons and hammers!
That I could look with a separate look on my own crucifixion and bloody crowning!

I remember now,
I resume the overstayd fraction,
The grave of rock multiplies what has been confided to it, or to any graves, Corpses rise, gashes heal, fastenings roll from me

I troop forth replenish'd with supreme power, one of an average unending procession, 97c Inland and sea-coast we go, and pass all boundary lines,
Our swift ordinances on their way over the whole earth,
The blossoms we wear in our hats the growth of thousands of years.

Eleves, I salute you! come forward!
Continue your annotations, continue your questionings.

39

The friendly and flowing savage, who is he?
Is he waiting for civilization, or past it and mastering it?

Is he some Southwesterner rais'd out-doors? is he Kanadian?
Is he from the Mississippi country? Iowa, Oregon, California?
The mountains? prairie-life, bush-life? or sailor from the sea? 98c

Wherever he goes men and women accept and desire him,
They desire he should like them, touch them, speak to them, stay with them

Behavior lawless as snow-flakes, words simple as grass, uncomb'd head, laughter, and naivetè, Slow-stepping feet, common features, common modes and emanations,
They descend in new forms from the tips of his fingers,
They are wafted with the odor of his body or breath, they fly out of the glance of his eyes

40

Flaunt of the sunshine I need not your bask—lie over!
You light surfaces only, I force surfaces and depths also.

Earth! you seem to look for something at my hands,
Say, old top-knot, what do you want? 99c

Man or woman, I might tell how I like you, but cannot,
And might tell what it is in me and what it is in you, but cannot,
And might tell that pining I have, that pulse of my nights and days.

Behold, I do not give lectures or a little charity,
When I give I give myself

You there, impotent, loose in the knees,
Open your scarf'd chops till I blow grit within you, Spread your palms and lift the flaps of your pockets,
I am not to be denied, I compel, I have stores plenty and to spare,
And any thing I have I bestow 100c

I do not ask who you are, that is not important to me,
You can do nothing and be nothing but what I will unfold you.

To cotton-field drudge or cleaner of privies I lean,
On his right cheek I put the family kiss,
And in my soul I swear I never will deny him.

On women fit for conception I start bigger and numbler babes, (This day I am jetting the stuff of far more arrogant republics )

To any one dying, thither I speed and twist the knob of the door, Turn the bed-clothes toward the foot of the bed,
Let the physician and the priest go home.

1010

I seize the descending man and raise him with resistless will,
O despairer, here is my neck,
By God, you shall not go down! hang your whole weight upon me.

I dilate you with tremendous breath, I buoy you up,
Every room of the house do I fill with an arm'd force, Lovers of me, bafflers of graves

Sleep—I and they keep guard all night,
Not doubt, not disease shall dare to lay finger upon you,
I have embraced you, and henceforth possess you to myself,
And when you rise in the morning you will find what I tell you is so.

1020

41

I am he bringing help for the sick as they pant on their backs,
And for strong upright men I bring yet more needed help.

I heard what was said of the universe,
Heard it and heard it of several thousand years;
It is muddling well as far as it goes—but is that all?

Magnifying and applying come I,
Outbidding at the start the old cautious hucksters, Taking myself the exact dimensions of Jehovah, Lithographing Kronos, Zeus his son, and Hercules his grandson, Buying drafts of Osiris, Isis, Belus, Brahma, Buddha,
In my portfolio placing Manito loose, Allah on a leaf, the crucifix engraved,
With Odin and the hideous-faced Mexith and every idol and image, Taking them all for what they are worth and not a cent more,
Admitting they were alive and did the work of their days, (They bore mutes as for unfledg'd birds who have now to rise and fly and sing for themselves,) Accepting the rough defec sketches to fill out better in myself, bestowing them freely on each man and woman I see,

1030

Discovering as much or more in a framer framing a house, Putting higher claims for him there with his roll'd-up sleeves driving the mallet and chisel,
Not objecting to special revelations, considering a curl of smoke or a hair on the back of my hand just as curious as any revelation,
Lads ahold of fire-engines and hook-and-ladder ropes no less to me than the gods of the antique wars, Minding their voices peal through the crash of destruction,

1040

Their brawny limbs passing safe over charr'd laths, their white foreheads whole and unhurt out of the flames,
 By the mechanic's wife with her babe at her nipple interceding for every person born, Three scythes at harvest whizzing in a row from three lusty angels with shirts bagg'd out at their waists,
 The snag-tooth'd hostler with red hair redeeming sins past and to come, Selling all he possesses, traveling on foot to fee lawyers for his brother and sit by him while he is tried for forgery, What was strewn in the amplest strewing the square rod about me, and not filling the square rod then,
 The bull and the bug never worshipp'd half enough, Dung and dirt more admirable than was dream'd,
 The supernatural of no account, myself waiting my time to be one of the supremes, 1050
 The day getting ready for me when I shall do as much good as the best, and be as prodigious,
 By my life-lumps! becoming already a creator, Putting myself here and now to the ambush'd womb of the shadows

42

A call in the midst of the crowd,
 My own voice, orotund sweeping and final

Come my children,
 Come my boys and girls, my women, household and intimates, Now the performer launches his nerve, he has pass'd his prelude on the reeds within.

Easily written loose-finger'd chords—I feel the thrum of your climax and close

My head slues round on my neck, 1060
 Music rolls, but not from the organ, Folks are around me, but they are no household of mine

Ever the hard unsunk ground, Ever the eaters and drinkers, ever the upward and downward sun, ever the air and the ceaseless tides,
 Ever myself and my neighbors, refreshing, wicked, real,
 Ever the old inexplicable query, ever that thorn'd thumb, that breath of itches and thirsts, Ever the vexer's hoot! hoot! till we find where the sly one hides and bring him forth, Ever love, ever the sobbing liquid of life,
 Ever the bandage under the chun, ever the trestles of death

Here and there with dimes on the eyes walking, 1070
 To feed the greed of the belly the brains liberally spooning, Tickets buying, taking, selling, but in to the feast never once going,
 Many sweating, ploughing, thrashing, and then the chaff for payment receiving,
 A few idly owning, and they the wheat continually claiming.

This is the city and I am one of the citizens, Whatever interests the rest interests me, politics, wars, markets, newspapers, schools, The mayor and councils, banks, tariffs, steamships, factories, stocks, stores, real estate and personal estate.

The little plentiful manikins skipping around in collars and tail'd coats,
 I am aware who they are, (they are positively not worms or fleas,)
 I acknowledge the duplicates of myself, the weakest and shallowest is deathless with me, 1080

What I do and say the same waits for them, Every thought that flounders in me the same flounders in them.

I know perfectly well my own egotism,
Know my omnivorous lines and must not write any less,
And would fetch you whoever you are flush with myself

Not words of routine this song of mine,
But abruptly to question, to leap beyond yet nearer bring,
This printed and bound book—but the printer and the printing-office boy?
The well-taken photographs—but your wife or friend close and solid in your arms?
The black ship mail'd with iron, her mighty guns in her turrets—but the pluck of the captain and engineers? 109c
In the houses the dishes and fare and furniture—but the host and hostess, and the look out of their eyes?
The sky up there—yet here or next door, or across the way?
The saints and sages in history—but you yourself?
Sermons, creeds, theology—but the fathomless human brain,
And what is reason? and what is love? and what is life?

43

I do not despise you priests, all time, the world over,
My faith is the greatest of faiths and the least of faiths, Enclosing worship ancient and modern and all between ancient and modern, Believing I shall come again upon the earth after five thousand years, Waiting responses from oracles, honoring the gods, saluting the sun, 110c Making a fetch of the first rock or stump, powowing with sticks in the circle of obis, Helping the llama or brahmin as he trims the lamps of the idols, Dancing yet through the streets in a phallic procession, rapt and austere in the woods a gymnosophist,
Drinking mead from the skull-cup, to Shastas and Vedas admiring, minding the Koran, Walking the teokallis, spotted with gore from the stone and knife, beating the serpent-skin drum Accepting the Gospels, accepting him that was crucified, knowing assuredly that he is divine,
To the mass kneeling or the puritan's prayer rising, or sitting patiently in a pew, Ranting and frothing in my insane crisis, or waiting dead-like till my spirit arouses me, Looking forth on pavement and land, or outside of pavement and land, Belonging to the winders of the circuit of circuits 111c

One of that centripetal and centrifugal gang I turn and talk like a man leaving charges before a journey.

Down-hearted doubters dull and excluded,
Frivolous, sullen, moping, angry, affected, dishearten'd, atheistical,
I know every one of you, I know the sea of torment, doubt, despair and unbelief.

How the flukes splash!
How they contort rapid as lightning, with spasms and spouts of blood!

Be at peace bloody flukes of doubters and sullen mopers,
I take my place among you as much as among any,
The past is the push of you, me, all, precisely the same,
And what is yet untried and afterward is for you, me, all precisely the same. 112c

I do not know what is untried and afterward,
But I know it will in its turn prove sufficient, and cannot fail.

Each who passes is consider'd, each who stops is consider'd, not a single one can it fail.

It cannot fail the young man who died and was buried,
 Nor the young woman who died and was put by his side, Nor the little child that peep'd in at the door, and then drew back and was never seen again,
 Nor the old man who has lived without purpose, and feels it with bitterness worse than gall, Nor him in the poor house tubercled by rum and the bad disorder, Nor the numberless slaughter'd and wreck'd, nor the brutish koboo call'd the ordure of humanity,
 Nor the sacs merely floating with open mouths for food to slip in, 1130
 Nor any thing in the earth, or down in the oldest graves of the earth, Nor any thing in the myriads of spheres, nor the myriads of myriads that inhabit them, Nor the present, nor the least wisp that is known

44

It is time to explain myself—let us stand up

What is known I strip away,
 I launch all men and women forward with me into the Unknown

The clock indicates the moment—but what does eternity indicate?

We have thus far exhausted trillions of winters and summers,
 There are trillions ahead, and trillions ahead of them

Births have brought us richness and variety, 1140
 And other births will bring us richness and variety

I do not call one greater and one smaller,
 That which fills its period and place is equal to any

Were mankind murderous or jealous upon you, my brother, my sister?
 I am sorry for you, they are not murderous or jealous upon me,
 All has been gentle with me, I keep no account with lamentation, (What have I to do with lamentation?)

I am an acme of things accomplish'd, and I an encloser of things to be.

My feet strike an apex of the apices of the stairs,
 On every step bunches of ages, and larger bunches between the steps, 1150
 All below duly travel'd, and still I mount and mount

Rise after rise bow the phantoms behind me, Afar down I see the huge first Nothing, I know I was even there,
 I waited unseen and always, and slept through the lethargic mist,
 And took my time, and took no hurt from the fetid carbon

Long I was hugg'd close—long and long

Immense have been the preparations for me, Faithful and friendly the arms that have help'd me

Cycles ferried my cradle, rowing and rowing like cheerful boatmen,
 For room to me stars kept aside in their own rings, 1160
 They sent influences to look after what was to hold me

Before I was born out of my mother generations guided me, My embryo has never been torpid, nothing could overlay it.

For it the nebula cohered to an orb,
The long slow strata piled to rest it on,
Vast vegetables gave it sustenance, Monstrous sauroids transported it in their mouths and deposited it with care.

All forces have been steadily employ'd to complete and delight me,
Now on this spot I stand with my robust soul

45

O span of youth! ever-push'd elasticity
O manhood, balanced, florid and full 1170

My lovers suffocate me,
Crowding my lips, thick in the pores of my skin, Jostling me through streets and public halls, coming naked to me at night, Crying by day Ahoy! from the rocks of the river, swinging and chirping over my head, Calling my name from flower-beds, vines, tangled underbrush, Lighting on every moment of my life,
Bussing my body with soft balsamic busses, Noiselessly passing handfuls out of their hearts and giving them to be mine

Old age superbly rising! O welcome, ineffable grace of dying days!

1180

Every condition promulges not only itself, it promulges what grows after and out of itself,
And the dark hush promulges as much as any

I open my scuttle at night and see the far-sprinkled systems,
And all I see multiplied as high as I can cipher edge but the rim of the farther systems.

Wider and wider they spread, expanding, always expanding, Outward and outward and forever outward

My sun has his sun and round him obediently wheels,
He joins with his partners a group of superior circuit,
And greater sets follow, making specks of the greatest inside them

There is no stoppage and never can be stoppage,
If I, you, and the worlds, and all beneath or upon their surfaces, were this moment reduced back to a pallid float, it would not avail in the long run,
We should surely bring up again where we now stand,
And surely go as much farther, and then farther and farther

1190

A few quadrillions of eras, a few octillions of cubic leagues, do not hazard the span or make it impatient,
They are but parts, any thing is but a part

See ever so far, there is limitless space outside of that, Count ever so much, there is limitless time around that.

My rendezvous is appointed, it is certain,
The Lord will be there and wait till I come on perfect terms,
The great Camerado, the lover true for whom I pine will be there.

46

I know I have the best of time and space, and was never measured and never will be measured.

I tramp a perpetual journey, (come listen all!) My signs are a rain-proof coat, good shoes, and a staff cut from the woods,
 No friend of mine takes his ease in my chair,
 I have no chair, no church, no philosophy,
 I lead no man to a dinner-table, library, exchange,
 But each man and each woman of you I lead upon a knoll,
 My left hand hooking you round the waist,
 My right hand pointing to landscapes of continents and the public road.

Not I, not any one else can travel that road for you,
 You must travel it for yourself

1210

It is not far, it is within reach,
 Perhaps you have been on it since you were born and did not know, Perhaps it is everywhere on water and on land

Shoulder your duds dear son, and I will mine, and let us hasten forth, Wonderful cities and free nations we shall fetch as we go.

If you tire, give me both burdens, and rest the chuff of your hand on my hip,
 And in due time you shall repay the same service to me,
 For after we start we never lie by again

This day before dawn I ascended a hill and look'd at the crowded heaven, And I said to my spirit When we become the enfolders of those orbs, and the pleasure and knowledge of every thing in them, shall we be fill'd and satisfied then?
 And my spirit said No, we but level that lift to pass and continue beyond

1220

You are also asking me questions and I hear you,
 I answer that I cannot answer, you must find out for yourself

Sit a while dear son,
 Here are biscuits to eat and here is milk to drink,
 But as soon as you sleep and renew yourself in sweet clothes, I kiss you with a good-by kiss and open the gate for your egress hence

Long enough have you dream'd contemptible dreams,
 Now I wash the gum from your eyes,
 You must habit yourself to the dazzle of the light and of every moment of your life

1230

Long have you timidly waded holding a plank by the shore,
 Now I will you to be a bold swimmer, To jump off in the midst of the sea, rise again, nod to me, shout, and laughingly dash with your hair.

47

I am the teacher of athletes,
 He that by me spreads a wider breast than my own proves the width of my own,
 He most honors my style who learns under it to destroy the teacher

The boy I love, the same becomes a man not through derived power, but in his own right, Wicked rather than virtuous out of conformity or fear,

Fond of his sweetheart, relishing well his steak, Unrequited love or a slight cutting him worse than sharp steel cuts, 1240
 First-rate to ride, to fight, to hit the bull's eye, to sail a skiff, to sing a song or play on the banjo, Preferring scars and the beard and faces pitted with small-pox over all latherers,
 And those well-tann'd to those that keep out of the sun.

I teach straying from me, yet who can stray from me?
 I follow you whoever you are from the present hour,
 My words itch at your ears till you understand them

I do not say these things for a dollar or to fill up the time while I wait for a boat, (It is you talking just as much as myself, I act as the tongue of you, Tied in your mouth, in mine it begins to be loosen'd )

I swear I will never again mention love or death inside a house, 1250
 And I swear I will never translate myself at all, only to him or her who privately stays with me in the open air

If you would understand me go to the heights or water-shore,
 The nearest gnat is an explanation, and a drop or motion of waves a key,
 The maul, the oar, the hand-saw, second my words

No shutter'd room or school can commune with me, But roughs and little children better than they.

The young mechanic is closest to me, he knows me well,
 The woodman that takes his axe and jug with him shall take me with him all day,
 The farm-boy ploughing in the field feels good at the sound of my voice,
 In vessels that sail my words sail, I go with fishermen and seamen and love them 1260

The soldier camp'd or upon the march is mine,
 On the night ere the pending battle many seek me, and I do not fail them,
 On that solemn night (it may be their last) those that know me seek me

My face rubs to the hunter's face when he lies down alone in his blanket,
 The driver thinking of me does not mind the jolt of his wagon,
 The young mother and old mother comprehend me,
 The girl and the wife rest the needle a moment and forget where they are,
 They and all would resume what I have told them

48

I have said that the soul is not more than the body,
 And I have said that the body is not more than the soul, 1270 And nothing, not God, is greater to one than one's self is,
 And whoever walks a furlong without sympathy walks to his own funeral drest in his shroud,
 And I or you pocketless of a dime may purchase the pick of the earth,
 And to glance with an eye or show a bean in its pod confounds the learning of all times,
 And there is no trade or employment but the young man following it may become a hero,
 And there is no object so soft but it makes a hub for the wheel'd universe,
 And I say to any man or woman, Let your soul stand cool and composed before a million universes

And I say to mankind, Be not curious about God,
 For I who am curious about each am not curious about God, (No array of terms can say how much I am at peace about God and about death ) 1280

I hear and behold God in every object, yet understand God not in the least, Nor do I understand who there can be more wonderful than myself

Why should I wish to see God better than this day?
I see something of God each hour of the twenty-four, and each moment then,
In the faces of men and women I see God, and in my own face in the glass,
I find letters from God dropt in the street, and every one is sign'd by God's name,
And I leave them where they are, for I know that wheresoe'er I go, Others will punctually come for ever and ever.

49

And as to you Death, and you bitter hug of mortality, it is idle to try to alarm me.

To his work without flinching the accoucheur comes,
I see the elder-hand pressing receiving supporting,
I recline by the sills of the exquisite flexible doors,
And mark the outlet, and mark the relief and escape

1290

And as to you Corpse I think you are good manure, but that does not offend me,
I smell the white roses sweet-scented and growing,
I reach to the leafy lips, I reach to the polish'd breasts of melons

And as to you Life I reckon you are the leavings of many deaths, (No doubt I have died myself ten thousand times before )

I hear you whispering there O stars of heaven,
O suns—O grass of graves—O perpetual transfers and promotions,
If you do not say any thing how can I say any thing?

1300

Of the turbid pool that lies in the autumn forest,
Of the moon that descends the steeps of the soughing twilight, Toss, sparkles of day and dusk—toss on the black stems that decay in the muck, Toss to the moaning gibberish of the dry limbs

I ascend from the moon, I ascend from the night, I perceive that the ghastly glimmer is noonday sunbeams reflected,
And debouch to the steady and central from the offspring great or small.

50

There is that in me—I do not know what it is—but I know it is in me.

Wrench'd and sweaty—calm and cool then my body becomes,
I sleep—I sleep long

1310

I do not know it—it is without name—it is a word unsaid,
It is not in any dictionary, utterance, symbol.

Something it swings on more than the earth I swing on,
To it the creation is the friend whose embracing awakes me.

Perhaps I might tell more Outlines! I plead for my brothers and sisters.

Do you see O my brothers and sisters?
It is not chaos or death—it is form, union, plan—it is eternal life—it is Happiness.

51

The past and present wilt—I have fill'd them, emptied them,
And proceed to fill my next fold of the future

1330

Listener up there! what have you to confide to me?
Look in my face while I snuff the side of evening, (Talk honestly, no one else hears you, and I stay only a minute longer.)

Do I contradict myself?
Very well then I contradict myself, (I am large, I contain multitudes )

I concentrate toward them that are nigh, I wait on the door-slab

Who has done his day's work? who will soonest be through with his supper?
Who wishes to walk with me?

Will you speak before I am gone? will you prove already too late?

1330

52

The spotted hawk swoops by and accuses me, he complains of my gab and my loitering.

I too am not a bit tamed, I too am untranslatable,
I sound my barbaric yawp over the roofs of the world

The last scud of day holds back for me,
It flings my likeness after the rest and true as any on the shadow'd wilds,
It coaxes me to the vapor and the dusk

I depart as air, I shake my white locks at the runaway sun,
I effuse my flesh in eddies, and drift it in lacy jags

I bequeath myself to the dirt to grow from the grass I love,
If you want me again look for me under your boot-soles.

1340

You will hardly know who I am or what I mean,
But I shall be good health to you nevertheless,
And filter and fibre your blood

Failing to fetch me at first keep encouraged, Missing me one place search another,
I stop somewhere waiting for you 1855

ONE HOUR TO MADNESS AND JOY

ONE hour to madness and joy! O furious! O confine me not!
(What is this that frees me so in storms?
What do my shouts amid lightnings and raging winds mean?)

O to drink the mystic delirium deeper than any other man!
O savage and tender achings! (I bequeath them to you, my children,
I tell them to you, for reasons, O bridegroom and bride.)

O to be yielded to you whoever you are, and you to be yielded to me in defiance of the world!

O to return to Paradise! O bashful and feminine!

O to draw you to me, to plant on you for the first time the lips of a determin'd man.

O the puzzle, the thrice-tied knot, the deep and dark pool, all untied and illumin'd! 10

O to speed where there is space enough and air enough at last!

To be absolv'd from previous ties and conventions, I from mine and you from yours!

To find a new unthought-of nonchalance with the best of Nature!

To have the gag remov'd from one's mouth!

To have the feeling to-day or any day I am sufficient as I am.

O something unprov'd! something in a trance!

To escape utterly from others' anchors and holds!

To drive free! to love free! to dash reckless and dangerous!

To court destruction with taunts, with invitations!

To ascend, to leap to the heavens of the love indicated to me! 20

To rise thither with my inebriate soul!

To be lost if it must be so!

To feed the remainder of life with one hour of fulness and freedom!

With one brief hour of madness and joy

I SAW IN LOUISIANA A LIVE-OAK GROWING

I saw in Louisiana a live-oak growing,

All alone stood it and the moss hung down from the branches,

Without any companion it grew there uttering joyous leaves of dark green,

And its look, rude, unbending, lusty, made me think of myself,

But I wonder'd how it could utter joyous leaves standing alone there without its friend near, for I knew I could not,

And I broke off a twig with a certain number of leaves upon it, and twined around it a little moss,

And brought it away, and I have placed it in sight in my room,

It is not needed to remind me as of my own dear friends,

(For I believe lately I think of little else than of them,)

Yet it remains to me a curious token, it makes me think of manly love, 10

For all that, and though the live-oak glistens there in Louisiana solitary in a wide flat space,

Uttering joyous leaves all its life without a friend a lover near,

I know very well I could not.

1860

I HEAR IT WAS CHARGED AGAINST ME

I HEAR it was charged against me that I sought to destroy institutions,

But really I am neither for nor against institutions,

(What indeed have I in common with them? or what with the destruction of them?)

Only I will establish in the Mannahatta and in every city of these States inland and seaboard,

And in the fields and woods, and above every keel little or large that dents the water,

Without edifices or rules or trustees or any argument,

The institution of the dear love of comrades.

CROSSING BROOKLYN FERRY

I

FLOOD-TIDE below me! I see you face to face!
 Clouds of the west—sun there half an hour high—I see you also face to face.

Crowds of men and women attired in the usual costumes, how curious you are to me!
 On the ferry-boats the hundreds and hundreds that cross, returning home, are more curious to me than you suppose,
 And you that shall cross from shore to shore years hence are more to me, and more in my meditations, than you might suppose

2

The impalpable sustenance of me from all things at all hours of the day,
 The simple, compact, well-join'd scheme, myself disintegrated, every one disintegrated yet part of the scheme,
 The similitudes of the past and those of the future, The glories strung like beads on my smallest sights and hearings, on the walk in the street and the passage over the river,
 The current rushing so swiftly and swimming with me far away, 10
 The others that are to follow me, the ties between me and them,
 The certainty of others, the life, love, sight, hearing of others

Others will enter the gates of the ferry and cross from shore to shore, Others will watch the run of the flood-tide, Others will see the shipping of Manhattan north and west, and the heights of Brooklyn to the south and east,
 Others will see the islands large and small,
 Fifty years hence, others will see them as they cross, the sun half an hour high,
 A hundred years hence, or ever so many hundred years hence, others will see them, Will enjoy the sunset, the pouring-in of the flood-tide, the falling-back to the sea of the ebb-tide

3

It avails not, time nor place—distance avails not, 20
 I am with you, you men and women of a generation, or ever so many generations hence,
 Just as you feel when you look on the river and sky, so I felt,
 Just as any of you is one of a living crowd, I was one of a crowd,
 Just as you are refresh'd by the gladness of the river and the bright flow, I was refresh'd, Just as you stand and lean on the rail, yet hurry with the swift current, I stood yet was hurried,
 Just as you look on the numberless masts of ships and the thick-stemm'd pipes of steamboats,
     I look'd

I too many and many a time cross'd the river of old, Watched the Twelfth-month sea-gulls, saw them high in the air floating with motionless wings, oscillating their bodies,
 Saw how the glistening yellow lit up parts of their bodies and left the rest in strong shadow, Saw the slow-wheeling circles and the gradual edging toward the south, 30 Saw the reflection of the summer sky in the water,
 Had my eyes dazzled by the shimmering track of beams, Look'd at the fine centrifugal spokes of light round the shape of my head in the sunlit water, Look'd on the haze on the hills southward and south-westward, Look'd on the vapor as it flew in fleeces tinged with violet,

Look'd toward the lower bay to notice the vessels arriving,
 Saw their approach, saw aboard those that were near me,
 Saw the white sails of schooners and sloops, saw the ships at anchor,
 The sailors at work in the rigging or out astride the spars,
 The round masts, the swinging motion of the hulls, the slender serpentine pennants, 40
 The large and small steamers in motion, the pilots in their pilot-houses,
 The white wake left by the passage, the quick tremulous whirl of the wheels,
 The flags of all nations, the falling of them at sunset,
 The scallop-edged waves in the twilight, the ladled cups, the frolicsome crests and glistening, The stretch afar growing dimmer and dimmer, the gray walls of the granite storehouses by the docks,
 On the river the shadowy group, the big steam-tug closely flank'd on each side by the barges, the hay-boat, the belated lighter, On the neighboring shore the fires from the foundry chimneys burning high and glaringly into the night,
 Casting their flicker of black contrasted with wild red and yellow light over the tops of houses, and down into the clefts of streets

4

These and all else were to me the same as they are to you,
 I loved well those cities, loved well the stately and rapid river, 50
 The men and women I saw were all near to me, Others the same—others who look back on me because I look'd forward to them,
 (The time will come, though I stop here to-day and to-night )

5

What is it then between us?
 What is the count of the scores or hundreds of years between us?

Whatever it is, it avails not—distance avails not, and place avails not,
 I too lived, Brooklyn of ample hills was mine,
 I too walk'd the streets of Manhattan island, and bathed in the waters around it,
 I too felt the curious abrupt questionings stir within me
 In the day among crowds of people sometimes they came upon me, 60
 In my walks home late at night or as I lay in my bed they came upon me,
 I too had been struck from the float forever held in solution,
 I too had receiv'd identity by my body,
 That I was I knew was of my body, and what I should be I knew I should be of my body

6

It is not upon you alone the dark patches fall,
 The dark threw its patches down upon me also,
 The best I had done seem'd to me blank and suspicious,
 My great thoughts as I supposed them, were they not in reality meagre?
 Nor is it you alone who know what it is to be evil,
 I am he who knew what it was to be evil, 70
 I too knitted the old knot of contrariety, Blabb'd, blush'd, resented, lied, stole, grudg'd,
 Had guile, anger, lust, hot wishes I dared not speak,
 Was wayward, vain, greedy, shallow, sly, cowardly, malignant,
 The wolf, the snake, the hog, not wanting in me,
 The cheating look, the frivolous word, the adulterous wish, not wanting, Refusals, hates, postponements, meanness, laziness, none of these wanting,
 Was one with the rest, the days and haps of the rest,

Was call'd by my highest name by clear loud voices of young men as they saw me approaching or passing, 79
 Felt their arms on my neck as I stood, or the negligent leaning of their flesh against me as I sat, Saw many I loved in the street or ferry-boat or public assembly, yet never told them a word, Lived the same life with the rest, the same old laughing, gnawing, sleeping, Play'd the part that still looks back on the actor or actress,
 The same old role, the role that is what we make it, as great as we like,
 Or as small as we like, or both great and small.

7

Closer yet I approach you,
 What thought you have of me now, I had as much of you—I laid in my stores in advance,
 I consider'd long and seriously of you before you were born

Who was to know what should come home to me?
 Who knows but I am enjoying this? 90 Who knows, for all the distance, but I am as good as looking at you now, for all you cannot see me?

8

Ah, what can ever be more stately and admirable to me than mast-hemm'd Manhattan?
 River and sunset and scallop-edg'd waves of flood-tide?
 The sea-gulls oscillating their bodies, the hay-boat in the twilight, and the belated lighter?
 What gods can exceed these that clasp me by the hand, and with voices I love call me promptly and loudly by my highest name as I approach?

What is more subtle than this which ties me to the woman or man that looks in my face?
 Which fuses me into you now, and pours my meaning into you?

We understand then do we not?
 What I promis'd without mentioning it, have you not accepted?
 What the study could not teach—what the preaching could not accomplish is accomplish'd, is it not? 100

9

Flow on, river! flow with the flood-tide, and ebb with the ebb-tide!
 Frolic on, crested and scallop-edg'd waves!
 Gorgeous clouds of the sunset! drench with your splendor me, or the men and women generations after me!
 Cross from shore to shore, countless crowds of passengers!
 Stand up, tall masts of Mannahatta! stand up, beautiful hills of Brooklyn!
 Throb, baffled and curious brain! throw out questions and answers!
 Suspend here and everywhere, eternal float of solution!
 Gaze, loving and thirsting eyes, in the house or street or public assembly!
 Sound out, voices of young men! loudly and musically call me by my highest name!
 Live, old life! play the part that looks back on the actor or actress! 110
 Play the old role, the role that is great or small according as one makes it!
 Consider, you who peruse me, whether I may not in unknown ways be looking upon you,
 Be firm, rail over the river, to support those who lean idly, yet haste with the hasting current,
 Fly on, sea-birds! fly sideways, or wheel in large circles high in the air, Receive the summer sky, you water, and faithfully hold it till all downcast eyes have time to take it from you!
 Diverge, fine spokes of light, from the shape of my head, or any one's head, in the sunlit water!
 Come on, ships from the lower bay! pass up or down, white-sail'd schooners, sloops, lighters!

Flaunt away, flags of all nations! be duly lower'd at sunset!
 Burn high your fires, foundry chimneys! cast black shadows at nightfall! cast red and yellow light over the tops of the houses!
 Appearances, now or henceforth, indicate what you are, 120
 You necessary film, continue to envelop the soul,
 About my body for me, and your body for you, be hung our divinest aromas, Thrive, cities—bring your freight, bring your shows, ample and sufficient rivers, Expand, being than which none else is perhaps more spiritual,
 Keep your places, objects than which none else is more lasting

You have waited, you always wait, you dumb, beautiful ministers,
 We receive you with free sense at last, and are insatiate henceforward,
 Not you any more shall be able to foil us, or withhold yourselves from us,
 We use you, and do not cast you aside—we plant you permanently within us,
 We fathom you not—we love you—there is perfection in you also, 130
 You furnish your parts toward eternity, Great or small, you furnish your parts toward the soul

1856

FROM SONG OF THE BROAD-AXE

I

WEAPON shapely, naked, wan,
 Head from the mother's bowels drawn,
 Wooded flesh and metal bone, limb only one and lip only one,
 Gray-blue leaf by red-heat grown, helve produced from a little seed sown, Resting the grass amid and upon,
 To be lean'd and to lean on 1856

PIONEERS! O PIONEERS!

COME my tan-faced children,
 Follow well in order, get your weapons ready,
 Have you your pistols? have you your sharp-edged axes?
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

For we cannot tarry here,
 We must march my darlings, we must bear the brunt of danger,
 We the youthful sinewy races, all the rest on us depend,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

O you youths, Western youths,
 So impatient, full of action, full of manly pride and friendship, 10 Plain I see you Western youths, see you tramping with the foremost,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Have the elder races halted?
 Do they droop and end their lesson, wearied over there beyond the seas?
 We take up the task eternal, and the burden and the lesson,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the past we leave behind,
 We debouch upon a newer mightier world, varied world,
 Fresh and strong the world we seize, world of labor and the march,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

20

We detachments steady throwing,
Down the edges, through the passes, up the mountains steep, Conquering, holding, daring, venturing as we go the unknown ways,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

We primeval forests felling,
We the rivers stemming, vexing we and piercing deep the mines within,
We the surface broad surveying, we the virgin soil upheaving,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

Colorado men are we,
From the peaks gigantic, from the great sierras and the high plateaus,
From the mine and from the gully, from the hunting trail we come,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

30

From Nebraska, from Arkansas,
Central inland race are we, from Missouri, with the continental blood intervein'd, All the hands of comrades clasping, all the Southern, all the Northern,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

O resistless restless race!
O beloved race in all! O my breast aches with tender love for all!
O I mourn and yet exult, I am rapt with love for all,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

40

Raise the mighty mother mistress, Waving high the delicate mistress, over all the starry mistress, (bend your heads all,) Raise the fang'd and warlike mistress, stern, impassive, weapon'd mistress,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

See my children, resolute children,
By those swarms upon our rear we must never yield or falter, Ages back in ghostly millions frowning there behind us urging,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

On and on the compact ranks,
With accessions ever waiting, with the places of the dead quickly fill'd, Through the battle, through defeat, moving yet and never stopping,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

50

O to die advancing on!
Are there some of us to droop and die? has the hour come?
Then upon the march we fittest die, soon and sure the gap is fill'd,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the pulses of the world,
Falling in they beat for us, with the Western movement beat,
Holding single or together, steady moving to the front, all for us, Pioneers! O pioneers!

60

Life's involv'd and varied pageants,
All the forms and shows, all the workmen at their work,
All the seamen and the landsmen, all the masters with their slaves,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the hapless silent lovers,
 All the prisoners in the prisons, all the righteous and the wicked,
 All the joyous, all the sorrowing, all the living, all the dying,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

I too with my soul and body,
 We, a curious trio, picking, wandering on our way, Through these shores amid the shadows, with the apparitions pressing,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

70

Lo, the darting bowling orb!
 Lo, the brother orbs around, all the clustering suns and planets,
 All the dazzling days, all the mystic nights with dreams,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

These are of us, they are with us,
 All for primal needed work, while the followers there in embryo wait behind,
 We to-day's procession heading, we the route for travel clearing,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

80

O you daughters of the West!
 O you young and elder daughters! O you mothers and you wives!
 Never must you be divided, in our ranks you move united,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Minstrels latent on the prairies!
 (Shrouded bards of other lands, you may rest, you have done your work,) Soon I hear you coming warbling, soon you rise and tramp amid us,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Not for delectations sweet,
 Not the cushion and the slipper, not the peaceful and the studious,
 Not the riches safe and palling, not for us the tame enjoyment,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

90

Do the feasters gluttonous feast?
 Do the corpulent sleepers sleep? have they lock'd and bolted doors?
 Still be ours the diet hard, and the blanket on the ground,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

Has the night descended?
 Was the road of late so toilsome? did we stop discouraged nodding on our way?
 Yet a passing hour I yield you in your tracks to pause oblivious, Pioneers! O pioneers!

100

Till with sound of trumpet,
 Far, far off the daybreak call—hark! how loud and clear I hear it wind, Swift! to the head of the army!—swift! spring to your places,
 Pioneers! O pioneers!

FRANCE

THE 18TH YEAR OF THESE STATES

A GREAT year and place,
 A harsh discordant natal scream out-sounding, to touch the mother's heart closer than any yet

I walk'd the shores of my Eastern sea, Heard over the waves the little voice,
 Saw the divine infant where she woke mournfully wailing, amid the roar of cannon, curses, shouts, crash of falling buildings, Was not so sick from the blood in the gutters running, nor from the single corpses, nor those in heaps, nor those borne away in the tumbrils, Was not so desperate at the battues of death—was not so shock'd at the repeated fusillades of the guns.

Pale, silent, stern, what could I say to that long-accrued retribution?
 Could I wish humanity different?
 Could I wish the people made of wood and stone?
 Or that there be no justice in destiny or time?

10

O Liberty! O mate for me!
 Here too the blaze, the grape-shot and the axe, in reserve, to fetch them out in case of need,
 Here too, though long repress'd, can never be destroy'd, Here too could rise at last murdering and ecstatic,
 Here too demanding full arrears of vengeance

Hence I sign this salute over the sea,
 And I do not deny that terrible red birth and baptism, But remember the little voice that I heard wailing, and wait with perfect trust, no matter how long,
 And from to-day sad and cogent I maintain the bequeath'd cause, as for all lands,
 And I send these words to Paris with my love,
 And I guess some chansonniers there will understand them,
 For I guess there is latent music yet in France, floods of it, O I hear already the bustle of instruments, they will soon be drowning all that would interrupt
     them,
 O I think the east wind brings a triumphal and free march,
 It reaches hither, it swells me to joyful madness,
 I will run transpose it in words, to justify it,
 I will yet sing a song for you ma femme

OUT OF THE CRADLE ENDLESSLY ROCKING

Out of the cradle endlessly rocking,
 Out of the mocking-bird's throat, the musical shuttle,
 Out of the Ninth-month midnight, Over the sterile sands and the fields beyond, where the child leaving his bed wander'd alone, bareheaded, barefoot,
 Down from the shower'd halo,
 Up from the mystic play of shadows twining and twisting as if they were alive,
 Out from the patches of briers and blackberries,
 From the memories of the bird that chanted to me,
 From your memories sad brother, from the fitful risings and fallings I heard,
 From under that yellow half-moon late-risen and swollen as if with tears,
 From those beginning notes of yearning and love there in the mist,
 From the thousand responses of my heart never to cease,
 From the myriad thence-arous'd words,
 From the word stronger and more delicious than any,
 From such as now they start the scene revisiting,
 As a flock, twittering, rising, or overhead passing,
 Borne hither, ere all eludes me, hurriedly,

10

*And do you wait a moment you husky-nois'd sea,
For somewhere I believe I heard my mate responding to me,
So faint, I must be still, be still to listen,
But not altogether still, for then she might not come immediately to me.*

110

*Hither my love!
Here I am! here!
With this just-sustain'd note I announce myself to you,
This gentle call is for you my love, for you*

*Do not be decoy'd elsewhere,
That is the whistle of the wind, it is not my voice,
That is the fluttering, the fluttering of the spray, Those are the shadows of leaves*

*O darkness! O in vain!
O I am very sick and sorrowful*

120

*O brown halo in the sky near the moon, drooping upon the sea!
O troubled reflection in the sea!
O throat! O throbbing heart!
And I singing uselessly, uselessly all the night*

*O past! O happy life! O songs of joy!
In the air, in the woods, over fields,
Loved! loved! loved! loved! loved!
But my mate no more, no more with me!
We two together no more.*

*The aria sinking,
All else continuing, the stars shining,
The winds blowing, the notes of the bird continuous echoing,
With angry moans the fierce old mother incessantly moaning,
On the sands of Paumanok's shore gray and rustling,
The yellow half-moon enlarged, sagging down, drooping, the face of the sea almost touching,
The boy ecstatic, with his bare feet the waves, with his hair the atmosphere dallying,
The love in the heart long pent, now loose, now at last tumultuously bursting,
The aria's meaning, the ears, the soul, swiftly depositing,
The strange tears down the cheeks coursing,
The colloquy there, the trio, each uttering,
The undertone, the savage old mother incessantly crying,
To the boy's soul's questions sullenly tuning, some drown'd secret hussing,
To the outsetting bard.*

140

*Demon or bird! (said the boy's soul,
Is it indeed toward your mate you sing? or is it really to me?
For I, that was a child, my tongue's use sleeping, now I have heard you,
Now in a moment I know what I am for, I awake, And already a thousand singers, a thousand songs, clearer, louder and more sorrowful than yours,
A thousand warbling echoes have started to life within me, never to die.*

O you singer solitary, singing by yourself, projecting me, O solitary me listening, never more shall I cease perpetuating you, Never more shall I escape, never more the reverberations,

150

Never more the cries of unsatisfied love be absent from me, Never again leave me to be the peaceful child I was before what there in the night,
 By the sea under the yellow and sagging moon,
 The messenger there arous'd, the fire, the sweet hell within,
 The unknown want, the destiny of me

O give me the clew! (it lurks in the night here somewhere,) O if I am to have so much, let me have more!

A word then, (for I will conquer it,) 160
 The word final, superior to all,
 Subtle, sent up—what is it?—I listen,
 Are you whispering it, and have been all the time, you sea waves?
 Is that it from your liquid rims and wet sands?

Whereto answering, the sea,
 Delaying not, hurrying not,
 Whisper'd me through the night, and very plainly before daybreak, Lisp'd to me the low and delicious word death,
 And again death, death, death, death,
 Hissing melodious, neither like the bird nor like my arous'd child's heart, 170
 But edging near as privately for me rustling at my feet, Creeping thence steadily up to my ears and laving me softly all over,
 Death, death, death, death, death.

Which I do not forget,
 But fuse the song of my dusky demon and brother,
 That he sang to me in the moonlight on Paumanok's gray beach,
 With the thousand responsive songs at random,
 My own songs awaked from that hour,
 And with them the key, the word up from the waves,
 The word of the sweetest song and all songs, 180
 That strong and delicious word which, creeping to my feet, (Or like some old crone rocking the cradle, swathed in sweet garments, bending aside,)
 The sea whisper'd me

TO THE MAN-OF-WAR-BIRD

THOU who hast slept all night upon the storm, Waking renew'd on thy prodigious pinions, (Burst the wild storm? above it thou ascended'st, And rested on the sky, thy slave that cradled thee,)
 Now a blue point, far, far in heaven floating,
 As to the light emerging here on deck I watch thee, (Myself a speck, a point on the world's floating vast ) Far, far at sea,
 After the night's fierce drifts have strewn the shore with wrecks,
 With re-appearing day as now so happy and serene, 190
 The rosy and elastic dawn, the flashing sun,
 The limpid spread of air cerulean,
 Thou also re-appearest.

Thou born to match the gale, (thou art all wings,)
 To cope with heaven and earth and sea and hurricane,

Thou ship of air that never furl'st thy sails,
 Days, even weeks untired and onward, through spaces, realms gyrating,
 At dusk that look'st on Senegal, at morn America,
 That sport'st amid the lightning-flash and thunder-cloud,
 In them, in thy experiences, had'st thou my soul,
 What joys! what joys were thine!

ON THE BEACH AT NIGHT

ON the beach at night,
 Stands a child with her father,
 Watching the east, the autumn sky.

Up through the darkness,
 While ravening clouds, the burial clouds, in black masses spreading, Lower sullen and fast athwart and down the sky,
 Amid a transparent clear belt of ether yet left in the east, Ascends large and calm the lord-star Jupiter,
 And nigh at hand, only a very little above,
 Swim the delicate sisters the Pleiades

10

From the beach the child holding the hand of her father, Those burial clouds that lower victorious soon to devour all,
 Watching, silently weeps.

Weep not, child,
 Weep not, my darling,
 With these kisses let me remove your tears,
 The ravening clouds shall not long be victorious,
 They shall not long possess the sky, they devour the stars only in apparition, Jupiter shall emerge, be patient, watch again another night, the Pleiades shall emerge,
 They are immortal, all those stars both silvery and golden shall shine out again,
 The great stars and the little ones shall shine out again, they endure,
 The vast immortal suns and the long-enduring pensive moons shall again shine.

20

Then dearest child mournest thou only for Jupiter?
 Considerest thou alone the burial of the stars?

Something there is,
 (With my lips soothing thee, adding I whisper,
 I give thee the first suggestion, the problem and indirection,) Something there is more immortal even than the stars, (Many the burials, many the days and nights, passing away,) Something that shall endure longer even than lustrous Jupiter, Longer than sun or any revolving satellite,
 Or the radiant sisters the Pleiades.

EUROPE

THE 72D AND 73D YEARS OF THESE STATES

SUDDENLY out of its stale and drowsy lair, the lair of slaves, Like lightning it le'pt forth half startled at itself,
 Its feet upon the ashes and the rags, its hand tight to the throats of kings.

O hope and faith!
O aching close of exiled patriots' lives!
O many a sicken'd heart!
Turn back unto this day and make yourselves afresh.

And you, paid to defile the People—you liars, mark!
Not for numberless agonies, murders, lusts, For court thieving in its manifold mean forms, worming from his simplicity the poor man's wages, 10
For many a promise sworn by royal lips and broken and laugh'd at in the breaking, Then in their power not for all these did the blows strike revenge, or the heads of the nobles fall,
The People scorn'd the ferocity of kings.

But the sweetness of mercy brew'd bitter destruction, and the frighten'd monarchs come back,
Each comes in state with his train, hangman, priest, tax-gatherer, Soldier, lawyer, lord, jailer, and sycophant

Yet behind all lowering stealing, lo, a shape, Vague as the night, draped interminably, head, front and form, in scarlet folds, Whose face and eyes none may see,
Out of its robes only this, the red robes lifted by the arm,
One finger crook'd pointed high over the top, like the head of a snake appears.

Meanwhile corpses lie in new-made graves, bloody corpses of young men,
The rope of the gibbet hangs heavily, the bullets of princes are flying, the creatures of power laugh aloud,
And all these things bear fruits, and they are good

Those corpses of young men,
Those martyrs that hang from the gibbets, those hearts pierc'd by the gray lead, Cold and motionless as they seem live elsewhere with unslaughter'd vitality.

They live in other young men O kings!
They live in brothers again ready to defy you,
They were purified by death, they were taught and exalted.

Not a grave of the murder'd for freedom but grows seed for freedom, in its turn to bear seed,
Which the winds carry afar and re-sow, and the rains and the snows nourish

Not a disembodied spirit can the weapons of tyrants let loose,
But it stalks invisibly over the earth, whispering, counseling, cautioning

Liberty, let others despair of you—I never despair of you.

Is the house shut? is the master away?
Nevertheless, be ready, be not weary of watching,
He will soon return, his messengers come anon

WHEN I HEARD THE LEARN'D ASTRONOMER

WHEN I heard the learn'd astronomer,
When the proofs, the figures, were ranged in columns before me,

When I was shown the charts and diagrams, to add, divide, and measure them, When I sitting heard the astronomer where he lectured with much applause in the lecture-room,

How soon unaccountable I became tired and sick, Till rising and gliding out I wander'd off by myself,
In the mystical moist night-air, and from time to time, Look'd up in perfect silence at the stars

1865

CAVALRY CROSSING A FORD

A LINE in long array where they wind betwixt green islands,
They take a serpentine course, their arms flash in the sun—hark to the musical clank, Behold the silvery river, in it the splashing horses loitering stop to drink, Behold the brown-faced men, each group, each person a picture, the negligent rest on the saddles,

Some emerge on the opposite bank, others are just entering the ford—while,
Scarlet and blue and snowy white,
The guidon flags flutter gayly in the wind

1865

COME UP FROM THE FIELDS FATHER

COME up from the fields father, here's a letter from our Pete,
And come to the front door mother, here's a letter from thy dear son

Lo, 'tis autumn,
Lo, where the trees, deeper green, yellower and redder, Cool and sweeten Ohio's villages with leaves fluttering in the moderate wind, Where apples ripe in the orchards hang and grapes on the trellis'd vines, (Smell you the smell of the grapes on the vines?
Smell you the buckwheat where the bees were lately buzzing?)

Above all, lo, the sky so calm, so transparent after the rain, and with wondrous clouds, Below too, all calm, all vital and beautiful, and the farm prospers well

10

Down in the fields all prospers well,
But now from the fields come father, come at the daughter's call,
And come to the entry mother, to the front door come right away

Fast as she can she hurries, something ominous, her steps trembling,
She does not tarry to smooth her hair nor adjust her cap

Open the envelope quickly,
O this is not our son's writing, yet his name is sign'd,
O a strange hand writes for our dear son, O stricken mother's soul!
All swims before her eyes, flashes with black, she catches the main words only, Sentences broken, gunshot wound in the breast, cavalry skirmish, taken to hospital,
At present low, but will soon be better.

20

Ah now the single figure to me,
Amid all teeming and wealthy Ohio with all its cities and farms, Sickly white in the face and dull in the head, very faint,
By the jamb of a door leans

Grieve not so, dear mother, (the just-grown daughter speaks through her sobs, The little sisters huddle around speechless and dismay'd,) See, dearest mother, the letter says Pete will soon be better.

Alas poor boy, he will never be better, (nor may-be needs to be better, that brave and simple soul,)

While they stand at home at the door he is dead already,
The only son is dead

30

But the mother needs to be better,
She with thin form presently drest in black,
By day her meals untouch'd, then at night fitfully sleeping, often waking,
In the midnight waking, weeping, longing with one deep longing,
O that she might withdraw unnoticed, silent from life escape and withdraw,
To follow, to seek, to be with her dear dead son 1865

A MARCH IN THE RANKS HARD-PREST, AND THE ROAD UNKNOWN

A MARCH in the ranks hard-prest, and the road unknown,
A route through a heavy wood with muffled steps in the darkness,
Our army foil'd with loss severe, and the sullen remnant retreating, Till after midnight glimmer upon us the lights of a dim-lighted building,
We come to an open space in the woods, and halt by the dim-lighted building,
'Tis a large old church at the crossing roads, now an impromptu hospital, Entering but for a minute I see a sight beyond all the pictures and poems ever made,
Shadows of deepest, deepest black, just lit by moving candles and lamps,
And by one great pitchy torch stationary with wild red flame and clouds of smoke,
By these, crowds, groups of forms vaguely I see on the floor, some in the pews laid down, 10 At my feet more distinctly a soldier, a mere lad, in danger of bleeding to death, (he is shot in the abdomen,)

I stanch the blood temporarily, (the youngster's face is white as a lily,) Then before I depart I sweep my eyes o'er the scene fain to absorb it all, Faces, varieties, postures beyond description, most in obscurity, some of them dead, Surgeons operating, attendants holding lights, the smell of ether, the odor of blood,
The crowd, O the crowd of the bloody forms, the yard outside also fill'd,
Some on the bare ground, some on planks or stretchers, some in the death-spasm sweating,
An occasional scream or cry, the doctor's shouted orders or calls,
The glisten of the little steel instruments catching the glint of the torches, These I resume as I chant, I see again the forms, I smell the odor, 20 Then hear outside the orders given, Fall in, my men, fall in,
But first I bend to the dying lad, his eyes open, a half-smile gives he me,
Then the eyes close, calmly close, and I speed forth to the darkness, Resuming, marching, ever in darkness marching, on in the ranks,
The unknown road still marching.

1865

A SIGHT IN CAMP IN THE DAYBREAK GRAY AND DIM

A SIGHT in camp in the daybreak gray and dim,
As from my tent I emerge so early sleepless,
As slow I walk in the cool fresh air the path near by the hospital tent, Three forms I see on stretchers lying, brought out there untended lying,
Over each the blanket spread, ample brownish woolen blanket, Gray and heavy blanket, folding, covering all.

Curious I halt and silent stand,
 Then with light fingers I from the face of the nearest the first just lift the blanket, Who are you elderly man so gaunt and grim, with well-gray'd hair, and flesh all sunken about the eyes?
 Who are you my dear comrade?

10

Then to the second I step—and who are you my child and darling?
 Who are you sweet boy with cheeks yet blooming?

Then to the third—a face nor child nor old, very calm, as of beautiful yellow-white ivory,
 Young man I think I know you—I think this face is the face of the Christ himself, Dead and divine and brother of all, and here again he lies

1865

THE WOUND-DRESSER

I

An old man bending I come among new faces,
 Years looking backward resuming in answer to children, Come tell us old man, as from young men and maidens that love me, (Arous'd and angry, I'd thought to beat the alarum, and urge relentless war,
 But soon my fingers fail'd me, my face droop'd and I resign'd myself, To sit by the wounded and soothe them, or silently watch the dead,) Years hence of these scenes, of these furious passions, these chances, Of unsurpass'd heroes, (was one side so brave? the other was equally brave,)
 Now be witness again, paint the mightiest armies of earth,
 Of those armies so rapid so wondrous what saw you to tell us?
 What stays with you latest and deepest? of curious panics,
 Of hard-fought engagements or sieges tremendous what deepest remains?

2

O maidens and young men I love and that love me,
 What you ask of my days those the strangest and sudden your talking recalls, Soldier alert I arrive after a long march cover'd with sweat and dust,
 In the nick of time I come, plunge in the fight, loudly shout in the rush of successful charge, Enter the captur'd works—yet lo, like a swift-running river they fade, Pass and are gone they fade—I dwell not on soldiers' perils or soldiers' joys, (Both I remember well—many of the hardships, few the joys, yet I was content.)

But in silence, in dreams' projections, While the world of gain and appearance and mirth goes on,
 So soon what is over forgotten, and waves wash the imprints off the sand, With hinged knees returning I enter the doors, (while for you up there, Whoever you are, follow without noise and be of strong heart )

20

Bearing the bandages, water and sponge,
 Straight and swift to my wounded I go,
 Where they lie on the ground after the battle brought in,
 Where their priceless blood reddens the grass the ground,
 Or to the rows of the hospital tent, or under the roof'd hospital,
 To the long rows of cots up and down each side I return,
 To each and all one after another I draw near, not one do I miss,
 An attendant follows holding a tray, he carries a refuse pail, Soon to be fill'd with clotted rags and blood, emptied, and fill'd again

30

I onward go, I stop,
 With hinged knees and steady hand to dress wounds,
 I am firm with each, the pangs are sharp yet unavoidable,
 One turns to me his appealing eyes—poor boy! I never knew you, Yet I think I could not refuse this moment to die for you, if that would save you.

3

On, on I go, (open doors of time! open hospital doors!)
 The crush'd head I dress, (poor crazed hand tear not the bandage away,) 40
 The neck of the cavalry-man with the bullet through and through I examine, Hard the breathing rattles, quite glazed already the eye, yet life struggles hard, (Come sweet death! be persuaded O beautiful death!
 In mercy come quickly )

From the stump of the arm, the amputated hand,
 I undo the clotted lint, remove the slough, wash off the matter and blood, Back on his pillow the soldier bends with curv'd neck and side falling head,
 His eyes are closed, his face is pale, he dares not look on the bloody stump,
 And has not yet look'd on it.

I dress a wound in the side, deep, deep, 50
 But a day or two more, for see the frame all wasted and sinking,
 And the yellow-blue countenance see.

I dress the perforated shoulder, the foot with the bullet-wound, Cleanse the one with a gnawing and putrid gangrene, so sickening, so offensive, While the attendant stands behind aside me holding the tray and pail

I am faithful, I do not give out,
 The fractur'd thigh, the knee, the wound in the abdomen, These and more I dress with impassive hand, (yet deep in my breast a fire, a burning flame.)

4

Thus in silence in dreams' projections,
 Returning, resuming, I thread my way through the hospitals, 60
 The hurt and wounded I pacify with soothing hand,
 I sit by the restless all the dark night, some are so young,
 Some suffer so much, I recall the experience sweet and sad, (Many a soldier's loving arms about this neck have cross'd and rested, Many a soldier's kiss dwells on these bearded lips )

1865

GIVE ME THE SPLENDID SILENT SUN

I

GIVE me the splendid silent sun with all his beams full-dazzling, Give me juicy autumnal fruit ripe and red from the orchard,
 Give me a field where the unmow'd grass grows,
 Give me an arbor, give me the trellis'd grape,
 Give me fresh corn and wheat, give me serene-moving animals teaching content, Give me nights perfectly quiet as on high plateaus west of the Mississippi, and I looking up at the stars,
 Give me odorous at sunrise a garden of beautiful flowers where I can walk undisturb'd, Give me for marriage a sweet-breath'd woman of whom I should never tire, Give me a perfect child, give me away aside from the noise of the world a rural domestic life,

Give me to warble spontaneous songs recluse by myself, for my own ears only, 10
 Give me solitude, give me Nature, give me again O Nature your primal sanities!

These demanding to have them, (tired with ceaseless excitement, and rack'd by the war-strife,)

These to procure incessantly asking, rising in cries from my heart, While yet incessantly asking still I adhere to my city,
 Day upon day and year upon year O city, walking your streets,
 Where you hold me enchain'd a certain time refusing to give me up, Yet giving to make me glutt'd, enrich'd of soul, you give me forever faces, (O I see what I sought to escape, confronting, reversing my cries, I see my own soul trampling down what it ask'd for )

2

Keep your splendid silent sun, 20
 Keep your woods O Nature, and the quiet places by the woods, Keep your fields of clover and timothy, and your corn-fields and orchards, Keep the blossoming buckwheat fields where the Ninth-month bees hum, Give me faces and streets—give me these phantoms incessant and endless along the trottoirs!
 Give me interminable eyes—give me women—give me comrades and lovers by the thousand!
 Let me see new ones every day—let me hold new ones by the hand every day!
 Give me such shows—give me the streets of Manhattan!
 Give me Broadway, with the soldiers marching—give me the sound of the trumpets and drums!
 (The soldiers in companies or regiments—some starting away, flush'd and reckless,
 Some, their time up, returning with thinn'd ranks, young, yet very old, worn, marching, noticing nothing,) 30
 Give me the shores and wharves heavy-fringed with black ships!
 O such for me! O an intense life, full to repletion and varied!
 The life of the theatre, bar-room, huge hotel, for me!
 The saloon of the steamer! the crowded excursion for me! the torchlight procession!
 The dense brigade bound for the war, with high piled military wagons following,
 People, endless, streaming, with strong voices, passions, pageants, Manhattan streets with their powerful throbs, with beating drums as now, The endless and noisy chorus, the rustle and clank of muskets, (even the sight of the wounded,)
 Manhattan crowds, with their turbulent musical chorus!
 Manhattan faces and eyes forever for me

ETHIOPIA SALUTING THE COLORS

WHO are you dusky woman, so ancient hardly human,
 With your woolly-white and turban'd head, and bare bony feet?
 Why rising by the roadside here, do you the colors greet?

('Tis while our army lines Carolina's sands and pines, Forth from thy hovel door thou Ethiopia com'st to me, As under doughty Sherman I march toward the sea )

*Me master years a hundred since from my parents sunder'd,
 A little child, they caught me as the savage beast is caught, Then hither me across the sea the cruel slaver brought*

No further does she say, but lingering all the day,
Her high-borne turban'd head she wags, and rolls her darkling eye,
And courtesies to the regiments, the guidons moving by.

10

What is it fateful woman, so bleary, hardly human?
Why wag your head with turban bound, yellow, red and green?
Are the things so strange and marvelous you see or have seen?

RECONCILIATION

WORD over all, beautiful as the sky,
Beautiful that war and all its deeds of carnage must in time be utterly lost,
That the hands of the sisters Death and Night incessantly softly wash again, and ever again, this soil'd world,
For my enemy is dead, a man divine as myself is dead,
I look where he lies white-faced and still in the coffin—I draw near,
Bend down and touch lightly with my lips the white face in the coffin

WHEN LILACS LAST IN THE DOORYARD BLOOM'D <sup>1</sup>

1

WHEN lilacs last in the dooryard bloom'd,
And the great star carly droop'd in the western sky in the night,
I mourn'd, and yet shall mourn with ever-returning spring

Ever-returning spring, trinity sure to me you bring, Lilac blooming perennial and drooping star in the west,
And thought of him I love

2

O powerful western fallen star!
O shades of night—O moody, tearful night!
O great star disappear'd—O the black murk that hides the star!
O cruel hands that hold me powerless—O helpless soul of me!
O harsh surrounding cloud that will not free my soul

10

In the dooryard fronting an old farm-house near the white-wash'd palings, Stands the lilac-bush tall-growing with heart-shaped leaves of rich green,
With many a pointed blossom rising delicate, with the perfume strong I love,
With every leaf a miracle—and from this bush in the dooryard,

<sup>1</sup> 'In the future of these States must arise poets immenser far, and make great poems of death. The poems of life are great, but there must be poems of the purports of life, not only in itself, but beyond itself. America needs, and the world needs, a class of bards who will, now and ever, so link and tally the rational physical being of man, with the ensembles of time and space, and with this vast and multiform show, Nature, surrounding him, ever tantalizing him, equally a part, and yet not a part of him, as to essentially harmonize, satisfy, and put at rest Faith, very old, now scared away by science, must be restored, brought back by the same power that caused her departure—restored with new sway, deeper, wider, higher than ever. Surely, this universal ennui, this coward fear, this shuddering at death, these low degrading views, are not always to rule the spirit pervading future society, as it has the past, and does the present. What the Roman Lucretius sought most nobly, yet all too blindly, negatively to do for his age and its successors, must be done positively by some great coming literatus, especially poet, who, while remaining fully poet, will absorb whatever science indicates, with spiritualism, and out of them, and out of his genius, will compose the great poem of death. Then will man indeed confront Nature, and confront time and space, both with science and con amore, and take his right place, prepared for life, master of fortune and misfortune.' Whitman, 'Democratic Vistas' (1871), Complete Prose Works (Boston, 1898), 245-46

With delicate-color'd blossoms and heart-shaped leaves of rich green, A sprig with its flower I break.

4

In the swamp in secluded recesses,
A shy and hidden bird is warbling a song.
Solitary the thrush,
The hermit withdrawn to himself, avoiding the settlements,
Sings by himself a song.

20

Song of the bleeding throat, Death's outlet song of life, (for well dear brother I know, If thou wast not granted to sing thou would'st surely die )

5

Over the breast of the spring, the land, amid cities, Amid lanes and through old woods, where lately the violets peep'd from the ground, spotting the gray debris,
Amid the grass in the fields each side of the lanes, passing the endless grass, Passing the yellow-spear'd wheat, every grain from its shroud in the dark-brown fields uprisen,
Passing the apple-tree blows of white and pink in the orchards,
Carrying a corpse to where it shall rest in the grave,
Night and day journeys a coffin

30

6

Coffin that passes through lanes and streets,
Through day and night with the great cloud darkening the land,
With the pomp of the inloop'd flags with the cities draped in black,
With the show of the States themselves as of crape-veil'd women standing,
With processions long and winding and the flambeaus of the night,
With the countless torches lit, with the silent sea of faces and the unbared heads,
With the waiting depot, the arriving coffin, and the sombre faces,
With dirges through the night, with the thousand voices rising strong and solemn,
With all the mournful voices of the dirges pour'd around the coffin,
The dim-lit churches and the shuddering organs—where amid these you journey,
With the tolling tolling bells' perpetual clang, Here, coffin that slowly passes,
I give you my sprig of lilac 40

7

(Nor for you, for one alone,
Blossoms and branches green to coffins all I bring,
For fresh as the morning, thus would I chant a song for you O sane and sacred death

All over bouquets of roses,
O death, I cover you over with roses and early lilies,
But mostly and now the lilac that blooms the first,
Copious I break, I break the sprigs from the bushes,
With loaded arms I come, pouring for you,
For you and the coffins all of you O death )

50

8

O western orb sailing the heaven,
Now I know what you must have meant as a month since I walk'd,

As I walk'd in silence the transparent shadowy night,
 As I saw you had something to tell as you bent to me night after night,
 As you droop'd from the sky low down as if to my side, (while the other stars all look'd on,)
 As we wander'd together the solemn night, (for something I know not what kept me from sleep,) 60

As the night advanced, and I saw on the rim of the west how full you were of woe,
 As I stood on the rising ground in the breeze in the cool transparent night,
 As I watch'd where you pass'd and was lost in the netherward black of the night,
 As my soul in its trouble dissatisfied sank, as where you sad orb, Concluded, dropt in the night, and was gone

9

Sing on there in the swamp,
 O singer bashful and tender, I hear your notes, I hear your call,
 I hear, I come presently, I understand you,
 But a moment I linger, for the lustrous star has detain'd me,
 The star my departing comrade holds and detains me. 70

10

O how shall I warble myself for the dead one there I loved?
 And how shall I deck my song for the large sweet soul that has gone?
 And what shall my perfume be for the grave of him I love?

Sea-winds blown from east and west, Blown from the Eastern sea and blown from the Western sea, till there on the prairies meeting,
 These and with these and the breath of my chant, I'll perfume the grave of him I love

11

O what shall I hang on the chamber walls?
 And what shall the pictures be that I hang on the walls,
 To adorn the burial-house of him I love? 80

Pictures of growing spring and farms and homes,
 With the Fourth-month eve at sundown, and the gray smoke lucid and bright, With floods of the yellow gold of the gorgeous, indolent, sinking sun, burning, expanding the air,
 With the fresh sweet herbage under foot, and the pale green leaves of the trees prolific,
 In the distance the flowing glaze, the breast of the river, with a wind-dapple here and there,
 With ranging hulls on the banks, with many a line against the sky, and shadows,
 And the city at hand with dwellings so dense, and stacks of chimneys,
 And all the scenes of life and the workshops, and the workmen homeward returning.

12

Lo, body and soul—this land,
 My own Manhattan with spires, and the sparkling and hurrying tides, and the ships, 90
 The varied and ample land, the South and the North in the light, Ohio's shores and flashing Missouri,
 And ever the far-spreading prairies cover'd with grass and corn

Lo, the most excellent sun so calm and haughty,
 The violet and purple morn with just-felt breezes,
 The gentle soft-born measureless light,
 The miracle spreading bathing all, the fulfill'd noon,

The coming eve delicious, the welcome night and the stars,
Over my cities shining all, enveloping man and land.

13

Sing on, sing on you gray-brown bird,
Sing from the swamps, the recesses, pour your chant from the bushes, 100 Limitless out of the dusk, out of the cedars and pines

Sing on dearest brother, warble your reedy song, Loud human song, with voice of uttermost woe

O liquid and free and tender!
O wild and loose to my soul—O wondrous singer!
You only I hear—yet the star holds me, (but will soon depart,)
Yet the lilac with mastering odor holds me

14

Now while I sat in the day and look'd forth,
In the close of the day with its light and the fields of spring, and the farmers preparing their crops,
In the large unconscious scenery of my land with its lakes and forests, 110
In the heavenly aerial beauty, (after the perturb'd winds and the storms,) Under the arching heavens of the afternoon swift passing, and the voices of children and women,

The many-moving sea-tides, and I saw the ships how they sail'd,
And the summer approaching with richness, and the fields all busy with labor, And the infinite separate houses, how they all went on, each with its meals and minutia of daily usages,

And the streets how their throbbings throb'd, and the cities pent—lo, then and there,
Falling upon them all and among them all, enveloping me with the rest, Appear'd the cloud, appear'd the long black trail,
And I knew death, its thought, and the sacred knowledge of death

Then with the knowledge of death as walking one side of me, 120
And the thought of death close-walking the other side of me,
And I in the middle as with companions, and as holding the hands of companions,
I fled forth to the hiding receiving night that talks not,
Down to the shores of the water, the path by the swamp in the dimness,
To the solemn shadowy cedars and ghostly pines so still

And the singer so shy to the rest receiv'd me,
The gray-brown bird I know receiv'd us comrades three,
And he sang the carol of death, and a verse for him I love.

From deep secluded recesses,
From the fragrant cedars and the ghostly pines so still, 130
Came the carol of the bird

And the charm of the carol rapt me,
As I held as if by their hands my comrades in the night,
And the voice of my spirit tallied the song of the bird

*Come lovely and soothing death, Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving,
In the day, in the night, to all, to each,
Sooner or later delicate death*

*Prais'd be the fathomless universe,
For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious,
And for love, sweet love—but praise! praise! praise!
For the sure-enwinding arms of cool-enfolding death*

140

*Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?
Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all,
I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly.*

*Approach strong deliveress,
When it is so, when thou hast taken them I joyously sing the dead,
Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee, Laved in the flood of thy bliss O death.*

150

*From me to thee glad serenades, Dances for thee I propose saluting thee, adornments and feastings for thee,
And the sights of the open landscape and the high-spread sky are fitting,
And life and the fields, and the huge and thoughtful night*

*The night in silence under many a star,
The ocean shore and the husky whispering wave whose voice I know,
And the soul turning to thee O vast and well-veil'd death,
And the body gratefully nestling close to thee.*

*Over the tree-tops I float thee a song,
Over the rising and sinking waves, over the myriad fields and the prairies wide,
Over the dense-pack'd cities all and the teeming wharves and ways,
I float this carol with joy, with joy to thee O death.*

15

To the tally of my soul,
Loud and strong kept up the gray-brown bird,
With pure deliberate notes spreading filling the night

Loud in the pines and cedars dim, Clear in the freshness moist and the swamp-perfume,
And I with my comrades there in the night

While my sight that was bound in my eyes unclosed,
As to long panoramas of visions

170

And I saw askant the armies,
I saw as in noiseless dreams hundreds of battle-flags, Borne through the smoke of the battles and pierc'd with missiles I saw them,
And carried hither and yon through the smoke, and torn and bloody,
And at last but a few shreds left on the staffs, (and all in silence,)
And the staffs all splinter'd and broken

I saw battle-corpses, myriads of them,
And the white skeletons of young men, I saw them,
I saw the debris and debris of all the slain soldiers of the war,
But I saw they were not as was thought,
They themselves were fully at rest, they suffer'd not,
The living remain'd and suffer'd, the mother suffer'd,

180

And the wife and the child and the musing comrade suffer'd,
And the armies that remain'd suffer'd

16

Passing the visions, passing the night,
Passing, unloosing the hold of my comrades' hands,
Passing the song of the hermit bird and the tallying song of my soul, Victorious song, death's outlet song, yet varying ever-altering song,
As low and wailing, yet clear the notes, rising and falling, flooding the night, Sadly sinking and fainting, as warning and warning, and yet again bursting with joy, 190 Covering the earth and filling the spread of the heaven,
As that powerful psalm in the night I heard from recesses, Passing, I leave thee lilac with heart-shaped leaves,
I leave thee there in the door-yard, blooming, returning with spring.

I cease from my song for thee,
From my gaze on thee in the west, fronting the west, communing with thee,
O comrade lustrous with silver face in the night

Yet each to keep and all, retrievements out of the night,
The song, the wondrous chant of the gray-brown bird,
And the tallying chant, the echo arous'd in my soul, 200
With the lustrous and drooping star with the countenance full of woe, With the holders holding my hand nearing the call of the bird, Comrades mine and I in the midst, and their memory ever to keep, for the dead I loved so well,
For the sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands—and thus for his dear sake, Lilac and star and bird twined with the chant of my soul,
There in the fragrant pines and the cedars dusk and dim

O CAPTAIN! MY CAPTAIN!

O CAPTAIN! my Captain! our fearful trip is done,
The ship has weather'd every rack, the prize we sought is won,
The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting, While follow eyes the steady keel, the vessel grim and daring,
But O heart! heart! heart!
O the bleeding drops of red,
Where on the deck my Captain lies,
Fallen cold and dead

O Captain! my Captain! rise up and hear the bells, Rise up—for you the flag is flung—for you the bugle trills, 10
For you bouquets and ribbon'd wreaths—for you the shores a-crowding, For you they call, the swaying mass, their eager faces turning,
Here Captain! dear father!
The arm beneath your head!
It is some dream that on the deck,
You've fallen cold and dead

My Captain does not answer, his lips are pale and still,
My father does not feel my arm, he has no pulse nor will,
The ship is anchor'd safe and sound, its voyage closed and done,
From fearful trip the victor ship comes in with object won, 20

Exult O shores, and ring O bells!
 But I with mournful tread,
 Walk the deck my Captain lies,
 Fallen cold and dead

THERE WAS A CHILD WENT FORTH <sup>1</sup>

THERE was a child went forth every day,
 And the first object he look'd upon, that object he became,
 And that object became part of him for the day or a certain part of the day,
 Or for many years or stretching cycles of years.

The early lilacs became part of this child,
 And grass and white and red morning-glories, and white and red clover, and the song of the phoebe-bird,
 And the Third-month lambs and the sow's pink-faint litter, and the mare's foal and the cow's calf,
 And the noisy brood of the barnyard or by the mire of the pond-side,
 And the fish suspending themselves so curiously below there, and the beautiful curious liquid,
 And the water-plants with their graceful flat heads, all became part of him

10

The field-sprouts of Fourth-month and Fifth-month became part of him, Winter-grain sprouts and those of the light-yellow corn, and the esculent roots of the garden, And the apple-trees cover'd with blossoms and the fruit afterward, and wood-berries, and the commonest weeds by the road,
 And the old drunkard staggering home from the outhouse of the tavern whence he had lately risen,
 And the schoolmistress that pass'd on her way to the school,
 And the friendly boys that pass'd, and the quarrelsome boys,
 And the tidy and fresh-check'd girls, and the barefoot negro boy and girl,
 And all the changes of city and country wherever he went

His own parents, he that had father'd him and she that had conceiv'd him in her womb and birth'd him,
 They gave this child more of themselves than that,
 They gave him afterward every day, they became part of him

20

The mother at home quietly placing the dishes on the supper-table,
 The mother with mild words, clean her cap and gown, a wholesome odor falling off her person and clothes as she walks by,
 The father, strong, self-sufficient, manly, mean, anger'd, unjust,
 The blow, the quick loud word, the tight bargain, the crafty lure,
 The family usages, the language, the company, the furniture, the yearning and swelling heart, Affection that will not be gainsay'd, the sense of what is real, the thought if after all it should prove unreal,
 The doubts of day-time and the doubts of night-time, the curious whether and how,
 Whether that which appears so is so, or is it all flashes and specks?
 Men and women crowding fast in the streets, if they are not flashes and specks what are they?
 The streets themselves and the façades of houses, and goods in the windows, Vehicles, teams, the heavy-plank'd wharves, the huge crossing at the ferries,

31

<sup>1</sup> 'People have often asked him the meaning of the poem "There Was a Child Went Forth," and he has always made the same answer "What is the meaning? I wonder what? I wonder what?" Once he said to Bronsall "Harry, maybe it has no meaning "' Traubel, With Walt Whitman in Camden (N Y, 1915), II, 228

The village on the highland seen from afar at sunset, the river between,
 Shadows, aureola and mist, the light falling on roofs and gables of white or brown two miles off,
 The schooner near by sleepily dropping down the tide, the little boat slack-tow'd astern,
 The hurrying tumbling waves, quick-broken crests, slapping, The strata of color'd clouds, the long bar of maroon-tint away solitary by itself, the spread of purity it lies motionless in,
 The horizon's edge, the flying sea-crow, the fragrance of salt marsh and shore mud, These became part of that child who went forth every day, and who now goes, and will always go forth every day

THE CITY DEAD-HOUSE

By the city dead-house by the gate,
 As idly sauntering wending my way from the clangor, I curious pause, for lo, an outcast form, a poor dead prostitute brought,
 Her corpse they deposit unclaim'd, it lies on the damp brick pavement,
 The divine woman, her body, I see the body, I look on it alone,
 That house once full of passion and beauty, all else I notice not,
 Nor stillness so cold, nor running water from faucet, nor odors morbidic impress me,
 But the house alone—that wondrous house—that delicate fair house—that ruin!
 That immortal house more than all the rows of dwellings ever built!
 Or white-domed capitol with majestic figure surmounted, or all the old high-spired cathedrals,
 That little house alone more than them all—poor, desperate house!
 Fair, fearful wreck—tenement of a soul—itself a soul, Unclaim'd, avoided house—take one breath from my tremulous lips,
 Take one tear dropt aside as I go for thought of you, Dead house of love—house of madness and sin, crumbled, crush'd House of life, erewhile talking and laughing—but ah, poor house, dead even then, Months, years, an echoing, garnish'd house—but dead, dead, dead

TO A COMMON PROSTITUTE

Be composed—be at ease with me—I am Walt Whitman, liberal and lusty as Nature, Nor till the sun excludes you do I exclude you, Nor till the waters refuse to glisten for you and the leaves to rustle for you, do my words refuse to glisten and rustle for you

My girl I appoint with you an appointment, and I charge you that you make preparation to be worthy to meet me,

And I charge you that you be patient and perfect till I come

Till then I salute you with a significant look that you do not forget me

WHO LEARNS MY LESSON COMPLETE?

Who learns my lesson complete?
 Boss, journeyman, apprentice, churchman and atheist,
 The stupid and the wise thinker, parents and offspring, merchant, clerk, porter and customer, Editor, author, artist, and schoolboy—draw nigh and commence,
 It is no lesson—it lets down the bars to a good lesson,
 And that to another, and every one to another still The great laws take and effuse without argument,
 I am of the same style, for I am their friend,
 I love them quits and quits, I do not halt and make salaams

I lie abstracted and hear beautiful tales of things and the reasons of things,
They are so beautiful I nudge myself to listen

10

I cannot say to any person what I hear—I cannot say it to myself—it is very wonderful.

It is no small matter, this round and delicious globe moving so exactly in its orbit for ever and ever, without one jolt or the untruth of a single second,
I do not think it was made in six days, nor in ten thousand years, nor ten billions of years, Nor plann'd and built one thing after another as an architect plans and builds a house.

I do not think seventy years is the time of a man or woman, Nor that seventy millions of years is the time of a man or woman, Nor that years will ever stop the existence of me, or any one else.

Is it wonderful that I should be immortal? as every one is immortal, I know it is wonderful, but my eyesight is equally wonderful, and how I was conceived in my mother's womb is equally wonderful, And pass'd from a babe in the creeping trance of a couple of summers and winters to articulate and walk—all this is equally wonderful.

20

And that my soul embraces you this hour, and we affect each other without ever seeing each other, and never perhaps to see each other, is every bit as wonderful.

And that I can think such thoughts as these is just as wonderful,
And that I can remind you, and you think them and know them to be true, is just as wonderful

And that the moon spins round the earth and on with the earth, is equally wonderful,
And that they balance themselves with the sun and stars is equally wonderful

ITALIAN MUSIC IN DAKOTA

(‘THE SEVENTEENTH—THE FINEST REGIMENTAL BAND I EVER HEARD’)

THROUGH the soft evening air enwinding all,
Rocks, woods, fort, cannon, pacing sentries, endless wilds,
In dulcet streams, in flutes’ and cornets’ notes, Electric, pensive, turbulent, artificial, (Yet strangely fitting even here, meanings unknown before, Subtler than ever, more harmony, as if born here, related here,
Not to the city’s fresco’d rooms, not to the audience of the opera house, Sounds, echoes, wandering strains, as really here at home,
Somnambula’s innocent love, trios with Norma’s anguish, And thy ecstatic chorus Poliuto,) Ray’d in the limpid yellow slanting sundown, Music, Italian music in Dakota

10

While Nature, sovereign of this gnarl’d realm, Lurking in hidden barbaric grim recesses,
Acknowledging rapport however far remov’d,
(As some old root or soil of earth its last-born flower or fruit,) Listens well pleas’d.

PASSAGE TO INDIA<sup>1</sup>

I

SINGING my days,
 Singing the great achievements of the present,
 Singing the strong light works of engineers,
 Our modern wonders, (the antique ponderous Seven outvied,) In the Old World the east the Suez canal,
 The New by its mighty railroad spann'd,
 The seas inlaid with eloquent gentle wires,
 Yet first to sound, and ever sound, the cry with thee O soul,
 The Past! the Past! the Past!

The Past—the dark unfathom'd retrospect!
 The teeming gulf—the sleepers and the shadows!
 The past—the infinite greatness of the past!
 For what is the present after all but a growth out of the past?
 (As a projectile form'd, impell'd, passing a certain line, still keeps on,
 So the present, utterly form'd, impell'd by the past )

Passage O soul to India!
 Eclaircise the myths Asiatic, the primitive fables.

Not you alone proud truths of the world,
 Nor you alone ye facts of modern science,
 But myths and fables of eld, Asia's, Africa's fables,
 The far-darting beams of the spirit, the unloos'd dreams,
 The deep diving bibles and legends,
 The daring plots of the poets, the elder religions, O you temples fairer than lilies pour'd over by the rising sun!
 O you fables spurning the known, eluding the hold of the known, mounting to heaven!
 You lofty and dazzling towers, pinnacled, red as roses, burnish'd with gold!
 Towers of fables immortal fashion'd from mortal dreams!
 You too I welcome and fully the same as the rest!
 You too with joy I sing

20

Passage to India!
 Lo, soul, seest thou not God's purpose from the first?
 The earth to be spann'd, connected by network,
 The races, neighbors, to marry and be given in marriage,
 The oceans to be cross'd, the distant brought near,
 The lands to be welded together

30

A worship new I sing,
 You captains, voyagers, explorers, yours,

<sup>1</sup> In reference to this poem, Whitman said "There's more of me, the essential me, in that than in any of the poems. There is no philosophy, consistent or inconsistent, in that poem—there Brnnton would be right—but the burden of it is evolution—the one thing escaping the other—the unfolding of cosmic purposes." Ibid., I, 156–57.

You engineers, you architects, machinists, yours,
 You, not for trade or transportation only,
 But in God's name, and for thy sake O soul

Passage to India!

Lo soul for thee of tableaux twain.

I see in one the Suez canal initiated, open'd,

I see the procession of steamships, the Empress Eugenie's leading the van,

I mark from on deck the strange landscape, the pure sky, the level sand in the distance,

I pass swiftly the picturesque groups, the workmen gather'd,

The gigantic dredging machines.

In one again, different, (yet thine, all thine, O soul, the same,)

I see over my own continent the Pacific railroad surmounting every barrier,

I see continual trains of cars winding along the Platte carrying freight and passengers, 50

I hear the locomotives rushing and roaring, and the shrill steam-whistle,

I hear the echoes reverberate through the grandest scenery in the world,

I cross the Laramie plains, I note the rocks in grotesque shapes, the buttes,

I see the plentiful larkspur and wild onions, the barren, colorless, sage-deserts,

I see in glimpses afar or towering immediately above me the great mountains, I see the Wind river and the Wahsatch mountains,

I see the Monument mountain and the Eagle's Nest, I pass the Promontory, I ascend the Nevadas,

I scan the noble Elk mountain and wind around its base,

I see the Humboldt range, I thread the valley and cross the river,

I see the clear waters of lake Tahoe, I see forests of majestic pines,

Or crossing the great desert, the alkali plains, I behold enchanting mirages of waters and meadows, 60

Marking through these and after all, in duplicate slender lines,

Bridging the three or four thousand miles of land travel,

Tying the Eastern to the Western sea,

The road between Europe and Asia

(Ah Genoese thy dream! thy dream!

Centuries after thou art laid in thy grave,

The shore thou foundest verifies thy dream )

Passage to India!

Struggles of many a captain, tales of many a sailor dead,

Over my mood stealing and spreading they come, 70

Like clouds and cloudlets in the unreach'd sky

Along all history, down the slopes,

As a rivulet running, sinking now, and now again to the surface rising,

A ceaseless thought, a varied train—lo, soul, to thee, thy sight, they rise,

The plans, the voyages again, the expeditions,

Again Vasco de Gama sails forth,

Again the knowledge gain'd, the mariner's compass,

Lands found and nations born, thou born America,

For purpose vast, man's long probation fill'd,

Thou rondure of the world at last accomplish'd. 80

5

O vast Rondure, swimming in space,
 Cover'd all over with visible power and beauty, Alternate light and day and the teeming spiritual darkness, Unspeakable high processions of sun and moon and countless stars above, Below, the manifold grass and waters, animals, mountains, trees,
 With inscrutable purpose, some hidden prophetic intention,
 Now first it seems my thought begins to span thee

Down from the gardens of Asia descending radiating, Adam and Eve appear, then their myriad progeny after them, Wandering, yearning, curious, with restless explorations, 90
 With questionings, baffled, formless, feverish, with never-happy hearts, With that sad incessant refrain, Wherefore unsatisfied soul? and Whither O mocking life?

Ah who shall soothe these feverish children?
 Who justify these restless explorations?
 Who speak the secret of impassive earth?
 Who bind it to us? what is this separate Nature so unnatural?
 What is this earth to our affections? (unloving earth, without a throb to answer ours, Cold earth, the place of graves )

Yet soul be sure the first intent remains, and shall be carried out, Perhaps even now the time has arrived 100

After the seas are all cross'd, (as they seem already cross'd,) After the great captains and engineers have accomplish'd their work,
 After the noble inventors, after the scientists, the chemist, the geologist, ethnologist, Finally shall come the poet worthy that name,
 The true son of God shall come singing his songs

Then not your deeds only O voyagers, O scientists and inventors, shall be justified,
 All these hearts as of fretted children shall be sooth'd,
 All affection shall be fully responded to, the secret shall be told,
 All these separations and gaps shall be taken up and hook'd and link'd together,
 The whole earth, this cold, impassive, voiceless earth, shall be completely justified, 110 Trinitas divine shall be gloriously accomplish'd and compacted by the true son of God, the poet, (He shall indeed pass the straits and conquer the mountains, He shall double the cape of Good Hope to some purpose,) Nature and Man shall be disjoin'd and diffused no more,
 The true son of God shall absolutely fuse them

6

Year at whose wide-flung door I sing!
 Year of the purpose accomplish'd!
 Year of the marriage of continents, climates and oceans!
 (No mere doge of Venice now wedding the Adriatic.)
 I see O year in you the vast terraqueous globe given and giving all, 120 Europe to Asia, Africa join'd, and they to the New World,
 The lands, geographies, dancing before you, holding a festival garland,
 As brides and bridegrooms hand in hand

Passage to India!
 Cooling airs from Caucasus, far, soothing cradle of man,
 The river Euphrates flowing, the past lit up again

Lo soul, the retrospect brought forward,
 The old, most populous, wealthiest of earth's lands,
 The streams of the Indus and the Ganges and their many affluents, (I my shores of America walking to-day behold, resuming all,) 130
 The tale of Alexander on his warlike marches suddenly dying,
 On one side China and on the other side Persia and Arabia,
 To the south the great seas and the bay of Bengal,
 The flowing literatures, tremendous epics, religions, castes, Old occult Brahma interminably far back, the tender and junior Buddha, Central and southern empires and all their belongings, possessors,
 The wars of Tamerlane, the reign of Aurungzebe,
 The traders, rulers, explorers, Moslems, Venetians, Byzantium, the Arabs, Portuguese,
 The first travelers famous yet, Marco Polo, Batouta the Moor, Doubts to be solv'd, the map incognita, blanks to be fill'd, 140
 The foot of man unstay'd, the hands never at rest, Thyself O soul that will not brook a challenge.

The mediæval navigators rise before me,
 The world of 1492, with its awaken'd enterprise, Something swelling in humanity now like the sap of the earth in spring,
 The sunset splendor of chivalry declining.

And who art thou sad shade?
 Gigantic, visionary, thyself a visionary;
 With majestic limbs and pious beaming eyes,
 Spreading around with every look of thine a golden world, 150
 Enhuing it with gorgeous hues

As the chief hustrion,
 Down to the footlights walks in some great scena, Dominating the rest I see the Admiral himself, (History's type of courage, action, faith,) Behold him sail from Palos leading his little fleet,
 His voyage behold, his return, his great fame,
 His misfortunes, calumniators, behold him a prisoner, chain'd, Behold his dejection, poverty, death

(Curious in time I stand, noting the efforts of heroes, 160
 Is the deferment long? bitter the slander, poverty, death?
 Lies the seed unreck'd for centuries in the ground? lo, to God's due occasion, Uprising in the night, it sprouts, blooms,
 And fills the earth with use and beauty )

7

Passage indeed O soul to primal thought,
 Not lands and seas alone, thy own clear freshness,
 The young maturity of brood and bloom,
 To realms of budding bibles

O soul, repressless, I with thee and thou with me, Thy circumnavigation of the world begin, 170
 Of man, the voyage of his mind's return,
 To reason's early paradise,
 Back, back to wisdom's birth, to innocent intuitions, Again with fair creation

O we can wait no longer,
 We too take ship O soul,
 Joyous we too launch out on trackless seas,
 Fearless for unknown shores on waves of ecstasy to sail, Amid the wafting winds, (thou pressing me to thee, I thee to me, O soul,) Caroling free, singing our song of God, Chanting our chant of pleasant exploration

180

With laugh and many a kiss, (Let others deprecate, let others weep for sin, remorse, humiliation,)
 O soul thou pleasest me, I thee

Ah more than any priest O soul we too believe in God,
 But with the mystery of God we dare not dally

O soul thou pleasest me, I thee,
 Sailing these seas or on the hills, or waking in the night, Thoughts, silent thoughts, of Time and Space and Death, like waters flowing, Bear me indeed as through the regions infinite, Whose air I breathe, whose ripples hear, lave me all over,
 Bathe me O God in thee, mounting to thee,
 I and my soul to range in range of thee

190

O Thou transcendent,
 Nameless, the fibre and the breath,
 Light of the light, shedding forth universes, thou centre of them, Thou mightier centre of the true, the good, the loving,
 Thou moral, spiritual fountain—affection's source—thou reservoir, (O pensive soul of me—O thirst unsatisfied—waitest not there?
 Waitest not haply for us somewhere there the Comrade perfect?)
 Thou pulse—thou motive of the stars, suns, systems,
 That, circling, move in order, safe, harmonious, Athwart the shapeless vastnesses of space,
 How should I think, how breathe a single breath, how speak, if, out of myself,
 I could not launch, to those, superior universes?

200

Swiftly I shrivel at the thought of God,
 At Nature and its wonders, Time and Space and Death,
 But that I, turning, call to thee O soul, thou actual Me,
 And lo, thou gently masterest the orbs,
 Thou matest Time, smilest content at Death,
 And fillest, swellest full the vastnesses of Space

210

Greater than stars or suns,
 Bounding O soul thou journeyest forth,
 What love than thine and ours could wider amplify?
 What aspirations, wishes, outvie thine and ours O soul?
 What dreams of the ideal? what plans of purity, perfection, strength, What cheerful willingness for others' sake to give up all?
 For others' sake to suffer all?

Reckoning ahead O soul, when thou, the time achiev'd,
 The seas all cross'd, weather'd the capes, the voyage done, Surrounded, copest, frontest God, yieldest, the aim attain'd,

220

As fill'd with friendship, love complete, the Elder Brother found,
The Younger melts in fondness in his arms

9

Passage to more than India!
Are thy wings plumed indeed for such far flights?
O soul, voyagest thou indeed on voyages like those?
Disportest thou on waters such as those?
Soundest below the Sanscrit and the Vedas?
Then have thy bent unleash'd.

Passage to you, your shores, ye aged fierce enigmas!
Passage to you, to mastership of you, ye strangling problems!
You, strew'd with the wrecks of skeletons, that, living, never reach'd you

230

Passage to more than India!
O secret of the earth and sky!
Of you O waters of the sea! O winding creeks and rivers!
Of you O woods and fields! of you strong mountains of my land!
Of you O prairies! of you gray rocks!
O morning red! O clouds! O rain and snows!
O day and night, passage to you!

O sun and moon and all you stars! Sirius and Jupiter!
Passage to you!

240

Passage, immediate passage! the blood burns in my veins!
Away O soul! hoist instantly the anchor!
Cut the hawsers—haul out—shake out every sail!
Have we not stood here like trees in the ground long enough?
Have we not grovel'd here long enough, eating and drinking like mere brutes?
Have we not darken'd and dazed ourselves with books long enough?

Sail forth—steer for the deep waters only,
Reckless O soul, exploring, I with thee, and thou with me,
For we are bound where mariner has not yet dared to go,
And we will risk the ship, ourselves and all

250

O my brave soul!
O farther farther sail!
O daring joy, but safe! are they not all the seas of God?
O farther, farther, farther sail!

CHANTING THE SQUARE DEIFIC <sup>1</sup>

I

CHANTING the square deific, out of the One advancing, out of the sides,
Out of the old and new, out of the square entirely divine, Solid, four-sided, (all the sides needed,) from this side Jehovah am I, Old Brahm I, and I Saturnus am,
Not Time affects me—I am Time, old, modern as any,

1 'Brinton said " 'Chanting the Square Deific' is an immortal poem I sometimes think it is the most subtle and profound thing you have written " W said as to that "Many of my friends have agreed with you, Doctor, about that It would be hard to give the idea mathematical expression the idea of spiritual equity—of spiritual substance the four-square

Unpersuadable, relentless, executing righteous judgments,
 As the Earth, the Father, the brown old Kronos, with laws, Aged beyond computation, yet ever new, ever with those mighty laws rolling, Relentless I forgive no man—whoever sins dies—I will have that man's life, Therefore let none expect mercy—have the seasons, gravitation, the appointed days, mercy?
     no more have I, 10
 But as the seasons and gravitation, and as all the appointed days that forgive not,
 I dispense from this side judgments inexorable without the least remorse.

2

Consolator most mild, the promis'd one advancing,
 With gentle hand extended, the mightier God am I, Foretold by prophets and poets in their most rapt prophecies and poems,
 From this side, lo! the Lord Christ gazes—lo! Hermes I—lo! mine is Hercules' face, All sorrow, labor, suffering, I, tallying it, absorb in myself, Many times have I been rejected, taunted, put in prison, and crucified, and many times shall be again,
 All the world have I given up for my dear brothers' and sisters' sake, for the soul's sake, Wending my way through the homes of men, rich or poor, with the kiss of affection, 20
 For I am affection, I am the cheer-bringing God, with hope and all-enclosing charity, With indulgent words as to children, with fresh and sane words, mine only,
 Young and strong I pass knowing well I am destin'd myself to an early death,
 But my charity has no death—my wisdom dies not, neither early nor late,
 And my sweet love bequeath'd here and elsewhere never dies

3

Aloof, dissatisfied, plotting revolt,
 Comrade of criminals, brother of slaves,
 Crafty, despised, a drudge, ignorant,
 With sudra face and worn brow, black, but in the depths of my heart, proud as any,
 Lifted now and always against whoever scorning assumes to rule me, 30 Morose, full of guile, full of reminiscences, brooding, with many wiles, (Though it was thought I was baffled and dispel'd, and my wiles done, but that will never be,) Defiant, I, Satan, still live, still utter words, in new lands duly appearing, (and old ones also,) Permanent here from my side, warlike, equal with any, real as any, Nor time nor change shall ever change me or my words

4

Santa Spirita, breather, life,
 Beyond the light, lighter than light,
 Beyond the flames of hell, joyous, leaping easily above hell, Beyond Paradise, perfumed solely with mine own perfume, Including all life on earth, touching, including God, including Saviour and Satan, 40 Ethereal, pervading all, (for without me what were all? what were God?)
 Essence of forms, life of the real identities, permanent, positive, (namely the unseen,) Life of the great round world, the sun and stars, and of man, I, the general soul, Here the square finishing, the solid, I the most solid,
 Breathe my breath also through these songs.

1866

entity—the north, south, east, west of the constituted universe (even the soul universe)—the four sides as sustaining the universe (the supernatural something) this is not the poem but the idea back of the poem or below the poem I am lame enough trying to explain it in other words—the idea seems to fit its own words better than mine You see, at the time the poem wrote itself now I am trying to write it." Ibid., I, 156.

843

A NOISELESS patient spider,
I mark'd where on a little promontory it stood isolated, Mark'd how to explore the vacant vast surrounding,
It launch'd forth filament, filament, filament, out of itself,
Ever unreeling them, ever tirelessly speeding them.

And you O my soul where you stand,
Surrounded, detached, in measureless oceans of space, Ceaselessly musing, venturing, throwing, seeking the spheres to connect them, Till the bridge you will need be form'd, till the ductile anchor hold,
Till the gossamer thread you fling catch somewhere, O my soul

THE LAST INVOCATION

At the last, tenderly,
From the walls of the powerful fortress'd house,
From the clasp of the knitted locks, from the keep of the well-closed doors,
Let me be wafted

Let me glide noiselessly forth,
With the key of softness unlock the locks—with a whisper, Set ope the doors O soul

Tenderly—be not impatient, (Strong is your hold O mortal flesh, Strong is your hold O love )

TO A LOCOMOTIVE IN WINTER

THEE for my recitative,
Thee in the driving storm even as now, the snow, the winter-day declining, Thee in thy panoply, thy measur'd dual throbbing and thy beat convulsive, Thy black cylindric body, golden brass and silvery steel, Thy ponderous side-bars, parallel and connecting rods, gyrating, shuttling at thy sides, Thy metrical, now swelling pant and roar, now tapering in the distance, Thy great protruding head-light fix'd in front, Thy long, pale, floating vapor-pennants, tinged with delicate purple,
The dense and murky clouds out-belching from thy smoke-stack, Thy knitted frame, thy springs and valves, the tremulous twinkle of thy wheels, 10 Thy train of cars behind, obedient, merrily following,
Through gale or calm, now swift, now slack, yet steadily careering, Type of the modern—emblem of motion and power—pulse of the continent,
For once come serve the Muse and merge in verse, even as here I see thee,
With storm and buffeting gusts of wind and falling snow,
By day thy warning ringing bell to sound its notes,
By night thy silent signal lamps to swing

Fierce-throated beauty!
Roll through my chant with all thy lawless music, thy swinging lamps at night, Thy madly-whistled laughter, echoing, rumbling like an earthquake, rousing all, 20 Law of thyself complete, thine own track firmly holding,

(No sweetness debonair of tearful harp or glib piano thine, Thy trills of shrieks by rocks and hulls return'd, Launch'd o'er the prairies wide, across the lakes,
 To the free skies unpent and glad and strong.

YEARS OF THE MODERN

YEARS of the modern! years of the unperform'd!
 Your horizon rises, I see it parting away for more august dramas, I see not America only, not only Liberty's nation but other nations preparing,
 I see tremendous entrances and exits, new combinations, the solidarity of races,
 I see that force advancing with irresistible power on the world's stage, (Have the old forces, the old wars, played their parts? are the acts suitable to them closed?)
 I see Freedom, completely arm'd and victorious and very haughty, with Law on one side and Peace on the other,
 A stupendous trio all issuing forth against the idea of caste,
 What historic denouements are these we so rapidly approach?
 I see men marching and countermarching by swift millions,
 I see the frontiers and boundaries of the old aristocracies broken, I see the landmarks of European kings removed,
 I see this day the People beginning their landmarks, (all others give way,) Never were such sharp questions ask'd as this day, Never was average man, his soul, more energetic, more like a God, Lo, how he urges and urges, leaving the masses no rest!
 His daring foot is on land and sea everywhere, he colonizes the Pacific, the archipelagoes,
 With the steamship, the electric telegraph, the newspaper, the wholesale engines of war,
 With these and the world-spreading factories he interlinks all geography, all lands, What whispers are these O lands, running ahead of you, passing under the seas?
 Are all nations communing? is there going to be but one heart to the globe?
 Is humanity forming en-masse? for lo, tyrants tremble, crowns grow dim,
 The earth, restive, confronts a new era, perhaps a general divine war,
 No one knows what will happen next, such portents fill the days and nights,
 Years prophetic! the space ahead as I walk, as I vainly try to pierce it, is full of phantoms, Unborn deeds, things soon to be, project their shapes around me,
 This incredible rush and heat, this strange ecstatic fever of dreams O years!
 Your dreams O years, how they penetrate through me! (I know now whether I sleep or wake,)
 The perform'd America and Europe grow dim, retiring in shadow behind me,
 The unperform'd, more gigantic than ever, advance, advance upon me.

1865

MANNAHATTA

I WAS asking for something specific and perfect for my city, Whereupon lo! upsprang the aboriginal name.

Now I see what there is in a name, a word, liquid, sane, unruly, musical, self-sufficient,
 I see that the word of my city is that word from of old,
 Because I see that word nested in nests of water-bays, superb, Rich, hemm'd thick all around with sailships and steamships, an island sixteen miles long, solid-founded,
 Numberless crowded streets, high growths of iron, slender, strong, light, splendidly uprising toward clear skies,
 Tides swift and ample, well-loved by me, toward sundown,
 The flowing sea-currents, the little islands, larger adjoining islands, the heights, the villas,

The countless masts, the white shore-steamers, the lighters, the ferry-boats, the black sea-steamers well-model'd,
 The down-town streets, the jobbers' houses of business, the houses of business of the ship-merchants and money-brokers, the river-streets, Immigrants arriving, fifteen or twenty thousand in a week,
 The carts hauling goods, the manly race of drivers of horses, the brown-faced sailors,
 The summer air, the bright sun shining, and the sailing clouds aloft, The winter snows, the sleigh-bells, the broken ice in the river, passing along up or down with the flood-tide or ebb-tide,
 The mechanics of the city, the masters, well-form'd, beautiful-faced, looking you straight in the eyes,
 Trottoirs throng'd, vehicles, Broadway, the women, the shops and shows, A million people—manners free and superb—open voices—hospitality—the most courageous and friendly young men,
 City of hurried and sparkling waters! city of spires and masts!
 City nested in bays! my city!

WITH HUSKY-HAUGHTY LIPS, O SEA!

WITH husky-haughty lips, O sea!
 Where day and night I wend thy surf-beat shore, Imaging to my sense thy varied strange suggestions, (I see and plainly list thy talk and conference here,) Thy troops of white-maned racers racing to the goal, Thy ample, smiling face, dash'd with the sparkling dimples of the sun, Thy brooding scowl and murk—thy unloos'd hurricanes, Thy unsubduedness, caprices, wilfulness,
 Great as thou art above the rest, thy many tears—a lack from all eternity in thy content, (Naught but the greatest struggles, wrongs, defeats, could make thee greatest—no less could make thee,) 10
 Thy lonely state—something thou ever seek'st and seek'st, yet never gain'st, Surely some right withheld—some voice, in huge monotonous rage, of freedom-lover pent, Some vast heart, like a planet's, chain'd and chafing in those breakers,
 By lengthen'd swell, and spasm, and panting breath,
 And rhythmic rasping of thy sands and waves,
 And serpent hiss, and savage peals of laughter,
 And undertones of distant lion roar, (Sounding, appealing to the sky's deaf ear—but now, rapport for once, A phantom in the night thy confidant for once,)
 The first and last confession of the globe, 20
 Outsurgings, muttering from thy soul's abysses,
 The tale of cosmic elemental passion, Thou tellest to a kindred soul

1889

AFTER THE SUPPER AND TALK

AFTER the supper and talk—after the day is done,
 As a friend from friends his final withdrawal prolonging, Good-bye and Good-bye with emotional lips repeating, (So hard for his hand to release those hands—no more will they meet,
 No more for communion of sorrow and joy, of old and young,
 A far-stretching journey awaits him, to return no more,) Shunning, postponing severance—seeking to ward off the last word ever so little,

E'en at the exit-door turning—charges superfluous calling back—e'en as he descends the steps,
 Something to eke out a minute additional—shadows of nightfall deepening, Farewells, messages lessening—dimmer the forthgoer's visage and form, Soon to be lost for aye in the darkness—loth, O so loth to depart!
 Garrulous to the very last.

SO LONG!

To conclude, I announce what comes after me

I remember I said before my leaves sprang at all,
 I would raise my voice jocund and strong with reference to consummations

When America does what was promis'd,
 When through these States walk a hundred millions of superb persons,
 When the rest part away for superb persons and contribute to them,
 When breeds of the most perfect mothers denote America,
 Then to me and mine our due fruition

I have press'd through in my own right,
 I have sung the body and the soul, war and peace have I sung, and the songs of life and death,
 And the songs of birth, and shown that there are many births

11

I have offer'd my style to every one, I have journey'd with confident step, While my pleasure is yet at the full I whisper So long!
 And take the young woman's hand and the young man's hand for the last time.

I announce natural persons to arise,
 I announce justice triumphant,
 I announce uncompromising liberty and equality,
 I announce the justification of candor and the justification of pride

I announce that the identity of these States is a single identity only,
 I announce the Union more and more compact, indissoluble,
 I announce splendors and majesties to make all the previous politics of the earth insignificant

20

I announce adhesiveness, I say it shall be limitless, unloosen'd, I say you shall yet find the friend you were looking for.

I announce a man or woman coming, perhaps you are the one, (So long!)
 I announce the great individual, fluid as Nature, chaste, affectionate, compassionate, fully arm'd

I announce a life that shall be copious, vehement, spiritual, bold, I announce an end that shall lightly and joyfully meet its translation

I announce myriads of youths, beautiful, gigantic, sweet-blooded,
 I announce a race of splendid and savage old men.

O thicker and faster—(So long!)
 O crowding too close upon me,
 I foresee too much, it means more than I thought,
 It appears to me I am dying

30

Hasten throat and sound your last,
Salute me—salute the days once more Peal the old cry once more.

Screaming electric, the atmosphere using,
At random glancing, each as I notice absorbing, Swiftly on, but a little while alighting, Curious envelop'd messages delivering,
Sparkles hot, seed ethereal down in the dirt dropping, 40
Myself unknowing, my commission obeying, to question it never daring, To ages and ages yet the growth of the seed leaving,
To troops out of the war arising, they the task I have set promulging, To women certain whispers of myself bequeathing, their affection me more clearly explaining,
To young men my problems offering—no dallier I—I the muscle of their brains trying,
So I pass, a little time vocal, visible, contrary, Afterward a melodious echo, passionately bent for, (death making me really undying,)
The best of me then when no longer visible, for toward that I have been incessantly preparing.

What is there more, that I lag and pause and crouch extended with unshut mouth?
Is there a single final farewell? 50

My songs cease, I abandon them,
From behind the screen where I hid I advance personally solely to you.

Camerado, this is no book,
Who touches this touches a man,
(Is it night? are we here together alone?)
It is I you hold and who holds you,
I spring from the pages into your arms—decease calls me forth.

O how your fingers drowse me,
Your breath falls around me like dew, your pulse lulls the tympani of my ears,
I feel immersed from head to foot, 60
Delicious, enough

Enough O deed impromptu and secret, Enough O gliding present—enough O surm'd-up past

Dear friend whoever you are take this kiss,
I give it especially to you, do not forget me,
I feel like one who has done work for the day to retire awhile,
I receive now again of my many translations, from my avatars ascending, while others doubtless await me, An unknown sphere more real than I dream'd, more direct, darts awakening rays about me,
So long!

Remember my words, I may again return,
I love you, I depart from materials, 70
I am as one disembodied, triumphant, dead

AS AT THY PORTALS ALSO DEATH

As at thy portals also death,
Entering thy sovereign, dim, illimitable grounds,
To memories of my mother, to the divine blending, maternity,
To her, buried and gone, yet buried not, gone not from me,

(I see again the calm benignant face fresh and beautiful still,
 I sit by the form in the coffin,
 I kiss and kiss convulsively again the sweet old lips, the cheeks, the closed eyes in the coffin,)
 To her, the ideal woman, practical, spiritual, of all of earth, life, love, to me the best,
 I grave a monumental line, before I go, amid these songs,
 And set a tombstone here

GOOD-BYE MY FANCY!

GOOD-BYE my Fancy!
 Farewell dear mate, dear love!
 I'm going away, I know not where,
 Or to what fortune, or whether I may ever see you again,
 So Good-bye my Fancy.

Now for my last—let me look back a moment,
 The slower fainter ticking of the clock is in me, Exit, nightfall, and soon the heart-thud stopping

Long have we lived, joy'd, caress'd together, Delightful!—now separation—Good-bye my Fancy.

10

Yet let me not be too hasty,
 Long indeed have we lived, slept, filter'd, become really blended into one,
 Then if we die we die together, (yes, we'll remain one,)
 If we go anywhere we'll go together to meet what happens,
 May-be we'll be better off and blither, and learn something,
 May-be it is yourself now really ushering me to the true songs, (who knows?)
 May-be it is you the mortal knob really undoing, turning—so now finally, Good-bye—and hail! my Fancy

THIRTY-TWO POEMS

2

THE soul selects her own society,
 Then shuts the door,
 On her divine majority
 Obtrude no more.

Unmoved, she notes the chariot's pausing
 At her low gate,
 Unmoved, an emperor is kneeling Upon her mat.

My life closed twice before its close,
 It yet remains to see
 If Immortality unveil
 A third event to me,

So huge, so hopeless to conceive,
 As these that twice befell.
 Parting is all we know of heaven,
 And all we need of hell

1896

I've known her from an ample nation
 Choose one,
 Then close the valves of her attention
 Like stone

3

THEY say that 'time assuages,'—
 Time never did assuage,
 An actual suffering strengthens,
 As sinews do, with age

Time is a test of trouble,
But not a remedy
If such it prove, it prove too
There was no malady.

1896

4

Just lost when I was saved!
Just felt the world go by!
Just girt me for the onset with eternity,
When breath blew back,
And on the other side
I heard recede the disappointed tide!

Therefore, as one returned, I feel,
Odd secrets of the line to tell!
Some sailor, skirting foreign shores,
Some pale reporter from the awful doors
Before the seal!

11

Next time, to stay!
Next time, the things to see
By ear unheard,
Unscrutinized by eye.

Next time, to tarry,
While the ages steal,— Slow tramp the centuries,
And the cycles wheel

5

I TASTE a liquor never brewed,
From tankards scooped in pearl,
Not all the vats upon the Rhine Yield such an alcohol!

Inebriate of air am I,
And debauchee of dew, Reeling, through endless summer
days,
From inns of molten blue

When landlords turn the drunken bee
Out of the foxglove's door,
When butterflies renounce their drams,
I shall but drink the more!

10

Till seraphs swing their snowy hats,
And saints to windows run,
To see the little uppler Leaning against the sun!

6

I STARTED early, took my dog,
And visited the sea,
The mermaids in the basement
Came out to look at me,

And frigates in the upper floor Extended hempen hands, Presuming me to be a mouse
Aground, upon the sands.

But no man moved me till the tide Went past my simple shoe,
And past my apron and my belt,
And past my bodice too,

10

And made as he would eat me up
As wholly as a dew
Upon a dandelion's sleeve—
And then I started too

And he—he followed close behind,
I felt his silver heel
Upon my ankle,—then my shoes
Would overflow with pearl

20

Until we met the solid town,
No man he seemed to know,
And bowing with a mighty look At me, the sea withdrew.

1891

7

If you were coming in the fall, I'd brush the summer by
With half a smile and half a spurn,
As housewives do a fly.

If I could see you in a year,
I'd wind the months in balls,
And put them each in separate drawers,
Until their time befalls

If only centuries delayed,
I'd count them on my hand,
Subtracting till my fingers dropped Into Van Diemen's land

10

If certain, when this life was out,
That yours and mine should be,
I'd toss it yonder like a rind,
And taste eternity.

But now, all ignorant of the length Of time's uncertain wing,
It goads me, like the goblin bee,
That will not state its sting

BECAUSE I could not stop for Death,
He kindly stopped for me,
The carriage held but just ourselves
And Immortality

We slowly drove, he knew no haste,
And I had put away
My labor, and my leisure too,
For his civility.

We passed the school where children played
At wrestling in a ring,
We passed the fields of gazing grain,
We passed the setting sun

10

We paused before a house that seemed
A swelling of the ground,
The roof was scarcely visible,
The cornice but a mound

Since then 'tis centuries, but each Feels shorter than the day
I first surmised the horses' heads Were toward eternity.

OUR share of night to bear,
Our share of morning,
Our blank in bliss to fill,
Our blank in scorning.

Here a mist, and there a mist,
Afterwards—day!

11

I CANNOT live with you,
It would be life,
And life is over there
Behind the shelf

The sexton keeps the key to,
Putting up
Our life, his porcelain,
Like a cup

Discarded of the housewife, Quant or broken,
A newer Sevres pleases,
Old ones crack.

10

I could not die with you,
For one must wait
To shut the other's gaze down,—
You could not.

And I, could I stand by
And see you freeze,
Without my right of frost,
Death's privilege?

20

Nor could I rise with you,
Because your face
Would put out Jesus',
That new grace

Glow plain and foreign
On my homesick eye, Except that you, than he Shone closer by

They'd judge us—how?
For you served Heaven, you know,
Or sought to,
I could not,

30

Because you saturated sight,
And I had no more eyes
For sordid excellence
As Paradise.

And were you lost, I would be,
Though my name
Rang loudest
On the heavenly fame.

40

And were you saved,
And I condemned to be Where you were not,
That self were hell to me.

How dreary to be somebody!
How public, like a frog
To tell your name the livelong day
To an admiring bog!

1891

So we must keep apart,
You there, I here,
With just the door ajar
That oceans are,
And prayer,
And that pale sustenance,
Despair!

I'LL tell you how the sun rose,—
A ribbon at a time
The steeples swam in amethyst,
The news like squirrels ran.

The hulls untied their bonnets,
The bobolinks begun
Then I said softly to myself,
'That must have been the sun!'

15 SURGEONS must be very careful
When they take the knife!
Underneath their fine incisions Stirs the culprit,—Life!

16

I FOUND the phrase to every thought
I ever had, but one,
And that defies me,—as a hand
Did try to chalk the sun

To races nurtured in the dark,—
How would your own begin?
Can blaze be done in cochineal,
Or noon in mazarin?

17

THE last night that she lived,
It was a common night,
Except the dying, this to us
Made nature different.

We noticed smallest things,— Things overlooked before,
By this great light upon our minds Italicized, as 'twere

That others could exist
While she must finish quite,
A jealousy for her arose
So nearly infinite.

10

We waited while she passed,
It was a narrow time,
Too jostled were our souls to speak,
At length the notice came.

She mentioned, and forgot,
Then lightly as a reed
Bent to the water, shivered scarce,
Consented, and was dead.

20

But how he set, I know not
There seemed a purple stile
Which little yellow boys and girls Were climbing all the while 10

Till when they reached the other side,
A domine in gray
Put gently up the evening bars,
And led the flock away

13

I NEVER saw a moor,
I never saw the sea,
Yet know I how the heather looks,
And what a wave must be

I never spoke with God,
Nor visited in heaven,
Yet certain am I of the spot
As if the chart were given.

14

I'M nobody! Who are you?
Are you nobody, too?
Then there's a pair of us—don't tell!
They'd banish us, you know.

And we, we placed the hair,
And drew the head erect,
And then an awful leisure was,
Our faith to regulate.

I FELT a funeral in my brain,
And mourners, to and fro, Kept treading, treading, till it seemed That sense was breaking through

And when they all were seated,
A service like a drum
Kept beating, beating, till I thought
My mind was going numb

And then I heard them lift a box,
And creak across my soul 10
With those same boots of lead, again
Then space began to toll

As all the heavens were a bell,
And Being but an ear,
And I and silence some strange race,
Wrecked, solitary, here. 1896

19

I LIKE to see it lap the miles,
And lick the valleys up,
And stop to feed itself at tanks,
And then, prodigious, step

Around a pile of mountains,
And, supercilious, peer
In shanties by the sides of roads,
And then a quarry pare

To fit its sides, and crawl between, Complaining all the while 10
In horrid, hooting stanza,
Then chase itself down hill

And neigh like Boanerges,
Then, punctual as a star,
Stop—docile and omnipotent—
At its own stable door 1891

Was but a book What liberty

But gallanter, I know,
Who charge within the bosom,
The cavalry of woe.

I heard it hit the ground,

HE preached upon 'breadth' till it argued him narrow,—
The broad are too broad to define,
And of 'truth' until it proclaimed him a

To hear an oriole sing
May be a common thing,
Or only a divine

It is not of the bird
Who sings the same, unheard,
As unto crowd

In dun or fair

So whether it be rune,

With a revolving wheel,

Yet that whip's name too noble
Then to tell

Magnanimous of bird
By boy descried,

PAIN has an element of blank,
It cannot recollect
When it began, or if there were

It has no future but itself,
Its infinite realms contain Its past, enlightened to perceive
New periods of pain

1836-1907

FREDERICKSBURG

THE increasing moonlight drifts across my bed,
And on the churchyard by the road, I know It falls as white and noiselessly as snow

"Twas such a night two weary summers fled,

The stars, as now, were waning overhead
Listen! Again the shrill-lipped bugles blow Where the swift currents of the river flow Past Fredericksburg,—far off the heavens are red

With sudden conflagration, on yon height, Linstock in hand, the gunners hold their breath,

A signal-rocket pierces the dense night, Flings its spent stars upon the town beneath,

Hark!—the artillery massing on the right, Hark!—the black squadrons wheeling down to Death!

1865

IDENTITY

SOMEWHERE—in desolate wind-swept space—

In Twilight-land—in No-man's-land—
Two hurrying Shapes met face to face,
And bade each other stand

'And who are you?' cried one a-gape, Shuddering in the gloaming light.

'I know not,' said the second Shape,
'I only died last night'

1877

HEREDITY

A SOLDIER of the Cromwell stamp,
With sword and psalm-book by his side,
At home alike in church and camp
Austere he lived, and smileless died.

But she, a creature soft and fine—
From Spain, some say, some say from France,

Within her veins leapt blood like wine—
She led her Roundhead lord a dance!

In Grantham church they lie asleep,
Just where, the verger may not know 10 Strange that two hundred years should keep
The old ancestral fires aglow!

In me these two have met again,
To each my nature owes a part
To one, the cool and reasoning brain,
To one, the quick, unreasoning heart

1885

MEMORY

MY mind lets go a thousand things,
Like dates of wars and deaths of kings,
And yet recalls the very hour—

"Twas noon by yonder village tower,
And on the last blue noon in May—
The wind came briskly up this way, Crisping the brook beside the road,
Then, pausing here, set down its load
Of pine-scents, and shook listlessly

Two petals from that wild-rose tree 10

ARIEL IN THE CLOVEN PINE

Now the frosty stars are gone
I have watched them, one by one,
Fading on the shores of Dawn
Round and full the glorious sun
Walks with level step the spray,

Through his vestibule of Day, While the wolves that late did howl

Slunk to dens and coverts foul,
Guarded by the demon owl,
Who, last night, with mocking croon, 10
Wheeled athwart the chilly moon,

And with eyes that blankly glared
On my direful torment stared.

The lark is flickering in the light;
Still the nightingale doth sing,—
All the isle, alive with Spring,
Lies, a jewel of delight,
On the blue sea's heaving breast.
Not a breath from out the West,
But some balmy smell doth bring 20
From the sprouting myrtle buds,
Or from meadowy vales that lie
Like a green inverted sky,
Which the yellow cowslip stars,
And the bloomy almond woods,
Cloud-like, cross with roseate bars
All is life that I can spy,
To the farthest sea and sky,
And my own the only pain
Within this ring of Tyrrhene main 30

In the gnarled and cloven Pine Where that hell-born hag did chain me,
All this orb of cloudless shine,
All this youth in Nature's veins
Tingling with the season's wine,
With a sharper torment pain me
Pansies in soft April rains Fill their stalks with honeyed sap Drawn from Earth's prolific lap,
But the sluggish blood she brings 40
To the tough Pine's hundred rings, Closer locks their cruel hold,
Closer draws the scaly bark Round the crevice, damp and cold, Where my useless wings I fold,— Sealing me in iron dark
By this coarse and alien state
Is my dainty essence wronged, Finer senses that belonged To my freedom, chafe at Fate, 50
Till the happier elves I hate,
Who in moonlight dances turn Underneath the palmy fern,
Or in light and twinkling bands
Follow on with linked hands
To the Ocean's yellow sands.

Primrose-eyes each morning ope
In their cool, deep beds of grass, Violets make the airs that pass Telltale of their fragrant slope. 60
I can see them where they spring
Never brushed by fairy wing.

All those corners I can spy
In the island's solitude,
Where the dew is never dry,
Nor the miser bees intrude Cups of rarest hue are there,
Full of perfumed wine undrained,— Mushroom banquets, ne'er profaned, Canopied by maiden-hair. 70
Pearls I see upon the sands, Never touched by other hands,
And the rainbow bubbles shine
On the ridged and frothy brine, Tenantless of voyager
Till they burst in vacant air
O, the songs that sung might be,
And the mazy dances woven,
Had that witch ne'er crossed the sea
And the Pine been never cloven! 80

Many years my direst pain
Has made the wave-rocked isle complain Winds, that from the Cyclades
Came, to blow in wanton riot Round its shore's enchanted quiet, Bore my wailings on the seas,
Sorrowing birds in Autumn went Through the world with my lament.
Still the bitter fate is mine,
All delight unshared to see, 90
Smarting in the cloven Pine,
While I wait the tardy axe
Which, perchance, shall set me free From the damned Witch Sycorax.

BEDOUIN SONG

FROM the Desert I come to thee
On a stallion shod with fire;
And the winds are left behind
In the speed of my desire.
Under thy window I stand,
And the midnight hears my cry.
I love thee, I love but thee,
With a love that shall not die
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old, 10
And the leaves of the Judgment
Book unfold!

Look from thy window and see My passion and my pain;
I lie on the sands below,
And I faint in thy disdain.

Let the night-winds touch thy brow
 With the heat of my burning sigh,
 And melt thee to hear the vow
 Of a love that shall not die 20
*Till the sun grows cold,
 And the stars are old,
 And the leaves of the Judgment
 Book unfold!*

My steps are nightly driven,
 By the fever in my breast,

To hear from thy lattice breathed
 The word that shall give me rest
 Open the door of thy heart,
 And open thy chamber door, 30
 And my kisses shall teach thy lips
 The love that shall fade no more
*Till the sun grows cold,
 And the stars are old,
 And the leaves of the Judgment
 Book unfold!*

HOW OLD BROWN TOOK HARPER'S FERRY

JOHN BROWN in Kansas settled, like a steadfast Yankee farmer, Brave and godly, with four sons, all stalwart men of might There he spoke aloud for freedom, and the Border-strife grew warmer, Till the Rangers fired his dwelling, in his absence, in the night,
 And Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Came homeward in the morning—to find his house burned down.

'Then he grasped his trusty rifle and boldly fought for freedom, Smote from border unto border the fierce, invading band, 9
 And he and his brave boys vowed—so might Heaven help and speed 'em!—
 They would save those grand old prairies from the curse that blights the land,
 And Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Said, 'Boys, the Lord will aid us!' and he shoved his ramrod down

And the Lord did aid these men, and they labored day and even, Saving Kansas from its peril, and their very lives seemed charmed, Till the ruffians killed one son, in the blessed light of Heaven,— In cold blood the fellows slew him, as he journeyed all unarmed,

Then Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown, 20 Shed not a tear, but shut his teeth, and frowned a terrible frown!

Then they seized another brave boy,—not amid the heat of battle,
 But in peace, behind his ploughshare,— and they loaded him with chains, And with pikes, before their horses, even as they goad their cattle, Drove him cruelly, for their sport, and at last blew out his brains,
 Then Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Raised his right hand up to Heaven, calling Heaven's vengeance down

And he swore a fearful oath, by the name of the Almighty,
 He would hunt this ravening evil that had scathed and torn him so, 30 He would seize it by the vitals, he would crush it day and night, he Would so pursue its footsteps, so return it blow for blow,
 That Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Should be a name to swear by, in backwoods or in town!

Then his beard became more grizzled, and his wild blue eye grew wilder,
 And more sharply curved his hawk's-nose, snuffing battle from afar,
 And he and the two boys left, though the Kansas strife waxed milder,

Grew more sullen, till was over the bloody Border War,
 And Old Brown, 40
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Had gone crazy, as they reckoned by his fearful glare and frown

So he left the plains of Kansas and their bitter woes behind him, Slpt off into Virginia, where the statesmen all are born, Hired a farm by Harper's Ferry, and no one knew where to find him, Or whether he'd turned parson, or was jacketed and shorn,
 For Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Mad as he was, knew texts enough to wear a parson's gown

He bought no ploughs and harrows, spades and shovels, and such trifles, 50 But quietly to his rancho there came, by every train,
 Boxes full of pikes and pistols, and his well-beloved Sharp's rifles, And eighteen other madmen joined their leader there again
 Says Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 'Boys, we've got an army large enough to march and take the town!'

'Take the town, and seize the muskets, free the negroes, and then arm them, Carry the County and the State, ay, and all the potent South On their own heads be the slaughter, if their victims rise to harm them—These Virginians! who believed not, nor would heed the warning mouth.' 60
 Says Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 'The world shall see a Republic, or my name is not John Brown'

'Twas the sixteenth of October, on the evening of a Sunday:
 'This good work,' declared the captain,
 'shall be on a holy night!'
 It was on a Sunday evening, and before the noon of Monday,
 With two sons, and Captain Stephens, fifteen privates—black and white,
 Captain Brown,

Osawatomie Brown,
 Marched across the bridged Potomac, and knocked the sentry down; 70

Took the guarded armory-building, and the muskets and the cannon; Captured all the county majors and the colonels, one by one, Scared to death each gallant scion of Virginia they ran on,
 And before the noon of Monday, I say, the deed was done.
 Mad Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 With his eighteen other crazy men, went in and took the town.

Very little noise and bluster, little smell of powder made he,
 It was all done in the midnight, like the Emperor's coup d'état
 'Cut the wires! Stop the rail-cars! Hold the streets and bridges!' said he, 80 Then declared the new Republic, with himself for guiding star,— This Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 And the bold two thousand citizens ran off and left the town.

Then was riding and railroading and expressing here and thither, And the Martinsburg Sharpshooters and the Charlestown Volunteers, And the Shepherdstown and Winchester Militia hastened whither Old Brown was said to muster his ten thousand grenadiers General Brown!
 Osawatomie Brown! 90
 Behind whose rampant banner all the North was pouring down

But at last, 'tis said, some prisoners escaped from Old Brown's durance, And the effervescent valor of the Chivalry broke out,
 When they learned that nineteen madmen had the marvellous assurance—Only nineteen—thus to seize the place and drive them straight about;
 And Old Brown,
 Osawatomie Brown,
 Found an army come to take him, encamped around the town.

But to storm with all the forces I have mentioned, was too risky,
 So they hurried off to Richmond for the Government Marines, 100
Tore them from their weeping matrons, fired their souls with Bourbon whiskey,
 Till they battered down Brown's castle with their ladders and machines;
     And Old Brown,
     Osawatomie Brown,
 Received three bayonet stabs, and a cut on his brave old crown.

Tallyho! the old Virginia gentry gather to the baying!
 In they rushed and killed the game, shooting lustily away,
 And whene'er they slew a rebel, those who came too late for slaying, Not to lose a share of glory, fired their bullets in his clay,
     And Old Brown, 110
     Osawatomie Brown, Saw his sons fall dead beside him, and between them laid him down

How the conquerors wore their laurels;
     how they hastened on the trial, How Old Brown was placed, half-dying, on the Charlestown court-house floor,
 How he spoke his grand oration, in the scorn of all denial,
 What the brave old madman told them,— these are known the country o'er 'Hang Old Brown,
     Oswatomie Brown,'
 Said the judge, 'and all such rebels!' with his most judicial frown

But, Virginians, don't do it! for I tell you that the flagon, 120 Filled with blood of Old Brown's offspring, was first poured by Southern hands,
 And each drop from Old Brown's life-veins, like the red gore of the dragon, May spring up a vengeful Fury, hissing through your slave-worn lands!
     And Old Brown,
     Osawatomie Brown,
 May trouble you more than ever, when you've nailed his coffin down!

KEARNY AT SEVEN PINES

So that soldierly legend is still on its journey,—
 That story of Kearny who knew not to yield!
 'Twas the day when with Jameson, fierce Berry, and Birney, Against twenty thousand he rallied the field Where the red volleys poured, where the clamor rose highest,
 Where the dead lay in clumps through the dwarf oak and pine,
 Where the aim from the thicket was surest and nighest,— No charge like Phil Kearny's along the whole line

When the battle went ill, and the bravest were solemn,
 Near the dark Seven Pines, where we still held our ground, 10
 He rode down the length of the withering column,
 And his heart at our war-cry leapt up with a bound,
 He snuffed, like his charger, the wind of the powder,—
 His sword waved us on and we answered the sign
 Loud our cheer as we rushed, but his laugh rang the louder,
 'There's the devil's own fun, boys, along the whole line!'

How he strode his brown steed! How we saw his blade brighten In the one hand still left,—and the reins in his teeth!
 He laughed like a boy when the holidays heighten,
 But a soldier's glance shot from his visor
     beneath 20
 Up came the reserves to the mellay infernal, Asking where to go in,—through the clearing or pine?
 'O, anywhere! Forward! 'Tis all the same, Colonel
 You'll find lovely fighting along the whole line!'

O, evil the black shroud of night at Chantilly,

That hid him from sight of his brave men and tried!
Foul, foul sped the bullet that clipped the white lily,
The flower of our knighthood, the whole army's pride!
Yet we dream that he still,—in that shadowy region

Where the dead form their ranks at the wan drummer's sign,— Rides on, as of old, down the length of his legion,
And the word still is Forward! along the whole line.

BRET HARTE

1836-1902

THE OUTCASTS OF POKER FLAT<sup>1</sup>

As Mr John Oakhurst, gambler, stepped into the main street of Poker Flat on the morning of the 23d of November, 1850, he was conscious of a change in its moral atmosphere since the preceding night. Two or three men, conversing earnestly together, ceased as he approached, and exchanged significant glances. There was a Sabbath lull in the air, which, in a settlement unused to Sabbath influences, looked ominous

<sup>1</sup> Of himself, Harte wrote "But he deems it worthy of consideration that during this period, i.e., from 1862 to 1866, he produced his first efforts toward indicating a peculiarly characteristic Western American literature. He would like to offer these facts as evidence of his very early, half-boyish, but very enthusiastic, belief in such a possibility—a belief which never deserted him, and which, a few years later, from the better-known pages of the Overland Monthly, he was able to demonstrate to a larger and more cosmopolitan audience in the story of "The Luck of Roaring Camp" and the poem of the "Heathen Chinee." But it was one of the anomalies of the very condition of life that he worked amidst, and endeavoured to portray, that these first efforts were rewarded by very little success, and even "The Luck of Roaring Camp" depended for its recognition in California upon its success elsewhere. Hence the critical reader will observe that the bulk of these earlier efforts were marked by very little flavour of the soil, but were addressed to an audience half foreign in their sympathies, and still imbued with Eastern or New England habits and literary traditions. "Home" was still potent with these voluntary exiles in their moments of relaxation. Eastern magazines and current Eastern literature formed their literary recreation, and the sale of the better class of periodicals was singularly great. Nor was the taste confined to American literature. The illustrated and satirical English journals were as frequently seen in California as in Massachusetts, and the author records that he has experienced more difficulty in procuring a copy of Punch in an English provincial town than was his fortune at "Red Dog" or "One-Horse Gulch." Harte, Introduction, Works (Boston, 1882), 1, 2-3

Mr. Oakhurst's calm, handsome face betrayed small concern in these indications. Whether he was conscious of any predisposing cause was another question. 'I reckon they're after somebody,' he reflected, 'likely it's me.' He returned to his pocket the handkerchief with which he had been whipping away the red dust of Poker Flat from his neat boots, and quietly discharged his mind of any further conjecture.

In point of fact, Poker Flat was 'after somebody.' It had lately suffered the loss of several thousand dollars, two valuable horses, and a prominent citizen. It was experiencing a spasm of virtuous reaction, quite as lawless and ungovernable as any of the acts that had provoked it. A secret committee had determined to rid the town of all improper persons. This was done permanently in regard of two men who were then hanging from the boughs of a sycamore in the gulch, and temporarily in the banishment of certain other objectionable characters. I regret to say that some of these were ladies. It is but due to the sex, however, to state that their impropriety was professional, and it was only in such easily established standards of evil that Poker Flat ventured to sit in judgment.

Mr. Oakhurst was right in supposing that he was included in this category. A few of the committee had urged hanging him as a possible example and a sure method of reimbursing themselves from his pockets of the sums he had won from them. 'It's agin justice,' said Jim Wheeler, 'to let this yer young man from Roaring Camp—an entire stranger—carry away our money.' But a crude sentiment of equity residing in the breasts of those who had been fortunate enough to win from Mr. Oakhurst overruled this narrower local prejudice

Mr. Oakhurst received his sentence with philosophic calmness, none the less coolly that he was aware of the hesitation of his judges. He was too much of a gambler not to accept fate. With him life was at best an uncertain game, and he recognized the usual percentage in favor of the dealer.

A body of armed men accompanied the deported wickedness of Poker Flat to the outskirts of the settlement. Besides Mr. Oakhurst, who was known to be a coolly desperate man, and for whose intimidation the armed escort was intended, the expatriated party consisted of a young woman familiarly known as 'The Duchess,' another who had won the title of 'Mother Shipton,' and 'Uncle Billy,' a suspected sluice-robber and confirmed drunkard. The cavalcade provoked no comments from the spectators, nor was any word uttered by the escort. Only when the gulch which marked the uttermost limit of Poker Flat was reached, the leader spoke briefly and to the point. The exiles were forbidden to return at the peril of their lives.

As the escort disappeared, their pent-up feelings found vent in a few hysterical tears from the Duchess, some bad language from Mother Shipton, and a Parthian volley of expletives from Uncle Billy. The philosophic Oakhurst alone remained silent. He listened calmly to Mother Shipton's desire to cut somebody's heart out, to the repeated statements of the Duchess that she would die in the road, and to the alarming oaths that seemed to be bumped out of Uncle Billy as he rode forward. With the easy good humor characteristic of his class, he insisted upon exchanging his own riding-horse, 'Five-Spot,' for the sorry mule which the Duchess rode. But even this act did not draw the party into any closer sympathy. The young woman readjusted her somewhat dragged plumes with a feeble, faded coquetry, Mother Shipton eyed the possessor of 'Five-Spot' with malevolence, and Uncle Billy included the whole party in one sweeping anathema.

The road to Sandy Bar—a camp that, not having as yet experienced the regenerating influences of Poker Flat, consequently seemed to offer some invitation to the emigrants—lay over a steep mountain range. It was distant a day's severe travel. In that advanced season the party soon passed out of the moist, temperate regions of the foothills into the dry, cold, bracing air of the Sierras. The trail was narrow and difficult. At noon the Duchess, rolling out of her saddle upon the ground, declared her intention of going no farther, and the party halted.

The spot was singularly wild and impressive. A wooded amphitheatre, surrounded on three sides by precipitous cliffs of naked granite, sloped gently toward the crest of another precipice that overlooked the valley. It was, undoubtedly, the most suitable spot for a camp, had camping been advisable. But Mr. Oakhurst knew that scarcely half the journey to Sandy Bar was accomplished, and the party were not equipped or provisioned for delay. This fact he pointed out to his companions curtly, with a philosophic commentary on the folly of 'throwing up their hand before the game was played out.' But they were furnished with liquor, which in this emergency stood them in place of food, fuel, rest, and prescience. In spite of his remonstrances, it was not long before they were more or less under its influence. Uncle Billy passed rapidly from a bellicose state into one of stupor, the Duchess became maudlin, and Mother Shipton snored. Mr. Oakhurst alone remained erect, leaning against a rock, calmly surveying them.

Mr. Oakhurst did not drink. It interfered with a profession which required coolness, impassiveness, and presence of mind, and, in his own language, he 'couldn't afford it.' As he gazed at his recumbent fellow exiles, the loneliness begotten of his pariah trade, his habits of life, his very vices, for the first time seriously oppressed him. He bestirred himself in dusting his black clothes, washing his hands and face, and other acts characteristic of his studiously neat habits, and for a moment forgot his annoyance. The thought of deserting his weaker and more pitiable companions never perhaps occurred to him. Yet he could not help feeling the want of that excitement which, singularly enough, was most conducive to that calm equanimity for which he was notorious. He looked at the gloomy walls that rose a thousand feet sheer above the circling pines around him, at the sky ominously clouded, at the valley below, already deepening into shadow, and, doing so, suddenly he heard his own name called

A horseman slowly ascended the trail. In the fresh, open face of the newcomer Mr Oakhurst recognized Tom Simson, otherwise known as 'The Innocent,' of Sandy Bar. He had met him some months before over a 'little game,' and had, with perfect equanimity, won the entire fortune—amounting to some forty dollars—of that guileless youth. After the game was finished, Mr Oakhurst drew the youthful speculator behind the door and thus addressed him: 'Tommy, you're a good little man, but you can't gamble worth a cent. Don't try it over again.' He then handed him his money back, pushed him gently from the room, and so made a devoted slave of Tom Simson.

There was a remembrance of this in his boyish and enthusiastic greeting of Mr Oakhurst. He had started, he said, to go to Poker Flat to seek his fortune. 'Alone?' No, not exactly alone, in fact (a giggle), he had run away with Piney Woods. Didn't Mr Oakhurst remember Piney? She that used to wait on the table at the Temperance House? They had been engaged a long time, but old Jake Woods had objected, and so they had run away, and were going to Poker Flat to be married, and here they were. And they were tired out, and how lucky it was they had found a place to camp, and company. All this the Innocent delivered rapidly, while Piney, a stout, comely damsel of fifteen, emerged from behind the pine-tree, where she had been blushing unseen, and rode to the side of her lover.

Mr Oakhurst seldom troubled himself with sentiment, still less with propriety, but he had a vague idea that the situation was not fortunate. He retained, however, his presence of mind sufficiently to kick Uncle Billy, who was about to say something, and Uncle Billy was sober enough to recognize in Mr Oakhurst's kick a superior power that would not bear trifling. He then endeavored to dissuade Tom Simson from delaying further, but in vain. He even pointed out the fact that there was no provision, nor means of making a camp. But, unluckily, the Innocent met this objection by assuring the party that he was provided with an extra mule loaded with provisions, and by the discovery of a rude attempt at a log house near the trail. 'Piney can stay with Mrs Oakhurst,' said the Innocent, pointing to the Duchess, 'and I can shift for myself.'

Nothing but Mr Oakhurst's admonishing foot saved Uncle Billy from bursting into a roar of laughter. As it was, he felt compelled to retire up the cañon until he could recover his gravity. There he confided the joke to the tall pine-trees, with many slaps of his leg, contortions of his face, and the usual profanity. But when he returned to the party, he found them seated by a fire—for the air had grown strangely chill and the sky overcast—in apparently amicable conversation. Piney was actually talking in an impulsive girlish fashion to the Duchess, who was listening with an interest and animation she had not shown for many days. The Innocent was holding forth, apparently with equal effect, to Mr Oakhurst and Mother Shipton, who was actually relaxing into amiability. 'Is this yer a d—d picnic?' said Uncle Billy, with inward scorn, as he surveyed the sylvan group, the glancing firelight, and the tethered animals in the foreground. Suddenly an idea mingled with the alcoholic fumes that disturbed his brain. It was apparently of a jocular nature, for he felt impelled to slap his leg again and cram his fist into his mouth.

As the shadows crept slowly up the mountain, a slight breeze rocked the tops of the pine-trees and moaned through their long and gloomy aisles. The ruined cabin, patched and covered with pine boughs, was set apart for the ladies. As the lovers parted, they unaffectedly exchanged a kiss, so honest and sincere that it might have been heard above the swaying pines. The frail Duchess and the malevolent Mother Shipton were probably too stunned to remark upon this last evidence of simplicity, and so turned without a word to the hut. The fire was replenished, the men lay down before the door, and in a few minutes were asleep.

Mr Oakhurst was a light sleeper. Toward morning he awoke benumbed and cold. As he stirred the dying fire, the wind, which was now blowing strongly, brought to his cheek that which caused the blood to leave it,—snow!

He started to his feet with the intention of awakening the sleepers, for there was no time to lose. But turning to where Uncle Billy had been lying, he found him gone. A suspicion leaped to his brain, and a curse to his lips. He ran to the spot where the mules had been tethered—they were no longer there. The tracks were already rapidly disappearing in the snow.

The momentary excitement brought Mr Oakhurst back to the fire with his usual calm. He did not waken the sleepers. The Innocent slumbered peacefully, with a smile on his good-humored, freckled face, the virgin Piney slept beside her frailer sisters as sweetly as though attended by celestial guardians, and Mr Oakhurst, drawing his blanket over his shoulders, stroked his mustaches and waited for the dawn. It came slowly in a whirling mist of snowflakes that dazzled and confused the eye. What could be seen of the landscape appeared magically changed. He looked over the valley, and summed up the present and future in two words, 'Snowed in!'

A careful inventory of the provisions, which, fortunately for the party, had been stored within the hut, and so escaped the felonious fingers of Uncle Billy, disclosed the fact that with care and prudence they might last ten days longer. 'That is,' said Mr Oakhurst sotto voce to the Innocent, 'if you're willing to board us. If you ain't—and perhaps you'd better not—you can wait till Uncle Billy gets back with provisions.' For some occult reason, Mr Oakhurst could not bring himself to disclose Uncle Billy's rascality, and so offered the hypothesis that he had wandered from the camp and had accidentally stampeded the animals. He dropped a warning to the Duchess and Mother Shipton, who of course knew the facts of their associate's defection. 'They'll find out the truth about us all when they find out anything,' he added significantly, 'and there's no good frightening them now.'

Tom Simson not only put all his worldly store at the disposal of Mr Oakhurst, but seemed to enjoy the prospect of their enforced seclusion. 'We'll have a good camp for a week, and then the snow'll melt, and we'll all go back together.' The cheerful gayety of the young man and Mr Oakhurst's calm infected the others. The Innocent, with the aid of pine boughs, extemporized a thatch for the roofless cabin, and the Duchess directed Piney in the rearrange of the interior with a taste and tact that opened the blue eyes of that provincial maiden to their fullest extent. 'I reckon now you're used to fine things at Poker Flat,' said Piney. The Duchess turned away sharply to conceal something that reddened her cheeks through their professional tint, and Mother Shipton requested Piney not to 'chatter.' But when Mr Oakhurst returned from a weary search for the trail, he heard the sound of happy laughter echoed from the rocks. He stopped in some alarm, and his thoughts first naturally reverted to the whiskey, which he had prudently cached. 'And yet it don't somehow sound like whiskey,' said the gambler. It was not until he caught sight of the blazing fire through the still blinding storm, and the group around it, that he settled to the conviction that it was 'square fun.'

Whether Mr Oakhurst had cached his cards with the whiskey as something debarred the free access of the community, I cannot say. It was certain that, in Mother Shipton's words, he 'didn't say "cards" once' during that evening. Haply the time was beguiled by an accordion, produced somewhat ostentatiously by Tom Simson from his pack. Notwithstanding some difficulties attending the manipulation of this instrument, Piney Woods managed to pluck several reluctant melodies from its keys, to an accompaniment by the Innocent on a pair of bone castanets. But the crowning festivity of the evening was reached in a rude camp-meeting hymn, which the lovers, joining hands, sang with great earnestness and vociferation. I fear that a certain defiant tone and Covenanters' swing to its chorus, rather than any devotional quality, caused it speedily to infect the others, who at last joined in the refrain:

'I'm proud to live in the service of the Lord,
And I'm bound to die in His army.'

The pines rocked, the storm eddied and whirled above the miserable group, and the flames of their altar leaped heavenward, as if in token of the vow.

At midnight the storm abated, the rolling clouds parted, and the stars glittered keenly above the sleeping camp. Mr Oakhurst, whose professional habits had enabled him to live on the smallest possible amount of sleep, in dividing the watch with Tom Simson somehow managed to take upon himself the greater part of that duty. He excused himself to the Innocent by saying that he had 'often been a week without sleep.' 'Doing what?' asked Tom 'Poker!' replied Oakhurst sententiously 'When a man gets a streak of luck,—nigger-luck,— 10 he don't get tired. The luck gives in first Luck,' continued the gambler reflectively, 'is a mighty queer thing. All you know about it for certain is that it's bound to change. And it's finding out when it's going to change that makes you. We've had a streak of bad luck since we left Poker Flat,—you come along, and slap you get into it, too. If you can hold your cards right along you're all right. For,' added the gambler, 20 with cheerful irrelevance—

"I'm proud to live in the service of the Lord,

The third day came, and the sun, looking through the white-curtained valley, saw the outcasts divide their slowly decreasing store of provisions for the morning meal. It was one of the peculiarities of that mountain climate that its rays diffused a kindly warmth over the wintry landscape, as if in regretful commiseration of the past. But it revealed drift on drift of snow piled high around the hut,—a hopeless, uncharted, trackless sea of white lying below the rocky shores to which the castaways still clung. Through the marvelously clear air the smoke of the pastoral village of Poker Flat rose miles away. Mother Shipton saw it, 40 and from a remote pinnacle of her rocky fastness hurled in that direction a final malediction. It was her last vituperative attempt, and perhaps for that reason was invested with a certain degree of sublimity. It did her good, she privately informed the Duchess. 'Just you go out there and cuss, and see.' She then set herself to the task of amusing 'the child,' as she and the Duchess were pleased to call Piney. Piney was no chicken, but it was a soothing and original theory of the pair thus to account for the fact that she didn't swear and wasn't im-50 proper

When night crept up again through the gorges, the reedy notes of the accordion rose and fell in fitful spasms and long-drawn gasps by the flickering campfire. But music failed to fill entirely the aching void left by insufficient food, and a new diversion was proposed by Piney,—story-telling. Neither Mr. Oakhurst nor his female companions caring to relate their personal experiences, this plan would have failed too, but for the Innocent. Some months before he had chanced upon a stray copy of Mr. Pope's ingenious translation of the Iliad. He now proposed to narrate the principal incidents of that poem—having thoroughly mastered the argument and fairly forgotten the words—in the current vernacular of Sandy Bar. And so for the rest of that night the Homeric demigods again walked the earth. Trojan bully and wily Greek wrestled in the winds, and the great pines in the cañon seemed to bow to the wrath of the son of Peleus. Mr. Oakhurst listened with quiet satisfaction. Most especially was he interested in the fate of 'Ash-heels,' as the Innocent persisted in denominating the 'swift-footed Achilles.'

So, with small food and much of Homer and the accordion, a week passed over the heads of the outcasts. The sun again forsook them, and again from leaden skies the snowflakes were sifted over the land. Day by day closer around them drew the snowy circle, until at last they looked from their prison over drifted walls of dazzling white, that towered twenty feet above their heads. It became more and more difficult to replenish their fires, even from the fallen trees beside them, now half hidden in the drifts. And yet no one complained. The lovers turned from the dreary prospect and looked into each other's eyes, and were happy. Mr. Oakhurst settled himself coolly to the losing game before him. The Duchess, more cheerful than she had been, assumed the care of Piney. Only Mother Shipton—once the strongest of the party—seemed to sicken and fade. At midnight on the tenth day she called Oakhurst to her side. 'I'm going,' she said, in a voice of querulous weakness, 'but don't say anything about it. Don't waken the kids. Take the bundle from under my head, and open it.' Mr. Oakhurst did so. It contained Mother Shipton's rations for the last week, untouched 'Give 'em to the child,' she said, pointing to the sleeping Piney. 'You've starved yourself,' said the gambler 'That's what they call it,' said the woman querulously, as she lay down again, and, turning her face to the wall, passed quietly away

The accordion and the bones were put aside that day, and Homer was forgotten. When the body of Mother Shipton had been committed to the snow, Mr Oakhurst took the Innocent aside, and showed him a pair of snowshoes, which he had fashioned from the old pack-saddle 'There's one chance in a hundred to save her yet,' he said, pointing to Piney, 'but it's there,' he added, pointing toward Poker Flat 'If you can reach there in two days she's safe' 'And you?' asked Tom Simson 'I'll stay here,' was the curt reply

The lovers parted with a long embrace 'You are not going, too?' said the Duchess, as she saw Mr Oakhurst apparently waiting to accompany him 'As far as the cañon,' he replied He turned suddenly and kissed the Duchess, leaving her pallid face aflame, and her trembling limbs rigid with amazement

Night came, but not Mr Oakhurst It brought the storm again and the whirling snow Then the Duchess, feeding the fire, found that some one had quietly piled beside the hut enough fuel to last a few days longer The tears rose to her eyes, but she hid them from Piney

The women slept but little In the morning, looking into each other's faces, they read their fate Neither spoke, but Piney, accepting the position of the stronger, drew near and placed her arm around the Duchess's waist They kept this attitude for the rest of the day That night the storm reached its greatest fury, and, rending asunder the protecting vines, invaded the very hut

Toward morning they found themselves unable to feed the fire, which gradually died away As the embers slowly blackened, the Duchess crept closer to Piney, and broke the silence of many hours 'Piney, can you pray?' 'No, dear,' said Piney simply The Duchess, without knowing exactly why, felt relieved, and, putting her head upon Piney's shoulder, spoke no more And so reclining, the younger and purer pillowing the head of her soiled sister upon her virgin breast, they fell asleep

The wind lulled as if it feared to waken them Feathery drifts of snow, shaken from the long pine boughs, flew like white-winged birds, and settled about them as they slept The moon through the rifted clouds looked down upon what had been the camp But all human stain, all trace of earthly travail, was hidden beneath the spotless mantle mercifully flung from above.

They slept all that day and the next, nor did they waken when voices and footsteps broke the silence of the camp And when pitying fingers brushed the snow from their wan faces, you could scarcely have told from the equal peace that dwelt upon them which was she that had sinned Even the law of Poker Flat recognized this, and turned away, leaving them still locked in each other's arms

But at the head of the gulch, on one of the largest pine-trees, they found the deuce of clubs pinned to the bark with a bowie-knife It bore the following, written in pencil in a firm hand

BENEATH THIS TREE LIES THE BODY OF

JOHN OAKHURST, WHO STRUCK A STREAK OF BAD LUCK
ON THE 23D OF NOVEMBER, 1850, AND HANDLED IN HIS CHECKS
ON THE 7TH DECEMBER, 1850

†

And pulseless and cold, with a Derringer by his side and a bullet in his heart, though still calm as in life, beneath the snow lay he who was at once the strongest and yet the weakest of the outcasts of Poker Flat

PLAIN LANGUAGE FROM TRUTHFUL JAMES

(TABLE MOUNTAIN, 1870)

WHICH I wish to remark,
And my language is plain,
That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain,
The heathen Chinee is peculiar,
Which the same I would rise to explain.

Ah Sin was his name;
 And I shall not deny,
 In regard to the same,
 What that name might imply, 10
 But his smile it was pensive and childlike,
 As I frequent remarked to Bill Nye

It was August the third,
 And quite soft was the skies,
 Which it might be inferred
 That Ah Sin was likewise, Yet he played it that day upon William And me in a way I despise.

Which we had a small game,
 And Ah Sin took a hand, 20
 It was Euchre The same
 He did not understand,
 But he smiled as he sat by the table,
 With the smile that was childlike and bland

Yet the cards they were stocked
 In a way that I grieve,
 And my feelings were shocked
 At the state of Nye's sleeve,
 Which was stuffed full of aces and bowers,
 And the same with intent to deceive 30

But the hands that were played
 By that heathen Chinee,
 And the points that he made,
 Were quite frightful to see,—
 Till at last he put down a right bower, Which the same Nye had dealt unto
 me

Then I looked up at Nye,
 And he gazed upon me,
 And he rose with a sigh,
 And said, 'Can this be? 40
 We are ruined by Chinese cheap labor,'—
 And he went for that heathen Chinee

In the scene that ensued
 I did not take a hand,
 But the floor it was strewed
 Like the leaves on the strand
 With the cards that Ah Sin had been hiding,
 In the game 'he did not understand.'

In his sleeves, which were long,
 He had twenty-four packs,— 50
 Which was coming it strong,
 Yet I state but the facts,

And we found on his nails, which were taper,
 What is frequent in tapers,—that's wax.

Which is why I remark,
 And my language is plain,
 That for ways that are dark
 And for tricks that are vain,
 The heathen Chinee is peculiar,—
 Which the same I am free to maintain 60

DICKENS IN CAMP<sup>1</sup>

(1812-1870)

ABOVE the pines the moon was slowly drifting,
 The river sang below,
 The dim Sierras, far beyond, uplifting
 Their minarets of snow

The roaring camp-fire, with rude humor, painted
 The ruddy tints of health On haggard face and form that drooped and fainted
 In the fierce race for wealth,

Till one arose, and from his pack's scant treasure
 A hoarded volume drew, 10
 And cards were dropped from hands of listless leisure
 To hear the tale anew

And then, while round them shadows gathered faster,
 And as the firelight fell,
 He read aloud the book wherein the Master
 Had writ of 'Little Nell'

Perhaps 'twas boyish fancy,—for the reader
 Was youngest of them all,— But, as he read, from clustering pine and cedar
 A silence seemed to fall, 20

The fir-trees, gathering closer in the shadows,
 Listened in every spray,

<sup>1</sup> 'When news of the death of Dickens reached Bret Harte he was camping in the Foot-Hills, far from San Francisco, but he sent a telegram to hold back for a day the printing of the Overland, then ready for the press, and his poem was written that night and forwarded the next morning' Merwin, The Life of Bret Harte (Boston, 1911), 312n.

While the whole camp with 'Nell' on English meadows
 Wandered and lost their way

And so in mountain solitudes—o'ertaken
 As by some spell divine—Their cares dropped from them like the needles shaken
 From out the gusty pine.

Lost is that camp and wasted all its
 fire;
 And he who wrought that spell? 30 Ah! towering pine and stately Kentish spire,
 Ye have one tale to tell!

Lost is that camp, but let its fragrant story
 Blend with the breath that thrills With hop-vine's incense all the pensive glory
 That fills the Kentish hulls

And on that grave where English oak and holly
 And laurel wreaths entwine,
 Deem it not all a too presumptuous folly,
 This spray of Western pine! 40

'JIM'

SAY there! P'r'aps
 Some on you chaps
 Might know Jim Wild?
 Well,—no offense
 Thar ain't no sense
 In gittin' riled!

Jim was my chum
 Up on the Bar
 That's why I come 10
 Down from up yar, Lookin' for Jim
 Thank ye, sir! You
 Ain't of that crew,— Blest if you are!

Money? Not much:
 That ain't my kind,
 I ain't no such Rum? I don't mund,
 Seem' it's you.

Well, this yer Jim,— 20
 Did you know him?
 Jes' 'bout your size,
 Same kind of eyes,—
 Well, that is strange
 Why, it's two year
 Since he came here,
 Sick, for a change.

Well, here's to us
 Eh?
 The h— you say! 30
 Dead?
 That little cuss?

What makes you star',
 You over thar?
 Can't a man drop
 's glass in yer shop
 But you must r'ar?
 It wouldn't take
 D—d much to break 40
 You and your bar

Dead!
 Poor—little—Jim!
 Why, thar was me,
 Jones, and Bob Lee,
 Harry and Ben,—
 No-account men
 Then to take him!

Well, thar—Good-by—
 No more, sir—I— 50
 Eh?
 What's that you say?
 Why, dern it!—sho!—
 No? Yes! By Joe!
 Sold!
 Sold! Why, you lumb,
 You ornery,
 Derved old Long-legged Jim

WHAT THE BULLET SANG

O JOY of creation
 To be!
 O rapture to fly
 And be free!
 Be the battle lost or won,
 Though its smoke shall hide the sun,
 I shall find my love,—the one Born for me!

I shall know him where he stands,
 All alone,
 With the power in his hands
 Not o'erthrown,
 I shall know him by his face,
 By his godlike front and grace;
 I shall hold him for a space,
 All my own!

10

It is he—O my love!
 So bold!
 It is I—all thy love
 Foretold!
 It is I O love! what bliss!
 Dost thou answer to my kiss?
 O sweetheart! what is this Lieth there so cold?

JOHN HAY

1838-1905

JIM BLUDSO, OF THE PRAIRIE BELLE

WALL, no! I can't tell whar he lives, Becase he don't live, you see,
 Leastways, he's got out of the habit Of livin' like you and me
 Whar have you been for the last three year
 That you haven't heard folks tell How Jimmy Bludso passed in his checks
 The night of the Prairie Belle?

He weren't no saint,—hem engineers
 Is all pretty much alike,—
 One wife in Natchez-under-the-Hill
 And another one here, in Pike,
 A keerless man in his talk was Jim,
 And an awkward hand in a row,
 But he never flunked, and he never lied,— I reckon he never knowed how 10

And this was all the religion he had,— To treat his engine well,
 Never be passed on the river;
 To mind the pilot's bell,
 And if ever the Prairie Belle took fire,—
 A thousand times he swore,
 He'd hold her nozzle agin the bank
 Till the last soul got ashore

20

All boats has their day on the Mississipp,
 And her day come at last,—
 The Movastar was a better boat,
 But the Belle she wouldn't be passed.

And so she come tearin' along that night—
 The oldest craft on the line—
 With a nigger squat on her safety-valve, And her furnace crammed, rosin and pine.

30

The fire bust out as she clared the bar,
 And burnt a hole in the night,
 And quick as a flash she turned, and made
 For that willer-bank on the right There was runnin' and cursin', but Jim yelled out,

Over all the infernal roar,
 'I'll hold her nozzle agin the bank
 Till the last galoot's ashore'

40

Through the hot, black breath of the burnin' boat
 Jim Bludso's voice was heard,
 And they all had trust in his cussedness,
 And knowed he would keep his word.
 And, sure's you're born, they all got off Afore the smokestacks fell,—
 And Bludso's ghost went up alone In the smoke of the Prairie Belle

He weren't no saint,—but at judgment I'd run my chance with Jim,
 'Longside of some pious gentlemen
 That wouldn't shook hands with hum.
 He seen his duty, a dead-sure thing,—
 And went for it thar and then,
 And Christ ain't a going to be too hard
 On a man that died for men

KIT CARSON'S RIDE<sup>1</sup>

*ROOM! room to turn round in, to breathe and be free,
To grow to be giant, to sail as at sea
With the speed of the wind on a steed with his mane*

To the wind, without pathway or route or a rein

Room! room to be free where the white border'd sea

*Blows a kiss to a brother as boundless as he,
Where the buffalo come like a cloud on the plain,*

*Pouring on like the tide of a storm-driven
man,*

And the lodge of the hunter to friend or to foe Offers rest, and unquestion'd you come or you go 10

*My plains of America! Seas of wild lands!
From a land in the seas in a raiment of foam,
That has reached to a stranger the welcome of
home,*

I turn to you, lean to you, lift you my hands

Run? Run? See this flank, sir, and I do love him so!

But he's blind, badger blind Whoa, Pache boy, whoa,

No, you wouldn't believe it to look at his eyes,

But he's blind, badger blind, and it hap-pen'd this wise

'We lay in the grass and the sunburnt clover

That spread on the ground like a great brown cover

 20

Northward and southward, and west and
away

To the Brazos, where our lodges lay,
One broad and unbroken level of brown

<sup>1</sup> 'The bugle-call to battle, the shouts of men and the neighing of horses, the roar of cannon, the waving banners—here is something unfully poetic The spotted cattle on the hills, the winding rivers through the valleys, the surging white seas against the granite shores—all life, all action that is beautiful and grand is poetry, waiting for expression The world is one great poem, because it is very grand, very good, and very beautiful' Miller, 'What Is Poetry,' Memories and Rime (N Y, 1884), 39

We were waiting the curtains of night 'o come down

To cover us trio and conceal our flight
With my brown bride, won from an Indian

That lay in the rear the full ride of a night

'We lounged in the grass—her eyes were in mine,

And her hands on my knee, and her hair was as wine

In its wealth and its flood, pouring on and all over

 30

Her bosom wine red, and press'd never by one,

Her touch was as warm as the tinge of the clover

Burnt brown as it reach'd to the kiss of the sun

Her words they were low as the lutethroated dove,

And as laden with love as the heart when it beats

In its hot, eager answer to earliest love, Or the bee hurried home by its burthen of sweets

'We lay low in the grass on the broad plain levels,

Old Revels and I, and my stolen brown bride,

"Forty full miles if a foot to ride!" 40
Forty full miles if a foot, and the devils
Of red Comanches are hot on the track
When once they strike it Let the sun go down

Soon, very soon," muttered bearded old Revels

As he peer'd at the sun, lying low on his back, Holding fast to his lasso Then he jerk'd at his steed

And he sprang to his feet, and glanced swiftly around,

And then dropp'd, as if shot, with an ear to the ground,

Then again to his feet, and to me, to my bride,

While his eyes were like flame, his face like a shroud,

 50

His form like a king, and his beard like a cloud,

And his voice loud and shrill, as both trumpet and reed,—
 "Pull, pull in your lassoes, and bridle to steed,
 And speed you if ever for life you would speed
 Aye, ride for your lives, for your lives you must ride!
 For the plain is aflame, the prairie on fire,
 And the feet of wild horses hard flying before
 I heard like a sea breaking hugh on the shore,
 While the buffalo come like a surge of the
 sea,
 Driven far by the flame, driving fast on us
 three 60
 As a hurricane comes, crushing palms in his
 ire "

'We drew in the lassoes, seized saddle and
 rein,
 Threw them on, cinched them on, cinched them over again,
 And again drew the girth, and spring we to horse,
 With head to the Brazos, with a sound in the air
 Like the surge of a sea, with a flash in the eye,
 From that red wall of flame reaching up to the sky,
 A red wall of flame and a black rolling sea Rushing fast upon us, as the wind sweeping free
 And afar from the desert blown hollow and hoarse 70

'Not a word, not a wail from a lip was let
 fall,
 We broke not a whisper, we breathed not a prayer,
 There was work to be done, there was death in the air,
 And the chance was as one to a thousand for all

'Twenty miles! thirty miles! . a dim distant speck
 Then a long reaching line, and the Brazos in sight!
 And I rose in my seat with a shout of delight
 I stood in my stirrup, and look'd to my right—

But Revels was gone, I glanced by my shoulder
 And saw his horse stagger; I saw his head drooping 80
 Hard down on his breast, and his naked breast stooping
 Low down to the mane, as so swifter and bolder
 Ran reaching out for us the red-footed fire
 He rode neck to neck with a buffalo bull, That made the earth shake where he came in his course,
 The monarch of millions, with shaggy mane full Of smoke and of dust, and it shook with desire
 Of battle, with rage and with bellowings hoarse
 His keen, crooked horns, through the storm of his mane,
 Like black lances lifted and lifted again, 90
 And I looked but this once, for the fire licked through,
 And Revels was gone, as we rode two and two

'I look'd to my left then—and nose, neck, and shoulder
 Sank slowly, sank surely, till back to my thighs,
 And up through the black blowing veil of her hair
 Did beam full in mine her two marvelous
 eyes,
 With a longing and love yet a look of despair
 And of pity for me, as she felt the smoke fold her,
 And flames leaping far for her glorious hair Her sinking horse falter'd, plunged, fell and was gone 100
 As I reach'd through the flame and I bore her still on
 On! into the Brazos, she, Pache and I—Poor, burnt, blinded Pache I love him .
 That's why '

CROSSING THE PLAINS

WHAT great yoked brutes with briskets low,
 With wrinkled necks like buffalo,
 With round, brown, liquid, pleading eyes,
 That turn'd so slow and sad to you,

That shone like love's eyes soft with tears,
 That seem'd to plead, and make replies,
 The while they bow'd their necks and drew
 The creaking load, and look'd at you
 Their sable briskets swept the ground,
 Their cloven feet kept solemn sound 10

Two sullen bullocks led the line,
 Their great eyes shining bright like wine;
 Two sullen captive kings were they,
 That had in time held herds at bay,
 And even now they crushed the sod
 With stolid sense of majesty,
 And stately stepp'd and stately trod,
 As if 'twere something stull to be Kings even in captivity

COLUMBUS<sup>1</sup>

(AUGUST 3—OCTOBER 12, 1492)

BEHIND him lay the gray Azores,
 Behind the Gates of Hercules,
 Before him not the ghost of shores,
 Before him only shoreless seas.
 The good mate said 'Now must we pray,
 For lo! the very stars are gone,
 Brave Adm'r'l, speak, what shall I say?'
 'Why, say "Sail on! sail on! and on!"'

'My men grow mutinous day by day,
 My men grow ghastly, wan and weak' 10
 The stout mate thought of home, a spray
 Of salt wave washed his swarthy cheek
 'What shall I say, brave Adm'r'l, say,
 If we sight naught but seas at dawn?'
 'Why, you shall say at break of day
 "Sail on! sail on! sail on! and on!"'

They sailed and sailed, as winds might
 blow,
 Until at last the blanched mate said
 'Why, now not even God would know Should I and all my men fall dead 20
 These very winds forget their way,
 For God from these dread seas is gone.

<sup>1</sup> "Columbus" was written at "The Heights" in Oakland the first week in October, 1892. He had suffered loss through, and disillusionment in one he had trusted that year. Reading a translated copy of the logbook left by Columbus, he marked—"the men mutined, but I sailed on." Another annotation "Storm and darkness, stars changed, but we sailed on." Daughter's note

Now speak, brave Adm'r'l, speak and say—
 He said 'Sail on! sail on! and on!'

They sailed They sailed Then spake the mate
 'This mad sea shows his teeth tonight.
 He curls his lip, he lies in wait,
 With lifted teeth, as if to bite!
 Brave Admiral, say but one good word
 What shall we do when hope is gone?' 30
 The words leapt like a leaping sword
 'Sail on! sail on! sail on! and on!'

Then, pale and worn, he paced his deck,
 And peered through darkness Ah, that night
 Of all dark nights! And then a speck—
 A light! A light! At last a light!
 It grew, a starlit flag unfurled!
 It grew to be Time's burst of dawn
 He gained a world, he gave that world
 Its grandest lesson 'On! sail on!' 40

FROM A SONG OF CREATION

CANTO I

I

His triple star led on and on,
 Led up blue, bastioned Chilkoot Pass To clouds, through clouds, above white clouds
 That droop with snows like beaded strouds—
 Above a world of gleaming glass, Where loomed such cities of the skies
 As only prophets look upon,
 As only loving poets see,
 With prophet ken of mystery.

2

What lone, white silence, left or right, 10 What whiteness, something more than white!
 Such steel blue whiteness, van or rear—
 Such silence as you could but hear Above the sparkled, frosted rime,
 As if the steely stars kept time And sang their mystic, mighty rune—
 . . . And oh, the icy, eerie moon!

3

What temples, towers, tombs of white, White tombs, white tombstones, left and
 right,

That pushed the passing night aside 20
 To ward where fallen stars had died—
 To ward white tombs where dead stars lay—

White tombs more white, more bright than they,

White tombs high heaped white tombs upon—

White Ossa piled on Pelion!

4

Pale, steel stars flashed, rose, fell again,
 Then paused, leaned low, as pitying,
 And leaning so they ceased to sing,
 The while the moon, with mother care,
 Slow rocked her silver rocking-chair. 30

5

Night here, mid-year, is as a span;
 Thor comes, a gold-clad king of war,
 Comes only as the great Thor can.
 Thor storms the battlements and Thor,
 Far leaping, clinging crowned upon,
 Throws battle hammer forth and back Until the walls blaze in his track
 With sparks and it is sudden dawn—
 Dawn, sudden, sparkling, as a gem—
 A jeweled, frost-set diadem 40
 Of diamond, ruby, radium

6

Two tallest, ice-tipt peaks take flame,
 Take yellow flame, take crimson, pink,
 Then, ere you yet have time to think,
 Take hues that never yet had name
 Then turret, minaret, and tower,
 As if to mark some mystic hour,
 Or ancient, lost Masonic sign,
 Take on a darkness like to night,
 Deep night below the yellow light 50
 That erstwhile seemed some snow-white tomb

Then all is set in ghostly gloom,
 As some dim-lighted, storied shrine—
 As if the stars forget to stay At court when comes the kingly day.

7

And now the high-built shafts of brass,
 Gate posts that guard the tomb-set pass,
 Put off their crowns, rich robes, and all Their sudden, splendid light let fall,
 And tomb and minaret and tower 60
 Again gleam as that midnight hour
 While day, as scorning still to wait,

Drives fiercely through the ice-built gate
 That guards the Arctic's outer hem
 Of white, high-built Jerusalem

8

To see, to guess the great white throne,
 Behold Alaska's ice-built steeps Where everlasting silence keeps
 And white death lives and lords alone:
 Go see God's river born full grown— 70
 The gold of this stream it is good Here grows the Ark's white gopher wood—

A wide, white land, unnamed, unknown,
 A land of mystery and moan

9

Tall, trim, slim gopher trees incline,
 A leaning, laden, helpless copse,
 And moan and creak and intertwine
 Their laden, twisted, tossing tops,
 And moan all night and moan all day
 With winds that walk these steeps alway. 80

10

The melancholy moose looks down,
 A tattered Capuchin in brown,
 A gaunt, ungainly, mateless monk,
 An elephant without his trunk,
 While far, against the gleaming blue,
 High up a rock-topt ridge of snow,
 Where scarce a dream would care to go,
 Climb countless blue-clad caribou,
 In endless line till lost to view.

11

The rent ice surges, grinds, and groans, 90
 Then gorges, backs, and climbs the shore,
 Then breaks with sudden rage and roar
 And plunging, leaping, foams and moans
 Swift down the surging, seething stream—
 Mad hurdles of some monstrous dream.

12

To see God's river born full grown,
 To see him burst the womb of earth
 And leap, a giant at his birth, Through shoreless whiteness, with wild shout—
 A shout so sharp, so cold, so dread 100
 You see, feel, hear, his sheeted dead—
 'Tis as to know, no longer doubt,
 'Tis as to know the eld Unknown,
 Aye, bow before the great white throne

SAMUEL CLEMENS
(Mark Twain)

1835-1910

THE CELEBRATED JUMPING FROG
OF CALAVERAS COUNTY<sup>1</sup>

IN compliance with the request of a friend of mine, who wrote me from the East, I called on good-natured, garrulous old Simon Wheeler, and inquired after my friend's friend, Leonidas W Smiley, as requested to do, and I hereunto append the result I have a lurking suspicion that Leonidas W Smiley is a myth, that my friend never knew such a personage, that he only conjectured that, if I asked old Wheeler about him, it would remind him of his infamous Jim Smiley, and he would go to work and bore me nearly to death with some infernal reminiscence of him as long and tedious as it should be useless to me. If that was the design, it certainly succeeded.

I found Simon Wheeler dozing comfortably by the bar-room stove of the old, dilapidated tavern in the ancient mining camp of Angel's, and I noticed that he was fat and bald-headed, and had an expression of winning gentleness and simplicity upon his tranquil countenance. He roused up and gave me good-day. I told him a friend of mine had commissioned me to make some inquiries about a cherished companion of his boyhood named Leonidas W Smiley—Rev Leonidas W Smiley—a young minister of the Gospel, who he had heard was at one time a resident of Angel's Camp. I added that, if Mr Wheeler could tell me anything about this Rev Leonidas W Smiley, I would feel under many obligations to him.

Simon Wheeler backed me into a corner and blockaded me there with his chair, and then sat me down and reeled off the monotonous narrative which follows this paragraph. He never smiled, he never frowned, he never changed his voice from the gentle-flowing key to which he tuned the initial sentence, he never betrayed the slightest suspicion of enthusiasm, but all through the interminable narrative there ran a vein of impressive earnestness and sincerity, which showed me plainly that, so far from his imagining that there was anything ridiculous or funny about his story, he regarded it as a really important matter, and admired its two heroes as men of transcendent genius in finesse. To me, the spectacle of a man drifting serenely along through such a queer yarn without ever smiling, was exquisitely absurd. As I said before, I asked him to tell me what he knew of Rev Leonidas W Smiley, and he replied as follows. I let him go on in his own way, and never interrupted him once.

There was a feller here once by the name of Jim Smiley, in the winter of '49—or may be it was the spring of '50—I don't recollect exactly, somehow, though what makes me think it was one or the other is because I remember the big flume wasn't finished when he first came to the camp, but any way, he was the curiosest man about always betting on any thing that turned up you ever see, if he could get any body to bet on the other side, and if he couldn't, he'd change sides. Any way that suited the other man would suit him—any way just so's he got a bet, he was satisfied. But still he was lucky, uncommon lucky, he most always come out winner. He was always ready and laying for a chance, there couldn't be no solitary thing mentioned but that feller'd offer to bet on it, and take any side you please, as I was just telling you. If there was a horse-race, you'd find him flush, or you'd find him busted at the end of it, if there was a dog-fight, he'd bet on it, if there was a cat-fight, he'd bet on it, if there was a chicken-fight, he'd bet on it, why, if there was two birds setting on a fence, he would bet you which one would fly first, or if there was a camp-meeting, he would be there reg'lar, to bet on Parson Walker, which he judged to be the best exhorter about there, and so he was, too, and a good man. If he even seen a straddle-bug start to go anywheres, he would bet you how long it would take him to get wherever he was going to, and if you took him up, he would follow that straddle-bug to Mexico but what he would find out where he was bound for and how long he was on the road. Lots of the boys here has seen that Smiley, and can tell you about him. Why, it never made no difference to him—he would bet on any thing—the dangdest feller. Parson Walker's wife laid very sick once, for a good while, and it seemed as if they warn't going to save her, but one morning he come in, and Smiley asked how she was, and he said she was considerable better—thank the Lord for his inf'nit mercy—and coming on so smart that, with the blessing of Prov'dence, she'd get well yet, and Smiley, before he thought, says, 'Well, I'll risk two-and-a-half that she won't, any way.'

Thish-er Smiley had a mare—the boys called her the fifteen-minute nag, but that was only in fun, you know, because, of course, she was faster than that—and he used to win money on that horse, for all she was so slow and always had the asthma, or the distemper, or the consumption, or something of that kind. They used to give her two or three hundred yards start, and then pass her under way, but always at the fag-end of the race she'd get excited and desperate-like, and come cavorting and straddling up, and scattering her legs around limber, sometimes in the air, and sometimes out to one side amongst the fences, and kicking up m-o-r-e dust, and raising m-o-r-e racket with her coughing and sneezing and blowing her nose—and always fetch up at the stand just about a neck ahead, as near as you could cypher it down.

And he had a little small bull pup, that to look at him you'd think he wa'n't worth a cent, but to set around and look ornery, and lay for a chance to steal something. But as soon as money was up on him, he was a different dog, his underjaw'd begin to stick out like the fo'castle of a steamboat, and his teeth would uncover, and shine savage like the furnaces. And a dog might tackle him, and bullyrag him, and bite him, and throw him over his shoulder two or three times, and Andrew Jackson—which was the name of the pup—Andrew Jackson would never let on but what he was satisfied, and hadn't expected nothing else—and the bets being doubled and doubled on the other side all the time, till the money was all up; and then all of a sudden he would grab that other dog jest by the j'int of his hind leg and freeze to it—not chew, you understand, but only jest grip and hang on till they throwed up the sponge, if it was a year. Smiley always come out winner on that pup, till he harnessed a dog once that didn't have no hind legs, because they'd been sawed off by a circular saw, and when the thing had gone along far enough, and the money was all up, and he come to make a snatch for his pet holt, he saw in a minute how he'd been imposed on, and how the other dog had him in the door, so to speak, and he 'peared surprised, and then he looked sorter discouraged-like, and didn't try no more to win the fight, and so he got shucked out bad. He give Smiley a look, as much as to say his heart was broke, and it was his fault, for putting up a dog that hadn't no hind legs for him to take holt of, which was his main dependence in a fight, and then he limped off a piece and laid down and died. It was a good pup, was that Andrew Jackson, and would have made a name for hisself if he'd lived, for the stuff was in him, and he had genius—I know it, because he hadn't had no opportunity to speak of, and it don't stand to reason that a dog could make such a fight as he could under them circumstances, if he hadn't no talent. It always makes me feel sorry when I think of that last fight of his'n, and the way it turned out.

Well, this-er Smiley had rat-tarriers, and chicken cocks, and tom-cats, and all them kind of things, till you couldn't rest, and you couldn't fetch nothing for him to bet on but he'd match you. He ketched a frog one day, and took him home, and said he cal'klated to edercate him, and so he never done nothing for three months but set in his back yard and learn that frog to jump. And you bet he did learn him, too. He'd give him a little punch behind, and the next minute you'd see that frog whirling in the air like a doughnut—see him turn one summerset, or may be a couple, if he got a good start, and come down flat-footed and all right, like a cat. He got him up so in the matter of catching flies, and kept him in practice so constant, that he'd nail a fly every time as far as he could see him. Smiley said all a frog wanted was education, and he could do most anything—and I believe him. Why, I've seen him set Dan'l Webster down here on this floor—Dan'l Webster was the name of the frog—and sing out, 'Flies, Dan'l, flies!' and quicker'n you could wink, he'd spring straight up, and snake a fly off'n the counter there, and flop down on the floor again as solid as a gob of mud, and fall to scratching the side of his head with his hind foot as indifferent as if he hadn't no idea he'd been doin' any more'n any frog might do. You never see a frog so modest and straightfor'ard as he was, for all he was so gifted. And when it come to fair and square jumping on a dead level, he could get over more ground at one straddle than any animal of his breed you ever see. Jumping on a dead level was his strong suit, you understand, and when it come to that, Smiley would ante up money on him as long as he had a red. Smiley was monstrous proud of his frog, and well he might be, for fellers that had traveled and been everywhere, all said he laid over any frog that ever they see.

Well, Smiley kept the beast in a little lattice box, and he used to fetch him down town sometimes and lay for a bet. One day a feller—a stranger in the camp, he was—come across him with his box, and says

'What might it be that you've got in the box?'

And Smiley says, sorter indifferent like, 'It might be a parrot, or it might be a canary, may be, but it ain't—it's only just a frog.'

And the feller took it, and looked at it careful, and turned it round this way and that, and says, 'H'm—so 'tis. Well, what's he good for?'

'Well,' Smiley says, easy and careless, 'He's good enough for one thing, I should judge—he can outjump any frog in Calaveras county.'

The feller took the box again, and took another long, particular look, and give it back to Smiley, and says, very deliberate, 'Well, I don't see no p'int about that frog that's any better'n any other frog.'

'May be you don't,' Smiley says. 'May be you understand frogs, and may be you don't understand 'em, may be you've had experience, and may be you an't only a amature, as it were. Anyways, I've got my opinion, and I'll risk forty dollars he can outjump any frog in Calaveras county.'

And the feller studied a minute, and then says, kinder sad like, 'Well, I'm only a stranger here, and I an't got no frog, but if I had a frog, I'd bet you.'

And then Smiley says, 'That's all right—that's all right—if you'll hold my box a minute, I'll go and get you a frog.' And so the feller took the box, and put up his forty dollars along with Smiley's, and set down to wait.

So he set there a good while thinking and thinking to hussell, and then he got the frog out and prized his mouth open and took a teaspoon and filled him full of quail shot—filled him pretty near up to his chin—and set him on the floor. Smiley he went to the swamp and slopped around in the mud for a long time, and finally he ketched a frog, and fetched him in, and give him to this feller, and says

'Now, if you're ready, set him alongside of Dan'l, with his fore-paws just even with Dan'l, and I'll give the word.' Then he says, 'One—two—three—jump!' and him and the feller touched up the frogs from behind, and the new frog hopped off, but Dan'l give a heave, and hysted up his shoulders—so—like a Frenchman, but it wa'n't no use—couldn't budge, he was planted as solid as an anvil, and he couldn't no more stir than if he was anchored out. Smiley was a good deal surprised, and he was disgusted too, but he didn't have no idea what the matter was, of course.

The feller took the money and started away, and when he was going out of the door, he sorter jerked his thumb over his shoulders—this way—at Dan'l, and says again, very deliberate, 'Well, I don't see no p'int about that frog that's any better'n any other frog.'

Smiley he stood scratching his head and looking down at Dan'l a long time, and at last he says, 'I do wonder what in the nation that frog throw'd off for—I wonder if there ain't something the matter with him—he 'pears to look might baggy, somehow.' And he ketched Dan'l by the nap of the neck, and lifted him up and says, 'Why, blame my cats, if he don't weigh five pound!" and turned him upside down, and he belched out a double handful of shot. And then he sees how it was, and he was the maddest man—he set the frog down and took out after that feller, but he never ketched him. And—

(Here Simon Wheeler heard his name called from the front yard, and got up to see what was wanted.) And turning to me as he moved away, he said 'Just set where you are, stranger, and rest easy—I an't going to be gone a second.'

But, by your leave, I did not think that a continuation of the history of the enterprising vagabond Jim Smiley would be likely to afford me much information concerning the Rev. Leomdas W. Smiley, and so I started away.

At the door I met the sociable Wheeler returning, and he buttonholed me and recommenced.

'Well, thish-yer Smiley had a yaller one-eyed cow that didn't have no tail, only jest a short stump like a bannanner, and—'

'Oh! hang Smiley and his afflicted cow!' I muttered, good-naturedly, and bidding the old gentleman good-day, I departed.

FROM LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI

HUCK FINN ON THE RAFT<sup>1</sup>

BY way of illustrating keelboat talk and manners, and that now departed and hardly remembered raft life, I will throw in, in this place, a chapter from a book which I have been working at, by fits and starts, during the past five or six years, and may possibly finish in the course of five or six more. The book is a story which details some passages in the life of an ignorant village boy, Huck Finn, son of the town drunkard of my time out West, there. He has run away from his persecuting father, and from a persecuting good widow who wishes to make a nice, truth-telling, respectable boy of him, and with him a slave of the widow's has also escaped. They have found a fragment of a lumber-raft (it is high water and dead summer-time), and are floating down the river by night, and hiding in the willows by day—bound for Cairo, whence the Negro will seek freedom in the heart of the free states. But, in a fog, they pass Cairo without knowing it. By and by they begin to suspect the truth, and Huck Finn is persuaded to end the dismal suspense by swimming down to a huge raft which they have seen in the distance ahead of them, creeping aboard under cover of the darkness, and gathering the needed information by eavesdropping.

But you know a young person can't wait very well when he is impatient to find a thing out. We talked it over, and by and by Jim said it was such a black night, now, that it wouldn't be no risk to swim down to the big raft and crawl aboard and listen—they would talk about Cairo, because they would be calculating to go ashore there for a spree, maybe, or anyway they would send boats ashore to buy whisky or fresh meat or something. Jim had a wonderful level head, for a nigger, he could most always start a good plan when you wanted one.

I stood up and shook my rags off and jumped into the river, and struck out for the raft's light. By and by, when I got down nearly to her, I eased up and went slow and cautious. But everything was all right—nobody at the sweeps. So I swum down along the raft till I was most abreast the camp-fire in the middle, then I crawled aboard and inched along and got in among some bundles of shingles on the weather side of the fire. There was thirteen men there—they was the watch on deck of course. And a mighty rough-looking lot, too. They had a jug, and tin cups, and they kept the jug moving. One man was singing—roaring, you may say, and it wasn't a nice song—for a parlor, anyway. He roared through his nose, and strung out the last word of every line very long. When he was done they all fetched a kind of Injun war-whoop, and then another was sung. It begun:

'There was a woman in our townd,
In our townd did dwed'l [dwell],
She loved her husband dear-i-lee,
But another man twyste as wed'l.

'Singing too, riloo, riloo, riloo, Ri-too, riloo, rilay - - - e,
She loved her husband dear-i-lee,
But another man twyste as wed'l.'

<sup>1</sup> The selection, to which the title has been given by the editors, is from Life on the Mississippi (N.Y., 1931), 19-31.

And so on—fourteen verses It was kind of poor, and when he was going to start on the next verse one of them said it was the tune the old cow died on, and another one said 'Oh, give us a rest!' And another one told him to take a walk They made fun of him till he got mad and jumped up and begun to cuss the crowd, and said he could lam any thief in the lot

They was all about to make a break for him, but the biggest man there jumped up and says

'Set whar you are, gentlemen. Leave him to me, he's my meat'

Then he jumped up in the air three times, and cracked his heels together every time He flung off a buckskin coat that was all hung with fringes, and says, 'You lay thar tell the chawin-up's done,' and flung his hat down, which was all over ribbons, and says, 'You lay thar tell his sufferin's is over'

Then he jumped up in the air and cracked his heels together again, and shouted out

'Whoo-ooop! I'm the old original iron-jawed, brass-mounted, copper-bellied corpse-maker from the wilds of Arkansaw! Look at me! I'm the man they call Sudden Death and General Desolation! Sired by a hurricane, dam'd by an earthquake, half-brother to the cholera, nearly related to the smallpox on the mother's side! Look at me! I take nineteen alligators and a bar'l of whiskey for breakfast when I'm in robust health, and a bushel of rattlesnakes and a dead body when I'm ailing I split the everlasting rocks with my glance, and I squench the thunder when I speak! Whoo-ooop! Stand back and give me room according to my strength! Blood's my natural drink, and the wails of the dying is music to my ear! Cast your eye on me, gentlemen! and lay low and hold your breath, for I'm 'bout to turn myself loose!'

All the time he was getting this off, he was shaking his head and looking fierce, and kind of swelling around in a little circle, tucking up his wristbands, and now and then straightening up and beating his breast with his fist, saying, 'Look at me, gentlemen!' When he got through, he jumped up and cracked his heels together three times, and let off a roaring 'Whoo-ooop! I'm the bloodiest son of a wildcat that lives!'

Then the man that had started the row tilted his old slouch hat down over his right eye, then he bent stooping forward, with his back sagged and his south end sticking out far, and his fists a-showing out and drawing in in front of him, and so went around in a little circle about three times, swelling himself up and breathing hard. Then he straightened, and jumped up and cracked his heels together three times before he lit again (that made them cheer), and he began to shout like this

'Whoo-ooop! bow your neck and spread, for the kingdom of sorrow's a-coming! Hold me down to the earth, for I feel my powers a-working! whoo-ooop! I'm a child of sin, don't let me get a start! Smoked glass, here, for all! Don't attempt to look at me with the naked eye, gentlemen! When I'm playful I use the meridians of longitude and parallels of latitude for a seine, and drag the Atlantic Ocean for whales! I scratch my head with the lightning and purr myself to sleep with the thunder! When I'm cold, I bile the Gulf of Mexico and bathe in it, when I'm hot I fan myself with an equinoctial storm, when I'm thirsty I reach up and suck a cloud dry like a sponge, when I range the earth hungry, famine follows in my tracks! Whoo-ooop! Bow your neck and spread! I put my hand on the sun's face and make it night in the earth, I bite a piece out of the moon and hurry the seasons, I shake myself and crumble the mountains! Contemplate me through leather—don't use the naked eye! I'm the man with a petrified heart and biler-iron bowels! The massacre of isolated communities is the pastime of my idle moments, the destruction of nationalities the serious business of my life! The boundless vastness of the great American desert is my inclosed property, and I bury my dead on my own premises! He jumped up and cracked his heels together three times before he lit (they cheered him again), and as he come down he shouted out 'Whoo-ooop! bow your neck and spread, for the Pet Child of Calamity's a-coming!'

Then the other one went to swelling around and blowing again—the first one—the one they called Bob; next, the Child of Calamity chipped in again, bigger than ever, then they both got at it at the same time, swelling round and round each other and punching their fists most into each other's faces, and whooping and jawing like Injuns, then Bob called the Child names, and the Child called him names back again, next, Bob called him a heap rougher names, and the Child come back at him with the very worst kind of language, next, Bob knocked the Child's hat off, and the Child picked it up and kicked Bob's ribbony hat about six foot, Bob went and got it and said never mind, this warn't going to be the last of this thing, because he was a man that never forgot and never forgive, and so the Child better look out, for there was a time a-coming, just as sure as he was a living man, that he would have to answer to him with the best blood in his body. The Child said no man was willing than he for that time to come, and he would give Bob fair warning, now, never to cross his path again, for he could never rest till he had waded in his blood, for such was his nature, though he was sparing him now on account of his family, if he had one.

Both of them was edging away in different directions, growling and shaking their heads and going on about what they was going to do, but a little black-whiskered chap skipped up and says

'Come back here, you couple of chicken-livered cowards, and I'll thrash the two of ye!'

And he done it, too. He snatched them, he jerked them this way and that, he booted them around, he knocked them sprawling faster than they could get up. Why, it warn't two minutes till they begged like dogs—and how the other lot did yell and laugh and clap their hands all the way through, and shout, 'Sail in, Corpse-Maker!' 'Hi!' at him again, Child of Calamity! 'Bully for you, little Davy!' Well, it was a perfect pow-wow for a while. Bob and the Child had red noses and black eyes when they got through. Little Davy made them own up that they was sneaks and cowards and not fit to eat with a dog or drink with a nigger, then Bob and the Child shook hands with each other, very solemn, and said they had always respected each other and was willing to let bygones be bygones. So then they washed their faces in the river, and just then there was a loud order to stand by for a crossing, and some of them went forward to man the sweeps there, and the rest went aft to handle the after sweeps.

I lay still and waited for fifteen minutes, and had a smoke out of a pipe that one of them left in reach, then the crossing was finished, and they stumped back and had a drink around and went to talking and singing again. Next they got out an old fiddle, and one played, and another patted juba, and the rest turned themselves loose on a regular old-fashioned keelboat breakdown. They couldn't keep that up very long without getting winded, so by and by they settled around the jug again.

They sung 'Jolly, Jolly Raftsman's the Life for Me,' with a rousing chorus, and then they got to talking about differences betwixt hogs, and their different kind of habits, and next about women and their different ways, and next about the best ways to put out houses that was afire, and next about what ought to be done with the Injuns, and next about what a king had to do, and how much he got, and next about how to make cats fight, and next about what to do when a man has fits, and next about differences betwixt clear-water rivers and muddy-water ones. The man they called Ed said the muddy Mississippi water was wholesomer to drink than the clear water of the Ohio, he said if you let a pint of this yaller Mississippi water settle, you would have about a half to three-quarters of an inch of mud in the bottom, according to the stage of the river, and then it warn't no better than Ohio water—what you wanted to do was to keep it stirred up—and when the river was low, keep mud on hand to put in and thicken the water up the way it ought to be.

The Child of Calamity said that was so, he said there was nutritiousness in the mud, and a man that drunk Mississippi water could grow corn in his stomach if he wanted to. He says

'You look at the graveyards, that tells the tale. Trees won't grow worth shucks in a Cincinnati graveyard, but in a Saint Louis graveyard they grow upwards of eight hundred foot high. It's all on account of the water the people drunk before they laid up. A Cincinnati corpse don't richen a soil any.'

And they talked about how Ohio water didn't like to mix with Mississippi water. Ed said if you take the Mississippi on a rise when the Ohio is low, you'll find a wide band of clear water all the way down the east side of the Mississippi for a hundred mile or more, and the minute you get out a quarter of a mile from shore and pass the line, it is all thick and yaller the rest of the way across. Then they talked about how to keep tobacco from getting mouldy, and from that they went into ghosts and told about a lot that other folks had seen, but Ed says

"Why don't you tell something that you've seen yourselves? Now let me have a say. Five years ago I was on a raft as big as this, and right along here it was a bright moonshiny night, and I was on watch and boss of the stabboard oar forrard, and one of my pards was a man named Dick Allbright, and he come along to where I was sitting, forrard—gaping and stretching, he was—and stooped down on the edge of the raft and washed his face in the river, and come and set down by me and got out his pipe, and had just got it filled, when he looks up and says

"Why looky-here," he says, "ain't that Buck Miller's place, over yander in the bend?"

"Yes," says I, "it is—why?" He laid his pipe down and leant his head on his hand, and says

"I thought we'd be further down" I says

"I thought it, too, when I went off watch"—we was standing six hours on and six off—"but the boys told me," I says, "that the raft didn't seem to hardly move, for the last hour," says I, "though she's a-slipping along all right now," says I. He give a kind of a groan, and says

"I've seed a raft act so before, along here," he says, "'pears to me the current has most quit above the head of this bend durin' the last two years," he says

"Well, he raised up two or three times, and looked away off and around on the water. That started me at it, too. A body is always doing what he sees somebody else doing, though there mayn't be no sense in it. Pretty soon I see a black something floating on the water away off to stabboard and quartering behind us. I see he was looking at it, too. I says

"What's that?" He says, sort of pettish.

"Tain't nothing but an old empty bar'l"

"An empty bar'l!" says I, "why," says

I, "a spy-glass is a fool to your eyes. How can you tell it's an empty bar'l?" He says

"I don't know, I reckon it ain't a bar'l, but I thought it might be," says he

"Yes," I says, "so it might be, and it might be anything else, too, a body can't tell nothing about it, such a distance as that," I says

"We hadn't nothing else to do, so we kept on watching it. By and by I says

"Why looky-here, Dick Allbright, that thing's a-gaining on us, I believe"

"He never said nothing. The thing gained and gained, and I judged it must be a dog that was about tired out. Well, we swung down into the crossing, and the thing floated across the bright streak of the moonshine, and by George, it was a bar'l. Says I

"Dick Allbright, what made you think that thing was a bar'l, when it was half a mile off?" says I. Says he

"I don't know." Says I

"You tell me, Dick Allbright." Says he

"Well, I knowed it was a bar'l, I've seen it before, lots has seen it, they says it's a ha'nted bar'l"

"I called the rest of the watch, and they come down and stood there, and I told them what Dick said. It floated right along abreast, now, and didn't gain any more. It was about twenty foot off. Some was for having it aboard, but the rest didn't want to. Dick Allbright said rafts that had fooled with it had got bad luck by it. The captain of the watch said he didn't believe in it. He said he reckoned the bar'l gained on us because it was in a little better current than what we was. He said it would leave by and by

"So then we went to talking about other things, and we had a song, and then a breakdown, and after that the captain of the watch called for another song, but it was clouding up now, and the bar'l stuck right thar in the same place, and the song didn't seem to have much warm-up to it, somehow, and so they didn't finish it, and there warn't any cheers, but it sort of dropped flat, and nobody said anything for a minute. Then everybody tried to talk at once, and one chap got off a joke, but it warn't no use, they didn't laugh, and even the chap that made the joke didn't laugh at it, which ain't usual. We all just settled down glum, and watched the bar'l, and was oneasy and uncomfortable. Well, sir, it shut down black and still, and then the wind began to moan around, and next the lightning began to play and the thunder to grumble. And pretty soon there was a regular storm, and in the middle of it a man that was running aft stumbled and fell and sprained his ankle so that he had to lay up. This made the boys shake their heads. And every time the lightning come, there was that bar'l, with the blue lights winking around it. We was always on the lookout for it. But by and by, toward dawn, she was gone. When the day come we couldn't see her anywhere, and we warn't sorry, either.

'But next night about half past nine, when there was songs and high jinks going on, here she comes again, and took her old roost on the stabboard side. There warn't no more high jinks. Everybody got solemn, nobody talked, you couldn't get anybody to do anything but set around moody and look at the bar'l. It begun to cloud up again. When the watch changed, the off watch stayed up, 'stead of turning in. The storm ripped and roared around all night, and in the middle of it another man tripped and sprained his ankle, and had to knock off. The bar'l left toward day, and nobody see it go.

'Everybody was sober and down in the mouth all day. I don't mean the kind of sober that comes of leaving liquor alone—not that. They was quiet, but they all drunk more than usual—not together, but each man sidled off and took it private, by himself.

'After dark the off watch didn't turn in, nobody sung, nobody talked, the boys didn't scatter around, neither, they sort of huddled together, forrard, and for two hours they set there, perfectly still, looking steady in the one direction, and heaving a sigh once in a while. And then, here comes the bar'l again. She took up her old place. She stayed there all night, nobody turned in. The storm come on again, after midnight. It got awful dark, the rain poured down, hail, too, the thunder boomed and roared and bellowed, the wind blowed a hurricane, and the lightning spread over everything in big sheets of glare, and showed the whole raft as plain as day, and the river lashed up white as milk as far as you could see for miles, and there was that bar'l jugging along, same as ever. The captain ordered the watch to man the after sweeps for a crossing, and nobody would go—no more sprained ankles for them, they said. They wouldn't even walk aft. Well, then, just then the sky split wide open, with a crash, and the lightning killed two men of the after watch, and crippled two more. Crippled them how, say you? Why, sprained their ankles!

10 'The bar'l left in the dark betwixt lightnings, toward dawn. Well, not a body eat a bite at breakfast that morning. After that the men loafed around, in twos and threes, and talked low together. But none of them herded with Dick Allbright. They all give him the cold shake. If he come around where any of the men was, they split up and sidled away. They wouldn't man the sweeps with him. The captain had all the skiffs 20 hauled up on the raft, alongside of his wigwam, and wouldn't let the dead men be took ashore to be planted, he didn't believe a man that got ashore would come back; and he was right.

'After night come, you could see pretty plain that there was going to be trouble if that bar'l come again, there was such a muttering going on. A good many wanted to kill Dick Allbright, because he'd seen the bar'l on other trips, and that had an ugly look. Some wanted to put him ashore. Some said "Let's all go ashore in a pile, if the bar'l comes again."

'This kind of whispers was still going on, the men being bunched together forrard watching for the bar'l, when lo and behold you! here she comes again. Down she comes, slow and steady, and settles into her old tracks. You could 'a' heard a pin drop. 40 Then up comes the captain, and says

' "Boys, don't be a pack of children and fools, I don't want this bar'l to be dogging us all the way to Orleans, and you don't. Well, then, how's the best way to stop it? Burn it up—that's the way. I'm going to fetch it aboard," he says. And before anybody could say a word, in he went.

'He swum to it, and as he come pushing it to the raft, the men spread to one side. But the old man got it aboard and busted in the head, and there was a baby in it! Yes, sir, a stark-naked baby. It was Dick Allbright's baby, he owned up and said so.

' "Yes," he says, a-leaning over it, "yes, it is my own lamented darling, my poor lost Charles William Allbright deceased," says he—for he could curl his tongue around the bulliest words in the language when he was a mund to, and lay them before you without a jint started anywheres. Yes, he said, he used to live up at the head of this bend, and one night he choked his child, which was crying, not intending to kill it—which was prob'ly a lie—and then he was scared, and buried it in a bar'l, before his wife got home, and off he went, and struck the northern trail and went to rafting, and this was the third year that the bar'l had chased him. He said the bad luck always begun light, and lasted till four men was killed, and then the bar'l didn't come any more after that. He said if the men would stand it one more night—and was a-going on like that—but the men had got enough. They started to get out a boat to take him ashore and lynch him, but he grabbed the little child all of a sudden and jumped overboard with it, hugged up to his breast and shedding tears, and we never see him again in this life, poor old suffering soul, nor Charles William neither.

"Who was shedding tears?" says Bob, "was it Allbright or the baby?"

"Why, Allbright, of course, didn't I tell you the baby was dead? Been dead three years—how could it cry?"

"Well, never mind how it could cry—how could it keep all that time?" says Davy. "You answer me that."

"I don't know how it done it," says Ed. "It done it, though—that's all I know about it."

"Say—what did they do with the bar'l?" says the Child of Calamity.

"Why, they hove it overboard, and it sunk like a chunk of lead."

"Edward, did the child look like it was choked?" says one.

"Did it have its hair parted?" says another. "What was the brand on that bar'l, Eddy?" says a fellow they called Bill.

"Have you got the papers for them status-tics, Edmund?" says Jimmy.

"Say, Edwin, was you one of the men that was killed by the lightning?" says Davy.

"Him? Oh, no! he was both of 'em," says Bob. Then they all haw-hawed.

"Say, Edward, don't you reckon you'd better take a pill? You look bad—don't you feel pale?" says the Child of Calamity.

"Oh, come, now, Eddy," says Jimmy, "show up, you must 'a' kept part of that bar'l to prove the thing by. Show us the bung-hole—do—and we'll all believe you."

"Say, boys," says Bill, "less divide it up. Thar's thirteen of us. I can swaller a thirteenth of the yarn, if you can worry down the rest."

Ed got up mad and said they could all go to some place which he ripped out pretty savage, and then walked off aft, cussing to himself, and they yelling and jeering at him, and roaring and laughing so you could hear them a mile.

"Boys, we'll split a watermelon on that," says the Child of Calamity, and he came rummaging around in the dark amongst the shingle bundles where I was, and put his hand on me. I was warm and soft and naked, so he says "Ouch!" and jumped back.

"Fetch a lantern or a chunk of fire here, boys—there's a snake here as big as a cow!"

So they run there with a lantern, and crowded up and looked in on me.

"Come out of that, you beggar!" says one. "Who are you?" says another.

"What are you after here? Speak up prompt, or overboard you go."

"Snake him out, boys. Snatch him out by the heels."

I began to beg, and crept out amongst them trembling. They looked me over, wondering, and the Child of Calamity says:

"A cussed thief! Lend a hand and less heave him overboard!"

"No," says Big Bob, "less get out the paint-pot and paint him a sky-blue all over from head to heel, and then heave him over."

"Good! that's it. Go for the paint, Jimmy."

When the paint come, and Bob took the brush and was just going to begin, the others laughing and rubbing their hands, I begun to cry, and that sort of worked on Davy, and he says:

"Vast there. He's nothing but a cub. I'll paint the man that teches him!"

So I looked around on them, and some of them grumbled and growled, and Bob put down the paint, and the others didn't take it up.

"Come here to the fire, and less see what you're up to here," says Davy. "Now set down there and give an account of yourself How long have you been aboard here?"

"Not over a quarter of a minute, sir," says I

"How did you get dry so quick?"

"I don't know, sir I'm always that way, mostly"

"Oh, you are, are you? What's your name?"

I warn't going to tell my name I didn't 10 know what to say, so I just says

"Charles William Allbright, sir"

Then they roared—the whole crowd, and I was mighty glad I said that, because, maybe, laughing would get them in a better humor

When they got done laughing, Davy says

"It won't hardly do, Charles William.
You couldn't have growed this much in five year, and you was a baby when you come 20 out of the bar'l, you know, and dead at that Come, now, tell a straight story, and no-body'll hurt you, if you ain't up to anything wrong What is your name?"

"Aleck Hopkins, sir Aleck James Hopkins"

"Well, Aleck, where did you come from,
here?"

"From a trading scow She lays up the bend yonder I was born on her Pap has 30 traded up and down here all his life, and he told me to swim off here, because when you went by he said he would like to get some of you to speak to a Mr Jonas Turner, in Cairo, and tell him—"

"Oh, come!"

"Yes, sir, it's as true as the world Pap he says—"

"Oh, your grandmother!"

They all laughed, and I tried again to 40 talk, but they broke in on me and stopped
me

"Now, looky-here," says Davy, "you're scared, and so you talk wild Honest, now, do you live in a scow, or is it a lie?"

"Yes, sir, in a trading scow She lays up at the head of the bend But I warn't born in her It's our first trip"

"Now you're talking! What did you come aboard here for? To steal?" 50

"No, sir, I didn't It was only to get a ride on the raft All boys does that"

"Well, I know that But what did you hide
for?"

"Sometimes they drive the boys off"

"So they do They might steal Lookyhere, if we let you off this time, will you keep out of these kind of scrapes hereafter?"

"'Deed I will, boss You try me"

"All right, then You ain't but little ways from shore Overboard with you, and don't you make a fool of yourself another time this way Blast it, boy, some raftsmen would rawhide you till you were black and blue!"

I didn't wait to kiss good-by, but went overboard and broke for shore When Jim come along by and by, the big raft was away out of sight around the point I swum out and got aboard, and was mighty glad to see home again

The boy did not get the information he was after, but his adventure has furnished the glimpse of the departed raftsmen and keel-boatman which I desire to offer in this place

THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED HADLEYBURG

I

It was many years ago Hadleyburg was the most honest and upright town in all the region around about It had kept that reputation unsmirched during three generations, and was prouder of it than of any other of its possessions It was so proud of it, and so anxious to insure its perpetuation, that it began to teach the principles of honest dealing to its babies in the cradle, and made the like teachings the staple of their culture thenceforward through all the years devoted to their education Also, throughout the formative years temptations were kept out of the way of the young people, so that their honesty could have every chance to harden and solidify, and become a part of their very bone The neighboring towns were jealous of this honorable supremacy, and affected to sneer at Hadleyburg's pride in it and call it vanity, but all the same they were obliged to acknowledge that Hadleyburg was in reality an incorruptible town, and if pressed they would also acknowledge that the mere fact that a young man hailed from Hadleyburg was all the recommendation he needed when he went forth from his natal town to seek for responsible employment

But at last, in the drift of time, Hadleyburg had the ill luck to offend a passing stranger—possibly without knowing it, certainly without caring, for Hadleyburg was sufficient unto itself, and cared not a rap for strangers or their opinions. Still, it would have been well to make an exception in this one's case, for he was a bitter man and revengeful. All through his wanderings during a whole year he kept his injury in mind, and gave all his leisure moments to trying to invent a compensating satisfaction for it. He contrived many plans, and all of them were good, but none of them was quite sweeping enough, the poorest of them would hurt a great many individuals, but what he wanted was a plan which would comprehend the entire town, and not let so much as one person escape unhurt. At last he had a fortunate idea, and when it fell into his brain it lit up his whole head with an evil joy. He began to form a plan at once, saying to himself, 'That is the thing to do—I will corrupt the town.'

Six months later he went to Hadleyburg, and arrived in a buggy at the house of the old cashier of the bank about ten at night. He got a sack out of the buggy, shouldered it, and staggered with it through the cottage yard, and knocked at the door. A woman's voice said 'Come in,' and he entered, and set his sack behind the stove in the parlor, saying politely to the old lady who sat reading the Missionary Herald by the lamp

'Pray keep your seat, madam, I will not disturb you. There—now it is pretty well concealed, one would hardly know it was there. Can I see your husband a moment, madam?'

No, he was gone to Brixton, and might not return before morning.

'Very well, madam, it is no matter. I merely wanted to leave that sack in his care, to be delivered to the rightful owner when he shall be found. I am a stranger, he does not know me, I am merely passing through the town to-night to discharge a matter which has been long in my mind. My errand is now completed, and I go pleased and a little proud, and you will never see me again. There is a paper attached to the sack which will explain everything. Good night, madam.'

The old lady was afraid of the mysterious big stranger, and was glad to see him go. But her curiosity was roused, and she went straight to the sack and brought away the paper. It began as follows

TO BE PUBLISHED, or, the right man sought out by private inquiry—either will answer. This sack contains gold coin weighing a hundred and sixty pounds four ounces—

'Mercy on us, and the door not locked!'

Mrs. Richards flew to it all in a tremble and locked it, then pulled down the window-shades and stood frightened, worried, and wondering if there was anything else she could do toward making herself and the money more safe. She listened awhile for burglars, then surrendered to curiosity and went back to the lamp and finished reading the paper

I am a foreigner, and am presently going back to my own country, to remain there permanently. I am grateful to America for what I have received at her hands during my long stay under her flag, and to one of her citizens—a citizen of Hadleyburg—I am especially grateful for a great kindness done me a year or two ago. Two great kindnesses, in fact. I will explain. I was a gambler. I say I WAS. I was a ruined gambler. I arrived in this village at night, hungry and without a penny. I asked for help—in the dark, I was ashamed to beg in the light. I begged of the right man. He gave me twenty dollars—that is to say, he gave me life, as I considered it. He also gave me fortune, for out of that money I have made myself rich at the gaming-table. And finally, a remark which he made to me has remained with me to this day, and has at last conquered me, and in conquering has saved the remnant of my morals. I shall gamble no more. Now I have no idea who that man was, but I want him found, and I want him to have this money, to give away, throw away, or keep, as he pleases. It is merely my way of testifying my gratitude to him. If I could stay, I would find him myself, but no matter, he will be found. This is an honest town, an incorruptible town, and I know I can trust it without fear. This man can be identified by the remark which he made to me, I feel persuaded that he will remember it.

And now my plan is this. If you prefer to conduct the inquiry privately, do so. Tell the contents of this present writing to any one who is likely to be the right man. If he shall an- swer, 'I am the man, the remark I made was so-and-so,' apply the test—to wit open the sack, and in it you will find a sealed envelope containing that remark. If the remark mentioned by the candidate talks with it, give him the money, and ask no further questions, for he is certainly the right man.

But if you shall prefer a public inquiry, then publish this present writing in the local paper—with these instructions added, to wit: Thirty days from now, let the candidate appear at the town-hall at eight in the evening (Friday), and hand his remark, in a sealed envelope, to the Rev Mr Burgess (if he will be kind enough to act), and let Mr Burgess there and then destroy the seals of the sack, open it, and see if the remark is correct, if correct, let the money be delivered, with my sincere gratitude, to my benefactor thus identified.

Mrs Richards sat down, gently quivering with excitement, and was soon lost in thinkings—after this pattern 'What a strange thing it is!'

And what a fortune for that kind man who set his bread afloat upon the waters!'

If it had only been my husband that did it!—for we are so poor, so old and poor!'

Then, with a sigh—'But it was not my Edward, no, it was not he that gave a stranger twenty dollars. It is a pity, too, I see it now.'

Then, with a shudder—'But it is gambler's money! the wages of sin we couldn't take it, we couldn't touch it. I don't like to be near it, it seems a defilement.'

She moved to a farther chair. 'I wish Edward would come and take it to the bank, a burglar might come at any moment, it is dreadful to be here all alone with it.'

At eleven Mr Richards arrived, and while his wife was saying, 'I am so glad you've come!' he was saying, 'I'm so tired—tired clear out, it is dreadful to be poor, and have to make these dismal journeys at my time of life. Always at the grind, grind, grind, on a salary—another man's slave, and he sitting at home in his slippers, rich and comfortable.'

'I am so sorry for you, Edward, you know that, but be comforted we have our livelihood, we have our good name—'

'Yes, Mary, and that is everything. Don't mind my talk—it's just a moment's irritation and doesn't mean anything. Kiss me—there, it's all gone now, and I am not complaining any more. What have you been getting? What's in the sack?'

Then his wife told him the great secret. It dazed him for a moment, then he said

'It weighs a hundred and sixty pounds? Why, Mary, it's for-ty thou-sand dollars—think of it—a whole fortune! Not ten men in this village are worth that much. Give me the paper.'

He skimmed through it and said

'Isn't it an adventure! Why, it's a romance, it's like the impossible things one reads about in books, and never sees in life.' He was well stirred up now, cheerful, even gleeful. He tapped his old wife on the cheek, and said, humorously, 'Why, we're rich, Mary, rich, all we've got to do is to bury the money and burn the papers. If the gambler ever comes to inquire, we'll merely look coldly upon him and say "What is this nonsense you are talking? We have never heard of you and your sack of gold before," and then he would look foolish, and—'

'And in the mean time, while you are running on with your jokes, the money is still here, and it is fast getting along toward burglar-time.'

'True. Very well, what shall we do—make the inquiry private? No, not that it would spoil the romance. The public method is better. Think what a noise it will make! And it will make all the other towns jealous, for no stranger would trust such a thing to any town but Hadleyburg, and they know it. It's a great card for us. I must get to the printing-office now, or I shall be too late.'

'But stop—stop—don't leave me here alone with it, Edward!'

But he was gone. For only a little while, however. Not far from his own house he met the editor-proprietor of the paper, and gave him the document, and said, 'Here is a good thing for you, Cox—put it in.'

'It may be too late, Mr Richards, but I'll see.'

At home again he and his wife sat down to talk the charming mystery over, they were in no condition for sleep. The first question was, Who could the citizen have been who gave the stranger the twenty dollars? It seemed a simple one, both answered it in the same breath

'Barclay Goodson'

'Yes,' said Richards, 'he could have done it, and it would have been like him, but there's not another in the town'

'Everybody will grant that, Edward—grant it privately, anyway For six months, now, the village has been its own proper self once more—honest, narrow, self-righteous, and stungy'

'It is what he always called it, to the day of his death—said it right out publicly, too'

'Yes, and he was hated for it'

'Oh, of course, but he didn't care I reckon he was the best-hated man among us, except the Reverend Burgess'

'Well, Burgess deserves it—he will never get another congregation here Mean as the town is, it knows how to estimate him Edward, doesn't it seem odd that the stranger should appoint Burgess to deliver the money?'

'Well, yes—it does That is—that is—'

'Why so much that-is-ing? Would you select him?'

'Mary, maybe the stranger knows him better than this village does'

'Much that would help Burgess'

The husband seemed perplexed for an answer, the wife kept a steady eye upon him, and waited Finally Richards said, with the hesitancy of one who is making a statement which is likely to encounter doubt

'Mary, Burgess is not a bad man'

His wife was certainly surprised

'Nonsense!' she exclaimed

'He is not a bad man I know The whole of his unpopularity had its foundation in that one thing—the thing that made so much noise'

'That "one thing," indeed! As if that "one thing" wasn't enough, all by itself'

'Plenty Plenty Only he wasn't guilty of it'

'How you talk! Not guilty of it! Everybody knows he was guilty'

'Mary, I gave you my word—he was innocent'

'I can't believe it, and I don't How do you know?'

'It is a confession I am ashamed, but I will make it I was the only man who knew he was innocent I could have saved him, and—and—well, you know how the town was wrought up—I hadn't the pluck to do it It would have turned everybody against me I felt mean, ever so mean, but I didn't dare, I hadn't the manliness to face that'

Mary looked troubled, and for a while was silent Then she said, stammeringly

'I—I don't think it would have done for you to—to—One mustn't—er—public opinion—one has to be so careful—so—' It was a difficult road, and she got mired, but after a little she got started again. 'It was a great pity, but—Why, we couldn't afford it, Edward—we couldn't indeed Oh, I wouldn't have had you do it for anything!'

'It would have lost us the good will of so many people, Mary, and then—and then—'

'What troubles me now is, what he thinks of us, Edward'

'He? He doesn't suspect that I could have saved him'

'Oh,' exclaimed the wife, in a tone of relief, 'I am glad of that! As long as he doesn't know that you could have saved him, he—he—well, that makes it a great deal better Why, I might have known he didn't know, because he is always trying to be friendly with us, as little encouragement as we give him More than once people have twitted me with it There's the Wilsons, and the Wilcoxes, and the Harknesses, they take a mean pleasure in saying, "Your friend Burgess," because they know it pesters me I wish he wouldn't persist in liking us so, I can't think why he keeps it up'

'I can explain it It's another confession When the thing was new and hot, and the town made a plan to ride him on a rail, my conscience hurt me so that I couldn't stand it, and I went privately and gave him notice, and he got out of the town and staid out till it was safe to come back'

'Edward! If the town had found it out—'

'Don't! It scares me yet, to think of it I repented of it the minute it was done, and I was even afraid to tell you, lest your face might betray it to somebody I didn't sleep any that night, for worrying But after a few days I saw that no one was going to suspect me, and after that I got to feeling glad I did it And I feel glad yet, Mary—glad through and through'

'So do I, now, for it would have been a dreadful way to treat him Yes, I'm glad, for really you did owe him that, you know

But, Edward, suppose it should come out yet, some day!"

"It won't"

"Why?"

"Because everybody thinks it was Goodson"

"Of course they would!"

"Certainly And of course he didn't care They persuaded poor old Sawlsberry to go and charge it on him, and he went blustering over there and did it Goodson looked him over, like as if he was hunting for a place on him that he could despise the most, then he says, "So you are the Committee of Inquiry, are you?" Sawlsberry said that was about what he was "Hm Do they require particulars, or do you reckon a kind of a general answer will do?" "If they require particulars, I will come back, Mr Goodson, I will take the general answer first" "Very well, then, tell them to go to hell—I reckon that's general enough And I'll give you some advice, Sawlsberry, when you come back for the particulars, fetch a basket to carry the relics of yourself home in"

"Just like Goodson, it's got all the marks He had only one vanity he thought he could give advice better than any other person"

"It settled the business, and saved us, Mary The subject was dropped"

"Bless you, I'm not doubting that"

Then they took up the gold-sack mystery again, with strong interest Soon the conversation began to suffer breaks—interruptions caused by absorbed thinkings The breaks grew more and more frequent At last Richards lost himself wholly in thought He sat long, gazing vacantly at the floor, and by and by he began to punctuate his thoughts with little nervous movements of his hands that seemed to indicate vexation Meantime his wife too had relapsed into a thoughtful silence, and her movements were beginning to show a troubled discomfort Finally Richards got up and strode aimlessly about the room, plowing his hands through his hair, much as a somnambulist might do who was having a bad dream Then he seemed to arrive at a definite purpose, and without a word he put on his hat and passed quickly out of the house His wife sat brooding, with a drawn face, and did not seem to be aware that she was alone Now and then she murmured, "Lead us not into t— . . . but—but—we are so poor, so poor!" "Lead us not into Ah, who would be hurt by it?—and no one would ever know. . . . Lead us . . ." The voice died out in mumblings After a little she glanced up and muttered in a half-frightened, half-glad way

"He is gone! But, oh dear, he may be too late—too late . . . Maybe not—maybe there is still time" She rose and stood thinking, nervously clasping and unclasping her hands A slight shudder shook her frame, and she said, out of a dry throat, "God forgive me—it's awful to think such things—but Lord, how we are made—how strangely we are made!"

She turned the light low, and slipped stealthily over and kneeled down by the sack and felt of its ridgy sides with her hands, and fondled them lovingly, and there was a gloating light in her poor old eyes She fell into fits of absence, and came half out of them at times to mutter, "If we had only waited!—oh, if we had only waited a little, and not been in such a hurry!"

Meantime Cox had gone home from his office and told his wife all about the strange thing that had happened, and they had talked it over eagerly, and guessed that the late Goodson was the only man in the town who could have helped a suffering stranger with so noble a sum as twenty dollars Then there was a pause, and the two became thoughtful and silent And by and by nervous and fidgety At last the wife said, as if to herself

"Nobody knows this secret but the Richardses and us . . . nobody"

The husband came out of his thinkings with a slight start, and gazed wistfully at his wife, whose face was become very pale, then he hesitatingly rose, and glanced furtively at his hat, then at his wife—a sort of mute inquiry Mrs Cox swallowed once or twice, with her hand at her throat, then in place of speech she nodded her head In a moment she was alone, and mumbling to herself.

And now Richards and Cox were hurrying through the deserted streets, from opposite directions They met, panting, at the foot of the printing-office stairs, by the night light there they read each other's face Cox whispered

"Nobody knows about this but us?"

The whispered answer was,
 'Not a soul—on honor, not a soul!'
 'If it isn't too late to—'

The men were starting up-stairs, at this moment they were overtaken by a boy, and Cox asked

'Is that you, Johnny?'
 'Yes, sir'

'You needn't ship the early mail—nor any mail, wait till I tell you'

'It's already gone, sir'

'Gone?' It had the sound of an unspeakable disappointment in it

'Yes, sir Time-table for Brixton and all the towns beyond changed to-day, sir—had to get the papers in twenty minutes earlier than common I had to rush, if I had been two minutes later—'

The men turned and walked slowly away, not waiting to hear the rest Neither of them spoke during ten minutes, then Cox said, in a vexed tone

'What possessed you to be in such a hurry, I can't make out'

The answer was humble enough

'I see it now, but somehow I never thought, you know, until it was too late. But the next time—'

'Next time be hanged! It won't come in a thousand years'

Then the friends separated without a good night, and dragged themselves home with the gait of mortally stricken men At their homes their wives sprang up with an eager 'Well?'—then saw the answer with their eyes and sank down sorrowing, without waiting for it to come in words In both houses a discussion followed of a heated sort—a new thing, there had been discussions before, but not heated ones, not ungentle ones The discussions to-night were a sort of seeming plagiarisms of each other. Mrs Richards said,

'If you had only waited, Edward—if you had only stopped to think, but no, you must run straight to the printing-office and spread it all over the world.'

'It said publish it'

'That is nothing, it also said do it privately, if you liked There, now—is that true, or not?'

'Why, yes—yes, it is true, but when I thought what a stir it would make, and what a compliment it was to Hadleyburg that a stranger should trust it so—'

'Oh, certainly, I know all that, but if you had only stopped to think, you would have seen that you couldn't find the right man, because he is in his grave, and hasn't left chuck nor child nor relation behind him; and as long as the money went to somebody that awfully needed it, and nobody would be hurt by it, and—and—'

She broke down, crying Her husband tried to think of some comforting thing to say, and presently came out with this

'But after all, Mary, it must be for the best—it must be, we know that And we must remember that it was so ordered—'

'Ordered! Oh, everything's ordered, when a person has to find some way out when he has been stupid Just the same, it was ordered that the money should come to us in this special way, and it was you that must take it on yourself to go meddling with the designs of Providence—and who gave you the right? It was wicked, that is what it was—just blasphemous presumption, and no more becoming to a meek and humble professor of—'

'But, Mary, you know how we have been trained all our lives long, like the whole village, till it is absolutely second nature to us to stop not a single moment to think when there's an honest thing to be done—'

'Oh, I know it, I know it—it's been one everlasting training and training and training in honesty—honesty shielded, from the very cradle, against every possible temptation, and so it's artificial honesty, and weak as water when temptation comes, as we have seen this night God knows I never had shade nor shadow of a doubt of my petrified and indestructible honesty until now—and now, under the very first big and real temptation, I—Edward, it is my belief that this town's honesty is as rotten as mine is, as rotten as yours is It is a mean town, a hard, stingy town, and hasn't a virtue in the world but this honesty it is so celebrated for and so conceited about, and so help me, I do believe that if ever the day comes that its honesty falls under great temptation, its grand reputation will go to ruin like a house of cards There, now I've made confession, and I feel better, I am a humbug, and I've been one all my life, without knowing it Let no man call me honest again—I will not have it'

'I—well, Mary, I feel a good deal as you do, I certainly do. It seems strange, too, so strange I never could have believed it—never’

A long silence followed; both were sunk in thought. At last the wife looked up and said—

‘I know what you are thinking, Edward.’

Richards had the embarrassed look of a person who is caught.

‘I am ashamed to confess it, Mary, but—’

‘It’s no matter, Edward, I was thinking the same question myself’

‘I hope so. State it’

‘You were thinking, if a body could only guess out what the remark was that Goodson made to the stranger’

‘It’s perfectly true. I feel guilty and ashamed. And you?’

‘I’m past it. Let us make a pallet here, we’ve got to stand watch till the bank vault opens in the morning and admits the sack’

Oh dear, oh dear—if we hadn’t made the mistake!’

The pallet was made, and Mary said.

‘The open sesame—what could it have been? I do wonder what that remark could have been? But come, we will get to bed now’

‘And sleep?’

‘No, think’

‘Yes, think’

By this time the Coxes too had completed their spat and their reconciliation, and were turning in—to think, to think, and toss, and fret, and worry over what the remark could possibly have been which Goodson made to the stranded derelict, that golden remark, that remark worth forty thousand dollars, cash.

The reason that the village telegraph-office was open later than usual that night was this. The foreman of Cox’s paper was the local representative of the Associated Press. One might say its honorary representative, for it wasn’t four times a year that he could furnish thirty words that would be accepted. But this time it was different. His despatch stating what he had caught got an instant answer

Send the whole thing—all the details—twelve hundred words.

A colossal order! The foreman filled the bill, and he was the proudest man in the State. By breakfast-time the next morning the name of Hadleyburg the Incorruptible was on every lip in America, from Montreal to the Gulf, from the glaciers of Alaska to the orange-groves of Florida, and millions and millions of people were discussing the stranger and his money-sack, and wondering if the right man would be found, and hoping some more news about the matter would come soon—right away.

II

Hadleyburg village woke up world-celebrated—astonished—happy—vain. Vain beyond imagination. Its nineteen principal citizens and their wives went about shaking hands with each other, and beaming, and smiling, and congratulating, and saying this thing adds a new word to the dictionary—Hadleyburg, synonym for incorruptible—destined to live in dictionaries forever! And the minor and unimportant citizens and their wives went around acting in much the same way. Everybody ran to the bank to see the gold-sack, and before noon grieved and envious crowds began to flock in from Brixton and all neighboring towns, and that afternoon and next day reporters began to arrive from everywhere to verify the sack and its history and write the whole thing up anew, and make dashing free-hand pictures of the sack, and of Richards’s house, and the bank, and the Presbyterian church, and the Baptist church, and the public square, and the town-hall where the test would be applied and the money delivered, and damnable portraits of the Richardses, and Pinkerton the banker, and Cox, and the foreman, and Reverend Burgess, and the postmaster—and even of Jack Halliday, who was the loafing, good-natured, no-account, irreverent fisherman, hunter, boys’ friend, stray-dogs’ friend, typical ‘Sam Lawson’ of the town. The little mean, smirking, oily Pinkerton showed the sack to all comers, and rubbed his sleek palms together pleasantly, and enlarged upon the town’s fine old reputation for honesty and upon this wonderful indorsement of it, and hoped and believed that the example would now spread far and wide over the American world, and be epoch-making in the matter of moral regeneration. And so on, and so on.

By the end of a week things had quieted down again, the wild intoxication of pride and joy had sobered to a soft, sweet, silent delight—a sort of deep, nameless, unutterable content. All faces bore a look of peaceful, holy happiness.

Then a change came. It was a gradual change, so gradual that its beginnings were hardly noticed, maybe were not noticed at all, except by Jack Halliday, who always noticed everything, and always made fun of it, too, no matter what it was. He began to throw out chaffing remarks about people not looking quite so happy as they did a day or two ago, and next he claimed that the new aspect was deepening to positive sadness, next, that it was taking on a sick look, and finally he said that everybody was become so moody, thoughtful, and absent-minded that he could rob the meanest man in town of a cent out of the bottom of his breeches pocket and not disturb his reverie.

At this stage—or at about this stage—a saying like this was dropped at bedtime—with a sigh, usually—by the head of each of the nineteen principal households. 'Ah, what could have been the remark that Goodson made?'

And straightway—with a shudder—came this, from the man's wife:

'Oh, don't! What horrible thing are you mulling in your mind? Put it away from you, for God's sake!'

But that question was wrung from those men again the next night—and got the same retort. But weaker.

And the third night the men uttered the question yet again—with anguish, and absently. This time—and the following night—the wives fidgeted feebly, and tried to say something. But didn't.

And the night after that they found their tongues and responded—longingly:

'Oh, if we could only guess!'

Halliday's comments grew daily more and more sparkingly disagreeable and disparaging. He went diligently about, laughing at the town, individually and in mass. But his laugh was the only one left in the village: it fell upon a hollow and mournful vacancy and emptiness. Not even a smile was findable anywhere. Halliday carried a cigar-box around on a tripod, playing that it was a camera, and halted all passers and aimed the thing and said, 'Ready!—now look pleasant, please,' but not even this capital joke could surprise the dreary faces into any softening.

So three weeks passed—one week was left. It was Saturday evening—after supper. Instead of the aforetime Saturday-evening flutter and bustle and shopping and larking, the streets were empty and desolate. Richards and his old wife sat apart in their little parlor—miserable and thinking. This was become their evening habit now: the lifelong habit which had preceded it, of reading, knitting, and contented chat, or receiving or paying neighborly calls, was dead and gone and forgotten, ages ago—two or three weeks ago, nobody talked now, nobody read, nobody visited—the whole village sat at home, sighing, worrying, silent. Trying to guess out that remark.

The postman left a letter. Richards glanced listlessly at the superscription and the postmark—unfamiliar, both—and tossed the letter on the table and resumed his might-have-beens and his hopeless dull miseries where he had left them off. Two or three hours later his wife got wearily up and was going away to bed without a good night—custom now—but she stopped near the letter and eyed it awhile with a dead interest, then broke it open, and began to skim it over. Richards, sitting there with his chair tilted back against the wall and his chin between his knees, heard something fall. It was his wife. He sprang to her side, but she cried out:

'Leave me alone, I am too happy. Read the letter—read it!'

He did. He devoured it, his brain reeling. The letter was from a distant state, and it said:

I am a stranger to you, but no matter. I have something to tell. I have just arrived home from Mexico, and learned about that episode. Of course you do not know who made that remark, but I know, and I am the only person living who does know. It was GOODSON. I knew him well, many years ago. I passed through your village that very night, and was his guest till the midnight train came along. I overheard him make that remark to the stranger in the dark—it was in Hale Alley. He and I talked of it the rest of the way home, and while smoking in his house. He mentioned many of your villagers in the course of his talk—most of them in a very un- complimentary way, but two or three favorably, among these latter yourself I say 'favorably'—nothing stronger I remember his saying he did not actually LIKE any person in the town—not one, but that you—I THINK he said you—am almost sure—had done him a very great service once, possibly without knowing the full value of it, and he wished he had a fortune, he would leave it to you when he died, and a curse apiece for the rest of the citizens Now, then, if it was you that did him that service, you are his legitimate heir, and entitled to the sack of gold I know that I can trust to your honor and honesty, for in a citizen of Hadleyburg these virtues are an unfailing inheritance, and so I am going to reveal to you the remark, well satisfied that if you are not the right man you will seek and find the right one and see that poor Goodson's debt of gratitude for the service referred to is paid This is the remark 'YOU ARE FAR FROM BEING A BAD MAN GO, AND REFORM'

'Oh, Edward, the money is ours, and I am so grateful, oh, so grateful—kiss me, dear, it's forever since we kissed—and we needed it so—the money—and now you are free of Pinkerton and his bank, and nobody's slave any more, it seems to me I could fly for joy'

It was a happy half-hour that the couple spent there on the settee caressing each other, it was the old days come again—days that had begun with their courtship and lasted without a break till the stranger brought the deadly money By and by the wife said

'Oh, Edward, how lucky it was you did him that grand service, poor Goodson! I never liked him, but I love him now. And it was fine and beautiful of you never to mention it or brag about it' Then, with a touch of reproach, 'But you ought to have told me, Edward, you ought to have told your wife, you know'

'Well, I—er—well, Mary, you see—'

'Now stop hemming and hawing, and tell me about it, Edward I always loved you, and now I'm proud of you Everybody believes there was only one good generous soul in this village, and now it turns out that you—Edward, why don't you tell me?'

'Well—er—er—Why, Mary, I can't'

'You can't? Why can't you?'

'You see, he—well, he—ne made me promise I wouldn't'

The wife looked him over, and said, very slowly

'Made—you—promise? Edward, what do you tell me that for?'

'Mary, do you think I would lie?'

She was troubled and silent for a moment, then she laid her hand within his and said

'No . . . no We have wandered far enough from our bearings—God spare us that! In all your life you have never uttered a lie But now—now that the foundations of things seem to be crumbling from under us, we—we—' She lost her voice for a moment, then said, brokenly, 'Lead us not into temptation . . . I think you made the promise, Edward Let it rest so Let us keep away from that ground Now—that is all gone by, let us be happy again, it is no time for clouds'

Edward found it something of an effort to comply, for his mind kept wandering—trying to remember what the service was that he had done Goodson.

The couple lay awake the most of the night, Mary happy and busy, Edward busy but not so happy Mary was planning what she would do with the money Edward was trying to recall that service At first his conscience was sore on account of the lie he had told Mary—if it was a lie After much reflection—suppose it was a lie? What then? Was it such a great matter? Aren't we always acting lies? Then why not tell them? Look at Mary—look what she had done While he was hurrying off on his honest errand, what was she doing? Lamenting because the papers hadn't been destroyed and the money kept! Is theft better than lying?

That point lost its sting—the lie dropped into the background and left comfort behind it The next point came to the front Had he rendered that service? Well, here was Goodson's own evidence as reported in Stephenson's letter; there could be no better evidence than that—it was even proof that he had rendered it Of course So that point was settled . . . No, not quite He recalled with a wince that this unknown Mr Stephenson was just a trifle unsure as to whether the performer of it was Richards or some other—and, oh dear, he had put Richards on his honor! He must himself decide whether that money must go—and Mr Stephenson was not doubting that if he was the wrong man he would go honorably and find the right one. Oh, it was odious to put a man in such a situation—ah, why couldn't Stephenson have left out that doubt! What did he want to intrude that for?

Further reflection. How did it happen that Richards's name remained in Stephenson's mind as indicating the right man, and not some other man's name? That looked good. Yes, that looked very good. In fact, it went on looking better and better, straight along—until by and by it grew into positive proof. And then Richards put the matter at once out of his mind, for he had a private instinct that a proof once established is better left so.

He was feeling reasonably comfortable now, but there was still one other detail that kept pushing itself on his notice of course he had done that service—that was settled, but what was that service? He must recall it—he would not go to sleep till he had recalled it, it would make his peace of mind perfect. And so he thought and thought. He thought of a dozen things—possible services, even probable services—but none of them seemed adequate, none of them seemed large enough, none of them seemed worth the money—worth the fortune Goodson had wished he could leave in his will. And besides, he couldn't remember having done them, anyway. Now, then—now, then—what kind of a service would it be that would make a man so inordinately grateful? Ah—the saving of his soul! That must be it. Yes, he could remember, now, how he once set himself the task of converting Goodson, and labored at it as much as—he was going to say three months, but upon closer examination it shrunk to a month, then to a week, then to a day, then to nothing. Yes, he remembered now, and with unwelcome vividness, that Goodson had told him to go to thunder and mind his own business—he wasn't hankering to follow Hadleyburg to heaven!

So that solution was a failure—he hadn't saved Goodson's soul. Richards was discouraged. Then after a little came another idea: had he saved Goodson's property? No, that wouldn't do—he hadn't any. His life? That is it! Of course. Why, he might have thought of it before. This time he was on the right track, sure. His imagination-mill was hard at work in a minute, now.

Thereafter during a stretch of two exhausting hours he was busy saving Goodson's life. He saved it in all kinds of difficult and perilous ways. In every case he got it saved satisfactorily up to a certain point, then, just as he was beginning to get well persuaded that it had really happened, a troublesome detail would turn up which made the whole thing impossible. As in the matter of drowning, for instance. In that case he had swum out and tugged Goodson ashore in an unconscious state with a great crowd looking on and applauding, but when he had got it all thought out and was just beginning to remember all about it, a whole swarm of disqualifying details arrived on the ground: the town would have known of the circumstance, Mary would have known of it, it would glare like a lime-light in his own memory instead of being an inconspicuous service which he had possibly rendered 'without knowing its full value.' And at this point he remembered that he couldn't swim, anyway.

Ah—there was a point which he had been overlooking from the start: it had to be a service which he had rendered 'possibly without knowing the full value of it.' Why, really, that ought to be an easy hunt—much easier than those others. And sure enough, by and by he found it. Goodson, years and years ago, came near marrying a very sweet and pretty girl, named Nancy Hewitt, but in some way or other the match had been broken off, the girl died, Goodson remained a bachelor, and by and by became a soured one and a frank despiser of the human species. Soon after the girl's death the village found out, or thought it had found out, that she carried a spoonful of Negro blood in her veins. Richards worked at these details a good while, and in the end he thought he remembered things concerning them which must have gotten mislaid in his memory through long neglect. He seemed to dimly remember that it was he that found out about the Negro blood, that it was he that told the village, that the village told Goodson where they got it, that he thus saved Goodson from marrying the tainted girl, that he had done him this great service 'without knowing the full value of it,' in fact without knowing that he was doing it, but that Goodson knew the value of it, and what a narrow escape he had had, and so went to his grave grateful to his benefactor and wishing he had a fortune to leave him. It was all clear and simple now, and the more he went over it the more luminous and certain it grew, and at last, when he nestled to sleep satisfied and happy, he remembered the whole thing just as if it had been yesterday. In fact, he dimly remembered Goodson's telling him his gratitude once. Meantime Mary had spent six thousand dollars on a new house for herself and a pair of slippers for her pastor, and then had fallen peacefully to rest.

That same Saturday evening the postman had delivered a letter to each of the other principal citizens—nineteen letters in all. No two of the envelopes were alike, and no two of the superscriptions were in the same hand, but the letters inside were just like each other in every detail but one. They were exact copies of the letter received by Richards—handwriting and all—and were all signed by Stephenson, but in place of Richards's name each receiver's own name appeared.

All night long eighteen principal citizens did what their caste-brother Richards was doing at the same time—they put in their energies trying to remember what notable service it was that they had unconsciously done Barclay Goodson. In no case was it a holiday job, still they succeeded.

And while they were at this work, which was difficult, their wives put in the night spending the money, which was easy. During that one night the nineteen wives spent an average of seven thousand dollars each out of the forty thousand in the sack—a hundred and thirty-three thousand altogether.

Next day there was a surprise for Jack Halliday. He noticed that the faces of the nineteen chief citizens and their wives bore that expression of peaceful and holy happiness again. He could not understand it, neither was he able to invent any remarks about it that could damage it or disturb it. And so it was his turn to be dissatisfied with life. His private guesses at the reasons for the happiness failed in all instances, upon examination. When he met Mrs Wilcox and noticed the placid ecstasy in her face, he said to himself, 'Her cat has had kittens'—and went and asked the cook it was not so, the cook had detected the happiness, but did not know the cause. When Halliday found the duplicate ecstasy in the face of 'Shadbelly' Billson (village nickname), he was sure some neighbor of Billson's had broken his leg, but inquiry showed that this had not happened. The subdued ecstasy in Gregory Yates's face could mean but one thing—he was a mother-in-law short. It was another mistake. 'And Pinkerton—Pinkerton—he has collected ten cents that he thought he was going to lose.' And so on, and so on. In some cases the guesses had to remain in doubt, in the others they proved distinct errors. In the end Halliday said to himself, 'Anyway it foots up that there's nineteen Hadleyburg families temporarily in heaven. I don't know how it happened, I only know Providence is off duty to-day.'

An architect and builder from the next state had lately ventured to set up a small business in this unpromising village, and his sign had now been hanging out a week. Not a customer yet, he was a discouraged man, and sorry he had come. But his weather changed suddenly now. First one and then another chief citizen's wife said to him privately:

'Come to my house Monday week—but say nothing about it for the present. We think of building.'

He got eleven invitations that day. That night he wrote his daughter and broke off her match with her student. He said she could marry a mule higher than that.

Pinkerton the banker and two or three other well-to-do men planned country-seats—but waited. That kind don't count their chickens until they are hatched.

The Wilsons devised a grand new thing—a fancy-dress ball. They made no actual promises, but told all their acquaintance in confidence that they were thinking the matter over and thought they should give it—'and if we do, you will be invited, of course.' People were surprised, and said, one to another, 'Why, they are crazy, those poor Wilsons, they can't afford it.' Several among the nineteen said privately to their husbands, 'It is a good idea. We will keep still till their cheap thing is over, then we will give one that will make it sick.'

The days drifted along, and the bill of future squanderings rose higher and higher, wilder and wilder, more and more foolish and reckless. It began to look as if every member of the nineteen would not only spend his whole forty thousand dollars before receiving-day, but be actually in debt by the time he got the money. In some cases light-headed people did not stop with planning to spend, they really spent—on credit. They bought land, mortgages, farms, speculative stocks, fine clothes, horses, and various other things, paid down the bonus, and made themselves liable for the rest—at ten days. Presently the sober second thought came, and Halliday noticed that a ghastly anxiety was beginning to show up in a good many faces. Again he was puzzled, and didn't know what to make of it. 'The Wilcox kittens aren't dead, for they weren't born, nobody's broken a leg, there's no shrinkage in mother-in-laws, nothing has happened—it is an unsolvable mystery.'

There was another puzzled man, too—the Rev. Mr. Burgess. For days, wherever he went, people seemed to follow him or to be watching out for him, and if he ever found himself in a retired spot, a member of the nineteen would be sure to appear, thrust an envelope privately into his hand, whisper 'To be opened at the town-hall Friday evening,' then vanish away like a guilty thing. He was expecting that there might be one claimant for the sack—doubtful, however, Goodson being dead—but it never occurred to him that all this crowd might be claimants. When the great Friday came at last, he found that he had nineteen envelopes.

III

The town hall had never looked finer. The platform at the end of it was backed by a showy draping of flags, at intervals along the walls were festoons of flags, the gallery fronts were clothed in flags, the supporting columns were swathed in flags, all this was to impress the stranger, for he would be there in considerable force, and in a large degree he would be connected with the press. The house was full. The 412 fixed seats were occupied, also the 68 extra chairs which had been packed into the aisles, the steps of the platform were occupied, some distinguished strangers were given seats on the platform, at the horse-shoe of tables which fenced the front and sides of the platform sat a strong force of special correspondents who had come from everywhere. It was the best-dressed house the town had ever produced. There were some tolerably expensive toilets there, and in several cases the ladies who wore them had the look of being unfamiliar with that kind of clothes. At least the town thought they had that look, but the notion could have arisen from the town's knowledge of the fact that these ladies had never inhabited such clothes before.

The gold-sack stood on a little table at the front of the platform where all the house could see it. The bulk of the house gazed at it with a burning interest, a mouth-watering interest, a wistful and pathetic interest, a minority of nineteen couples gazed at it tenderly, lovingly, proprietarily, and the male half of this minority kept saying over to themselves the moving little impromptu speeches of thankfulness for the audience's applause and congratulations which they were presently going to get up and deliver. Every now and then one of these got a piece of paper out of his vest pocket and privately glanced at it to refresh his memory.

Of course there was a buzz of conversation going on—there always is, but at last when the Rev. Mr. Burgess rose and laid his hand on the sack he could hear his microbes gnaw, the place was so still. He related the curious history of the sack, then went on to speak in warm terms of Hadleyburg's old and well-earned reputation for spotless honesty, and of the town's just pride in this reputation. He said that this reputation was a treasure of priceless value, that under Providence its value had now become inestimably enhanced, for the recent episode had spread this fame far and wide, and thus had focused the eyes of the American world upon this village, and made its name for all time, as he hoped and believed, a synonym for commercial incorruptibility [Applause]. 'And who is to be the guardian of this noble treasure—the community as a whole? No! The responsibility is individual, not communal. From this day forth each and every one of you is in his own person its special guardian, and individually responsible that no harm shall come to it Do you—does each of you—accept this great trust? [Tumultuous assent] Then all is well Transmit it to your children and to your children's children To-day your purity is beyond reproach—see to it that it shall remain so To-day there is not a person in your community who could be beguiled to touch a penny not his own—see to it that you abide in this grace ['We will! we will!'] This is not the place to make comparisons between ourselves and other communities—some of them ungracious toward us, they have their ways, we have ours, let us be content [Applause] I am done Under my hand, my friends, rests a stranger's eloquent recognition of what we are, through him the world will always henceforth know what we are We do not know who he is, but in your name I utter your gratitude, and ask you to raise your voices in indorsement'

The house rose in a body and made the walls quake with the thunders of its thankfulness for the space of a long minute Then it sat down, and Mr Burgess took an envelope out of his pocket The house held its breath while he slit the envelope open and took from it a slip of paper He read its contents—slowly and impressively—the audience listening with tranced attention to this magic document, each of whose words stood for an ingot of gold

"The remark which I made to the distressed stranger was this 'You are very far from being a bad man go, and reform'"

Then he continued

"We shall know in a moment now whether the remark here quoted corresponds with the one concealed in the sack, and if that shall prove to be so—and it undoubtedly will—this sack of gold belongs to a fellow-citizen who will henceforth stand before the nation as the symbol of the special virtue which has made our town famous throughout the land—Mr Billson!"

The house had gotten itself all ready to burst into the proper tornado of applause, but instead of doing it, it seemed stricken with a paralysis, there was a deep hush for a moment or two, then a wave of whispered murmurs swept the place—of about this tenor 'Billson! oh, come, this is too thin! Twenty dollars to a stranger—or anybody—

Billson! tell it to the marines!" And now at this point the house caught its breath all of a sudden in a new access of astonishment, for it discovered that whereas in one part of the hall Deacon Billson was standing up with his head meekly bowed, in another part of it Lawyer Wilson was doing the same There was a wondering silence now for a while

Everybody was puzzled, and nineteen couples were surprised and indignant

Billson and Wilson turned and stared at each other Billson asked, bitingly

"Why do you rise, Mr Wilson?"

"Because I have a right to Perhaps you will be good enough to explain to the house why you rise?"

"With great pleasure Because I wrote that paper"

"It is an impudent falsity! I wrote it myself"

It was Burgess's turn to be paralyzed He stood looking vacantly at first one of the men and then the other, and did not seem to know what to do The house was stupefied Lawyer Wilson spoke up, now, and said,

"I ask the Chair to read the name signed to that paper"

That brought the Chair to itself, and it read out the name

"John Wharton Billson"

"There!" shouted Billson, "what have you got to say for yourself, now? And what kind of apology are you going to make to me and to this insulted house for the imposture which you have attempted to play here?"

"No apologies are due, sir, and as for the rest of it, I publicly charge you with pilfering my note from Mr Burgess and substituting a copy of it signed with your own name There is no other way by which you could have gotten hold of the test-remark, I alone, of living men, possessed the secret of its wording"

There was likely to be a scandalous state of things if this went on, everybody noticed with distress that the short-hand scribes were scribbling like mad, many people were crying 'Chair, Chair! Order! order!' Burgess rapped with his gavel, and said:

"Let us not forget the proprieties due There has evidently been a mistake somewhere, but surely that is all If Mr. Wilson gave me an envelope—and I remember now that he did—I still have it'

He took one out of his pocket, opened it, glanced at it, looked surprised and worried, and stood silent a few moments. Then he waved his hand in a wandering and mechanical way, and made an effort or two to say something, then gave it up, despondently. Several voices cried out

'Read it! read it! What is it?'

So he began in a dazed and sleep-walker fashion

"The remark which I made to the unhappy stranger was this 'You are far from being a bad man [The house gazed at him, marveling] Go, and reform' "" [Murmurs 'Amazing! what can this mean?'] This one,' said the Chair, 'is signed Thurlow G. Wilson'

'There!' cried Wilson 'I reckon that settles it! I knew perfectly well my note was purloined'

'Purloined!' retorted Billson 'I'll let you know that neither you nor any man of your kidney must venture to—'

The Chair. 'Order, gentlemen, order! Take your seats, both of you, please'

They obeyed, shaking their heads and grumbling angrily. The house was profoundly puzzled, it did not know what to do with this curious emergency. Presently Thompson got up. Thompson was the hatter. He would have liked to be a Nineteener, but such was not for him: his stock of hats was not considerable enough for the position. He said

'Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to make a suggestion, can both of these gentlemen be right? I put it to you, sir, can both have happened to say the very same words to the stranger? It seems to me—'

The tanner got up and interrupted him. The tanner was a disgruntled man, he believed himself entitled to be a Nineteener, but he couldn't get recognition. It made him a little unpleasant in his ways and speech. Said he

'Sho, that's not the point! That could happen—twice in a hundred years—but not the other thing. Neither of them gave the twenty dollars!'

[A ripple of applause]

Billson 'I did!'

Wilson 'I did!'

Then each accused the other of pilfering

The Chair 'Order! Sit down, if you please—both of you. Neither of the notes has been out of my possession at any moment'

A Voice 'Good—that settles that!'

The Tanner 'Mr. Chairman, one thing is now plain: one of these men has been eavesdropping under the other one's bed, and filching family secrets. If it is not unparliamentary to suggest it, I will remark that both are equal to it [The Chair 'Order! order!'] I withdraw the remark, sir, and will confine myself to suggesting that if one of them has overheard the other reveal the test-remark to his wife, we shall catch him now.'

A Voice 'How?'

The Tanner 'Easily. The two have not quoted the remark in exactly the same words. You would have noticed that, if there hadn't been a considerable stretch of time and an exciting quarrel inserted between the two readings.'

A Voice 'Name the difference.'

The Tanner 'The word very is in Billson's note, and not in the other.'

Many Voices 'That's so—he's right!'

The Tanner 'And so, if the Chair will examine the test-remark in the sack, we shall know which of these two frauds—[The Chair 'Order!']—which of these two adventurers—[The Chair 'Order! order!']—which of these two gentlemen—[laughter and applause]—is entitled to wear the belt as being the first dishonest blatherskite ever bred in this town—which he has dishonored, and which will be a sultry place for him from now out!'] [Vigorous applause]

Many Voices 'Open it!—open the sack!'

Mr. Burgess made a slit in the sack, slid his hand in and brought out an envelope. In it were a couple of folded notes. He said

'One of these is marked, "Not to be examined until all written communications which have been addressed to the Chair—if any—shall have been read." The other is marked "The Test." Allow me. It is worded—to wit:

"I do not require that the first half of the remark which was made to me by my benefactor shall be quoted with exactness, for it was not striking, and could be forgotten, but its closing fifteen words are quite striking, and I think easily rememberable, unless these shall be accurately reproduced, let the applicant be regarded as an impostor. My benefactor began by saying he seldom gave advice to any one, but that it always bore the hall-mark of high value when he did give it. Then he said this—and it has never faded from my memory: 'You are far from being a bad man—' ”

Fifty Voices 'That settles it—the money's Wilson's! Wilson! Wilson! Speech! Speech!'

People jumped up and crowded around Wilson, wringing his hand and congratulating fervently—meantime the Chair was hammering with the gavel and shouting

'Order, gentlemen! Order! Order! Let me finish reading, please.' When quiet was restored, the reading was resumed—as follows

“ ‘Go, and reform—or, mark my words—some day, for your sins, you will die and go to hell or Hadleyburg—TRY AND MAKE IT THE FORMER.’ ”

A ghastly silence followed. First an angry cloud began to settle darkly upon the faces of the citizenship, after a pause the cloud began to rise, and a tickled expression tried to take its place, tried so hard that it was only kept under with great and painful difficulty, the reporters, the Brixtonites, and other strangers bent their heads down and shielded their faces with their hands, and managed to hold in by main strength and heroic courtesy. At this most inopportune time burst upon the stillness the roar of a solitary voice—Jack Halliday's

'That's got the hall-mark on it!'

Then the house let go, strangers and all. Even Mr. Burgess's gravity broke down presently, then the audience considered itself officially absolved from all restraint, and it made the most of its privilege. It was a good long laugh, and a tempestuously whole-hearted one, but it ceased at last—long enough for Mr. Burgess to try to resume, and for the people to get their eyes partially wiped, then it broke out again, and afterward yet again, then at last Burgess was able to get out these serious words

'It is useless to try to disguise the fact—we find ourselves in the presence of a matter of grave import. It involves the honor of your town, it strikes at the town's good name. The difference of a single word between the test-remarks offered by Mr. Wilson and Mr. Billson was itself a serious thing, since it indicated that one or the other of these gentlemen had committed a theft—'

The two men were sitting limp, nerveless, crushed; but at these words both were electrified into movement, and started to get up—

'Sit down!' said the Chair, sharply, and they obeyed. 'That, as I have said, was a serious thing. And it was—but for only one of them. But the matter has become graver, for the honor of both is now in formidable peril. Shall I go even further, and say in inextricable peril? Both left out the crucial fifteen words.' He paused. During several moments he allowed the pervading stillness to gather and deepen its impressive effects, then added 'There would seem to be but one way whereby this could happen. I ask these gentlemen—Was there collusion?—agreement?'

A low murmur sifted through the house; its import was, 'He's got them both.'

Billson was not used to emergencies, he sat in a helpless collapse. But Wilson was a lawyer. He struggled to his feet, pale and worried, and said

'I ask the indulgence of the house while I explain this most painful matter. I am sorry to say what I am about to say, since it must inflict irreparable injury upon Mr. Billson, whom I have always esteemed and respected until now, and in whose invulnerability to temptation I entirely believed—as did you all. But for the preservation of my own honor I must speak—and with frankness I confess with shame—and I now beseech your pardon for it—that I said to the ruined stranger all of the words contained in the test-remark, including the disparaging fifteen [Sensation.] When the late publication was made I recalled them, and I resolved to claim the sack of coin, for by every right I was entitled to it. Now I will ask you to consider this point, and weigh it well: that stranger's gratitude to me that night knew no bounds, he said himself that he could find no words for it that were adequate, and that if he should ever be able he would repay me a thousand-fold. Now, then, I ask you this: Could I expect—could I believe—could I even remotely imagine—that, feeling as he did, he would do so ungrateful a thing as to add those quite unnecessary fifteen words to his test?—set a trap for me?—expose me as a slanderer of my own town before my own people assembled in a public hall? It was preposterous, it was impossible. His test would contain only the kindly opening clause of my remark. Of that I had no shadow of doubt. You would have thought as I did. You would not have expected a base betrayal from one whom you had befriended and against whom you had committed no offense. And so, with perfect confidence, perfect trust, I wrote on a piece of paper the opening words—ending with “Go, and reform,”—and signed it. When I was about to put it in an envelope I was called into my back office, and without thinking I left the paper lying open on my desk. He stopped, turned his head slowly toward Billson, waited a moment, then added “I ask you to note this when I returned, a little later, Mr. Billson was retiring by my street door.” [Sensation]

In a moment Billson was on his feet and shouting

The Chair “Be seated, sir! Mr. Wilson has the floor.”

Billson’s friends pulled him into his seat and quieted him, and Wilson went on “Those are the simple facts. My note was now lying in a different place on the table from where I had left it. I noticed that, but attached no importance to it, thinking a draught had blown it there. That Mr. Billson would read a private paper was a thing which could not occur to me, he was an honorable man, and he would be above that. If you will allow me to say it, I think his extra word “very” stands explained, it is attributable to a defect of memory. I was the only man in the world who could furnish here any detail of the test-remark—by honorable means. I have finished.”

There is nothing in the world like a persuasive speech to fuddle the mental apparatus and upset the convictions and debauch the emotions of an audience not practised in the tricks and delusions of oratory. Wilson sat down victorious. The house submerged him in tides of approving applause, friends swarmed to him and shook him by the hand and congratulated him, and Billson was shouted down and not allowed to say a word. The Chair hammered and hammered with its gavel, and kept shouting

“But let us proceed, gentlemen, let us proceed!”

At last there was a measurable degree of quiet, and the hatter said:

“But what is there to proceed with, sir, but to deliver the money?”

Voices “That’s it! That’s it! Come forward, Wilson!”

The Hatter “I move three cheers for Mr. Wilson, Symbol of the special virtue which—”

The cheers burst forth before he could finish; and in the midst of them—and in the midst of the clamor of the gavel also—some enthusiasts mounted Wilson on a big friend’s shoulder and were going to fetch him in triumph to the platform. The Chair’s voice now rose above the noise—

“Order! To your places! You forget that there is still a document to be read.” When quiet had been restored he took up the document, and was going to read it, but laid it down again, saying, “I forgot, this is not to be read until all written communications received by me have first been read.” He took an envelope out of his pocket, removed its inclosure, glanced at it—seemed astonished—held it out and gazed at it—stared at it.

Twenty or thirty voices cried out

“What is it? Read it! read it!”

And he did—slowly, and wondering

“The remark which I made to the stranger—[Voices “Hello! how’s this?”]—was thus “You are far from being a bad man [Voices “Great Scott!”] Go, and reform.” [Voice “Oh, saw my leg off!”] Signed by Mr. Pinkerton, the banker.”

The pandemonium of delight which turned itself loose now was of a sort to make the judicious weep. Those whose withers were unwrung laughed till the tears ran down, the reporters, in throes of laughter, set down disordered pot-hooks which would never in the world be decipherable, and a sleeping dog jumped up, scared out of its wits, and barked itself crazy at the turmoil. All manner of cries were scattered through the din. “We’re getting rich—two Symbols of Incorruptibility!—without counting Billson!” “Three!—count Shad-belly in—we can’t have too many!” “All right—Billson’s elected!” “Alas, poor Wilson—victim of two thieves!”

A Powerful Voice “Silence! The Chair’s fished up something more out of its pocket.”

Voices 'Hurrah! Is it something fresh?
Read it! read! read!'

The Chair [reading] "The remark which I made," etc. "You are far from being a bad man Go," etc Signed, "Gregory Yates "'

Tornado of Voices 'Four Symbols'
'Rah for Yates!' 'Fish again!'

The house was in a roaring humor now, and ready to get all the fun out of the occasion that might be in it Several Nineteeners, looking pale and distressed, got up and began to work their way toward the aisles, but a score of shouts went up

'The doors, the doors—close the doors, no Incorruptible shall leave this place! Sit down, everybody!'

The mandate was obeyed

'Fish again! Read! read!'

The Chair fished again, and once more the familiar words began to fall from its lips
—'You are far from being a bad man "'

'Name! name! What's his name?'

'L Ingoldsby Sargent "'

'Five elected! Pile up the Symbols! Go on, go on!'

'"You are far from being a bad—"'

'Name! name!'

'"Nicholas Whitworth "'

'Hooray! hooray! it's a symbolical day!'

Somebody wailed in, and began to sing this rhyme (leaving out 'it's') to the lovely 'Mikado' tune of 'When a man's afraid, a beautiful maid—', the audience joined in, with joy, then, just in time, somebody contributed another line—

'And don't you thus forget—'

The house roared it out A third line was at once furnished—

'Corruptibles far from Hadleyburg are—'

The house roared that one too As the last note died, Jack Halliday's voice rose high and clear, freighted with a final line—

'But the Symbols are here, you bet!'

That was sung, with booming enthusiasm Then the happy house started in at the beginning and sang the four lines through twice, with immense swing and dash, and finished up with a crashing three-times-three and a tiger for 'Hadleyburg the Incorruptible and all Symbols of it which we shall find worthy to receive the hall-mark to-night.'

Then the shoutings at the Chair began again, all over the place.

'Go on! go on! Read! read some more!
Read all you've got!'

'That's it—go on! We are winning eternal celebrity!'

A dozen men got up now and began to protest They said that this farce was the work of some abandoned joker, and was an insult to the whole community Without a doubt these signatures were all forgeries—

'Sit down! sit down! Shut up! You are confessing We'll find your names in the lot '

'Mr Chairman, how many of those envelopes have you got?'

The Chair counted

'Together with those that have been already examined, there are nineteen '

A storm of derisive applause broke out

'Perhaps they all contain the secret I move that you open them all and read every signature that is attached to a note of the sort—and read also the first eight words o' the note '

'Second the motion'

It was put and carried—uproariously Then poor old Richards got up, and his wife rose and stood at his side Her head was bent down, so that none might see that she was crying Her husband gave her his arm, and so supporting her, he began to speak in a quavering voice

'My friends, you have known us two—Mary and me—all our lives, and I think you have liked us and respected us—'

The Chair interrupted him

'Allow me It is quite true—that which you are saying, Mr Richards: this town does know you two, it does like you, it does respect you, more—it honors you and loves
you—'

Halliday's voice rang out

'That's the hall-marked truth, too! If the Chair is right, let the house speak up and say it Rise! Now, then—hip! hip! hip!—all together!'

The house rose in mass, faced toward the old couple eagerly, filled the air with a snow-storm of waving handkerchiefs, and delivered the cheers with all its affectionate heart

The Chair then continued

'What I was going to say is this. We know your good heart, Mr Richards, but this is not a time for the exercise of charity toward offenders. [Shouts of 'Right! right!'] I see your generous purpose in your face, but I cannot allow you to plead for these men—'

'But I was going to—'

'Please take your seat, Mr Richards We must examine the rest of these notes—simple fairness to the men who have already been exposed requires this As soon as that has been done—I give you my word for this—you shall be heard '

Many Voices 'Right!—the Chair is right—no interruption can be permitted at this stage! Go on!—the names! the names!—according to the terms of the motion!'

The old couple sat reluctantly down, and the husband whispered to the wife, 'It is pitifully hard to have to wait, the shame will be greater than ever when they find we were only going to plead for ourselves '

Straightway the jollity broke loose again with the reading of the names

'"You are far from being a bad man—"

Signature, "Robert J Titmarsh "

'"You are far from being a bad man—"

Signature, "Eliphalet Weeks "

'"You are far from being a bad man—"

Signature, "Oscar B Wilder " '

At this point the house lit upon the idea of taking the eight words out of the Chairman's hands He was not unthankful for that Thenceforward he held up each note in its turn, and waited The house droned out the eight words in a massed and measured and musical deep volume of sound (with a daringly close resemblance to a well-known church chant)—' "You are f-a-r from being a b-a-a-a-d man " ' Then the Chair said, 'Signature, "Archibald Wilcox " ' And so on, and so on, name after name, and everybody had an increasingly and gloriously good time except the wretched Nineteen Now and then, when a particularly shining name was called, the house made the Chair wait while it chanted the whole of the test-remark from the beginning to the closing words, 'And go to hell or Hadleyburg—try and make it the for-or-m-e-r' and in these special cases they added a grand and agonized and imposing 'A-a-a-a-men!'

The list dwindled, dwindled, dwindled, poor old Richards keeping tally of the count, wincing when a name resembling his own was pronounced, and waiting in miserable suspense for the time to come when it would be his humiliating privilege to rise with Mary and finish his plea, which he was intending to word thus ' . for until now we have never done any wrong thing, but have gone our humble way unreproached We are very poor, we are old, and have no chick nor child to help us, we were sorely tempted, and we fell It was my purpose when I got up before to make confession and beg that my name might not be read out in this public place, for it seemed to us that we could not bear it, but I was prevented It was just, it was our place to suffer with the rest It has been hard for us It is the first time we have ever heard our name fall from any one's lips—sullied Be merciful—for the sake of the better days, make our shame as light to bear as in your charity you can ' At this point in his reverie Mary nudged him, perceiving that his mind was absent The house was chanting, 'You are f-a-r,' etc

'Be ready,' Mary whispered 'Your name comes now, he has read eighteen '

The chant ended

'Next! next! next!' came volleying from all over the house

Burgess put his hand into his pocket The old couple, trembling, began to rise Burgess fumbled a moment, then said,

'I find I have read them all '

Faint with joy and surprise, the couple sank into their seats, and Mary whispered

'Oh, bless God, we are saved!—he has lost ours—I wouldn't give this for a hundred of those sacks!'

The house burst out with its 'Mikado' travesty, and sang it three times with ever-increasing enthusiasm, rising to its feet when it reached for the third time the closing line—and finishing up with cheers and a tiger for 'Hadleyburg purity and our eighteen immortal representatives of it '

'But the Symbols are here, you bet!'

Then Wingate, the saddler, got up and proposed cheers 'for the cleanest man in town, the one solitary important citizen in it who didn't try to steal that money—Edward Richards'

They were given with great and moving heartiness, then somebody proposed that Richards be elected sole guardian and Symbol of the now Sacred Hadleyburg Tradition, with power and right to stand up and look the whole sarcastic world in the face

Passed, by acclamation, then they sang the 'Mikado' again, and ended it with:

'And there's one Symbol left, you bet!'

There was a pause, then—

A Voice 'Now, then, who's to get the sack?'

The Tanner (with bitter sarcasm). 'That's easy The money has to be divided among the eighteen Incorruptibles They gave the suffering stranger twenty dollars apiece—and that remark—each in his turn—it took twenty-two minutes for the procession to move past. Staked the stranger—total contribution, $360 All they want is just the loan back—and interest—forty thousand dollars altogether'

Many Voices [derisively] 'That's it! Divvy! divvy! Be kind to the poor—don't keep them waiting!'

The Chair 'Order! I now offer the stranger's remaining document It says "If no claimant shall appear [grand chorus of groans] I desire that you open the sack and count out the money to the principal citizens of your town, they to take it in trust [cries of 'Oh! Oh! Oh!']", and use it in such ways as to them shall seem best for the propagation and preservation of your community's noble reputation for incorruptible honesty [more cries]—a reputation to which their names and their efforts will add a new and far-reaching luster" [Enthusiastic outburst of sarcastic applause] That seems to be all. No—here is a postscript

'P S—CITIZENS OF HADLEYBURG There is no test-remark—nobody made one. [Great sensation] There wasn't any pauper stranger, nor any twenty-dollar contribution, nor any accompanying benediction and compliment—these are all inventions. [General buzz and hum of astonishment and delight.] Allow me to tell my story—it will take but a word or two I passed through your town at a certain time, and received a deep offense which I had not earned Any other man would have been content to kill one or two of you and call it square, but to me that would have been a trivial revenge, and inadequate, for the dead do not suffer Besides, I could not kill you all—and, anyway, made as I am, even that would not have satisfied me. I wanted to damage every man in the place, and every woman—and not in their bodies or in their estate, but in their vanity—the place where feeble and foolish people are most vulnerable So I disguised myself and came back and studied you You were easy game You had an old and lofty reputation for honesty, and naturally you were proud of it—it was your treasure of treasures, the very apple of your eye As soon as I found out that you carefully and vigilantly kept yourselves and your children out of temptation, I knew how to proceed Why, you simple creatures, the weakest of all weak things is a virtue which has not been tested in the fire I laid a plan, and gathered a list of names My project was to corrupt Hadleyburg the Incorruptible My idea was to make liars and thieves of nearly half a hundred smirchless men and women who had never in their lives uttered a lie or stolen a penny I was afraid of Goodson He was neither born nor reared in Hadleyburg I was afraid that if I started to operate my scheme by getting my letter laid before you, you would say to yourselves, 'Goodson is the only man among us who would give away twenty dollars to a poor devil'—and then you might not bite at my bait But Heaven took Goodson, then I knew I was safe, and I set my trap and baited it It may be that I shall not catch all the men to whom I mailed the pretended test secret, but I shall catch the most of them, if I know Hadleyburg nature [Voices 'Right—he got every last one of them'] I believe they will even steal ostensible gamble-money, rather than miss, poor, tempted, and mistreated fellows I am hoping to eternally and everlastingly squelch your vanity and give Hadleyburg a new renown—one that will stick—and spread far If I have succeeded, open the sack and summon the Committee on Propagation and Preservation of the Hadleyburg Reputation''

A Cyclone of Voices 'Open it! Open it! The Eighteen to the front! Committee on Propagation of the Tradition! Forward—the Incorruptibles!'

The Chair ripped the sack wide, and gathered up a handful of bright, broad, yellow coins, shook them together, then examined them—

'Friends, they are only gilded disks of lead!'

There was a crashing outbreak of delight over this news, and when the noise had subsided, the tanner called out

'By right of apparent seniority in this business, Mr Wilson is Chairman of the Committee on Propagation of the Tradition I suggest that he step forward on behalf of his pals, and receive in trust the money'

A Hundred Voices. 'Wilson! Wilson! Wilson! Speech! Speech!'

Wilson [in a voice trembling with anger]

'You will allow me to say, and without apologies for my language, damn the money!'

A Voice 'Oh, and hum a Baptist!'

A Voice 'Seventeen Symbols left! Step up, gentlemen, and assume your trust!'

There was a pause—no response

The Saddler 'Mr Chairman, we've got one clean man left, anyway, out of the late aristocracy, and he needs money, and deserves it I move that you appoint Jack Halliday to get up there and auction off that sack of gilt twenty-dollar pieces, and give the result to the right man—the man whom Hadleyburg delights to honor—Edward Richards'

This was received with great enthusiasm, the dog taking a hand again, the saddler started the bids at a dollar, the Brixton folk and Barnum's representative fought hard for it, the people cheered every jump that the bids made, the excitement climbed moment by moment higher and higher, the bidders got on their mettle and grew steadily more and more daring, more and more determined, the jumps went from a dollar up to five, then to ten, then to twenty, then fifty, then to a hundred, then—

At the beginning of the auction Richards whispered in distress to his wife 'O Mary, can we allow it? It—it—you see, it is an honor-reward, a testimonial to purity of character, and—and—can we allow it? Hadn't I better get up and—O Mary, what ought we to do?—what do you think we—' [Halliday's voice] 'Fifteen I'm bid!—fifteen for the sack!—twenty!—ah, thanks!—thirty—thanks again! Thirty, thirty, thirty!—do I hear forty?—forty it is! Keep the ball rolling, gentlemen, keep it rolling!—fifty! thanks, noble Roman! going at fifty, fifty, fifty!—seventy!—ninety!—splendid!—a hundred!—pile it up, pile it up!—hundred and twenty—forty!—just in time!—hundred and fifty!—two hundred!—superb! Do I hear two h—thanks!—two hundred and fifty!—']

'It is another temptation, Edward—I'm all in a tremble—but, oh, we've escaped one temptation, and that ought to warn us to—'
['Six did I hear?—thanks!—six-fifty, six-f—SEVEN hundred!'] And yet, Edward, when you think—nobody susp—' ['Eight hundred dollars!—hurrah!—make it nine!—Mr Parsons, did I hear you say—thanks—nine!—this noble sack of virgin lead going at only nine hundred dollars, gilding and all—come! do I hear—a thousand!—gratefully yours!—did some one say eleven?—a sack which is going to be the most celebrated in the whole Um—'] O Edward' (beginning to sob), 'we are so poor!—but—but—do as you think best—do as you think best'

Edward fell—that is, he sat still, sat with a conscience which was not satisfied, but which was overpowered by circumstances

Meantime a stranger, who looked like an amateur detective gotten up as an impossible English earl, had been watching the evening's proceedings with manifest interest, and with a contented expression in his face, and he had been privately commenting to himself He was now soliloquizing somewhat like this 'None of the Eighteen are bidding, that is not satisfactory, I must change that—the dramatic unities require it, they must buy the sack they tried to steal, they must pay a heavy price, too—some of them are rich And another thing, when I make a mistake in Hadleyburg nature the man that puts that error upon me is entitled to a high honorarium, and some one must pay it This poor old Richards has brought my judgment to shame, he is an honest man—I don't understand it, but I acknowledge it Yes, he saw my deuces and with a straight flush, and by rights the pot is his And it shall be a jack-pot, too, if I can manage it He disappointed me, but let that pass'

He was watching the bidding At a thousand, the market broke, the prices tumbled swiftly. He waited—and still watched One competitor dropped out, then another, and another He put in a bid or two, now When the bids had sunk to ten dollars, he added a five, some one raised him a three, he waited a moment, then flung in a fifty-dollar jump, and the sack was his—at $1,282 The house broke out in cheers—then stopped, for he was on his feet, and had lifted his hand He began to speak

'I desire to say a word, and ask a favor I am a speculator in rarities, and I have dealings with persons interested in numismatics all over the world I can make a profit on this purchase, just as it stands, but there is a way, if I can get your approval, whereby I can make every one of these leaden twenty-dollar pieces worth its face in gold, and perhaps more Grant me that approval, and I will give part of my gains to your Mr Richards, whose invulnerable probity you have so justly and so cordially recognized tonight, his share shall be ten thousand dollars, and I will hand him the money tomorrow [Great applause from the house But the 'invulnerable probity' made the Richardses blush prettily, however, it went for modesty, and did no harm ] If you will pass my proposition by a good majority—I would like a two-thirds vote—I will regard that as the town's consent, and that is all I ask Rarities are always helped by any device which will rouse curiosity and compel remark Now if I may have your permission to stamp upon the faces of each of these ostensible coins the names of the eighteen gentlemen who—'

Nine-tenths of the audience were on their feet in a moment—dog and all—and the proposition was carried with a whirlwind of approving applause and laughter

They sat down, and all the Symbols except 'Dr' Clay Harkness got up, violently protesting against the proposed outrage, and threatening to—

'I beg you not to threaten me,' said the stranger, calmly 'I know my legal rights, and am not accustomed to being frightened at bluster' [Applause] He sat down 'Dr' Harkness saw an opportunity here He was one of the two very rich men of the place, and Pinkerton was the other Harkness was proprietor of a mint, that is to say, a popular patent medicine He was running for the legislature on one ticket, and Pinkerton on the other It was a close race and a hot one, and getting hotter every day. Both had strong appetites for money, each had bought a great tract of land, with a purpose, there was going to be a new railway, and each wanted to be in the legislature and help locate the route to his own advantage, a single vote might make the decision, and with it two or three fortunes. The stake was large, and Harkness was a daring speculator. He was sitting close to the stranger. He leaned over while one or another of the other Symbols was entertaining the house with protests and appeals, and asked, in a whisper

'What is your price for the sack?'

'Forty thousand dollars'

'I'll give you twenty.'

'No'

'Twenty-five'

'No'

'Say thirty'

'The price is forty thousand dollars, not a penny less'

'All right, I'll give it I will come to the hotel at ten in the morning I don't want it known will see you privately'

'Very good' Then the stranger got up and said to the house

'I find it late The speeches of these gentlemen are not without merit, not without interest, not without grace, yet if I may be excused I will take my leave I thank you for the great favor which you have shown me in granting my petition I ask the Chair to keep the sack for me until to-morrow, and to hand these three five-hundred-dollar notes to Mr Richards' They were passed up to the Chair 'At nine I will call for the sack, and at eleven will deliver the rest of the ten thousand to Mr Richards in person, at his home Good night'

Then he slipped out, and left the audience making a vast noise, which was composed of a mixture of cheers, the 'Mikado' song, dog-disapproval, and the chant, 'You are f-a-r from being a b-a-a-d man—a-a-a-men!'

IV

At home the Richardses had to endure congratulations and compliments until midnight Then they were left to themselves They looked a little sad, and they sat silent and thinking Finally Mary sighed and said,

'Do you think we are to blame, Edward—much to blame?' and her eyes wandered to the accusing triplet of big bank-notes lying on the table, where the congratulators had been gloating over them and reverently fingering them. Edward did not answer at once, then he brought out a sigh and said, hesitatingly

'We—we couldn't help it, Mary. It—well, it was ordered. All things are.'

Mary glanced up and looked at him steadily, but he didn't return the look. Presently she said

'I thought congratulations and praises always tasted good. But—it seems to me, now—Edward?'

'Well?'

'Are you going to stay in the bank?'

'N-no.'

'Resign?'

'In the morning—by note.'

'It does seem best.'

Richards bowed his head in his hands and muttered

'Before, I was not afraid to let oceans of people's money pour through my hands, but—Mary, I am so tired, so tired—'

'We will go to bed.'

At nine in the morning the stranger called for the sack and took it to the hotel in a cab. At ten Harkness had a talk with him privately. The stranger asked for and got five checks on a metropolitan bank—drawn to 'Bearer'—four for $1,500 each, and one for $34,000. He put one of the former in his pocketbook, and the remainder, representing $38,500, he put in an envelope, and with these he added a note, which he wrote after Harkness was gone. At eleven he called at the Richards house and knocked. Mrs. Richards peeped through the shutters, then went and received the envelope, and the stranger disappeared without a word. She came back flushed and a little unsteady on her legs, and gasped out

'I am sure I recognized him! Last night it seemed to me that maybe I had seen him somewhere before.'

'He is the man that brought the sack here?'

'I am almost sure of it.'

'Then he is the ostensible Stephenson, too, and sold every important citizen in this town with his bogus secret. Now if he has sent checks instead of money, we are sold, too, after we thought we had escaped. I was beginning to feel fairly comfortable once more, after my night's rest, but the look of that envelope makes me sick. It isn't fat enough, $8,500 in even the largest bank-notes makes more bulk than that.'

'Edward, why do you object to checks?'

'Checks signed by Stephenson! I am resigned to take the $8,500 if it could come in bank-notes—for it does seem that it was so ordered, Mary—but I have never had much courage, and I have not the pluck to try to market a check signed with that disastrous name. It would be a trap. That man tried to catch me, we escaped somehow or other, and now he is trying a new way. If it is checks—'

'Oh, Edward, it is too bad!' and she held up the checks and began to cry.

'Put them in the fire! quick! we mustn't be tempted. It is a trick to make the world laugh at us, along with the rest, and—Give them to me, since you can't do it!' He snatched them and tried to hold his grip till he could get to the stove, but he was human, he was a cashier, and he stopped a moment to make sure of the signature. Then he came near to fainting.

'Fan me, Mary, fan me! They are the same as gold!'

'Oh, how lovely, Edward! Why?'

'Signed by Harkness. What can the mystery of that be, Mary?'

'Edward, do you think—'

'Look here—look at this! Fifteen—fifteen—fifteen—thirty-four. Thirty-eight thousand five hundred! Mary, the sack isn't worth twelve dollars, and Harkness—apparently—has paid about par for it.'

'And does it all come to us, do you think—instead of the ten thousand?'

'Why, it looks like it. And the checks are made to "Bearer," too.'

'Is that good, Edward? What is it for?'

'A hunt to collect them at some distant bank, I reckon. Perhaps Harkness doesn't want the matter known. What is that—a note?'

'Yes. It was with the checks.'

It was in the 'Stephenson' handwriting, but there was no signature. It said:

'I am a disappointed man. Your honesty is beyond the reach of temptation. I had a different idea about it, but I wronged you in that, and I beg pardon, and do it sincerely. I honor you—and that is sincere too. This town is not worthy to kiss the hem of your garment. Dear sir, I made a square bet with myself that there were nineteen debauchable men in your self-righteous community I have lost Take the whole pot, you are entitled to it'

Richards drew a deep sigh, and said
'It seems written with fire—it burns so.
Mary—I am miserable again.'

'I, too Ah, dear, I wish—'

'To think, Mary—he believes in me'

'Oh, don't, Edward—I can't bear it'

'If those beautiful words were deserved, Mary—and God knows I believed I deserved them once—I think I could give the forty thousand dollars for them And I would put that paper away, as representing more than gold and jewels, and keep it always But now—We could not live in the shadow of its accusing presence, Mary'

He put it in the fire

A messenger arrived and delivered an envelope

Richards took from it a note and read it, it was from Burgess

'You saved me, in a difficult time I saved you last night It was at cost of a lie, but I made the sacrifice freely, and out of a grateful heart None in this village knows so well as I know how brave and good and noble you are At bottom you cannot respect me, knowing as you do of that matter of which I am accused, and by the general voice condemned, but I beg that you will at least believe that I am a grateful man, it will help me to bear my burden

BURGESS'

'Saved, once more And on such terms!' He put the note in the fire 'I—I wish I were dead, Mary, I wish I were out of it all'

'Oh, these are bitter, bitter days, Edward The stabs, through their very generosity, are so deep—and they come so fast'

Three days before the election each of two thousand voters suddenly found himself in possession of a prized memento—one of the renowned bogus double-eagles Around one of its faces was stamped these words 'THE REMARK I MADE TO THE POOR STRANGER WAS—' Around the other face was stamped these 'GO, AND REFORM [SIGNED] PINKERTON' Thus the entire remaining refuse of the renowned joke was emptied upon a single head, and with calamitous effect It revived the recent vast laugh and concentrated it upon Pinkerton, and Harkness's election was a walkover.

Within twenty-four hours after the Richardses had received their checks their consciences were quieting down, discouraged; the old couple were learning to reconcile themselves to the sin which they had committed But they were to learn, now, that a sin takes on new and real terrors when there seems a chance that it is going to be found out This gives it a fresh and most substantial and important aspect At church the morning sermon was of the usual pattern, it was the same old things said in the same old way, they had heard them a thousand times and found them innocuous, next to meaningless, and easy to sleep under, but now it was different the sermon seemed to bristle with accusations, it seemed aimed straight and specially at people who were concealing deadly sins After church they got away from the mob of congratulators as soon as they could, and hurried homeward, chilled to the bone at they did not know what—vague, shadowy, indefinite fears And by chance they caught a glimpse of Mr Burgess as he turned a corner He paid no attention to their nod of recognition! He hadn't seen it, but they did not know that What could his conduct mean? It might mean—it might mean—oh, a dozen dreadful things Was it possible that he knew that Richards could have cleared him of guilt in that bygone time, and had been silently waiting for a chance to even up accounts? At home, in their distress they got to imagining that their servant might have been in the next room listening when Richards revealed the secret to his wife that he knew of Burgess's innocence, next, Richards began to imagine that he had heard the swish of a gown in there at that time, next, he was sure he had heard it They would call Sarah in, on a pretext, and watch her face if she had been betraying them to Mr Burgess, it would show in her manner They asked her some questions—questions which were so random and incoherent and seemingly purposeless that the girl felt sure that the old people's minds had been affected by their sudden good fortune, the sharp and watchful gaze which they bent upon her frightened her, and that completed the business. She blushed, she became nervous and confused, and to the old people these were plain signs of guilt—guilt of some fearful sort or other—without doubt she was a spy and a traitor. When they were alone again they began to piece many unrelated things together and get horrible results out of the combination. When things had got about to the worst, Richards was delivered of a sudden gasp, and his wife asked

‘The note—Burgess’s note! Its language was sarcastic, I see it now.’ He quoted: “‘At bottom you cannot respect me, knowing, as you do, of that matter of which I am accused”—oh, it is perfectly plain, now, God help me! He knows that I know! You see the ingenuity of the phrasing. It was a trap—and like a fool, I walked into it. And Mary—?’

‘Oh, it is dreadful—I know what you are going to say—he didn’t return your transcript of the pretended test-remark.’

‘No—kept it to destroy us with Mary, he has exposed us to some already. I know it—I know it well. I saw it in a dozen faces after church. Ah, he wouldn’t answer our nod of recognition—he knew what he had been doing!’

In the night the doctor was called. The news went around in the morning that the old couple were rather seriously ill—prostrated by the exhausting excitement growing out of their great windfall, the congratulations, and the late hours, the doctor said. The town was sincerely distressed, for these old people were about all it had left to be proud of, now.

Two days later the news was worse. The old couple were delirious, and were doing strange things. By witness of the nurses, Richards had exhibited checks—for $8,500. No—for an amazing sum—$38,500! What could be the explanation of this gigantic piece of luck?

The following day the nurses had more news—and wonderful. They had concluded to hide the checks, lest harm come to them, but when they searched they were gone from under the patient’s pillow—vanished away. The patient said

‘Let the pillow alone, what do you want?’

‘We thought it best that the checks—’

‘You will never see them again—they are destroyed. They came from Satan. I saw the hell-brand on them, and I knew they were sent to betray me to sin.’ Then he fell to gabbling strange and dreadful things which were not clearly understandable, and which the doctor admonished them to keep to themselves.

Richards was right, the checks were never seen again.

A nurse must have talked in her sleep, for within two days the forbidden gabblings were the property of the town, and they were of a surprising sort. They seemed to indicate that Richards had been a claimant for the sack himself, and that Burgess had concealed that fact and then maliciously betrayed it.

Burgess was taxed with this and stoutly denied it. And he said it was not fair to attach weight to the chatter of a sick old man who was out of his mind. Still, suspicion was in the air, and there was much talk.

After a day or two it was reported that Mrs. Richards’s delirious deliveries were getting to be duplicates of her husband’s. Suspicion flamed up into conviction, now, and the town’s pride in the purity of its one undiscredited important citizen began to dim down and flicker toward extinction.

Six days passed, then came more news. The old couple were dying. Richards’s mind cleared in his latest hour, and he sent for Burgess. Burgess said

‘No!’ said Richards. ‘I want witnesses. I want you all to hear my confession, so that I may die a man, and not a dog. I was clean—artificially—like the rest, and like the rest

I felt when temptation came. I signed a lie, and claimed the miserable sack. Mr. Burgess remembered that I had done him a service, and in gratitude (and ignorance) he suppressed my claim and saved me. You know the thing that was charged against Burgess years ago. My testimony, and mine alone, could have cleared him, and I was a coward, and left him to suffer disgrace—’

‘No—no—Mr. Richards, you—’

‘My servant betrayed my secret to him—’

‘No one has betrayed anything to me—’

—‘and then he did a natural and justifiable thing, he repented of the saving kindness which he had done me, and he exposed me—as I deserved—’

'Never!—I make oath—'

'Out of my heart I forgive him.'

Burgess's impassioned protestations fell upon deaf ears, the dying man passed away without knowing that once more he had done poor Burgess a wrong. The old wife died that night.

The last of the sacred Nineteen had fallen a prey to the fiendish sack, the town was stripped of the last rag of its ancient glory. Its mourning was not showy, but it was deep.

By act of the Legislature—upon prayer and petition—Hadleyburg was allowed to change its name to (never mind what—I will not give it away), and leave one word out of the motto that for many generations had graced the town's official seal.

It is an honest town once more, and the man will have to rise early that catches it napping again.

LITTLE BESSIE WOULD ASSIST PROVIDENCE<sup>1</sup>

[It is dull, and I need wholesome excitements and distractions, so I will go lightly excursioning along the primrose path of theology.]

Little Bessie was nearly three years old. She was a good child, and not shallow, not frivolous, but meditative and thoughtful, and much given to thinking out the reasons of things and trying to make them harmonize with results. One day she said:

'Mama, why is there so much pain and sorrow and suffering? What is it all for?'

It was an easy question, and mama had no difficulty in answering it.

<sup>1</sup> Clemens 'often busied himself working out more extensively some of the ideas that came to him—moral ideas, he called them. One fancy which he followed in several forms (some of them not within the privilege of print) was that of an inquisitive little girl, Bessie, who pursues her mother with difficult questionings. He read these aloud as he finished them.' Paune, Mark Twain (N.Y., 1912), III, 1515. The above selection was first published, ibid., III, 1671-73.

'It is for our good, my child. In His wisdom and mercy the Lord sends us these afflictions to discipline us and make us better.'

'Is it He that sends them?'

'Yes.'

'Does He send all of them, mama?'

'Yes, dear, all of them. None of them comes by accident, He alone sends them, and always out of love for us, and to make us better.'

'Isn't it strange?'

'Strange? Why, no, I have never thought of it in that way. I have not heard any one call it strange before. It has always seemed natural and right to me, and wise and most kindly and merciful.'

'Who first thought of it like that, mama? Was it you?'

'Oh no, child, I was taught it.'

'Who taught you so, mama?'

'Why, really, I don't know—I can't remember. My mother, I suppose, or the preacher. But it's a thing that everybody knows.'

'Well, anyway, it does seem strange. Did He give Billy Norris the typhus?'

'Yes.'

'What for?'

'Why, to discipline him and make him good.'

'But he died, mama, and so it couldn't make him good.'

'Well, then, I suppose it was for some other reason. We know it was a good reason, whatever it was.'

'What do you think it was, mama?'

'Oh, you ask so many questions! I think it was to discipline his parents.'

'Well, then, it wasn't fair, mama. Why should his life be taken away for their sake, when he wasn't doing anything?'

'Oh, I don't know! I only know it was for a good and wise and merciful reason.'

'What reason, mama?'

'I think—I think—well, it was a judgment, it was to punish them for some sin they had committed.'

'But he was the one that was punished, mama. Was that right?'

'Certainly, certainly. He does nothing that isn't right and wise and merciful. You can't understand these things now, dear, but when you are grown up you will understand them, and then you will see that they are just and wise.'

After a pause

'Did He make the roof fall in on the stranger that was trying to save the crippled old woman from the fire, mama?'

'Yes, my child Wait! Don't ask me why, because I don't know I only know it was to discipline some one, or be a judgment upon somebody, or to show His power.'

'That drunken man that stuck a pitchfork into Mrs. Welch's baby when—'

'Never mind about it, you needn't go into particulars, it was to discipline the child—that much is certain, anyway'

'Mama, Mr. Burgess said in his sermon that billions of little creatures are sent into us to give us cholera, and typhoid, and lockjaw, and more than a thousand other sicknesses and—mama, does He send them?'

'Oh, certainly, child, certainly. Of course'

'What for?'

'Oh, to discipline us! Haven't I told you so, over and over again?'

'It's awful cruel, mama! And silly! and if I—'

'Hush, oh hush! Do you want to bring the lightning?'

'You know the lightning did come last week, mama, and struck the new church, and burnt it down Was it to discipline the church?'

(Wearily) 'Oh, I suppose so.'

'But it killed a hog that wasn't doing anything Was it to discipline the hog, mama?'

'Dear child, don't you want to run out and play a while? If you would like to—'

'Mama, only think! Mr. Hollister says there isn't a bird, or fish, or reptile, or any other animal that hasn't got an enemy that Providence has sent to bite it and chase it and pester it and kill it and suck its blood and discipline it and make it good and religious Is that true, mother—because if it is true why did Mr. Hollister laugh at it?'

'That Hollister is a scandalous person, and I don't want you to listen to anything he says'

'Why, mama, he is very interesting, and I think he tries to be good He says the wasps catch spiders and cram them down into their nests in the ground—alive, mama!—and there they live and suffer days and days and days, and the hungry little wasps chewing their legs and gnawing into their bellies all the time, to make them good and religious and praise God for His infinite mercies I think Mr. Hollister is just lovely, and ever so kind, for when I asked him if he would treat a spider like that he said he hoped to be damned if he would, and then he—Dear mama, have you fainted! I will run and bring help! Now this comes of staying in town this hot weather'

THE COTTON BOLL

WHILE I recline

At ease beneath

This immemorial pine,

Small sphere!

(By dusky fingers brought this morning here

And shown with boastful smiles),

I turn thy cloven sheath,

Through which the soft white fibres peer,

That, with their gossamer bands,

Unite, like love, the sea-divided lands, 10

And slowly, thread by thread,

Draw forth the folded strands,

Than which the trembling line,

By whose frail help yon startled spider fled

Down the tall spear-grass from his swinging bed,

Is scarce more fine,

And as the tangled skein

Unravels in my hands,

Berwixt me and the noonday light,

A veil seems lifted, and for miles and miles

The landscape broadens on my sight, 21

As, in the little boll, there lurked a spell

Like that which, in the ocean shell,

With mystic sound,

Breaks down the narrow walls that hem us

round,

And turns some city lane
 Into the restless main,
 With all his capes and isles!

Yonder bird,
 Which floats, as if at rest, 30
 In those blue tracts above the thunder, where

No vapors cloud the stainless air,
 And never sound is heard,
 Unless at such rare time
 When, from the City of the Blest, Rings down some golden chime,
 Sees not from his high place
 So vast a cirque of summer space
 As widens round me in one mighty field,
 Which, rimmed by seas and sands, 40
 Doth hail its earliest daylight in the beams
 Of gray Atlantic dawns, And, broad as realms made up of many lands,

Is lost afar
 Behind the crimson hills and purple lawns Of sunset, among plains which roll their streams

Against the Evening Star!
 And lo!

To the remotest point of sight,
 Although I gaze upon no waste of snow, 50
 The endless field is white,
 And the whole landscape glows,
 For many a shining league away,
 With such accumulated light As Polar lands would flash beneath a tropic
                   day!

Nor lack there (for the vision grows,
 And the small charm within my hands—
 More potent even than the fabled one,
 Which oped whatever golden mystery
 Lay hid in fairy wood or magic vale, 60
 The curious ointment of the Arabian tale—Beyond all mortal sense
 Doth stretch my sight's horizon, and I see, Beneath its simple influence,
 As if, with Uriel's crown,
 I stood in some great temple of the Sun,
 And looked, as Uriel, down!)
 Nor lack there pastures rich and fields all green

With all the common gifts of God,
 For temperate aers and torrid sheen 70
 Weave Edens of the sod, Through lands which look one sea of billowy gold
 Broad rivers wind their devious ways,

A hundred isles in their embraces fold
 A hundred luminous bays,
 And through yon purple haze Vast mountains lift their plumed peaks cloud-crowned,
 And, save where up their sides the plowman
                   creeps,
 An unhewn forest girds them grandly
                   round,

In whose dark shades a future navy sleeps!
 Ye Stars, which, though unseen, yet with me gaze 81

Upon this loveliest fragment of the earth!
 Thou Sun, that kindlest all thy gentlest rays Above it, as to light a favorite hearth!
 Ye Clouds, that in your temples in the West See nothing brighter than its humblest flowers!

And you, ye Winds, that on the ocean's breast
 Are kissed to coolness ere ye reach its bowers!

Bear witness with me in my song of praise,
 And tell the world that, since the world began, 90

No fairer land hath fired a poet's lays,
 Or given a home to man!

But these are charms already widely blown!
 His be the meed whose pencil's trace Hath touched our very swamps with grace,
 And round whose tuneful way
 All Southern laurels bloom, The Poet of 'The Woodlands,' unto whom Alike are known
 The flute's low breathing and the trumpets' 100 tone,

And the soft west wind's sighs,
 But who shall utter all the debt,
 O Land wherein all powers are met
 That bind a people's heart,
 The world doth owe thee at this day,
 And which it never can repay,
 Yet scarcely deigns to own!
 Where sleeps the poet who shall fitly sing
 The source wherefrom doth spring
 That mighty commerce which, confined 110
 To the mean channels of no selfish mart,
 Goes out to every shore
 Of this broad earth, and throngs the sea with ships

That bear no thunders, hushes hungry lips
 In alien lands,
 Joins with a delicate web remotest strands;
 And gladdening rich and poor,

Doth gild Parisian domes,
 Or feed the cottage-smoke of English homes,
 And only bounds its blessings by mankind!
 In offices like these, thy mission lies, 121
 My Country! and it shall not end
 As long as rain shall fall and heaven bend
 In blue above thee, though thy foes be hard
 And cruel as their weapons, it shall guard Thy hearth-stones as a bulwark, make thee great

In white and bloodless state,
 And haply, as the years increase—
 Still working through its humbler reach With that large wisdom which the ages teach— 130
 Revive the half-dead dream of universal peace!

As men who labor in that mine
 Of Cornwall, hollowed out beneath the bed
 Of ocean, when a storm rolls overhead, Hear the dull booming of the world of brine

Above them, and a mighty muffled roar
 Of winds and waters, yet toil calmly on,
 And split the rock, and pile the massive ore,
 Or carve a niche, or shape the archèd roof,
 So I, as calmly, weave my woof 140
 Of song, chanting the days to come,
 Unsilenced, though the quiet summer air Stirs with the bruit of battles, and each dawn

Wakes from its starry silence to the hum
 Of many gathering armies Still,
 In that we sometimes hear,
 Upon the Northern winds, the voice of woe Not wholly drowned in triumph, though I
     know

The end must crown us, and a few brief
     years
 Dry all our tears, 150
 I may not sing too gladly To Thy will Resigned, O Lord! we cannot all forget That there is much even Victory must regret

And, therefore, not too long From the great burthen of our country's wrong

Delay our just release!
 And, if it may be, save
 These sacred fields of peace
 From stain of patriot or of hostile blood!
 Oh, help us, Lord! to roll the crimson flood Back on its course, and, while our banners wing 161

Northward, strike with us! till the Goth shall cling
 To his own blasted altar-stones, and crave Mercy, and we shall grant it, and dictate
 The lenient future of his fate There, where some rotting ships and crumbling quays
 Shall one day mark the Port which ruled the Western seas

CHARLESTON

CALM as that second summer which precedes
 The first fall of the snow,
 In the broad sunlight of heroic deeds,
 The city bides the foe

As yet, behind their ramparts stern and proud,
 Her bolted thunders sleep—
 Dark Sumter, like a battlemented cloud, Looms o'er the solemn deep

No Calpe frowns from lofty cliff or scar
 To guard the holy strand, 10
 But Moultrie holds in leash her dogs of war
 Above the level sand

And down the dunes a thousand guns lie couched,
 Unseen, beside the flood—
 Like tigers in some Orient jungle crouched,
 That wait and watch for blood

Meanwhile, through streets still echoing with trade,
 Walk grave and thoughtful men, Whose hands may one day wield the patriot's blade
 As lightly as the pen 20

And maidens, with such eyes as would grow dim
 Over a bleeding hound, Seem each one to have caught the strength of him
 Whose sword she sadly bound

Thus girt without and garrisoned at home,
 Day patient following day, Old Charleston looks from roof and spire and dome,
 Across her tranquil bay

Ships, through a hundred foes, from Saxon lands
And spicy Indian ports, 30
Bring Saxon steel and iron to her hands,
And Summer to her courts

But still, along yon dim Atlantic line,
The only hostile smoke Creeps like a harmless mist above the brine,
From some frail floating oak

Shall the Spring dawn, and she, still clad in smiles,
And with an unscathed brow, Rest in the strong arms of her palm-crowned isles,
As fair and free as now? 40

We know not, in the temple of the Fates God has inscribed her doom,
And, all untroubled in her faith, she waits
The triumph of the tomb

ASPECTS OF THE PINES

TALL, sombre, grim, against the morning
sky
They rise, scarce touched by melancholy airs,
Which stir the fadeless foliage dreamfully,
As if from realms of mystical despairs

Tall, sombre, grim, they stand with dusky gleams Brightening to gold within the wood-land's core,
Beneath the gracious noontide's tranquil beams—
But the weird winds of morning sigh no
more

A stillness, strange, divine, ineffable, Broods round and o'er them in the wind's surcease, 10
And on each tinted copse and shimmering dell Rests the mute rapture of deep-hearted
peace

Last, sunset comes—the solemn joy and might Borne from the West when cloudless day declines—
Low, flutelike breezes sweep the waves of
light,
And lifting dark green tresses of the pines,

Till every lock is luminous—gently float, Fraught with hale odors up the heavens afar

To faint when twilight on her virginal throat
Wears for a gem the tremulous vesper star 20

THE MOCKING-BIRD

(AT NIGHT)

A GOLDEN pallor of voluptuous light Filled the warm southern night
The moon, clear orb'd, above the sylvan scene
Moved like a stately queen,
So rife with conscious beauty all the while,
What could she do but smile
At her own perfect loveliness below, Glass'd in the tranquil flow
Of crystal fountains and unruffled streams? 10
Half lost in waking dreams,
As down the loneliest forest dell I strayed,
Lo! from a neighboring glade, Flashed through the drifts of moonshine, swiftly came
A fairy shape of flame
It rose in dazzling spirals overhead,
Whence to wild sweetness wed, Poured marvellous melodies, silvery trill on trill,
The very leaves grew still On the charmed trees to hearken, while for
me,
Heart-trilled to ecstasy, 20
I followed—followed the bright shape that flew,
Still circling up the blue, Till as a fountain that has reached its height,

Falls back in sprays of light
 Slowly dissolved, so that enrapturing lay, Divinely melts away Through tremulous spaces to a music-must,

Soon by the fitful breeze
 How gently kissed
 Into remote and tender silences.

FROM 'TIGER LILIES

THE STORY OF CAIN AND GORM SMALLIN<sup>1</sup>

'Russet yeas and honest kersey noes'

LOVE'S LABOR'S LOST

CAIN SMALLIN was the most indefatigable of scouts. He was always moving, the whole country side knew him. His good-natured face and communicated habits procured for him a cordial welcome at every house in that quiet country, where as yet only the distant roar of the war had been heard, where all was still and sunny and lonesome, where the house-hold talk was that of old men and women, of girls and children, whose sons and brothers were all away in the midst of that dimly-heard roaring. In this serene land a soldier's face that had been in front of cannon and bullets was a thing to be looked at twice, and a soldier's talk was the rare treasure of a fireside. The gunboats in the river, upon which these neighbors looked whenever they walked the river bank, had ceased to be objects of alarm, or even of curiosity. They lay there quietly and lazily, day after day, making no hostile sign, and had lain so since Norfolk fell. And as for the evening-gun at Fortress Monroe—that had boomed every sunset for many a year before the war

On his way to the Point which terminates between Burwell's Bay and Smithfield Creek, and which afforded store of succulent grass and clover for the horses, Cain Smallin passed the house of a neighbor who had particularly distinguished himself in kindness to our little party of scouts. The old gentleman was seated in the open doorway, in midst of a pile of newspapers

'Good mornin'! Mr. Smallin. Couldn't stand it any longer, you see, so I sent Dick away up to Ivor yesterday to try and get some papers. Here's another stinger in the Examiner. Sit down here, I want you to read it.'

'Thank'ee, sir, don't care if I do rest a leetle, tolluble warm walkin' this mornin',' replied the mountaineer, and fell to reading—a slow operation for him whose eye was far more accustomed to sighting a rifle than deciphering letters

'Massy me!' said he, after some silence, 'our men's desertun' mighty fast, up yan, f'om the army. Here's nigh to a whole column full of "Thirty Dollars Rewards" for each deserter. Let's see if I know any of 'em.'

Cain's lip moved busily, in what might well have been called a spell of silence. Suddenly he dropped the paper and looked piteously upward

'May be I spelt it wrong, le'm me look again,' muttered he, and snatched the paper up to gaze again upon their dreadful Thirty Dollar column

It was there

THIRTY-DOLLARS REWARD.

'Deserted from the — Regiment, — Volunteers, GORM SMALLIN, who enlisted,' &c, &c

Cain Smallin dropped his newspaper and strode hastily out of the door, unheeding the surprise of his host

He walked rapidly, and aimlessly. The cruel torture would not permit him to rest, his grief drove him about, it lashed him with sharp thongs. Across fields and marshes, through creeks and woods, with bent head, with hands idly hanging, with unsteady step, he circled. A tear emerged from his eye. It stopped in a furrow, and glistered. Occasionally he muttered to himself,—

'We was poor. We aint never had much to live on but our name, which it was good as gold An' now it aint no better'n rusty copper, hut'll be green an' pisenous An' who's done it? Gorm Smallin! Nobody but Gorm Smallin! My own brother, Gorm Smallin! Gorm,—Gorm ' He repeated this name a hundred times, as if his mind wandered and he wished to fix it

The hours passed on and still the mountaineer walked His simple mountain-life had known few griefs This was worse than any sorrow It was disgrace He knew no sophistries to retire into, in the ostrich-fashion wherewith men avoid dishonor He had lost all Not only he, but all whom he loved, would suffer

'What will the Sterlin's say? Old John Sterlin', him that stuck by us when corn was so scarce in the Cove? an' Philip! him that I've hunted with an' fished with an' camped with, by ourselves, in yan mountains? And Miss Felix! Miss Felix!'

The man dwelt on this name His mind became a blank, except two luminous spots which were rather feelings than thoughts These were, a sensation of disgrace and a sensation of loveliness the one embodied in the name Gorm, the other in the name Felix He recoiled from one, he felt as if religion demanded that he should also recoil from the other He suffered more than if he had committed the crime himself For he was innocence, and that is highly tender and sensitive, being unseared

At length the gathering twilight attracted his attention He looked around, to discover his locality Leaping a fence he found himself in the main road, and a short walk brought him to a low house that stood in a field on the right He opened the gate, and knocked at the door 'Here's whar he said he'd stay,' he muttered Gorm himself came to the door

'Put on your hat, Gorm!'

The stern tone of his voice excited his brother's surprise

'What fur, Cain?'

'I want you to walk with me, a little piece Hurry!'

Gorm took down his hat and came out

'Whar to, brother Cain?'

'Follow me,' replied Cain, with a motion of displeasure at the wheedling tone of his brother

Leaving the road, he struck into a path leading to the Point from which he had wandered As he walked his pace increased, until it required the most strenuous exertions on the part of his companion to keep up with his long and rapid strides

'Whar the devil air you gwine to, Cain? Don't walk so fast, anyhow, I'm a'most out o' breath a'ready!'

The mountaineer made no reply, but slackened his pace He only muttered to himself 'Hits eight mile across, ye'll need your strength to git thar, may be '

The path wound now amongst gloomy pines, for some distance, until suddenly they emerged upon the open beach They were upon the extreme end of the lonely Point The night was dark, but the sand-beach glimmered ghastly white through the darkness Save the mournful hooting of an owl from his obscure cell in the woods, the place was silent Hundreds of huge tree-stumps, with their roots upturned in the air, lay in all fantastic positions upon the white sand, as the tide had deposited them. These straggling clumps had been polished white by salt air and waves They seemed like an agitated convention of skeletons, discussing the propriety of flesh A small boat rested on the beach, with one end secured by a 'painter' to a stake driven in the sand

'Little did I think, when I found it in the marsh this mornin' an' brought it thar, thinkin' to git it round to camp to-night, what use I was gwine put it to,' said Cain Smallin to himself

As he led the way to the boat, suddenly he stopped and turned face to face with his recreant brother His eyes glared into Gorm's His right hand was raised, and a pistol-barrel protruded from the long fingers

'Gorm Smallin,' he said, with grating voice, 'have ye ever know'd me to say I'd do anything an' then not to do it?'

'I—I—no, I haven't, Cain,' stuttered the deserter, cowering with terror and surprise.

'Remember them words Now answer my questions, and don't say nothin' outside o' them Gorm Smallin, whar was you born?'

'What makes you ax me sich foolish questions, Cain? I was born in Tennessey, an' you know it!'

'Answer my questions, Gorm Smallin! Who raised you, f'om a little un?'

'Mother an' father, o' course'

'Who's your mother and father? what's ther name?'

'Cain, air you crazy? ther name's Smal-lin'

'Gorm Smallin, did you ever know any o' the Smallins to cheat a man in a trade?'

'No, Cain, we've always been honest'

'Did ye ever know a Smallin to swar to a lie afore the Jestus?'

'No'

'Did ye ever know one to steal another man's horse, or his rifle, or anything?'

'No'

'Did ye ever know one to sneak out f'om a rightful fight?'

'No'

'Did ye ever know one to'—the words came like lightning with a zigzag jerk—'to desert f'om his rigiment?'

The flash struck Gorm Smallin. He vis-ibly sank into himself like a jointed cane. He trembled, and gazed apprehensively at the pistol in his brother's right hand which still towered threateningly aloft. He made no reply.

'Ye don't like to say yes this time!' con-tinued Cain. 'Gorm Smallin, altho' I say it which I'm your brother,—ye lied every time ye said no, afore. You has cheated in a dirty trade, you has swore to a lie afore God that's better than the Jestus, you has stole what's better'n any rifle or horse, you has sneaked out f'om the rightfulest fight ye ever was in, you has deserted f'om your rigiment, an' that when yer own brother an' every friend ye had in the world was fightun' along with ye.

'Gorm Smallin, you has cheated me, an' ole father an' mother an' all, out of our name which it was all we had, you has swore to a lie, for you swore to me 'at the colonel sent you down here to go a-scoutin' amongst the Yankees, you has stole our honest name, which it is more than ye can ever make to give to your wife's baby, you has sneaked out f'om a fight that we was fightun' to keep what was our'n an' to per-fect them that has been kind to us an' them that raised us, you has deserted f'om your rigiment which it has fought now gwine on four years an' fought manful, too, an' never run a inch.

'Gorm Smallin, you has got your name in the paper 'ith thirty dollars reward over it, in big letters, big letters, so 'at father's ole eyes can read it 'ithout callin' sister Ginny to make it out for him. Thar it is, for every man, woman, and child in the whole Confed-eracy to read it, an' by this time they has read it, may be, an' every man in the rigiment has cussed you for a sneak an' a scoundrel, an' wonderin' whether Cain Smallin will do like his brother!

10 'Gorm Smallin, you has brung me to that, that I haunt no sperrit to fight hearty an' cheerful. Ef ye had been killed in a fa'r battle, I mought ha' been able to fight hard enough for both of us, for every time I cried a-thunkin' of you, I'd ha' been twice as strong an' twice as clear-sighted as I was buffere. But—sich things as these'—the mountaineer wiped off a tear with his coat-sleeve—'burns me an' weakens me an' hurts 20 my eyes that bad that I kin scarcely look a man straight forrard in the face. Hit don't make much diff'ence to me now, whether we whips the Yanks or they whups us. What good'll it do ef we conquer 'em? Every-body'll be a-shoutin' an' a-hurrahin' an' they'll leave us out o' the frolic, for we is kin to a deserter! An' the women'll be a-smilin' on them that has lived to git home, one minute, an' the next they'll be a-weepin' for them that's left dead in Virginy an' Pennsylvany an' Tennessy,—but you won't git home, an' you won't be left dead no-wher, they can't neither smle at you nor cry for you, what'll they do ef anybody speaks yer name? Gorm Smallin, they'll lift their heads high an' we'll hang our'n low. They'll scorn ye an' we'll blush for ye.

'Hadn't ye better be dead? Hadn't I bet-ter kill ye right here an' bury ye whar ye 40 can't do no more harm to the fambly name?

'But I can't shoot ye, hardly. The same uns raised us an' fed us. I can't do it, an' I'm sorry I can't!'

'You air 'most on yer knees, anyhow, git down on 'em all the way. Listen to me. God A'mighty's a-lookin' at you out o' the stars yan, an' he's a-listenin' at you out o' the sand here, an' he won't git tired by mornin' but he'll keep a-listenin' an' a-lookin' at ye to-morrow all day. Now mind ye. I'm gwine 50 to put ye in this boat here, an' you can pad-dle across to yan side the river, easy. Ef ye'll keep yer eye on yan bright star that's jest a-risin' over Bullitt Pint, ye'll strike t'other shore about the right place. Ef ye paddle out o' the way, the guard on yan gunboat'll be apt to fire into ye, keep yer eye on the star Ye'll git to the beach on t'other side, an' lay down under a tree an' sleep till mornun'—ef ye can sleep. In the mornun' ye'll walk down the road, an' the Yankee pickets'll see yer gray coat an' take ye to Head-quarters The officer at Head-quar-ters'll examine ye, an' when you tell him you air a deserter he'll make ye take the oath, an' ef he know'd how many oaths ye've already broke I think he would'n' take the trouble! Howsumdever, I'm gwine to do the same foolishness, for it's all I kun do Now when ye take the oath the officer'll likely make ye sign yer name to it, or write yer name somewhar Gorm Smallin, when ye write that name ye shall not write your own name, ye must write some other name Swar to it, now, while ye air kneelin' bu-fore God A'mighty! Raise up yer hands, both of 'em, swar to it, that ye'll write some other name in the Yankee deserter-book, or I'll shoot ye, thar, right down!

Cain had placed the muzzle of his pistol against his brother's forehead

The oath was taken

'Don't git up yet, kneel thar. Hit would'n' be right to put any other man's name in the deserter-book in place o' yourn, for ye mought be robbin' some other decent fambly of ther good name Le'ss see We must git some name that nobody ever was named afore Take a stick thar an' write it in the sand, so you won't forgit it The fust name don't make no diff'ence Write Sam'l'

It was written in great scrawling letters

'Now write J, an' call out as you write, so you won't forgit it For I'm gwine to captur' that deserter-book on' see ef your name's in it Write J, an' call out'

'J'

'le,-bull'

'Sam'l Joxo—Joxy—I can't call it, but you can write it—hit'll do Git it by heart'

Cain paused a moment

'Now git up Git in the boat Gorm Smallin, don't never come back home, don't never come whar I may be! I can't shake hands with ye, but I'll shove ye off.'

Cain loosened the head of the boat from the sand, turned her round, and gave a mighty push, running with her till he was waist deep in the water He came out dripping, folded his arms, and stood stull, watchung the dusky form in the receding boat.

Gorm Smallin was a half-mile from shore Suddenly he heard his brother's voice, across the water

'Gorm'

'Hello'

'Joxo—Joxobabbul' cried Cain Smallin at the top of his voice bending down to read the inscription on the sand

FROM THE SCIENCE OF ENGLISH VERSE

VERSE A PHENOMENON OF SOUND<sup>1</sup>

PERHAPS no one will find difficulty in accepting the assertion that when formal poetry, or verse,—two terms which will be always used here as convertible,—is repeated aloud, it impresses itself upon the ear as verse only by means of certain relations existing among its component words considered purely as sounds, without reference to their associated ideas If the least doubt upon this point should be entertained, it may be dispelled by observing that all ideas may be abolished out of a poem without disturbing its effect upon the ear as verse.
This may be practically demonstrated by the simple experiment of substituting for the words of a formal poem any other words which preserve the accentuation, alliteration, and rhyme, but which convey no ideas to the mind,—words of some foreign language not understood by the experimenter being the most effective for this purpose Upon repeating aloud the poem thus treated it will be found that the verse-structure has not been impaired If, therefore, the ear accepts as perfect verse a series

(N Y., 1909), 21-24, 39-40, 46-48, 57-58

of words from which ideas are wholly absent,—that is to say, a series of sounds,—it is clear that what we call ‘verse’ is a set of specially related sounds, at least in the case of a formal poem repeated aloud

But a much more sweeping proposition is true. If we advance from the case of formal poetry repeated aloud to that of formal poetry silently perused by the eye of a reader, a slight examination will show the proposition good that here, as before, verse is still a set of specially related sounds. For, in this instance, the characters of print or writing in which the words are embodied are simply signs of sounds, and although originally received by the eye, they are handed over to the ear, are interpreted by the auditory sense, and take their final lodgement, not at all as conceptions of sight, but as conceptions of hearing. The function of the eye is now purely ministerial: it merely purveys for the ear. An analogous process is indicated in the Arabian saw which affirms that ‘that is the best description which makes the ear and eye.’ In general, the reader will do well to recall that each sense has not only what is ordinarily called its physical province, but also its corresponding imaginative province, the eye has its imagination, the ear its imagination, and when the term ‘imagination of the ear’ is hereinafter used it must be understood to suggest those perceptions of sound which come to exist in the mind, not by virtue of actual vibratory impact upon the tympanum immediately preceding the perception, but by virtue of indirect causes (such as the characters of print and of writing) which in any way amount to practical equivalents of such impact. Now these signs convey, along with their corresponding sounds, the same relations between those sounds which are suggested to the ear when the sounds themselves fall upon the tympanum. It is therefore strictly true that, although the great majority of formal poems in modern times are perceived by the mind through the original agency of the eye, the relations indicated by the term ‘verse’ are still relations between sounds.

Nor—to call the briefest attention to the only other case in which this fundamental proposition could seem at all doubtful—is this connection of verse with sound less essential when the formal poem is merely conceived in the thought of its author without ever reaching either visible or audible embodiment. For the formal poem is necessarily conceived in words, and in the imagination of the sounds (words) is necessarily involved the imagination of the relations between the sounds, that is, of verse.

In short, when we hear verse, we hear a set of relations between sounds, when we silently read verse, we see that which brings to us a set of relations between sounds, when we imagine verse, we imagine a set of relations between sounds.

Approached in this way, the proposition given below will probably not seem difficult of acceptance, indeed it is possible many will be surprised that the ideas leading to it have been dwelt upon so long. In point of fact, however, it is the very failure to recognize verse as in all respects a phenomenon of sound and to appreciate the necessary consequences thereof which has caused the non-existence of a science of formal poetry. Occasion will presently arise to show how this has happened, with some detail, meantime, we are now prepared to formulate a proposition which will serve as the basis of a science of verse.

The term ‘verse’ denotes a set of specially related sounds.

Since an art of sound must depend primarily upon exact co-ordinations by the ear, and since these exact co-ordinations are, as just shown, possible only in respect of duration, pitch, and tone-color, it is evident that these three sound-relations constitute three distinct principles to one or the other of which all the primary phenomena of this art must be referred. They thus afford us three fundamental principles of classification for the effects of sound in art. The effects ordinarily known as ‘rhythm’ depend primarily upon duration, those known as ‘tune’ depend upon pitch, those known as ‘colors’ in music, and as ‘rhymes’ and ‘alliterations’ in verse,—besides many allied effects of verse which have never been named,—depend upon tone-color. Stated in other terms—

I

When the ear exactly co-ordinates a series of sounds and silences with primary reference to their duration, the result is a conception of . . .

RHYTHM

When the ear exactly co-ordinates a series of sounds with primary reference to their pitch, the result is a conception of TUNE

When the ear exactly co-ordinates a series of sounds with primary reference to their tone-color, the result is a conception of (in music, flute-tone as distinct from violin-tone, and the like, in verse, rhyme as opposed to rhyme, vowel varied with vowel, phonetic syzygy, and the like), in general . . . TONE-COLOR

. . . We have now reached a point where we can profitably inquire as to the precise differentiation between the two species of the art of sound—music and verse. We have found that the art of sound, in general, embraces phenomena of rhythm, of tune, and of tone-color. Many will be disposed to think that the second class of these phenomena just named—tune—is not found in verse, and that the absence of it should be one of the first differences to be noted as between music and verse. Tune is, however, quite as essential a constituent of verse as of music, and the disposition to believe otherwise is due only to the complete unconsciousness with which we come to use these tunes after the myriad repetitions of them which occur in all our daily intercourse by words. We will presently find, from numerous proofs and illustrations which are submitted in Part II., on the Tunes of Verse, that our modern speech is made up quite as much of tunes as of words, and that our ability to convey our thoughts depends upon the existence of a great number of curious melodies of speech which have somehow acquired form and significance. These ‘tunes’ are not mere vague variations of pitch in successive words,—which would deserve the name of tune only in the most general sense of that term,—but they are perfectly definite and organized melodies of the speaking-voice, composed of exact variations of pitch so well marked as to be instantly recognized by every ear. If they were not thus recognized a large portion of the ideas which we now convey with ease would be wholly inexpressible. Reserving, then, all details upon this matter until their appropriate place under the head of the Tunes of Verse, in Part II. above cited, it will be sufficient here if the reader is asked to realize them in a practical way by first attempting to utter any significant sentences of prose or verse in an absolutely unchanging voice from beginning to end. This will be found quite difficult, and when successfully executed produces an impression of strangeness which all the more clearly illustrates how habitually and how unconsciously the tunes of speech are used. If, having uttered the sentences in a rigidly unvarying tone, the reader will then utter them in the tunes which we feel—by some inward perceptions too subtle for treatment here—to be appropriate to them, it will be easily seen that definite successions of tones are being used,—so definite that they are kept in mind for their appropriate occasions just as words are, and so regular in their organizations as to be in all respects worthy the name of ‘tunes,’ instead of the vague terms ‘intonation,’ or ‘inflection,’ which have so long concealed the real function of these wonderful melodies of the speaking-voice.

The art of verse, then, as well as the art of music,—the two species of the genus art of sound,—includes all the three great classes of phenomena summed up under the terms rhythm, tune, and tone-color. We will presently find many problems solved by the full recognition of this fact that there is absolutely no difference between the sound-relations used in music and those used in verse.

If this be true,—if the sound-relations of music and verse are the same,—we are necessarily forced to look for the difference between the two arts in the nature of the sounds themselves with which they deal. Here, indeed, the difference lies. Expressed, as far as possible, in popular terms, it is as follows—

When those exact co-ordinations which the ear perceives as rhythm, tune, and tone-color, are suggested to the ear by a series of ‘musical sounds,’ the result is . . . MUSIC.

When those exact co-ordinations which the ear perceives as rhythm, tune, and tone-color, are suggested to the ear by a series of ‘spoken words,’ the result is . . . VERSE

. . . The foregoing proposition aims only to state the distinctions between music and verse it will not be found complete for other purposes. For example, it would not serve to discriminate verse and prose. Prose has its rhythms, its tunes, and its tone-colors, like verse, and, while the extreme forms of prose and verse are sufficiently unlike each other, there are such near grades of intermediate forms that they may be said to run into each other, and any line claiming to be distinctive must necessarily be more or less arbitrary. The art of sound must always be regarded the genus, and music and verse its two species. Prose, scientifically considered, is a wild variety of verse.

The science of verse, then, observes and classifies all the phenomena of rhythm, of tune, and of tone-color, so far as they can be exhibited to the ear directly by spoken words,—or to the ear, through the eye, by written or printed signs of spoken words,—or to the mind by the conception of spoken words, and,

The science of English verse observes and classifies these phenomena so far as they can be indicated through the medium of spoken English words . . .

THE SYMPHONY<sup>1</sup>

'O TRADE! O Trade! would thou wert dead!
The Time needs heart—'tis tired of head
We're all for love,' the violins said

<sup>1</sup> Lanier wrote, 12 Feb. 1876, to a friend: "I met with a line in one of Shakespeare's sonnets some time ago which seems to me so completely a nutshell judgment on my side as regards the possibilities of interpreting—within limits—one sense by another through the forms of art that I cannot help sending it to you. It is "To hear with eyes belongs to Love's fine wit." In my "Symphony" Love's fine wit—the love of one's fellow-men—attempts (not to hear with eyes, but precisely the reverse) to see with ears." Starke, Sidney Lanier (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1933), 205-06.

<sup>2</sup> To Simms, 17 April 1872, Lanier wrote: "Trade, Trade, Trade! pah, are we not all sick? A man cannot walk down a green alley of woods, in these days, without unawares getting his mouth and nose and eyes covered with some web or other that Trade has stretched across, to catch some gain or other. You know what the commercial spirit is: you remember that Trade killed Chivalry and now sits in the throne. It was Trade that hatched the Jacquerie in the 14th Century; it was Trade that hatched John Brown, and broke the saintly heart of Robert Lee in the 19th." Ibid., 201.

'Of what avail the rigorous tale
Of bill for coin and box for bale?
Grant thee, O Trade! thine uttermost hope:
Level red gold with blue sky-slope,
And base it deep as devils grope
When all's done, what hast thou won
Of the only sweet that's under the sun? 10
Ay, canst thou buy a single sigh
Of true love's least, least ecstasy?
Then, with a bridegroom's heart-beats trembling,

All the mightier strings assembling Ranged them on the violins' side
As when the bridegroom leads the bride,
And, heart in voice, together cried
'Yea, what avail the endless tale Of gain by cunning and plus by sale?
Look up the land, look down the land 20
The poor, the poor, the poor, they stand Wedged by the pressing of Trade's hand Against an inward-opening door
That pressure tightens ever more
They sigh a monstrous foul-air sigh
For the outside leagues of liberty, Where Art, sweet lark, translates the sky
Into a heavenly melody
'Each day, all day' (these poor folks say),
'In the same old year-long, drear-long
way, 30

We weave in the mills and heave in the kilns,

We sieve mine-meshes under the hills,
And thieve much gold from the Devil's bank tills,

To relieve, O God, what manner of ills?—
The beasts, they hunger, and eat, and die,
And so do we, and the world's a sty,
Hush, fellow-swine, why nuzzle and cry?
Swinehood hath no remedy

Say many men, and hasten by,
Clamping the nose and blinking the eye 40
But who said once, in the lordly tone,
Man shall not live by bread alone
But all that cometh from the Throne?

Hath God said so?

But Trade saith No

And the kilns and the curt-tongued mills say Go.

There's plenty that can, if you can't we know

*Move out, if you think you're underpaid.
The poor are prolific, we're not afraid;
Trade is trade."* 50

Thereat this passionate protesting Meekly changed, and softened till

It sank to sad requesting And suggesting sadder still
 'And oh, if men might some time see How piteous—false the poor decree That trade no more than trade must be!
 Does business mean, Die, you—live, I?
 Then "Trade is trade" but sings a lie
 'Tis only war grown miserly 60
 If business is battle, name it so War-crimes less will shame it so,
 And widows less will blame it so Alas, for the poor to have some part
 In yon sweet living lands of Art, Makes problem not for head, but heart.
 Vainly might Plato's brain revolve it Plainly the heart of a child could solve it '

And then, as when from words that seem but rude
 We pass to silent pain that sits abroad 70
 Back in our heart's great dark and solitude,
 So sank the strings to gentle throbbing Of long chords change-marked with sobbing—
 Motherly sobbing, not distinctlier heard Than half wing-openings of the sleeping bird,
 Some dream of danger to her young hath stirred
 Then stirring and demurring ceased, and lo!
 Every least ripple of the strings' song-flow Died to a level with each level bow And made a great chord tranquil-surfaced
 so, 80
 As a brook beneath his curving bank doth
 go
 To linger in the sacred dark and green
 Where many boughs the still pool overlean And many leaves make shadow with their sheen

But presently
 A velvet flute-note fell down pleasantly
 Upon the bosom of that harmony,
 And sailed and sailed incessantly,
 As if a petal from a wild-rose blown 89
 Had fluttered down upon that pool of tone
 And boatwise dropped o' the convex side
 And floated down the glassy tide
 And clarified and glorified
 The solemn spaces where the shadows bide.
 From the warm concave of that fluted note Somewhat, half song, half odor, forth did float,
 As if a rose might somehow be a throat

'When Nature from her far-off glen Flutes her soft messages to men,
 The flute can say them o'er again; 100
 Yea, Nature, singing sweet and lone,
 Breathes through life's strident polyphone
 The flute-voice in the world of tone.
 Sweet friends,
 Man's love ascends
 To finer and diviner ends Than man's mere thought e'er comprehends
 For I, e'en I,
 As here I lie,
 A petal on a harmony, 110
 Demand of Science whence and why Man's tender pain, man's inward cry,
 When he doth gaze on earth and sky?
 I am not overbold
 I hold
 Full powers from Nature manifold
 I speak for each no-tongued tree That, spring by spring, doth nobler be,
 And dumbly and most wistfully
 His mighty prayerful arms outspreads 120
 Above men's oft-unheeding heads,
 And his big blessing downward sheds.
 I speak for all-shaped blooms and leaves,
 Lichens on stones and moss on eaves,
 Grasses and grains in ranks and sheaves,
 Broad-fronded ferns and keen-leaved canes,
 And briery mazes bounding lanes,
 And marsh-plants, thirsty-cupped for rains,
 And milky stems and sugary veins,
 For every long-armed woman-vine 130
 That round a piteous tree doth twine,
 For passionate odors, and divine Pistils, and petals crystalline,
 All purities of shady springs,
 All shynesses of film-winged things
 That fly from tree-trunks and bark-rings,
 All modesties of mountain-fawns
 That leap to covert from wild lawns,
 And tremble if the day but dawns,
 All sparklings of small beady eyes 140
 Of birds, and sidelong glances wise
 Wherewith the jay hunts tragedies,
 All piquancies of prickly burs,
 And smoothnesses of downs and furs
 Of eiders and of munevers,
 All limpid honeys that do lie
 At stamen-bases, nor deny
 The humming-birds' fine roguery, Bee-thighs, nor any butterfly,
 All gracious curves of slender wings, 150

Bark-mottlings, fibre-spiralings, Fern-wavings and leaf-flickerings,
 Each dial-marked leaf and flower-bell Wherewith in every lonesome dell
 Time to himself his hours doth tell,
 All tree-sounds, rustlings of pine cones,
 Wind-sighings, doves' melodious moans,
 And night's unearthly under-tones,
 All placid lakes and waveless deeps,
 All cool reposing mountain-steeps, 160
 Vale-calms and tranquil lotos-sleeps,— Yea, all fair forms, and sounds, and lights,
 And warmths, and mysteries, and mights,
 Of Nature's utmost depths and heights,
 —These doth my timid tongue present,
 Their mouthpiece and leal instrument
 And servant, all love-eloquent I heard, when All for love the violins cried
 So, Nature calls through all her system
 wide,
Give me thy love, O man, so long denied 170 Much time is run, and man hath changed
 his ways,
 Since Nature, in the antique fable-days,
 Was hid from man's true love by proxy fays,
 False fauns and rascal gods that stole her praise
 The nymphs, cold creatures of man's colder
 brain,
 Chilled Nature's streams till man's warm heart was fain
 Never to lave its love in them again
 Later, a sweet Voice Love thy neighbor said, Then first the bounds of neighborhood outspread
 Beyond all confines of old ethnic dread 180 Vainly the Jew might wag his covenant
 head
All men are neighbors, so the sweet Voice said
 So, when man's arms had circled all man's race,
 The liberal compass of his warm embrace Stretched bigger yet in the dark bounds of space,
 With hands a-grope he felt smooth Nature's grace,
 Drew her to breast and kissed her sweetheart face
 Yea, man found neighbors in great hills and trees
 And streams and clouds and suns and birds and bees,

And throbbed with neighbor-loves in loving these 190
 But oh, the poor! the poor! the poor!
 That stand by the inward-opening door
 Trade's hand doth tighten ever more,
 And sigh their monstrous foul-air sigh
 For the outside hills of liberty, Where Nature spreads her wild blue sky
 For Art to make into melody!
 Thou Trade! thou king of the modern days!
 Change thy ways,
 Change thy ways, 200
 Let the sweaty laborers file
 A little while,
 A little while,
 Where Art and Nature sing and smile
 Trade! is thy heart all dead, all dead?
 And hast thou nothing but a head?
 I'm all for heart,' the flute-voice said,
 And into sudden silence fled,
 Like as a blush that while 'tis red Dies to a still, still white instead 210

Thereto a thrilling calm succeeds, Till presently the silence breeds
 A little breeze among the reeds
 That seems to blow by sea-marsh weeds
 Then from the gentle stir and fret Sings out the melting clarionet,
 Like as a lady sings while yet
 Her eyes with salty tears are wet
 'O Trade! O Trade!' the Lady said,
 'I too will wish thee utterly dead 220
 If all thy heart is in thy head
 For O my God! and O my God!
 What shameful ways have women trod
 At beckoning of Trade's golden rod!
 Alas when sighs are traders' lies,
 And heart's-ease eyes and violet eyes
 Are merchandise!
 O purchased lips that kiss with pain!
 O cheeks coin-spotted with smutch and stain!
 O trafficked hearts that break in twain! 230 —And yet what wonder at my sisters'
 crime?
 So hath Trade withered up Love's sinewy prime,
 Men love not women as in olden time
 Ah, not in these cold merchantable days Deem men their life an opal gray, where plays
 The one red Sweet of gracious ladies'- praise

Now, comes a suitor with sharp prying
 eye—
Says, Here, you Lady, if you'll sell, I'll buy Come, heart for heart—a trade? What'
weeping? why?
 Shame on such wooers' dapper mercery! 240
 I would my lover kneeling at my feet
 In humble manliness should cry, O sweet!
I know not if thy heart my heart will greet
I ask not if thy love my love can meet Whate'er thy worshipful soft tongue shall
say,
I'll kiss thine answer, be it yea or nay.
I do but know I love thee, and I pray
To be thy knight until my dying day
 Woe him that cunning trades in hearts contrives! 249
 Base love good women to base loving drives
 If men loved larger, larger were our lives,
 And wooed they nobler, won they nobler wives '
 There thrust the bold straightforward horn
 To battle for that lady lorn,
 With heartsome voice of mellow scorn,
 Like any knight in knighthood's morn
 'Now comfort thee,' said he,
 'Fair Lady
 For God shall right thy grievous wrong,
 And man shall sing thee a true-love song,
 Voiced in act his whole life long, 261
 Yea, all thy sweet life long,
 Fair Lady
 Where's he that craftily hath said,
 The day of chivalry is dead?
 I'll prove that lie upon his head,
 Or I will die instead,
 Fair Lady
 Is Honor gone into his grave?
 Hath Faith become a catuff knave, 270
 And Selfhood turned into a slave
 To work in Mammon's cave,
 Fair Lady?
 Will Truth's long blade ne'er gleam again?
 Hath Giant Trade in dungeons slain
 All great contempts of mean-got gain
 And hates of inward stain,
 Fair Lady?
 For aye shall name and fame be sold,
 And place be hugged for the sake of gold,
 And smurched Justice feebly scold 281
 At Crime all money-bold,
 Fair Lady?
 Shall self-wrapt husbands aye forget Kiss-pardons for the daily fret

Wherewith sweet wifely eyes are wet—Blind to lips kiss-wise set—
 Fair Lady?
 Shall lovers huggle, heart for heart,
 Till wooing grows a trading mart 290
 Where much for little, and all for part,
 Make love a cheapening art,
 Fair Lady?
 Shall woman scorch for a single sin
 That her betrayer may revel in,
 And she be burnt, and he but grin
 When that the flames begin,
 Fair Lady?
 Shall ne'er prevail the woman's plea,
We maids would far, far whiter be 300
If that our eyes might sometimes see
Men maids in purity,
 Fair Lady?
 Shall Trade aye salve his conscience-aches
 With jibes at Chivalry's old mistakes—
 The wars that o'erhot knighthood makes For Christ's and ladies' sakes,
 Fair Lady?
 Now by each knight that e'er hath prayed
 To fight like a man and love like a maid, 310 Since Pembroke's life, as Pembroke's blade,
 I' the scabbard, death, was laid,
 Fair Lady,
 I dare avouch my faith is bright That God doth right and God hath might.
 Nor time hath changed His hair to white,
 Nor His dear love to spite,
 Fair Lady
 I doubt no doubts I strive, and shrive my clay,
 And fight my fight in the patient modern
 way 320
 For true love and for thee—ah me! and pray
 To be thy knight until my dying day,
 Fair Lady '
 Made end that knightly horn, and spurred away
 Into the thuck of the melodious fray.
 And then the hautboy played and smiled,
 And sang like any large-eyed child,
 Cool-hearted and all undefiled.
 'Huge Trade!' he said,
 'Would thou wouldst lift me on thy head
 And run where'er my finger led! 331 Once said a Man—and wise was He—Never shalt thou the heavens see, Save as a little child thou be.'

Then o'er sea-lashings of commingling tunes
The ancient wise bassoons,
Like weird
Gray-beard
Old harpers sitting on the high sea-dunes, Chanted runes 340
'Bright-waved gain, gray waved loss,
The sea of all doth lash and toss,
One wave forward and one across
But now 'twas trough, now 'tis crest,
And worst doth foam and flash to best,
And curst to blest

Life! Life! thou sea-fugue, writ from east to west,
Love, Love alone can pore
On thy dissolving score
Of harsh half-phrasings, 350
Blotted ere writ,
And double erasings
Of chords most fit
Yea, Love, sole music master blest,
May read thy weltering palimpsest
To follow Time's dying melodies through,
And never to lose the old in the new,
And ever to solve the discords true—
Love alone can do 359
And ever Love hears the poor-folks' crying,
And ever Love hears the women's sighing,
And ever sweet knighthood's death-defying,
And ever wise childhood's deep implying,
But never a trader's glozing and lying

'And yet shall Love himself be heard, Though long deferred, though long deferred
O'er the modern waste a dove hath whirled
Music is Love in search of a word.' 1875 1877

EVENING SONG

Look off, dear Love, across the fallow sands,
And mark yon meeting of the sun and
sea,
How long they kiss in sight of all the lands.
Ah! longer, longer, we

Now in the sea's red vintage melts the sun,
As Egypt's pearl dissolved in rosy wine,
And Cleopatra night drinks all 'Tis done,
Love, lay thine hand in mine.

Come forth, sweet stars, and comfort heaven's heart,
Glimmer, ye waves, round else unlighted
sands. 10
O night! divorce our sun and sky apart
Never our lips, our hands.

SONG OF THE CHATTAHOOCHEE

Out of the hills of Habersham, Down the valleys of Hall,
I hurry amain to reach the plain,
Run the rapid and leap the fall,
Split at the rock and together again,
Accept my bed, or narrow or wide,
And flee from folly on every side
With a lover's pain to attain the plain Far from the hills of Habersham,
Far from the valleys of Hall 10

All down the hills of Habersham, All through the valleys of Hall,
The rushes cried Abide, abide,
The willful waterweeds held me thrall,
The laving laurel turned my tide,
The ferns and the fondling grass said Stay,
The dewberry dipped for to work delay,
And the little reeds sighed Abide, abide,
Here in the hills of Habersham,
Here in the valleys of Hall 20

High o'er the hills of Habersham, Veiling the valleys of Hall,
The hickory told me manifold Fair tales of shade, the poplar tall Wrought me her shadowy self to hold,
The chestnut, the oak, the walnut, the pine, Overleaning, with flickering meaning and sign,
Said, Pass not, so cold, these manifold
Deep shades of the hills of Habersham,
These glades in the valleys of Hall. 30

And oft in the hills of Habersham,
And oft in the valleys of Hall,
The white quartz shone, and the smooth brook-stone
Did bar me of passage with friendly brawl,
And many a luminous jewel lone —Crystals clear or a-cloud with mist, Ruby, garnet and amethyst—
Made lures with the lights of streaming
stone

In the clefts of the hills of Habersham,
In the beds of the valleys of Hall 40

But oh, not the hills of Habersham,
And oh, not the valleys of Hall Avail I am fain for to water the plain Downward the voices of Duty call—Downward, to toil and be mixed with the main,
The dry fields burn, and the mills are to turn,
And a myriad flowers mortally yearn,
And the lordly main from beyond the plain Calls o'er the hills of Habersham, Calls through the valleys of Hall 50

THE REVENGE OF HAMISH<sup>1</sup>

It was three slim does and a ten-tined buck in the bracken lay,
And all of a sudden the sinister smell of a
man, Awaft on a wind-shift, wavered and ran Down the hull-side and sifted along through the bracken and passed that way

Then Nan got a-tremble at nostril, she was the daintiest doe,
In the print of her velvet flank on the velvet fern
She reared, and rounded her ears in turn Then the buck leapt up, and his head as a king's to a crown did go

Full high in the breeze, and he stood as if Death had the form of a deer,
And the two slim does long lazily stretching arose, 10
For their day-dream slower came to a close,
Till they woke and were still, breath-bound with waiting and wonder and fear

<sup>1</sup> ' While alliteration was used among the Anglo-Saxon poets to establish and fortify the main rhythm of the verse, its effect in modern verse is to vary the main rhythm by irregular and unlooked-for groups which break the monotony of the set rhythmic movement

All alliteration for the sake of alliteration is trifling, and in modern English verse it is to be used with such delicate art that the ear will unconsciously feel its indefinite presence, varying the verse as brief irregular bird-calls, heard in the wood here and there, seem to add a delight to the mass of green ' Lanier, The Science of English Verse (N Y, 1909), 310-14.

Then Alan the huntsman sprang over the hillock, the hounds shot by,
The does and the ten-tined buck made a marvellous bound,
The hounds swept after with never a
sound,
But Alan loud winded his horn in sign that the quarry was nigh.

For at dawn of that day proud Maclean of Lochbuy to the hunt had waxed wild,
And he cursed at old Alan till Alan fared off with the hounds For to drive him the deer to the lower glen-grounds
'I will kill a red deer,' quoth Maclean, 'in the sight of the wife and the child.'

So gayly he paced with the wife and the child to his chosen stand, 21
But he hurried tall Hamish the henchman ahead 'Go turn,'— Cried Maclean—'if the deer seek to cross to the burn,
Do thou turn them to me nor fail, lest thy back be red as thy hand'

Now hard-fortuned Hamish, half blown of his breath with the height of the hill,
Was white in the face when the ten-tined buck and the does Drew leaping to burn-ward, huskily rose
His shouts, and his nether lip twitched, and his legs were o'er-weak for his will

So the deer darted lightly by Hamish and bounded away to the burn
But Maclean never bating his watch tarried waiting below 30 Still Hamish hung heavy with fear for to go

All the space of an hour, then he went, and his face was greenish and stern,

And his eye sat back in the socket, and shrunk the eyeballs shone, As withdrawn from a vision of deeds it were shame to see
'Now, now, grim henchman, what is't with thee?'
Brake Maclean, and his wrath rose red as a beacon the wind hath upblown

'Three does and a ten-tined buck made out,' spoke Hamish, full mild,
'And I ran for to turn, but my breath it was blown, and they passed;
I was weak, for ye called ere I broke me my fast'

Cried Maclean: 'Now a ten-tined buck in the sight of the wife and the child 40

I had killed if the gluttonous kern had not wrought me a snail's own wrong!
Then he sounded, and down came kinsmen and clansmen all:

'Ten blows, for ten tine, on his back let fall,
And reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of thong!'

So Hamish made bare, and took him his strokes, at the last he smiled
'Now I'll to the burn,' quoth Maclean,
'for it still may be,
If a slimmer-paunched henchman will hurry with me,
I shall kill me the ten-tined buck for a gift to the wife and the child!'

Then the clansmen departed, by this path and that, and over the hill Sped Maclean with an outward wrath for an inward shame, 50
And that place of the lashing full quiet became,
And the wife and the child stood sad, and bloody-backed Hamish sat still

But look! red Hamish has risen, quick about and about turns he
'There is none betwixt me and the cragtop!' he screams under breath
Then, livid as Lazarus lately from death, He snatches the child from the mother, and clambers the crag toward the sea

Now the mother drops breath, she is dumb, and her heart goes dead for a space, Till the motherhood, mistress of death, shrieks, shrieks through the glen,
And that place of the lashing is live with
men,
And Maclean, and the gillie that told him, dash up in a desperate race. 60

Not a breath's time for asking; an eye-glance reveals all the tale untold

They follow mad Hamish afar up the crag toward the sea, And the lady cries 'Clansmen, run for a fee!—

Yon castle and lands to the two first hands that shall hook him and hold Fast Hamish back from the brink!—and ever she flies up the steep, And the clansmen pant, and they sweat, and they jostle and strain But, mother, 'tis vain; but, father, 'tis vain;

Stern Hamish stands bold on the brink, and dangles the child o'er the deep

Now a faintness falls on the men that run, and they all stand still And the wife prays Hamish as if he were God, on her knees, 70 Crying 'Hamish! O Hamish! but please, but please
For to spare him!' and Hamish still dangles the child, with a wavering will

On a sudden he turns, with a sea-hawk scream, and a gibe, and a song, Cries 'So, I will spare ye the child if, in sight of ye all, Ten blows on Maclean's bare back shall
fall,
And ye reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of the thong!'

Then Maclean he set hardly his tooth to his lip that his tooth was red, Breathed short for a space, said 'Nay, but it never shall be!
Let me hurl off the damnable hound in
the sea!
But the wife 'Can Hamish go fish us the child from the sea, if dead? 80

Say yea!—Let them lash me, Hamish?—
'Nay!'—'Husband, the lashing will heal,
But, oh, who will heal me the bonny sweet bairn in his grave?
Could ye cure me my heart with the death of a knave?
Quick! Love! I will bare thee—so—kneel!
Then Maclean 'gan slowly to kneel

With never a word, till presently downward he jerked to the earth

Then the henchman—he that smote Hamish—would tremble and lag; ‘Strike, hard!’ quoth Hamish, full stern, from the crag,
 Then he struck him, and ‘One!’ sang Hamish, and danced with the child in his mirth.

And no man spake beside Hamish; he counted each stroke with a song When the last stroke fell, then he moved him a pace down the height, 90 And he held forth the child in the heart-aching sight
 Of the mother, and looked all pitiful grave, as repenting a wrong

And there as the motherly arms stretched out with the thanksgiving prayer—And there as the mother crept up with a fearful swift pace, Till her finger nigh felt of the bairnie’s face—
 In a flash fierce Hamish turned round and lifted the child in the air,

And sprang with the child in his arms from the horrible height in the sea, Shrill screeching, ‘Revenge!’ in the windrush, and pallid Maclean, Age-feeble with anger and impotent pain, Crawled up on the crag, and lay flat, and locked hold of dead roots of a tree—

And gazed hungrily o’er, and the blood from his back drip-dripped in the brine, And a sea-hawk flung down a skeleton fish as he flew, 102
 And the mother stared white on the waste of blue,
 And the wind drove a cloud to seaward, and the sun began to shine

OPPOSITION

Of fret, of dark, of thorn, of chill,
 Complain no more, for these, O heart, Direct the random of the will
 As rhymes direct the rage of art.

The lute’s fixt fret, that runs athwart
 The strain and purpose of the string,
 For governance and nice consort
 Doth bar his wilful wavering.

The dark hath many dear avails;
 The dark distils divinest dew, 10
 The dark is rich with nightingales,
 With dreams, and with the heavenly Muse.

Bleeding with thorns of petty strife,
 I’ll ease (as lovers do) my smart
 With sonnets to my lady Life Writ red in issues from the heart.

What grace may lie within the chill
 Of favor frozen fast in scorn!
 When Good’s a-freeze, we call it Ill!
 Thus rosy Time is glacier-born 20

Of fret, of dark, of thorn, of chill,
 Complain thou not, O heart, for these Bank-in the current of the will To uses, arts, and charities

A BALLAD OF TREES
AND THE MASTER<sup>1</sup>

INTO the woods my Master went,
 Clean forspent, forspent
 Into the woods my Master came,
 Forspent with love and shame
 But the olives they were not blind to Him,
 The little gray leaves were kind to Him.
 The thorn-tree had a mind to Him
 When into the woods He came Out of the woods my Master went,

 And He was well content. 10
 Out of the woods my Master came,
 Content with death and shame, When Death and Shame would woo Him
 last,
 From under the trees they drew Him last:
 ’Twas on a tree they slew Him—last When out of the woods He came

THE CRYSTAL

At midnight, death’s and truth’s unlocking
 time,
 When far within the spirit’s hearing rolls

1 ‘“A Ballad of Trees and the Master” was conceived as an interlude of the latest “Hymn of the Marshes,” “Sunrise,” although written earlier. In Mr Lanier’s final copy the “Ballad” is omitted. It was one of several interludes which he at first designed, but, for some reason, afterwards abandoned.’ Mrs Lanier’s note, Poems of Sidney Lanier (N Y, 1929), 255

The great soft rumble of the course of things—

A bulk of silence in a mask of sound,— When darkness clears our vision that by day

Is sun-blind, and the soul's a ravening owl
For truth and fitteth here and there about Low-lying woody tracts of time and oft Is minded for to sit upon a bough, Dry-dead and sharp, of some long-stricken tree 10

And muse in that gaunt place,—'twas then my heart,

Deep in the meditative dark, cried out

'Ye companies of governor-spirits grave, Bards, and old bringers-down of flaming news

From steep-wall'd heavens, holy malcontents,
Sweet seers, and stellar visionaries, all
That brood about the skies of poesy,
Full bright ye shine, insuperable stars,
Yet, if a man look hard upon you, none
With total lustre blazeth, no, not one 20
But hath some heinous freckle of the flesh Upon his shining cheek, not one but winks

His ray, opaqued with intermittent mist
Of defect, yea, you masters all must ask Some sweet forgiveness, which we leap to give,

We lovers of you, heavenly-glad to meet Your largesse so with love, and interplight
Your genuses with our mortalities

Thus unto thee, O sweetest Shakspeare sole,

A hundred hurts a day I do forgive 30
( 'Tis little, but, enchantment! 'tis for thee) Small curious quibble, Juliet's prurient pun

In the poor, pale face of Romeo's fancied death,

Cold rant of Richard, Henry's fustian roar
Which frights away that sleep he invokes, Wronged Valentine's unnatural haste to yield

Too-silly shifts of maids that mask as men In faint disguises that could ne'er disguise —

Viola, Julia, Portia, Rosalind, 39
Fatigues most drear, and needless overtax
Of speech obscure that had as lief be plain; Last I forgive (with more delight, because

'Tis more to do) the labored-lewd discourse That e'en thy young invention's youngest heir Besmurfed the world with

Father Homer, thee,
Thee also I forgive thy sandy wastes
Of prose and catalogue, thy drear harangues
That tease the patience of the centuries,
Thy sleazy scrap of story,—but a rogue's 50 Rape of a light-o'-love,—too soiled a patch
To broider with the gods

Thee, Socrates,
Thou dear and very strong one, I forgive Thy year-worn cloak, thine iron stringencies
That were but dandy upside-down, thy words
Of truth that, milder spoke had mainlier wrought

So, Buddha, beautiful! I pardon thee That all the All thou hadst for needy
man
Was Nothing, and thy Best of being was 60
But not to be

Worn Dante, I forgive
The implacable hates that in thy horrid hells
Or burn or freeze thy fellows, never loosed
By death, nor time, nor love

And I forgive
Thee, Milton, those thy comic-dreadful wars
Where, armed with gross and inconclusive steel,
Immortals smite immortals mortalwise
And fill all heaven with folly 70

Also thee,
Brave Æschylus, thee I forgive, for that Thine eye, by bare bright justice basilisk'd, Turned not, nor ever learned to look where Love
Stands shining.

So, unto thee, Lucretius mine (For oh, what heart hath loved thee like to this
That's now complaining?), freely I forgive Thy logic poor, thine error rich, thine earth Whose graves eat souls and all 80

Yea, all you hearts
 Of beauty, and sweet righteous lovers large Aurelius fine, oft superfine, mild Saint A Kempis, overmild, Epictetus, Whiles low in thought, still with old slavery tinct,
 Rapt Behmen, rapt too far, high Swedenborg, O'ertoppling, Langley, that with but a touch
 Of art hadst sung Piers Plowman to the top Of English songs, whereof 'tis dearest,
     now,
 And most adorable, Cædmon, in the morn,
 A-calling angels with the cow-herd's call 91
 That late brought up the cattle, Emerson, Most wise, that yet, in finding Wisdom,
     lost
 Thy Self, sometimes, tense Keats, with angels' nerves
 Where men's were better, Tennyson, largest voice
 Since Milton, yet some register of wit Wanting,—all, all, I pardon, ere 'tis asked, Your more or less, your little mole that marks
 You brother and your kinship seals to man.

But Thee, but Thee, O sovereign Seer of time, 100
 But Thee, O poets' Poet, Wisdom's Tongue,
 But Thee, O man's best Man, O love's best
     Love,
 O perfect life in perfect labor writ, O all men's Comrade, Servant, King, or Priest,—
 What if or yet, what mole, what flaw, what lapse,
 What least defect or shadow of defect,
 What rumor, tattled by an enemy,
 Of inference loose, what lack of grace Even in torture's grasp, or sleep's, or death's—
 Oh, what amiss may I forgive in Thee, 110
 Jesus, good Paragon, thou Crystal Christ?

FROM HYMNS OF THE MARSHES

I SUNRISE

In my sleep I was fain of their fellowship, fain
 Of the live-oak, the marsh, and the main.

The little green leaves would not let me alone in my sleep;
 Up-breathed from the marshes, a message of range and of sweep, Interwoven with waftures of wild sea-liberties, drifting, Came through the lapped leaves sifting, sifting,
     Came to the gates of sleep.
 Then my thoughts, in the dark of the dungeon-keep
 Of the Castle of Captives hid in the City of Sleep,
 Upstarted, by twos and by threes assembling 10
 The gates of sleep fell a-trembling Like as the lips of a lady that forth falter
     yes,
     Shaken with happiness
 The gates of sleep stood wide

I have waked, I have come, my beloved! I might not abide I have come ere the dawn, O beloved, my live-oaks, to hide
     In your gospelling glooms,—to be As a lover in heaven, the marsh my marsh and the sea my sea

Tell me, sweet burly-bark'd, man-bodied
     Tree
 That mine arms in the dark are embracing, dost know 20
 From what fount are these tears at thy feet which flow?
 They rise not from reason, but deeper inconsequent deeps
     Reason's not one that weeps
     What logic of greeting lies Betwixt dear over-beautiful trees and the rain of the eyes?

O cunning green leaves, little masters! like as ye gloss
 All the dull-tissued dark with your luminous darks that emboss
 The vague blackness of night into pattern and plan,

So,

(But would I could know, but would I could know,) 30
 With your question embroid'ring the dark of the question of man,—
 So, with your silences purfling this silence of man

While his cry to the dead for some knowledge is under the ban,
Under the ban,—
So, ye have wrought me Designs on the night of our knowledge,— yea, ye have taught me,
So,
That haply we know somewhat more than we know.

Ye lispers, whisperers, singers in storms,
Ye consciences murmuring faiths under forms, 40
Ye ministers meet for each passion that grieves,
Friendly, sisterly, sweetheart leaves, Oh, rain me down from your darks that contain me
Wisdoms ye winnow from winds that pain
me,— Sift down tremors of sweet-within-sweet
That advise me of more than they bring,— repeat
Me the woods-smell that swiftly but now brought breath
From the heaven-side bank of the river of death,— Teach me the terms of silence,—preach
me
The passion of patience,—sift me,—impeach me,— 50
And there, oh there As ye hang with your myriad palms upturned in the air,
Pray me a myriad prayer

My gossip, the owl,—is it thou That out of the leaves of the low-hanging
bough,
As I pass to the beach, art stirred?
Dumb woods, have ye uttered a bird?

. . . . .
Reverend Marsh, low-couched along the
sea,
Old chemist, rapt in alchemy,
Distilling silence,—lo, 60
That which our father-age had died to
know—
The menstruum that dissolves all matter —thou
Hast found it for this silence, filling now
The globéd charity of receiving space,

This solves us all: man, matter, doubt, disgrace,
Death, love, sin, sanity,
Must in yon silence, clear solution lie Too clear! That crystal nothing who'll peruse?
The blackest night could bring us brighter
news
Yet precious qualities of silence haunt 70
Round these vast margins, ministrant
Oh, if thy soul's at latter gasp for space, With trying to breathe no bigger than thy race
Just to be fellow'd, when that thou hast found No man with room, or grace enough of bound To entertain that New thou tell'st, thou art,—
'Tis here, 'tis here, thou canst unhand thy heart
And breathe it free, and breathe it free,
By rangy marsh, in lone sea-liberty

The tide's at full the marsh with flooded
streams 80
Glimmers, a limpid labyrinth of dreams.
Each winding creek in grave entrancement lies A rhapsody of morning-stars The skies
Shine scant with one forked galaxy,— The marsh brags ten, looped on his breast they lie

Oh, what if a sound should be made!
Oh, what if a bound should be laid To this bow-and-string tension of beauty and silence a-spring,— To the bend of beauty the bow, or the hold of silence the string!
I fear me I fear me yon dome of diaphanous gleam 90
Will break as a bubble o'er-blown in a dream,— Yon dome of too-tenuous tissues of space and of night,
Over-weighted with stars, over-freighted with light,
Over-sated with beauty and silence, will seem
But a bubble that broke in a dream, If a bound of degree to this grace be laid,
Or a sound or a motion made,

But no, it is made: list! somewhere,— mystery, where?

In the leaves? in the air?
In my heart? is a motion made. 100

'Tis a motion of dawn, like a flicker of shade on shade.

In the leaves 'tis palpable low multitudinous stirring

Upwinds through the woods; the little ones, softly conferring,

Have settled my lord's to be looked for, so;
they are still,

But the air and my heart and the earth are a-thrill,—

And look where the wild duck sails round the bend of the river,—

And look where a passionate shiver Expectant is bending the blades Of the marsh-grass in serial shimmers and shades,—

And invisible wings, fast fleeting, fast fleeting, 110

Are beating

The dark overhead as my heart beats,— and steady and free

Is the ebb-tide flowing from marsh to sea—(Run home, little streams,

With your lapfuls of stars and dreams),—

And a sailor unseen is hoisting a-peak, For list, down the inshore curve of the creek

How merrily flutters the sail,—
And lo, in the East! Will the East unveil?
The East is unveiled, the East hath confessed 120

A flush 'tis dead, 'tis alive 'tis dead, ere the West

Was aware of it nay, 'tis abiding, 'tis unwithdrawn

Have a care, sweet Heaven! 'Tis Dawn.

Now a dream of a flame through that dream of a flush is uprolled

To the zenith ascending, a dome of un-dazzling gold

Is builded, in shape as a bee-hive, from out of the sea

The hive is of gold undazzling, but oh, the Bee,

The star-fed Bee, the build-fire Bee,
Of dazzling gold is the great Sun-Bee That shall flash from the hive-hole over the
sea 130

Yet now the dew-drop, now the morning gray,

Shall live their little lucid sober day Ere with the sun their souls exhale
away

Now in each pettiest personal sphere of dew
The summ'd moon shines complete as in the blue

Big dew-drop of all heaven with these lit shrines

O'er-silvered to the farthest sea-confines,
The sacramental marsh one pious plain
Of worship lies Peace to the ante-reign
Of Mary Morning, blissful mother mild, Minded of nought but peace, and of a child 141

Not slower than Majesty moves, for a mean and a measure

Of motion,—not faster than dateless
Olympian leisure

Might pace with unblown ample garments from pleasure to pleasure,—

The wave-serrate sea-rim sinks unjarring, unreeling,

Forever revealing, revealing, revealing, Edgewise, bladewise, halfwise, wholewise,
—'tis done!

Good-morrow, lord Sun!
With several voice, with ascription one,
The woods and the marsh and the sea and my soul 150

Unto thee, whence the glittering stream of all morrows doth roll,

Cry good and past-good and most heavenly morrow, lord Sun

O Artisan born in the purple,—Workman
Heat,—

Parter of passionate atoms that travail to meet,

And be mixed in the death-cold oneness,— innermost Guest

At the marriage of elements,—fellow of publicans,—blest

King in the blouse of flame, that loiterest
o'er

The idle skies yet laborest fast ever-
more,—

Thou, in the fine forge-thunder, thou, in the beat

Of the heart of a man, thou Motive,— Laborer Heat: 160

Yea, Artist, thou, of whose art yon sea's all
news,

With his inshore greens and manifold mid-sea blues,
 Pearl-glint, shell-tint, ancientest perfectest hues
 Ever shaming the maidens,—lily and rose Confess thee, and each mild flame that glows
 In the clarified virginal bosoms of stones that shine,

It is thine, it is thine

Thou chemist of storms, whether driving the winds a-swirl
 Or a-flicker the subtler essences polar that whirl
 In the magnet earth,—yea, thou with a storm for a heart, 170 Rent with debate, many-spotted with question, part
 From part oft sundered, yet ever a globèd
 light, Yet ever the artist, ever more large and bright
 Than the eye of a man may avail of —manifold One,
 I must pass from the face, I must pass from the face of the Sun Old Want is awake and agog, every wrinkle a-frown,
 The worker must pass to his work in the terrible town
 But I fear not, nay, and I fear not the thing to be done,
 I am strong with the strength of my lord
 the Sun
 How dark, how dark soever the race that must needs be run, 180
 I am lit with the Sun

Oh, never the mast-high run of the seas
 Of traffic shall hide thee, Never the hell-colored smoke of the factories

Hide thee,

Never the reek of the time's fen-politics

Hide thee,

And ever my heart through the night shall with knowledge abide thee, And ever by day shall my spirit, as one that hath tried thee, Labor, at leisure, in art,—till yonder beside thee 190
 My soul shall float, friend Sun,
 The day being done.

IV. THE MARSHES OF GLYNN

GLOOMS of the live-oaks, beautiful-braided and woven
 With intricate shades of the vines that myriad-cloven Clamber the forks of the multiform boughs,— Emerald twilights,— Virginal shy lights,
 Wrought of the leaves to allure to the whisper of vows,
 When lovers pace timidly down through the green colonnades
 Of the dim sweet woods, of the dear dark
 woods,
 Of the heavenly woods and glades,
 That run to the radiant marginal sand-beach within 10
 The wide sea-marshes of Glynn,—

Beautiful glooms, soft dusks in the noonday fire,—
 Wildwood privacies, closets of lone desire, Chamber from chamber parted with waver-ing arras of leaves,— Cells for the passionate pleasure of prayer to the soul that grieves, Pure with a sense of the passing of saints through the wood,
 Cool for the dutiful weighing of ill with good,—

O braided dusks of the oak and woven shades of the vine, While the riotous noon-day sun of the June-day long did shine
 Ye held me fast in your heart and I held you fast in mine, 20
 But now when the noon is no more, and riot is rest,
 And the sun is a-wait at the ponderous gate of the West,
 And the slant yellow beam down the wood-aisle doth seem Like a lane into heaven that leads from a dream,— Ay, now, when my soul all day hath drunken the soul of the oak,
 And my heart is at ease from men, and the wearisome sound of the stroke Of the scythe of time and the trowel of trade is low,
 And belief overmasters doubt, and I know that I know,

1884

And my spirit is grown to a lordly great compass within,
 That the length and the breadth and the sweep of the marshes of Glynn 30
 Will work me no fear like the fear they have wrought me of yore
 When length was fatigue, and when breadth was but bitterness sore,
 And when terror and shrinking and dreary unnamable pain
 Drew over me out of the merciless miles of the plain,—

Oh, now, unafraid, I am fain to face
 The vast sweet visage of space To the edge of the wood I am drawn, I am drawn,
 Where the gray beach glimmering runs, as a belt of the dawn,
 For a mete and a mark
 To the forest-dark — 40
 So

Affable live-oak, leaning low,— Thus—with your favor—soft, with a reverent hand, (Not lightly touching your person, Lord of the land!)
 Bending your beauty aside, with a step I stand
 On the firm-packed sand,
 Free
 By a world of marsh that borders a world of
 sea Sinuous southward and sinuous northward the shimmering band Of the sand-beach fastens the fringe of the marsh to the folds of the land 50 Inward and outward to northward and southward the beach-lines linger and curl
 As a silver-wrought garment that clings to and follows the firm sweet limbs of a girl
 Vanishing, swerving, evermore curving again into sight,
 Softly the sand-beach wavers away to a dim gray looping of light And what if behind me to westward the wall of the woods stands high?
 The world lies east how ample, the marsh and the sea and the sky!
 A league and a league of marsh-grass, waist-high, broad in the blade, Green, and all of a height, and unflecked with a light or a shade,

Stretch leisurely off, in a pleasant plain,
 To the terminal blue of the main 60

Oh, what is abroad in the marsh and the terminal sea?
 Somehow my soul seems suddenly
 free
 From the weighing of fate and the sad discussion of sin,
 By the length and the breadth and the
 sweep of the marshes of Glynn

Ye marshes, how candid and simple and nothing-withholding and free Ye publish yourselves to the sky and offer yourselves to the sea!
 Tolerant plains, that suffer the sea and the rains and the sun, Ye spread and span like the catholic man who hath mightily won God out of knowledge and good out of infinite pain
 And sight out of blindness and purity out of a stain 70

As the marsh-hen secretly builds on the watery sod,
 Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness of God
 I will fly in the greatness of God as the marsh-hen flies
 In the freedom that fills all the space 'twixt the marsh and the skies By so many roots as the marsh-grass sends in the sod
 I will heartily lay me a-hold on the greatness of God
 Oh, like to the greatness of God is the greatness within
 The range of the marshes, the liberal marshes of Glynn

And the sea lends large, as the marsh' lo, out of his plenty the sea Pours fast full soon the time of the floodtide must be 80
 Look how the grace of the sea doth go About and about through the intricate channels that flow
 Here and there,
 Everywhere,
 Till his waters have flooded the uttermost creeks and the low-lying lanes, And the marsh is meshed with a million veins,

That like as with rosy and silvery essences flow
 In the rose-and-silver evening glow
 Farewell, my lord Sun! 89
 The creeks overflow a thousand rivulets run
 'Twixt the roots of the sod, the blades of the marsh-grass stir, Passeth a hurrying sound of wings that westward whirr, Passeth, and all is still, and the currents cease to run,
 And the sea and the marsh are one

 How still the plains of the waters be!
 The tide is in his ecstasy,

The tide is at his highest height.
 And it is night

And now from the Vast of the Lord will the waters of sleep
 Roll in on the souls of men, 100
 But who will reveal to our waking ken The forms that swim and the shapes that creep

Under the waters of sleep?
 And I would I could know what swimmeth below when the tide comes in On the length and the breadth of the marvelous marshes of Glynn.

GEORGE WASHINGTON CABLE

1844-1925

BELLES DEMOISELLES PLANTATION

THE original grantee was Count—, assume the name to be De Charleu, the old Creoles never forgive a public mention. He was the French king's commissary. One day, called to France to explain the lucky accident of the commissariat having burned down with his account-books inside, he left his wife, a Choctaw Comtesse, behind.

Arrived at court, his excuses were accepted, and that tract granted him where afterwards stood Belles Demoiselles Plantation. A man cannot remember every thing! In a fit of forgetfulness he married a French gentlewoman, rich and beautiful, and 'brought her out.' However, 'All's well that ends well', a famine had been in the colony, and the Choctaw Comtesse had starved, leaving nought but a half-caste orphan family lurking on the edge of the settlement, bearing our French gentlewoman's own new name, and being mentioned in Monsieur's will.

And the new Comtesse—she tarried but a twelve-month, left Monsieur a lovely son, and departed, led out of this vain world by the swamp-fever.

From this son sprang the proud Creole family of De Charleu. It rose straight up, up, up, generation after generation, tall, branchless, slender, palm-like, and finally, in the time of which I am to tell, flowered with all the rare beauty of a century-plant, in Artemise, Innocente, Felicite, the twins Marie and Martha, Leontine and little Septima, the seven beautiful daughters for whom their home had been fitly named Belles Demoiselles.

The Count's grant had once been a long Pointe, round which the Mississippi used to whirl, and seethe, and foam, that it was horrid to behold. Big whirlpools would open and wheel about in the savage eddies under the low bank, and close up again, and others open, and spin, and disappear. Great circles of muddy surface would boil up from hundreds of feet below, and gloss over, and seem to float away,—sink, come back again under water, and with only a soft huss surge up again, and again drift off, and vanish. Every few minutes the loamy bank would tip down a great load of earth upon its besieger, and fall back a foot,—sometimes a yard,—and the writhing river would press after, until at last the Pointe was quite swallowed up, and the great river glided by in a majestic curve, and asked no more, the bank stood fast, the 'caving' became a forgotten misfortune, and the diminished grant was a long, sweeping, willowy bend, rustling with miles of sugar-cane.

Coming up the Mississippi, the sailing craft of those early days, about the time one first could descrie the white spires of the old St. Louis Cathedral, you would be pretty sure to spy, just over to your right under the levee, Belles Demoiselles Mansion, with its broad veranda and red painted cypress roof, peering over the embankment, like a bird in the nest, half hid by the avenue of willows which one of the departed De Charleus,—he that married a Marot,—had planted on the levee's crown.

The house stood unusually near the river, facing eastward, and standing four-square, with an immense veranda about its sides, and a flight of steps in front spreading broadly downward, as we open arms to a child. From the veranda nine miles of river were seen, and in their compass, near at hand, the shady garden full of rare and beautiful flowers, farther away broad fields of cane and rice, and the distant quarters of the slaves, and on the horizon everywhere a dark belt of cypress forest

The master was old Colonel De Charleu, —Jean Albert Henri Joseph De Charleu-Marot, and 'Colonel' by the grace of the first American governor Monsieur,—he would not speak to any one who called him 'Colonel,'—was a hoary-headed patriarch. His step was firm, his form erect, his intellect strong and clear, his countenance classic, serene, dignified, commanding, his manners courtly, his voice musical,—fascinating. He had had his vices,—all his life, but had borne them, as his race do, with a serenity of conscience and a cleanliness of mouth that left no outward blemish on the surface of the gentleman. He had gambled in Royal Street, drunk hard in Orleans Street, run his adversary through in the duelling-ground at Slaughter-house Point, and danced and quarrelled at the St. Philippe-street-theatre quadroom balls. Even now, with all his courtesy and bounty, and a hospitality which seemed to be entertaining angels, he was bitter-proud and penurious, and deep down in his hard-finished heart loved nothing but himself, his name, and his motherless children. But these!—their ravishing beauty was all but excuse enough for the unbounded idolatry of their father. Against these seven goddesses he never rebelled. Had they even required him to defraud old De Carlos—

I can hardly say

Old De Carlos was his extremely distant relative on the Choctaw side. With this single exception, the narrow thread-like line of descent from the Indian wife, diminished to a mere strand by injudicious alliances, and deaths in the gutters of old New Orleans, was extinct. The name, by Spanish contact, had become De Carlos, but this one surviving bearer of it was known to all, and known only, as Injin Charlie.

One thing I never knew a Creole to do. He will not utterly go back on the ties of blood, no matter what sort of knots those ties may be. For one reason, he is never ashamed of his or his father's sins, and for another,—he will tell you—he is 'all heart'!

So the different heirs of the De Charleu estate had always strictly regarded the rights and interests of the De Carloses, especially their ownership of a block of dilapidated buildings in a part of the city, which had once been very poor property, but was beginning to be valuable. This block had much more than maintained the last De Carlos through a long and lazy lifetime, and, as his household consisted only of himself, and an aged and crippled negress, the inference was irresistible that he 'had money.' Old Charlie, though by alias an 'Injin,' was plainly a dark white man, about as old as Colonel De Charleu, sunk in the bliss of deep ignorance, shrewd, deaf, and, by repute at least, unmerciful.

The Colonel and he always conversed in English. This rare accomplishment, which the former had learned from his Scotch wife,—the latter from up-river traders,—they found an admirable medium of communication, answering, better than French could, a similar purpose to that of the stick which we fasten to the bit of one horse and breast-gear of another, whereby each keeps his distance. Once in a while, too, by way of jest, English found its way among the ladies of Belles Demoiselles, always signifying that their sire was about to have business with old Charlie.

Now a long-standing wish to buy out Charlie troubled the Colonel. He had no desire to oust him unfairly, he was proud of being always fair, yet he did long to engross the whole estate under one title. Out of his luxurious idleness he had conceived this desire, and thought little of so slight an obstacle as being already somewhat in debt to old Charlie for money borrowed, and for which Belles Demoiselles was, of course, good, ten times over. Lots, buildings, rents, all, might as well be his, he thought, to give, keep, or destroy 'Had he but the old man's heritage. Ah! he might bring that into existence which his belles demoiselles had been begging for, "since many years," a home,—and such a home,—in the gay city Here he should tear down this row of cottages, and make his garden wall, there that long rope-walk should give place to vine-covered arbors, the bakery yonder should make way for a costly conservatory, that wine warehouse should come down, and the mansion go up It should be the finest in the state Men should never pass it, but they should say—"the palace of the De Charleus, a family of grand descent, a people of elegance and bounty, a line as old as France, a fine old man, and seven daughters as beautiful as happy, whoever dare attempt to marry there must leave his own name behind him!"

'The house should be of stones fitly set, brought down in ships from the land of "les Yankees," and it should have an airy belvedere, with a gilded image tip-toeing and shunning on its peak, and from it you should see, far across the gleaming folds of the river, the red roof of Belles Demoiselles, the country-seat At the big stone gate there should be a porter's lodge, and it should be a privilege even to see the ground'

Truly they were a family fine enough, and fancy-free enough to have fine wishes, yet happy enough where they were, to have had no wish but to live there always

To those, who, by whatever fortune, wandered into the garden of Belles Demoiselles some summer afternoon as the sky was reddening towards evening, it was lovely to see the family gathered out upon the tiled pavement at the foot of the broad front steps, gayly chatting and jesting, with that ripple of laughter that comes so pleasingly from a bevy of girls The father would be found seated in their midst, the centre of attention and compliment, witness, arbiter, umpire, critic, by his beautiful children's unanimous appointment, but the single vassal, too, of seven absolute sovereigns

Now they would draw their chairs near together in eager discussion of some new step in the dance, or the adjustment of some rich adornment Now they would start about him with excited comments to see the eldest fix a bunch of violets in his button-hole Now the twins would move down a walk after some unusual flower, and be greeted on their return with the high pitched notes of delighted feminine surprise.

As evening came on they would draw more quietly about their paternal centre Often their chairs were forsaken, and they grouped themselves on the lower steps, one above another, and surrendered themselves to the tender influences of the approaching night At such an hour the passer on the river, already attracted by the dark figures of the broad-roofed mansion, and its woody garden standing against the glowing sunset, would hear the voices of the hidden group rise from the spot in the soft harmonies of an evening song, swelling clearer and clearer as the thrill of music warmed them into feeling, and presently joined by the deeper tones of the father's voice, then, as the daylight passed quite away, all would be still, and he would know that the beautiful home had gathered its nestlings under its wings

And yet, for mere vagary, it pleased them not to be pleased

'Ar! called one sister to another in the broad hall, one morning,—mock amazement in her distended eyes,—'something is goin' to took place!'

'Comm-e-n-t'—long-drawn perplexity.

'Papa is goin' to town!'

The news passed up stairs

'Inno!—one to another meeting in a doorway,—'something is goin' to took place!'

'Qu'est-ce-que c'est'—vain attempt at gruffness

'Papa is goin' to town!'

The unusual tidings were true It was afternoon of the same day that the Colonel tossed his horse's bridle to his groom, and stepped up to old Charlie, who was sitting on his bench under a China-tree, his head, as was his fashion, bound in a Madras handkerchief The 'old man' was plainly under the effect of spirits, and smiled a deferential salutation without trusting himself to his feet

'Eh, well Charlie!—the Colonel raised his voice to suit his kinsman's deafness,—'how is those times with my friend Charlie?'

'Eh?' said Charlie, distractedly.

'Is that goin' well with my friend Charlie?'

'In de house,—call her,'—making a pretence of rising

'Non, non! I don't want,' the speaker paused to breathe—'ow is collection?'

'Oh!' said Charlie, 'every day he make me more poorer!'

'What do you hask for it?' asked the planter indifferently, designating the house by a wave of his whip

'Ask for w'at?' said Injin Charlie

'De house! What you ask for it?'

'I don't believe,' said Charlie

'What you would take for it!' cried the planter

'Wait for w'at?'

'What you would take for the whole block?'

'I don't want to sell him!'

'I'll give you ten thousand dollah for it'

'Ten t'ousand dollah for dis house? Oh, no, dat is no price He is blame good old house,—dat old house' (Old Charlie and the Colonel never swore in presence of each other) 'Forty years dat old house didn't had to be paint! I easy can get fifty t'ousand dollah for dat old house'

'Fifty thousand picayunes, yes,' said the Colonel

'She's a good house Can make plenty money,' pursued the deaf man

'That's what make you so rich, eh, Charlie?'

'Non, I don't make nothing Too blame clever, me, dat's de troub' She's a good house,—make money fast like a steamboat,—make a barrel full in a week! Me, I lose money all de days Too blame clever'

'Charlie!'

'Eh?'

'Tell me what you'll take'

'Make? I don't make nothing Too blame clever'

'What will you take?'

'Oh! I got enough already,—half drunk now'

'What will you take for the 'ouse?'

'You want to buy her?'

'I don't know,'—(shrug),—'maybe,—if you sell it cheap'

'She's a bully old house'

There was a long silence By and by old Charlie commenced—

'Old Injin Charlie is a low-down dog'

'C'est vrai, ou!' retorted the Colonel in an undertone

'He's got Injin blood in him'

The Colonel nodded assent.

'But he's got some blame good blood, too, ain't it?'

The Colonel nodded impatiently

'Bien! Old Charlie's Injin blood says, "sell de house, Charlie, you blame old fool!" Mais, old Charlie's good blood says, "Charlie! if you sell dat old house, Charlie, you low-down old dog, Charlie, what de Compte De Charleu make for you grace-granmuzzer, de dev' can eat you, Charlie, I don't care''

'But you'll sell it anyhow, won't you, old man?'

'No!' And the no rumbled off in muttered oaths like thunder out on the Gulf The incensed old Colonel wheeled and started off

'Curl!' (Colonel) said Charlie, standing up unsteadily

The planter turned with an inquiring frown

'I'll trade with you!' said Charlie

The Colonel was tempted 'Ow! you trade?' he asked

'My house for yours!'

The old Colonel turned pale with anger He walked very quickly back, and came close up to his kinsman

'Charlie!' he said

'Injin Charlie,'—with a tipsy nod

But by this time self-control was returning 'Sell Belles Demoiselles to you?' he said in a high key, and then laughed 'Ho, ho, ho!' and rode away

A cloud, but not a dark one, overshadowed the spirits of Belles Demoiselles' plantation. The old master, whose beaming presence had always made him a shining Saturn, spinning and sparkling within the bright circle of his daughters, fell into musing fits, started out of frowning reveries, walked often by himself, and heard business from his overseer fretfully

No wonder The daughters knew his closeness in trade, and attributed to it his failure to negotiate for the Old Charlie buildings,—so to call them They began to depreciate Belles Demoiselles If a north wind blew, it was too cold to ride If a shower had fallen, it was too muddy to drive In the morning the garden was wet.

In the evening the grasshopper was a burden Ennu was turned into capital, every headache was interpreted a premonition of ague, and when the native exuberance of a flock of ladies without a want or a care burst out in laughter in the father's face, they spread their French eyes, rolled up their little hands, and with rigid wrists and mock vehemence vowed and vowed again that they only laughed at their misery, and should pine to death unless they could 10 move to the sweet city 'Oh! the theatre! Oh! Orleans Street! Oh! the masquerade! the Place d'Armes! the ball!' and they would call upon Heaven with French irreverence, and fall into each other's arms, and whirl down the hall singing a waltz, end with a grand collision and fall, and, their eyes streaming merriment, lay the blame on the slippery floor, that would some day be the death of the whole seven

Three times more the fond father, thus goaded, managed, by accident,—business accident,—to see old Charlie and increase his offer, but in vain. He finally went to him formally

'Eh?' said the deaf and distant relative 'For what you want him, eh? Why you don't stay where you halways be 'appy? Dis is a blame old rat-hole,—good for old Injin 30 Charlie,—da's all. Why you don't stay where you be halways 'appy? Why you don't buy somewheres else?'

'That's none of your business,' snapped the planter. Truth was, his reasons were unsatisfactory even to himself.

A sullen silence followed. Then Charlie spoke

'Well, now, look here, I sell you old Charlie's house'

'Bien! and the whole block,' said the Colonel

'Hold on,' said Charlie. 'I sell you de 'ouse and de block. Den I go and git drunk, and go to sleep, de dev' comes along and says, "Charlie! old Charlie, you blame low-down old dog, wake up! What you doin' here? Where's de 'ouse what Monsieur le 50 Comte give your grace-gran-muzzer? Don't you see dat fine gentyman, De Charleu, done gone and tore him down and make him over new, you blame old fool, Charlie, you low-down old Injin dog!"'

'I'll give you forty thousand dollars,' said the Colonel

'For de 'ouse?'

'For all'

The deaf man shook his head

'Forty-five!' said the Colonel

'What a lie? For what you tell me "What a lie?" I don't tell you no lie'

'Non, non! I give you forty-five!' shouted the Colonel

Charlie shook his head again

'Fifty!'

He shook it again

The figures rose and rose to—

'Seventy-five!'

The answer was an invitation to go away and let the owner alone, as he was, in certain specified respects, the vilest of living creatures, and no company for a fine gentyman

The 'fine gentyman' longed to blaspheme,—but before old Charlie!—in the name of pride, how could he? He mounted and started away

'Tell you what I'll make wid you,' said Charlie

The other, guessing aright, turned back without dismounting, smiling

'How much Belles Demoiselles hoes me now?' asked the deaf one

'One hundred and eighty thousand dollars,' said the Colonel, firmly

'Yass,' said Charlie. 'I don't want Belles Demoiselles'

The old Colonel's quiet laugh intimated it made no difference either way

'But me,' continued Charlie, 'me,—I'm got le Comte De Charleu's blood in me, any'ow,—a litt' bit, any'ow, ain't it?'

The Colonel nodded that it was

'Bien! If I go out of dis place and don't 40 go to Belles Demoiselles, de peoples will say,—dey will say, "Old Charlie he been all doze time tell a blame lie! He ain't no kin to his old grace-gran-muzzer, not a blame bit! He don't got nary drop of De Charleu blood to save his blame low-down old Injin soul!"' No, sare! What I want wid money, den? No, sare! My place for yours!'

He turned to go into the house, just too soon to see the Colonel make an ugly whisk at him with his riding-whip. Then the Colonel, too, moved off

Two or three times over, as he ambled homeward, laughter broke through his annoyance, as he recalled old Charlie's fami-ly pride and the presumption of his offer Yet each time he could but think better of—not the offer to swap, but the preposterous ancestral loyalty It was so much better than he could have expected from his 'low-down' relative, and not unlike his own whim withal—the proposition which went with it was forgiven

This last defeat bore so harshly on the master of Belles Demoiselles, that the daughters, reading chagrin in his face, began to repent They loved their father as daughters can, and when they saw their pretended dejection harassing him seriously they restrained their complaints, displayed more than ordinary tenderness, and heroically and ostentatiously concluded there was no place like Belles Demoiselles But the new mood touched him more than the old, and only refined his discontent Here was a man, rich without the care of riches, free from any real trouble, happiness as native to his house as perfume to his garden, deliberately, as it were with premeditated malice, taking joy by the shoulder and bidding her be gone to town, whither he might easily have followed, only that the very same ancestral nonsense that kept Injun Charlie from selling the old place for twice its value prevented him from choosing any other spot for a city home.

But by and by the charm of nature and the merry hearts around him prevailed, the fit of exalted sulks passed off, and after a while the year flared up at Christmas, flickered, and went out

New Year came and passed, the beautiful garden of Belles Demoiselles put on its spring attire, the seven fair sisters moved from rose to rose, the cloud of discontent had warmed into invisible vapor in the rich sunlight of family affection, and on the common memory the only scar of last year's wound was old Charlie's sheer impertinence in crossing the caprice of the De Charleus The cup of gladness seemed to fill with the filling of the river

How high that river was! Its tremendous current rolled and tumbled and spun along, hustling the long funeral flotillas of drift,—and how near shore it came! Men were out day and night, watching the levee On windy nights even the old Colonel took part, and grew light-hearted with occupation and excitement, as every minute the river threw a white arm over the levee's top, as though it would vault over But all held fast, and, as the summer drifted in, the water sunk down into its banks and looked quite incapable of harm.

On a summer afternoon of uncommon mildness, old Colonel Jean Albert Henri Joseph De Charleu-Marot, being in a mood for revery, slipped the custody of his feminine rulers and sought the crown of the levee, where it was his wont to promenade Presently he sat upon a stone bench,—a favorite seat Before him lay his broadspread fields, near by, his lordly mansion, and being sull,—perhaps by female contact,—somewhat sentimental, he fell to musing on his past It was hardly worthy to be proud of All its morning was reddened with mad frolic, and far toward the meridian it was marred with elegant rioting Pride had kept him well-nigh useless, and despised the honors won by valor, gaming had dimmed prosperity, death had taken his heavenly wife, voluptuous ease had mortgaged his lands, and yet his house still stood, his sweet-smelling fields were still fruitful, his name was fame enough, and yonder and yonder, among the trees and flowers, like angels walking in Eden, were the seven goddesses of his only worship

Just then a slight sound behind him brought him to his feet He cast his eyes anxiously to the outer edge of the little strip of bank between the levee's base and the river There was nothing visible He paused, with his ear toward the water, his face full of frightened expectation Hal! There came a single plashing sound, like some great beast slipping into the river, and little waves in a wide semi-circle came out from under the bank and spread over the water!

'My God!'

He plunged down the levee and bounded through the low weeds to the edge of the bank It was sheer, and the water about four feet below He did not stand quite on the edge, but fell upon his knees a couple of yards away, wringing his hands, moaning and weeping, and staring through his watery eyes at a fine, long crevice just discernible under the matted grass, and curving outward on either hand toward the river

'My God!' he sobbed aloud, 'my God!' and even while he called, his God answered the tough Bermuda grass stretched and snapped, the crevice slowly became a gape, and softly, gradually, with no sound but the closing of the water at last, a ton or more of earth settled into the boiling eddy and disappeared

At the same instant a pulse of the breeze brought from the garden behind, the joyous, thoughtless laughter of the fair mistresses of Belles Demoiselles

The old Colonel sprang up and clambered over the levee. Then forcing himself to a more composed movement, he hastened into the house and ordered his horse

'Tell my children to make merry while I am gone,' he left word. 'I shall be back to-night,' and the horse's hoofs clattered down a by-road leading to the city

'Charlie,' said the planter, riding up to a window, from which the old man's night-cap was thrust out, 'what you say, Charlie,—my house for yours, eh, Charlie—what you say?'

'Elo!' said Charlie, 'from where you come from dis time of to-night?'

'I come from the Exchange in St. Louis Street' (A small fraction of the truth)

'What you want?' said matter-of-fact Charlie

'I come to trade'

The low-down relative drew the worsted off his ears. 'Oh! yass,' he said with an uncertain air

'Well, old man Charlie, what you say my house for yours,—like you said,—eh, Charlie?'

'I dunno,' said Charlie, 'it's nearly mine now. Why you don't stay dare youse'f?'

'Because I don't want!' said the Colonel savagely. 'Is dat reason enough for you? You better take me in de notion, old man, I tell you,—yes!'

Charlie never winced, but how his answer delighted the Colonel! Quoth Charlie

'I don't care—I take him!—mais, possession give right off'

'Not the whole plantation, Charlie, only'—

'I don't care,' said Charlie, 'we easy can fix dat. Mais, what for you don't want to keep him? I don't want him. You better keep him'

'Don't you try to make no fool of me, old man,' cried the planter

'Oh, no!' said the other. 'Oh, no! but you make a fool of yourself, ain't it?'

The dumbfounded Colonel stared, Charlie went on

'Yass! Belles Demoiselles is more wort' dan tree block like dis one. I pass by dare since two weeks. Oh, pritty Belles Demoiselles! De cane was wave in de wind, de garden smell like a bouquet, de white-cap was jump up and down on de river, seven belles demoiselles was ridin' on horses. "Pritty, pritty, pritty!" says old Charlie. Ah! Monsieur le père, 'ow 'appy, 'appy, 'appy!'

'Yass!' he continued—the Colonel still staring—'le Compte De Charleu have two familie. One was low-down Choctaw, one was high up noblesse. He gave the low-down Choctaw dis old rat-hole, he give Belles Demoiselles to you gran-fozzer, and now you don't be satisfait. What I'll do wid Belles Demoiselles? She'll break me in two years, yass. And what you'll do wid old Charlie's house, eh? You'll tear her down and make you'se'f a blame old fool. I rather wouldn't trade!'

The planter caught a big breathful of anger, but Charlie went straight on

'I rather wouldn't, mais I will do it for you,—just the same, like Monsieur le Compte would say, "Charlie, you old fool, I want to shange houses wid you"'

So long as the Colonel suspected irony he was angry, but as Charlie seemed, after all, to be certainly in earnest, he began to feel conscience-stricken. He was by no means a tender man, but his lately-discovered misfortune had unhinged him, and this strange, undeserved, disinterested family fealty on the part of Charlie touched his heart. And should he still try to lead him into the pitfall he had dug? He hesitated,—no, he would show him the place by broad daylight, and if he chose to overlook the 'caving bank,' it would be his own fault,—a trade's a trade

'Come,' said the planter, 'come at my house to-night, to-morrow we look at the place before breakfast, and finish the trade'

'For what?' said Charlie

'Oh, because I got to come in town in the morning'

'I don't want,' said Charlie. 'How I'm goin' to come dere?'

'I git you a horse at the liberty stable'

'Well—anyhow—I don't care—I'll go'
And they went

When they had ridden a long time, and were on the road darkened by hedges of Cherokee rose, the Colonel called behind him to the 'low-down' scion

'Keep the road, old man'

'Eh?'

'Keep the road'

'Oh, yes, all right, I keep my word, we 10 don't goin' to play no tricks, eh?'

But the Colonel seemed not to hear His ungenerous design was beginning to be hateful to him Not only old Charlie's unprovoked goodness was prevailing, the eulogy on Belles Demoiselles had stirred the depths of an intense love for his beautiful home True, if he held to it, the caving of the bank, at its present fearful speed, would let the house into the river within 20 three months, but were it not better to lose it so, than sell his birthright? Again,—coming back to the first thought,—to betray his own blood! It was only Injun Charlie, but had not the De Charleu blood just spoken out in him? Unconsciously he groaned

After a time they struck a path approaching the plantation in the rear, and a little after, passing from behind a clump of live- 30 oaks, they came in sight of the villa It looked so like a gem, shining through its dark grove, so like a great glow-worm in the dense foliage, so significant of luxury and gayety, that the poor master, from an overflowing heart, groaned again

'What?' asked Charlie

The Colonel only drew his rein, and, dismounting mechanically, contemplated the sight before him The high, arched doors 40 and windows were thrown wide to the summer air, from every opening the bright light of numerous candelabra darted out upon the sparkling foliage of magnolia and bay, and here and there in the spacious verandas a colored lantern swayed in the gentle breeze A sound of revel fell on the ear, the music of harps, and across one window, brighter than the rest, fluted, once or twice, the shadows of dancers But oh! the shadows flitting across the heart of the fair man- 50 sion's master!

'Old Charlie,' said he, gazing fondly at his house, 'You and me is both old, eh?'

'Yaas,' said the stolid Charlie

'And we has both been bad enough in our time, eh, Charlie?'

Charlie, surprised at the tender tone, repeated 'Yaas'

'And you and me is mighty close?'

'Blame close, yaas.'

'But you never know me to cheat, old man!'

'No,'—impassively

'And do you think I would cheat you now?'

'I dunno,' said Charlie 'I don't believe'

'Well, old man, old man,'—his voice began to quiver,—'I sha'n't cheat you now My God!—old man, I tell you—you better not make the trade!'

'Because for what?' asked Charlie in plain anger, but both looked quickly toward the house! The Colonel tossed his hands wildly in the air, rushed forward a step or two, and giving one fearful scream of agony and fright, fell forward on his face in the path Old Charlie stood transfixed with horror Belles Demoiselles, the realm of maiden beauty, the home of merriment, the house of dancing, all in the tremor and glow of pleasure, suddenly sunk, with one short, wild wail of terror—sunk, sunk, down, 30 down, down, into the merciless, unfathomable flood of the Mississippi

Twelve long months were midnight to the mind of the childless father, when they were only half gone, he took his bed, and every day, and every night, old Charlie, the 'low-down,' the 'fool,' watched him tenderly, tended him lovingly, for the sake of his name, his misfortunes, and his broken heart No woman's step crossed the floor of the sick-chamber, whose western dormer- 40 windows overpeered the dingy architecture of old Charlie's block, Charlie and a skilled physician, the one all interest, the other all gentleness, hope, and patience—these only entered by the door, but by the window came in a sweet-scented evergreen vine, transplanted from the caving bank of Belles Demoiselles It caught the rays of sunset in its flowery net and let them softly in upon the sick man's bed, gathered the glancing beams of the moon at midnight, and often wakened the sleeper to look, with his mindless eyes, upon their pretty silver fragments strewn upon the floor

By and by there seemed—there was—a twinkling dawn of returning reason Slowly, peacefully, with an increase unseen from day to day, the light of reason came into the eyes, and speech became coherent, but withal there came a failing of the wrecked body, and the doctor said that monsieur was both better and worse

One evening, as Charlie sat by the vine-clad window with his fireless pipe in his hand, the old Colonel's eyes fell full upon his own, and rested there

'Charl—,' he said with an effort, and his delighted nurse hastened to the bedside and bowed his best ear There was an unsuccessful effort or two, and then he whispered, smiling with sweet sadness,—

'We didn't trade'

The truth, in this case, was a secondary matter to Charlie, the main point was to give a pleasing answer So he nodded his head decidedly, as who should say—'Oh yes, we did, it was a bona-fide swap' but when he saw the smile vanish, he tried the other expedient and shook his head with still more vigor, to signify that they had not so much as approached a bargain, and the smile returned

Charlie wanted to see the vine recognized. He stepped backward to the window with a broad smile, shook the foliage, nodded and looked smart

'I know,' said the Colonel, with beaming eyes, '—many weeks'

The next day—

'Charl—'

The best ear went down

'Send for a priest'

The priest came, and was alone with him a whole afternoon When he left, the patient was very haggard and exhausted, but smiled and would not suffer the crucifix to be removed from his breast

One more morning came Just before dawn Charlie, lying on a pallet in the room, thought he was called, and came to the bedside

'Old man,' whispered the failing invalid, 'is it caving yet?'

Charlie nodded

'It won't pay you out'

'Oh, dat makes not'ing,' said Charlie. Two big tears rolled down his brown face 'Dat makes not'in'

The Colonel whispered once more

'Mes belles demoiselles' in paradise,—in the garden—I shall be with them at sunrise,' and so it was

'Bimeby, one day, arter Brer Fox bin doin' all dat he could fer ter ketch Brer Rabbit, en Brer Rabbit bin doin' all he could fer to keep 'im fum it, Brer Fox say to hisse'f dat he'd put up a game on Brer themselves in their original simplicity, and to wed them permanently to the quaint dialect—if, indeed, it can be called a dialect—through the medium of which they have become a part of the domestic history of every Southern family, and I have endeavored to give to the whole a genuine flavor of the old plantation

'Each legend has its variants, but in every instance I have retained that particular version which seemed to me to be the most characteristic, and have given it without embellishment and without exaggeration' Ibid., vii

Rabbit, en' he ain't mo'n got de wuds out'n his mouf twel Brer Rabbit come a lopin' up de big road, lookin' des ez plump, en ez fat, en ez sassy ez a Moggin hoss in a barley-patch

"Hol' on dar, Brer Rabbit," sez Brer Fox, sezee

"I ain't got time, Brer Fox," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, sorter mendin' his licks.

"I wanten have some confab wid you, Brer Rabbit," sez Brer Fox, sezee

"All right, Brer Fox, but you better hol-ler fum whar you stan' I'm monstus full er fleas dis mawnin'," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee.

"I seed Brer B'ar ystiddy," sez Brer Fox, sezee, "en he sorter rake me over de coals kaze you en me ain't make frens en live naberly, en I told 'im dat I'd see you "

"Den Brer Rabbit scratch one year wid his off hinefoot sorter jub'usly, en den he ups en sez, sezee

"All a settin', Brer Fox Spose'n you drap roun' ter-morrer en take dinner wid me We ain't got no great doin's at our house, but I speck de old 'oman en de chilluns kin sorter scramble roun' en git up sump'n fer ter stay yo' stummuck "

"I'm 'gree'ble, Brer Rabbit," sez Brer Fox, sezee

"Den I'll 'pen' on you," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee

"Nex' day, Mr Rabbit an' Miss Rabbit got up soon, 'fo' day, en raided on a gyarden like Miss Sally's out dar, en got some cabiges, en some roas'n years, en some sparrer-grass, en dey fixed up a smashin' dinner Bimeby onc er de little Rabbits, playin' out in de backyard, come runnin' in hollerin', "Oh, ma' oh, ma' I seed Mr Fox a comin'" En den Brer Rabbit he tuck de chilluns by der years en made um set down, en den him and Miss Rabbit sorter dally roun' waitin' for Brer Fox En dey keep on waitin', but no Brer Fox ain't come. Atter 'while Brer Rabbit goes to de do', easy like, en peep out, en dar, stickin' fum behume de cornder, wuz de tip-eeen' er Brer Fox tail Den Brer Rabbit shot de do' en sot down, en put his paws behume his years en begin fer ter sing

"De place wharbouts you spill de grease, Right dar youer boun' ter slide,
An' whar you fine a bunch er ha'r, You'll sholy fine de hide "

'Nex' day, Brer Fox sont word by Mr Mink an' skuze hisse'f kaze he wuz too sick fer ter come, en he ax Brer Rabbit fer to come en take dinner wid him, en Brer Rabbit say he wuz 'gree'ble

"Bimeby, w'en de shadders wuz at der shortes', Brer Rabbit he sorter brush up en santer down ter Brer Fox's house, en w'en he got dar, he hear somebody groanin', en he look in de do' en dar he see Brer Fox settin' up in a rockin' cheer all wrop up wid flannil, en he look mighty weak. Brer Rabbit look all 'roun', he did, but he ain't see no dinner De dish-pan wuz settin' on de table, en close by wuz a kyarvin' knufe

"Look like you gwineter have chicken fer dinner, Brer Fox," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee

"Yes, Brer Rabbit, deyer nice, en fresh, en tender," sez Brer Fox, sezee

"Den Brer Rabbit sorter pull his mustarsh, en say "You ain't got no calamus root, is you, Brer Fox? I done got so now dat I can't eat no chicken 'ceppin she's seasoned up wid calamus root " En wid dat Brer Rabbit lipt out er de do' and dodge 'mong de bushes, en sot dar watchin' fer Brer Fox, en he ain't watch long, nudder, kaze Brer Fox flung off de flannil en crope out er de house en got whar he could cloze in on Brer Rabbit, en bimeby Brer Rabbit holler out "Oh, Brer Fox! I'll des put yo' calamus root out yer on dis yer stump Better come git it while hit's fresh," and wid dat Brer Rabbit gallop off home En Brer Fox ain't never kotch 'im yit, en w'at's mo', honey, he ain't gwineter "

THE WONDERFUL TAR-BABY STORY

"DIDN'T the fox never catch the rabbit, Uncle Remus?" asked the little boy the next evening

"He come mighty nigh it, honey, sho's you born—Brer Fox did One day atter Brer Rabbit fool 'im wid dat calamus root, Brer Fox went ter wuk en got 'im some tar, en mix it wid some turkentime, en fix up a contrapshun wat he call a Tar-Baby, en he tuck dish yer Tar-Baby en he sot 'er in de big road, en den he lay off in de bushes fer to see wat de news wuz gwineter be En he didn't hatter wait long, nudder, kaze bimeby here come Brer Rabbit pacin' down de road—lippity-clippity, clippity-lippity—dez ez sassy ez a jay-bird Brer Fox, he lay low Brer Rabbit come prancin' 'long twel he spy de Tar-Baby, en den he fotch up on his behume legs like he wuz 'stonished De Tar-Baby, she sot dar, she did, en Brer Fox, he lay low

'“Mawnin’!” sez Brer Rabbit, sezee “Nice wedder dis mawnin’,” sezee.

“Tar-Baby ain’t sayin’ nothin’, en Brer 10 Fox, he lay low

“How duz yo’ sym’tums seem ter segashuate?” sez Brer Rabbit, sezee “Brer Fox, he wink his eye slow, en lay low, en de Tar-Baby, she ain’t saying nothin’

“How you come on, den? Is you deaf?” sez Brer Rabbit, sezee “Kaze if you is, I kin holler louder,” sezee

“Tar-Baby stay still, en Brer Fox, he lay 20
low

“Youer stuck up, dat’s w’at you is,” says Brer Rabbit, sezee, “en I’m gwineter kyore you, dat’s w’at I’m a gwineter do,” sezee

“Brer Fox, he sorter chuckle in his stummuck, he did, but Tar-Baby ain’t sayin’
nothin’

“I’m gwineter larn you howter talk ter ‘specttubble fokes ef hut’s de las’ ack,” sez 30 Brer Rabbit, sezee “Ef you don’t take off dat hat en tell me howdy, I’m gwineter bus’ you wide open,” sezee

“Tar-Baby stay still, en Brer Fox, he lay
low

“Brer Rabbit keep on axin’ ‘im, en de Tar-Baby she keep on sayin’ nothin’, twel present’y Brer Rabbit draw back wid his fis’, he did, en blip he tuck ‘er side er de head Right dar’s whar he broke his mer-lasses jug His fis’ stuck, en he can’t pull loose De tar hilt ‘im But Tar-Baby, she stay still, en Brer Fox, he lay low “Ef you don’t lemme loose, I’ll knock you agin,” sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, en wid dat he fotch ‘er a wipe wid de udder han’, en dat stuck Tar-Baby, she ain’t sayin’ nothin’, en Brer Fox, he lay low “Tu’n me loose, fo’ I kick de natal stuffin’ outen you,” sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, 50 but de Tar-Baby, she ain’t sayin’ nothin’ She des hilt on, en den Brer Rabbit lose de use er his feet in de same way Brer Fox, he lay low Den Brer Rabbit squall out dat ef de Tar-Baby don’t tu’n ‘im loose he butt ‘er cranksided En den he butted, en his head got stuck Den Brer Fox, he sa’ntered fort’, lookin’ des ez innercent ez one er yo mammy’s mockin’ birds

“Howdy, Brer Rabbit,” sez Brer Fox, sezee “You look sorter stuck up dis mawnin’,” sezee, en den he rolled on de groun’, en laughed en laughed twel he couldn’t laugh no mo’ “I speck you’ll take dinner wid me dis time, Brer Rabbit I done laid in some calamus root, en I ain’t gwine-ter take no skuse,” sez Brer Fox, sezee

Here Uncle Remus paused, and drew a two-pound yam out of the ashes

“Did the fox eat the rabbit?” asked the little boy to whom the story had been told

“Dat’s all de fur de tale goes,” replied the old man “He mout, en den agin he moutent Some say Jedge B’ar come ‘long en loosed ‘im—some say he didn’t I hear Miss Sally callin’ You better run ‘long’

HOW MR RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR FOX

“UNCLE REMUS,” said the little boy one evening, when he had found the old man with little or nothing to do, “did the fox kill and eat the rabbit when he caught him with the Tar-Baby?”

“Law, honey, ain’t I tell you ‘bout dat?” replied the old darkey, chuckling slyly “I ‘clar ter grashus I ought er tole you dat, but old man Nod wuz ridin’ on my eyeleds ‘twel a leetle mo’n I’d a dis’member’d my own name, en den on to dat here come yo’ mammy hollerin’ atter you

“W’at I tell you w’en I fus’ begin? I tole you Brer Rabbit wuz a monstus soon creetur, leas’ways dat’s w’at I laid out fer ter tell you Well, den, honey, don’t you go en make no udder calkalashuns, kaze in dem days Brer Rabbit en his fambly wuz at de head er de gang w’en enny racket wuz on han’, en dar dey stayed ‘Fo’ you begins fer ter wipe yo’ eyes ‘bout Brer Rabbit, you wait en see whar‘bouts Brer Rabbit gwine-ter fetch up at But dat’s needer yer ner dar.

“W’en Brer Fox fine Brer Rabbit mxt up wid de Tar-Baby, he feel mighty good, en he roll on de groun’ en laff Bimeby he up’n say, sezee

“Well, I speck I got you dis time, Brer

Rabbit," sezee, "maybe I ain't, but I speck I is You been runnin' roun' here sassin' atter me a mighty long time, but I speck you done come ter de een' er de row You bin cuttin' up yo' capers en bouncin' 'roun' in dis neighborhood ontwel you come ter b'leeve yo'se'f de boss er de whole gang En den youer allers some'rs whar you got no bizness," sez Brer Fox, sezee "Who ax you fer ter come en strike up a 'quaintance wid dish yer Tar-Baby? En who stuck you up dar whar you iz? Nobody in de roun' worril You des tuck en jam yo'se'f on dat Tar-Baby widout waitin' fer enny invite," sez Brer Fox, sezee, "en dar you is, en dar you'll stay twel I fixes up a bresh-pile and fires her up, kaze I'm gwineter bobbycue you dis day, sho," sez Brer Fox, sezee

'Den Brer Rabbit talk mighty 'umble

"I don't keer w'at you do wid me, Brer Fox," sezee, "so you don't fling me in dat brier-patch Roas' me, Brer Fox," sezee, "but don't fling me in dat brier-patch," sezee

"Hit's so much trouble fer ter kindle a fier," sez Brer Fox, sezee, "dat I speck I'll hatter hang you," sezee

"Hang me dcs ez high as you please, Brer Fox," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, "but do fer de Lord's sake don't fling me in dat brier-patch," sezee

"I ain't got no string," sez Brer Fox, sezee, "en now I speck I'll hatter drown you," sezee

"Drown me des ez deep ez you please, Brer Fox," sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, "but do don't fling me in dat brier-patch," sezee

"Dey ain't no water nigh," sez Brer Fox, sezee, "en now I speck I'll hatter skin you," sezee

"Skin me, Brer Fox," sez Brer Rabbit sezee, "snatch out my eyeballs, t'ar out my years by de roots, en cut off my legs," sezee, "but do please, Brer Fox, don't fling me in dat brier-patch," sezee

'Co'se Brer Fox wanten hurt Brer Rabbit bad ez he kin, so he cotch 'im by de behime legs en slung 'im right in de middle er de brier-patch Dar wuz a considerbul flutter whar Brer Rabbit struck de bushes, en Brer Fox sorter hang 'roun' fer ter see w'at wuz gwineter happen Bimeby he hear somebody call 'im, en way up de hill he see Brer Rabbit settin' cross-legged on a chinkapin log koamin' de pitch ouden his har wid a chip Den Brer Fox know dat he bin swop off mighty bad Brer Rabbit wuz bleedzed fer ter fling back some er his sass, en he holler out

"Bred en bawn in a brier-patch, Brer Fox—bred en bawn in a brier-patch!" en wid dat he skip out des ez lively ez a cricket in de embers'

FROM CHITA

THE LEGEND OF L'ÎLE DERNIÈRE<sup>1</sup>

I

TRAVELLING south from New Orleans to the Islands, you pass through a strange land into a strange sea, by various winding waterways You can journey to the Gulf by lugger if you please, but the trip may be made much more rapidly and agreeably on some one of those light, narrow steamers, built especially for bayou-travel, which usually receive passengers at a point not far from the foot of old Saint-Louis Street, hard by the sugar-landing, where there is ever a pushing and flocking of steam-craft—all striving for place to rest their white breasts against the levee, side by side,—like great weary swans But the miniature steamboat on which you engage passage to the Gulf never lingers long in the Mississippi she crosses the river, slips into some canal-mouth, labors along the artificial channel awhile, and then leaves it with a scream of joy, to puff her free way down many a league of heavily shadowed bayou Perhaps thereafter she may bear you through the immense silence of drenched ricefields, where the yellow-green level is broken at long intervals by the black silhouette of some irrigating machine,—but, whichever of the five different routes be pursued, you will find yourself more than once floating through sombre mazes of swamp-forest,—past assemblages of cypresses all hoary with the parasitic tillandsia, and grotesque as gatherings of fetch-gods. Ever from river or from lakelet the steamer glides again into canal or bayou,—from bayou or canal once more into lake or bay, and sometimes the swamp-forest visibly thins away from these shores into wastes of reedy morass where, even of breathless nights, the quaggy soil trembles to a sound like thunder of breakers on a coast the storm-roar of billions of reptile voices chanting in cadence,—rhythmically surging in stupendous crescendo and diminuendo,—a monstrous and appalling chorus of frogs! .

Panting, screaming, scraping her bottom over the sand-bars,—all day the little steamer strives to reach the grand blaze of blue open water below the marsh-lands, and perhaps she may be fortunate enough to enter the Gulf about the time of sunset. For the sake of passengers, she travels by day only, but there are other vessels which make the journey also by night—threading the bayou-labyrinths winter and summer sometimes steering by the North Star,—sometimes feeling the way with poles in the white season of fogs,—sometimes, again, steering by that Star of Everung which in our sky glows like another moon, and drops over the silent lakes as she passes a quivering trail of silver fire.

Shadows lengthen, and at last the woods dwindle away behind you into thin bluish lines,—land and water alike take more luminous color,—bayous open into broad passes,—lakes link themselves with sea-bays,—and the ocean-wind bursts upon you,—keen, cool, and full of light. For the first time the vessel begins to swing,—rocking to the great living pulse of the tides. And gazing from the deck around you, with no forest walls to break the view, it will seem to you that the low land must have once been rent asunder by the sea, and strewn about the Gulf in fantastic tatters . . .

Sometimes above a waste of wind-blown prairie-cane you see an oasis emerging,—a ridge or hillock heavily umbraged with the rounded foliage of evergreen oaks—a chemere. And from the shining flood also kindred green knolls arise,—pretty islets, each with its beach-girdle of dazzling sand and shells, yellow-white,—and all radiant with semi-tropical foliage, myrtle and palmetto, orange and magnolia. Under their emerald shadows curious little villages of palmetto huts are drowsing, where dwell a swarthy population of Orientals,—Malay fishermen, who speak the Spanish-Creole of the Philippines as well as their own Tagal, and perpetuate in Louisiana the Catholic traditions of the Indies. There are girls in those unfamiliar villages worthy to inspire any statuary,—beautiful with the beauty of ruddy bronze,—gracile as the palmettoes that sway above them. Further seaward you may also pass a Chinese settlement some queer camp of wooden dwellings clustering around a vast platform that stands above the water upon a thousand piles,—over the miniature wharf you can scarcely fail to observe a white sign-board painted with crimson ideographs. The great platform is used for drying fish in the sun, and the fantastic characters of the sign, literally translated, mean 'Heap—Shrimp—Plenty'. And finally all the land melts down into desolations of sea-marsh, whose stillness is seldom broken, except by the melancholy cry of long-legged birds, and in wild seasons by that sound which shakes all shores when the weird Musician of the Sea touches the bass keys of his mighty organ.

II

Beyond the sea-marshes a curious archipelago lies. If you travel by steamer to the sea-islands to-day, you are tolerably certain to enter the Gulf by Grande Pass—skirting Grande Terre, the most familiar island of all, not so much because of its proximity as because of its great crumbling fort and its graceful pharos the stationary White-Light of Barataria. Otherwise the place is bleakly uninteresting—a wilderness of wind-swept grasses and sinewy weeds waving away from a thin beach ever speckled with drift and decaying things,—worm-riddled timbers, dead porpoises. Eastward the russet level is broken by the columnar silhouette of the light-house, and again, beyond it, by some puny scrub timber, above which rises the angular ruddy mass of the old brick fort, whose ditches swarm with crabs, and whose sluiceways are half choked by obsolete cannon-shot, now thickly covered with incrustation of oyster shells Around all the gray circling of a sharkhaunted sea. .

Sometimes of autumn evenings there, when the hollow of heaven flames like the interior of a chalice, and waves and clouds are flying in one wild rout of broken gold, —you may see the tawny grasses all covered with something like husks,—wheat-colored husks,—large, flat, and disposed evenly along the lee-side of each swaying stalk, so as to present only their edges to the wind. But, if you approach, those pale husks all break open to display strange splendors of scarlet and seal-brown, with arabesque mottlings in white and black they change into wondrous living blossoms, which detach themselves before your eyes and rise in air, and flutter away by thousands to settle down farther off, and turn into wheat-colored husks once more a whirling flower-drift of sleepy butterflies!

Southwest, across the pass, gleams beautiful Grande Isle primitively a wilderness of palmetto (latamer),—then drained, diked, and cultivated by Spanish sugar-planters, and now familiar chiefly as a bathing-resort. Since the war the ocean reclaimed its own,—the cane-fields have degenerated into sandy plains, over which tramways wind to the smooth beach,—the plantation-residences have been converted into rustic hotels, and the negro-quarters remodelled into villages of cozy cottages for the reception of guests. But with its imposing groves of oak, its golden wealth of orange-trees, its odorous lanes of oleander, its broad grazing-meadows yellow-starred with wild camomile, Grande Isle remains the prettiest island of the Gulf, and its loveliness is exceptional. For the bleakness of Grande Terre is reiterated by most of the other islands,—Caillou, Cassetête, Calumet, Wine Island, the twin Timbali-ers, Gull Island, and the many islets haunted by the gray pelican,—all of which are little more than sand-bars covered with wiry grasses, prairie-cane, and scrub-timber.
Last Island (L'Île Dermere),—well worthy a long visit in other years, in spite of its remoteness, is now a ghastly desolation twenty-five miles long. Lying nearly forty miles west of Grande Isle, it was nevertheless far more populated a generation ago:

it was not only the most celebrated island of the group, but also the most fashionable watering-place of the aristocratic South;— to-day it is visited by fishermen only, at long intervals. Its admirable beach in many respects resembled that of Grande Isle to-day; the accommodations also were much similar, although finer a charming village of cottages facing the Gulf near the western end. The hotel itself was a massive two-story construction of timber, containing many apartments, together with a large dining-room and dancing-hall. In the rear of the hotel was a bayou, where passengers landed—'Village Bayou' it is still called by seamen,—but the deep channel which now cuts the island in two a little eastwardly did not exist while the village remained. The sea tore it out in one night—the same night when trees, fields, dwellings, all vanished into the Gulf, leaving no vestige of former human habitation except a few of those strong brick props and foundations upon which the frame houses and cisterns had been raised. One living creature was found there after the cataclysm—a cow! But how that solitary cow survived the fury of a storm-flood that actually rent the island in twain has ever remained a mystery. . . .

III

On the Gulf side of these islands you may observe that the trees—when there are any trees—all bend away from the sea, and, even of bright, hot days when the wind sleeps, there is something grotesquely pathetic in their look of agonized terror. A group of oaks at Grande Isle I remember as especially suggestive: five stooping silhouettes in line against the horizon, like fleeing women with streaming garments and wind-blown hair,—bowing grievously and thrusting out arms desperately northward as to save themselves from falling. And they are being pursued indeed,—for the sea is devouring the land. Many and many a mile of ground has yielded to the tireless charging of Ocean's cavalry far out you can see, through a good glass, the porpoises at play where of old the sugar-cane shook out its million bannerets; and shark-fins now seam deep water above a site where pigeons used to coo. Men build dikes, but the besieging tides bring up their battering-rams—whole forests of drift—huge trunks of water-oak and weighty cypress. Forever the yellow Mississippi strives to build, forever the sea struggles to destroy,—and amid their eternal strife the islands and the promontories change shape, more slowly, but not less fantastically, than the clouds of heaven.

And worthy of study are those wan battle-grounds where the woods made their last brave stand against the irresistible invasion,—usually at some long point of seamarsh, widely fringed with billowing sand. Just where the waves curl beyond such a point you may discern a multitude of blackened, snaggy shapes protruding above the water,—some high enough to resemble ruined chimneys, others bearing a startling likeness to enormous skeleton-feet and skeleton-hands,—with crustaceous white growths clinging to them here and there like remnants of integument. These are bodies and limbs of drowned oaks,—so long drowned that the shell-scurf is inch-thick upon parts of them. Farther in upon the beach immense trunks lie overthrown. Some look like vast broken columns, some suggest colossal torsos imbedded, and seem to reach out mutilated stumps in despair from their deepening graves,—and beside these are others which have kept their feet with astounding obstinacy, although the barbarian tides have been charging them for twenty years, and gradually torn away the soil above and beneath their roots. The sand around,—soft beneath and thinly crusted upon the surface,—is everywhere pierced with holes made by a beautifully mottled and semi-diaphanous crab, with hairy legs, big staring eyes, and milk-white claws,—while in the green sedges beyond there is a perpetual rustling, as of some strong wind beating among reeds, a marvellous creeping of ‘fiddlers,’ which the inexperienced visitor might at first mistake for so many peculiar beetles, as they run about sideways, each with his huge single claw folded upon his body like a wing-case. Year by year that rustling strip of green land grows narrower, the sand spreads and sinks, shuddering and wrinkling like a living brown skin, and the last standing corpses of the oaks, ever clinging with naked, dead feet to the sliding beach, lean more and more out of the perpendicular. As the sands subside, the stumps appear to creep, their intertwined masses of snakish roots seem to crawl, to writhe,—like the reaching arms of cephalopods.

Grande Terre is going the sea mines her fort, and will before many years carry the ramparts by storm. Grande Isle is going,—slowly but surely the Gulf has eaten three miles into her meadowed land. Last Island has gone! How it went I first heard from the lips of a veteran pilot, while we sat one evening together on the trunk of a drifted cypress which some high tide had pressed deeply into the Grande Isle beach. The day had been tropically warm, we had sought the shore for a breath of living air. Sunset came, and with it the ponderous heat lifted,—a sudden breeze blew,—lightnings flickered in the darkening horizon,—wind and water began to strive together,—and soon all the low coast boomed. Then my companion began his story, perhaps the coming of the storm inspired him to speak! And as I listened to him, listening also to the clamoring of the coast, there flashed back to me recollection of a singular Breton fancy that the Voice of the Sea is never one voice, but a tumult of many voices—voices of drowned men,—the muttering of multitudinous dead,—the moaning of innumerable ghosts, all rising, to rage against the living, at the great Witch-call of storms.

IV

The charm of a single summer day on these island shores is something impossible to express, never to be forgotten. Rarely, in the paler zones, do earth and heaven take such luminosity: those will best understand me who have seen the splendor of a West Indian sky. And yet there is a tenderness of tint, a caress of color, in these Gulf-days which is not of the Antilles,—a spirituality, as of eternal tropical spring. It must have been to even such a sky that Xenophanes lifted up his eyes of old when he vowed the Infinite Blue was God,—it was indeed under such a sky that De Soto named the vastest and grandest of Southern havens Espiritu Santo,—the Bay of the Holy Ghost. There is a something unutterable in this bright Gulf-air that compels awe,—something vital, something holy, something pantheistic, and reverentially the mind asks itself if what the eye beholds is not the Πνεῦμα indeed, the Infinite Breath, the Divine Ghost, the great Blue Soul of the Unknown All, all is blue in the calm,—save the low land under your feet, which you almost forget, since it seems only as a tiny green flake afloat in the liquid eternity of day. Then slowly, caressingly, irresistibly, the witchery of the Infinite grows upon you out of Time and Space you begin to dream with open eyes,—to drift into delicious oblivion of facts,—to forget the past, the present, the substantial,—to com-

And this day-magic of azure endures sometimes for months together Cloudlessly the dawn reddens up through a violet east there is no speck upon the blossoming of its Mystical Rose,—unless it be the silhouette of some passing gull, whirling his sickle-wings against the crimsoning Ever, as the sun floats higher, the flood shifts its color Sometimes smooth and gray, yet flickering with the morning gold, it is the vision of John,—the apocalyptic Sea of Glass mixed with fire,—again, with the growing breeze, it takes that incredible purple tint familiar mostly to painters of West Indian scenery,—once more, under the blaze of noon, it changes to a waste of broken emerald With evening, the horizon assumes tints of inexpressible sweetness,—pearl-lights, opaline colors of milk and fire, and in the west are topaz-glowings and wondrous flushings as of nacre Then, if the sea sleeps, it dreams of all these,—faintly, weirdly,—shadowing them even to the verge of heaven

Beautiful, too, are those white phantasmagoria which, at the approach of equinoctial days, mark the coming of the winds Over the rim of the sea a bright cloud gently pushes up its head It rises, and others rise with it, to right and left—slowly at first, then more swiftly All are brilliantly white and flocculent, like loose new cotton Gradually they mount in enormous line high above the Gulf, rolling and wreathing into an arch that expands and advances,—bending from horizon to horizon A clear, cold breath accompanies its coming Reaching the zenith, it seems there to hang poised awhile,—a ghostly bridge arching the empyrean,—upreaching its measureless span from either underside of the world Then the colossal phantom begins to turn, as on a pivot of air,—always preserving its curvilinear symmetry, but moving its unseen ends beyond and below the sky-circle And at last it floats away unbroken beyond the blue sweep of the world, with a wind following after. Day after day, almost at the same hour, the white arc rises, wheels, and passes . . .

. Never a glimpse of rock on these low shores,—only long sloping beaches and bars of smooth tawny sand Sand and sea teem with vitality,—over all the dunes there is a constant susurrant, a blattering and swarming of crustacea,—through all the sea there is a ceaseless play of silver lightning,—flashing of myriad fish Sometimes the shallows are thickened with minute, transparent, crab-like organisms,—all colorless as gelatine There are days also when countless medusæ drift in—beautiful veined creatures that throb like hearts, with perpetual systole and diastole of their diaphanous envelops some, of translucent azure or rose, seem in the flood the shadows or ghosts of huge campanulate flowers,—others have the semblance of strange living vegetables,—great milky tubers, just beginning to sprout But woe to the human skin grazed by those shadowy sproutings and spectral stamens!—the touch of glowing iron is not more painful . . . Within an hour or two after their appearance all these tremulous jellies vanish mysteriously as they came

Perhaps, if a bold swimmer, you may venture out alone a long way—once! Not twice!—even in company As the water deepens beneath you, and you feel those ascending wave-currents of coldness arising which bespeak profundity, you will also begin to feel innumerable touches, as of groping fingers—touches of the bodies of fish, innumerable fish, fleeing towards shore The farther you advance, the more thickly you will feel them come, and above you and around you, to right and left, others will leap and fall so swiftly as to daze the sight, like intercrossing fountain-jets of fluid silver The gulls fly lower about you, circling with sinister squeaking cries,—perhaps for an instant your feet touch in the deep something heavy, swift, lithe, that rushes past with a swirling shock Then the fear of the Abyss, the vast and voiceless Nightmare of the Sea, will come upon you, the silent panic of all those opaline millions that flee glimmering by will enter into you also. . . .

From what do they flee thus perpetually? Is it from the giant sawfish or the ravening shark?—from the herds of the porpoises, or from the grande-écaille,—that splendid monster whom no net may hold,—all helmed and armored in argent plate-mail?—or from the hideous devil-fish of the Gulf,—gigantic, flat-bodied, black, with immense side-fins ever outspread like the pinions of a bat,—the terror of luggermen, the uprooter of anchors? From all these, perhaps, and from other monsters likewise—goblin shapes evolved by Nature as destroyers, as equilibrists, as counterchecks to that prodigious fecundity, which, unhindered, would thicken the deep into one measureless and waveless ferment of being

But when there are many bathers these perils are forgotten,—numbers give courage,—one can abandon one's self, without fear of the invisible, to the long, quivering, electrical caresses of the sea.

V

Thirty years ago, Last Island lay steeped in the enormous light of even such magical days. July was dying,—for weeks no fleck of cloud had broken the heaven's blue dream of eternity, winds held their breath, slow wavelets caressed the bland brown beach with a sound as of kisses and whispers. To one who found himself alone, beyond the limits of the village and beyond the hearing of its voices,—the vast silence, the vast light, seemed full of weirdness. And these hushes, these transparencies, do not always inspire a causeless apprehension: they are omens sometimes—omens of coming tempest. Nature,—incomprehensible Sphinx!—before her mightiest bursts of rage, ever puts forth her divinest witchery, makes more manifest her awful beauty. . . .

But in that forgotten summer the witchery lasted many long days,—days born in rose-light, buried in gold. It was the height of the season. The long myrtle-shadowed village was thronged with its summer population,—the big hotel could hardly accommodate all its guests,—the bathing-houses were too few for the crowds who flocked to the water morning and evening.

There were diversions for all,—hunting and fishing parties, yachting excursions, rides, music, games, promenades. Carriage wheels whirled flickering along the beach, seaming its smoothness noiselessly, as if muffled Love wrote its dreams upon the sand. . . .

Then one great noon, when the blue abyss of day seemed to yawn over the world more deeply than ever before, a sudden change touched the quicksilver smoothness of the waters—the swaying shadow of a vast motion. First the whole sea-circle appeared to rise up bodily at the sky, the horizon-curve lifted to a straight line, the line darkened and approached,—a monstrous wrinkle, an immeasurable fold of green water, moving swift as a cloud-shadow pursued by sunlight. But it had looked formidable only by startling contrast with the previous placidity of the open: it was scarcely two feet high,—it curled slowly as it neared the beach, and combed itself out in sheets of woolly foam with a low, rich roll of whispered thunder. Swift in pursuit another followed—a third—a feebler fourth, then the sea only swayed a little, and smiled again. Minutes passed, and the immeasurable heaving recommenced—one, two, three, four—seven long swells this time,—and the Gulf smoothed itself once more. Irregularly the phenomenon continued to repeat itself, each time with heavier billowing and briefer intervals of quiet—until at last the whole sea grew restless and shifted color and flickered green,—the swells became shorter and changed form. Then from horizon to shore ran one uninterrupted heaving—one vast green swarming of snaky shapes, rolling in to hiss and flatten upon the sand. Yet no single cirrus-speck revealed itself through all the violet heights: there was no wind!—you might have fancied the sea had been upheaved from beneath.

And indeed the fancy of a seismic origin for a windless surge would not appear in these latitudes to be utterly without foundation. On the fairest days a southeast breeze may bear you an odor singular enough to startle you from sleep,—a strong, sharp smell as of fish-oil, and gazing at the sea you might be still more startled at the sudden apparition of great oleaginous patches spreading over the water, sheeting over the swells. That is, if you had never heard of the mysterious submarine oil-wells, the volcanic fountains, unexplored, that well up with the eternal pulsing of the Gulf-Stream

But the pleasure-seekers of Last Island knew there must have been a 'great blow' somewhere that day. Still the sea swelled, and a splendid surf made the evening bath delightful. Then, just at sundown, a beautiful cloud-bridge grew up and arched the sky with a single span of cottony pink vapor, that changed and deepened color with the dying of the iridescent day. And the cloud-bridge approached, stretched, strained, and swung round at last to make way for the coming of the gale,—even as the light bridges that traverse the dreamy Têche swing open when luggermen sound through their conch-shells the long, bellowing signal of approach.

Then the wind began to blow, with the passing of July. It blew from the northeast, clear, cool. It blew in enormous sighs, dying away at regular intervals, as if pausing to draw breath. All night it blew, and in each pause could be heard the answering moan of the rising surf,—as if the rhythm of the sea moulded itself after the rhythm of the air,—as if the waving of the water responded precisely to the waving of the wind,—a billow for every puff, a surge for every sigh.

The August morning broke in a bright sky,—the breeze still came cool and clear from the northeast. The waves were running now at a sharp angle to the shore; they began to carry fleeces, an innumerable flock of vague green shapes, wind-driven to be despoiled of their ghostly wool. Far as the eye could follow the line of the beach, all the slope was white with the great shearing of them. Clouds came, flew as in a panic against the face of the sun, and passed. All that day and through the night and into the morning again the breeze continued from the northeast, blowing like an equinoctial gale.

Then day by day the vast breath freshened steadily, and the waters heightened. A week later sea-bathing had become perilous. Colossal breakers were herding in, like moving leviathan-backs, twice the height of a man. Still the gale grew, and the billowing waxed mightier, and faster and faster overhead flew the tatters of torn cloud. The gray morning of the 9th wanly lighted a surf that appalled the best swimmers; the sea was one wild agony of foam, the gale was rending off the heads of the waves and veiling the horizon with a fog of salt spray. Shadowless and gray the day remained, there were mad bursts of lashing rain. Evening brought with it a sinister apparition, looming through a cloud-rent in the west—a scarlet sun in a green sky. His sanguine disk, enormously magnified, seemed barred like the body of a belted planet. A moment, and the crimson spectre vanished, and the moonless night came.

Then the Wind grew weird. It ceased being a breath, it became a Voice moaning across the world,—hooting,—uttering nightmare sounds,—Whoo!—whoo!—whoo!—and with each stupendous owl-cry the moaning of the waters seemed to deepen, more and more abysmally, through all the hours of darkness. From the northwest the breakers of the bay began to roll high over the sandy slope, into the salines,—the village bayou broadened to a bellowing flood.

So the tumult swelled and the turmoil heightened until morning,—a morning of gray gloom and whistling rain. Rain of bursting clouds and rain of wind-blown brine from the great spuming agony of the sea.

The steamer Star was due from St. Mary's that fearful morning. Could she come? No one really believed it,—no one. And nevertheless men struggled to the roaring beach to look for her, because hope is stronger than reason.

Even to-day, in these Creole islands, the advent of the steamer is the great event of the week. There are no telegraph lines, no telephones; the mailpacket is the only trustworthy medium of communication with the outer world, bringing friends, news, letters. The magic of steam has placed New Orleans nearer to New York than to the Timbaleers, nearer to Washington than to Wine Island, nearer to Chicago than to Baratania Bay. And even during the deepest sleep of waves and winds there will come betimes to sojourners in this unfamiliar archipelago a feeling of lonesomeness that is a fear, a feeling of isolation from the world of men,—totally unlike that sense of solitude which haunts one in the silence of mountain-heights, or amid the eternal tumult of lofty granitic coasts a sense of helpless insecurity. The land seems but an undulation of the sea-bed its highest ridges do not rise more than the height of a man above the salines on either side,—the salines themselves lie almost level with the level of the flood-tides,—the tides are variable, treacherous, mysterious. But when all around and above these ever-changing shores the twin vastnesses of heaven and sea begin to utter the tremendous revelation of themselves as infinite forces in contention, then indeed this sense of separation from humanity appals.

Perhaps it was such a feeling which forced men, on the tenth day of August, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, to hope against hope for the coming of the Star, and to strain their eyes towards far-off Terrebonne 'It was a wind you could lie down on,' said my friend the pilot

'Great God!' shrieked a voice above the shouting of the storm,—'she is coming!'

It was true. Down the Atchafalaya, and thence through strange mazes of bayou, lakelet, and pass, by a rear route familiar only to the best of pilots, the frail river-craft had toiled into Caillou Bay, running close to the main shore,—and now she was heading right for the island, with the wind aft, over the monstrous sea. On she came, swaying, rocking, plunging,—with a great whiteness wrapping her about like a cloud, and moving with her moving,—a tempest-whirl of spray,—ghost-white and like a ghost she came, for her smoke-stacks exhaled no visible smoke—the wind devoured it! The excitement on shore became wild,—men shouted themselves hoarse, women laughed and cried. Every telescope and opera-glass was directed upon the coming apparition, all wondered how the pilot kept his feet, all marvelled at the madness of the captain.

But Captain Abraham Smith was not mad. A veteran American sailor, he had learned to know the great Gulf as scholars know deep books by heart: he knew the birthplace of its tempests, the mystery of its tides, the omens of its hurricanes. While lying at Brashear City he felt the storm had not yet reached its highest, vaguely foresaw a mighty peril, and resolved to wait no longer for a lull. 'Boys,' he said, 'we've got to take her out in spite of Hell!' And they 'took her out.' Through all the peril, his men stayed by him and obeyed him. By mid-morning the wind had deepened to a roar,—lowering sometimes to a rumble, sometimes bursting upon the ears like a measureless and deafening crash. Then the captain knew the Star was running a race with Death. 'She'll win it,' he muttered,—'she'll stand it. . . . Perhaps they'll have need of me to-night.'

She won! With a sonorous steamchant of triumph the brave little vessel rode at last into the bayou, and anchored hard by her accustomed resting-place, in full view of the hotel, though not near enough to shore to lower her gang-plank. . . . But she had sung her swan-song. Gathering in from the northeast, the waters of the bay were already marbling over the salines and half across the island, and still the wind increased its paroxysmal power.

Cottages began to rock. Some slid away from the solid props upon which they rested. A chimney tumbled. Shutters were wrenched off, verandas demolished. Light roofs lifted, dropped again, and flapped into ruin. Trees bent their heads to the earth. And still the storm grew louder and blacker with every passing hour.

The Star rose with the rising of the waters, dragging her anchor. Two more anchors were put out, and still she dragged—dragged in with the flood,—twisting, shuddering, careening in her agony. Evening fell, the sand began to move with the wind, stinging faces like a continuous fire of fine shot, and frenzied blasts came to buffet the steamer forward, sideward. Then one of her hog-chains parted with a clang like the boom of a big bell. Then another!

Then the captain bade his men to cut away all her upper works, clean to the deck. Overboard into the seething went her stacks, her pilot-house, her cabins,—and whirled away. And the naked hull of the Star, still dragging her three anchors, labored on through the darkness, nearer and nearer to the immense silhouette of the hotel, whose hundred windows were now all aflame. The vast timber building seemed to defy the storm. The wind, roaring round its broad verandas,—hussing through every crevice with the sound and force of steam,—appeared to waste its rage. And in the half-lull between two terrible gusts there came to the captain's ears a sound that seemed strange in that night of multitudinous terrors . . . a sound of music!

VI

. Almost every evening throughout the season there had been dancing in the great hall,—there was dancing that night also. The population of the hotel had been augmented by the advent of families from other parts of the island, who found their summer cottages insecure places of shelter there were nearly four hundred guests assembled. Perhaps it was for this reason that the entertainment had been prepared upon a grander plan than usual, that it assumed the form of a fashionable ball. And all those pleasure-seekers,—representing the wealth and beauty of the Creole parishes,—whether from Ascension or Assumption, St Mary's or St Landry's, Iberville or Terrebonne, whether inhabitants of the multi-colored and many-balconied Creole quarter of the quaint metropolis, or dwellers in the dreamy paradises of the Têche,—mingled joyously, knowing each other, feeling in some sort akin—whether affiliated by blood, connaturalized by caste, or simply interassociated by traditional sympathies of class sentiment and class interest. Perhaps in the more than ordinary merriment of that evening something of nervous exaltation might have been discerned,—something like a feverish resolve to oppose apprehension with gayety, to combat uneasiness by diversion. But the hours passed in mirthfulness, the first general feeling of depression began to weigh less and less upon the guests, they had found reason to confide in the solidity of the massive building, there were no positive terrors, no outspoken fears, and the new conviction of all had found expression in the words of the host himself,—'Il n'y a rien de mieux à faire que de s'amuser!' Of what avail to lament the prospective devastation of cane-fields,—to discuss the possible ruin of crops? Better to seek solace in choregraphic harmonies, in the rhythm of gracious motion and of perfect melody, than hearken to the discords of the wild orchestra of storms,—wiser to admire the grace of Parisian toilets, the eddy of trailing robes with its fairy-foam of lace, the ivory loveliness of glossy shoulders and jewelled throats, the glimmering of satın-slipped feet,—than to watch the raging of the flood without, or the flying of the wrack .

So the music and the mirth went on they made joy for themselves—those elegant guests,—they jested and sipped rich wines,—they pledged, and hoped, and loved, and promised, with never a thought of the morrow, on the night of the tenth of August, eighteen hundred and fifty-six. 10
Observant parents were there, planning for the future bliss of their nearest and dearest,—mothers and fathers of handsome lads, lithe and elegant as young pines, and fresh from the polish of foreign university training,—mothers and fathers of splendid girls whose simplest attitudes were witcheries. Young cheeks flushed, young hearts fluttered with an emotion more puissant than the excitement of the dance,—young eyes betrayed the happy secret discreeter lips would have preserved. Slave-servants circled through the aristocratic press, bearing dainties and wines, praying permission to pass in terms at once humble and officious,—always in the excellent French which well-trained house-servants were taught to use on such occasions. 20

Night wore on still the shining floor palpitated to the feet of the dancers, still the piano-forte pealed, and still the violins sang,—and the sound of their singing shrilled through the darkness, in gasps of the gale, to the ears of Captain Smith, as he strove to keep his footing on the spray-drenched deck of the Star. 30

—'Christ!' he muttered,—'a dance! If that wind whips round south, there'll be another dance! . . . But I guess the Star will stay.' 40

Half an hour might have passed, still the lights flamed calmly, and the violins trilled, and the perfumed whirl went on . . . And suddenly the wind veered!

Again the Star reeled, and shuddered, and turned, and began to drag all her anchors. But she now dragged away from the great building and its lights,—away from the voluptuous thunder of the grand piano,—even at that moment outpouring the great joy of Weber's melody orchestrated by Berlioz l'Invitation à la Valse,—with its marvellous musical swing! 50

—'Waltzing!' cried the captain 'God help them!—God help us all now! . .

The Wind waltzes to-might, with the Sea for his partner! . . .

O the stupendous Valse-Tourbillon! O the mighty Dancer! One—two—three! From northeast to east, from east to south-east, from southeast to south then from the south he came, whirling the Sea in his arms

Some one shrieked in the midst of the revels,—some girl who found her pretty slippers wet What could it be? Thin streams of water were spreading over the level planking,—curling about the feet of the dancers What could it be? All the land had begun to quake, even as, but a moment before, the polished floor was trembling to the pressure of circling steps,—all the building shook now, every beam uttered its groan What could it be?

There was a clamor, a panic, a rush to the windy night Infinite darkness above and beyond, but the lantern-beams danced far out over an unbroken circle of heaving and swirling black water Stealthily, swiftly, the measureless sea-flood was rising —‘Messieurs—mesdames, ce n’est rien 30 Nothing serious, ladies, I assure you . . . Mais nous en avons vu bien souvent, les inondations comme celle-ci, ça passe vite! The water will go down in a few hours, ladies,—it never rises higher than this, il n’y a pas le moindre danger, je vous dis! Allons! il n’y a— My God! what is that?’ . . .

For a moment there was a ghastly hush of voices And through that hush there burst upon the ears of all a fearful and unfamiliar sound, as of a colossal cannonade— 40 rolling up from the south, with volleying lightnings Vastly and swiftly, nearer and nearer it came,—a ponderous and unbroken thunder-roll, terrible as the long muttering of an earthquake

The nearest mainland,—across mad Caillou Bay to the sea-marshes,—lay twelve miles north, west, by the Gulf, the nearest solid ground was twenty miles distant 50 There were boats, yes!—but the stoutest swimmer might never reach them now!

Then rose a frightful cry,—the hoarse, hideous, indescribable cry of hopeless fear, —the despairing animal-cry man utters when suddenly brought face to face with Nothingness, without preparation, without consolation, without possibility of respite

Sauve qui peut! Some wrenched down the doors, some clung to the heavy banquet-tables, to the sofas, to the billiard-tables—during one terrible instant,—against fruitless heroisms, against futile 10 generousities,—raged all the frenzy of selfishness, all the brutalities of panic And then—then came, thundering through the blackness, the giant swells, boom on boom!

One crash!—the huge frame building rocks like a cradle, seesaws, crackles What are human shrieks now?—the tornado is shrieking! Another!—chandeliers splinter, lights are dashed out, a sweeping cataract 20 hurls in the immense hall rises,—oscillates,—twirls as upon a pivot,—crepitates,—crumbles into ruin Crash again!—the swirling wreck dissolves into the wallowing of another monster billow, and a hundred cottages overturn, spin in sudden eddies, quaver, disjoint, and melt into the scething

. . . So the hurricane passed,—tearing off the heads of the prodigious waves, to hurl them a hundred feet in air,—heaping up the ocean against the land,—upturning the woods Bays and passes were swollen to abysses, rivers regorged, the sea-marshes were changed to raging wastes of water Before New Orleans the flood of the mile-broad Mississippi rose six feet above highest water-mark One hundred and ten miles away, Donaldsonville trembled at the towering tide of the Lafourche Lakes strove to burst their boundaries Far-off river steamers 40 tugged wildly at their cables,—shivering like tethered creatures that hear by night the approaching howl of destroyers Smoke-stacks were hurled overboard, pilot-houses torn away, cabins blown to fragments

And over roaring Kaimbuck Pass,—over the agony of Caillou Bay,—the billowing tide rushed unresisted from the Gulf,—tearing and swallowing the land in its course,—ploughing out deep-sea channels 50 where sleek herds had been grazing but a few hours before,—rending islands in twain,—and ever bearing with it, through the night, enormous vortex of wreck and vast wan drift of corpses . . .

But the Star remained. And Captain Abraham Smith, with a long, good rope about his waist, dashed again and again into that awful surging to snatch victims from death,—clutching at passing hands, heads, garments, in the cataract-sweep of the seas,—saving, aiding, cheering, though blinded by spray and battered by drifting wreck, until his strength failed in the unequal struggle at last, and his men drew him aboard senseless, with some beautiful half-drowned girl safe in his arms. But well-nigh twoscore souls had been rescued by him, and the Star stayed on through it all.

Long years after, the weed-grown ribs of her graceful skeleton could still be seen, curving up from the sand-dunes of Last Island, in valiant witness of how well she stayed

VII

Day breaks through the flying wrack, over the infinite heaving of the sea, over the low land made vast with desolation. It is a spectral dawn—a wan light, like the light of a dying sun.

The wind has waned and veered, the flood sinks slowly back to its abysses—abandoning its plunder,—scattering its piteous waifs over bar and dune, over shoal and marsh, among the silences of the mango-swamps, over the long low reaches of sand-grasses and drowned weeds, for more than a hundred miles. From the shell-reefs of Pointe-au-Fer to the shallows of Pelto Bay the dead lie mingled with the high-heaped drift,—from their cypress groves the vultures rise to dispute a share of the feast with the shrieking frigate-birds and squeaking gulls. And as the tremendous tide withdraws its plunging waters, all the pirates of air follow the great white-gleaming retreat—a storm of billowing wings and screaming throats.

And swift in the wake of gull and frigate-bird the Wreckers come, the Spoilers of the dead,—savage skimmers of the sea,—hurricane-riders wont to spread their canvas-pinions in the face of storms, Sicilian and Corsican outlaws, Manila-men from the marshes, deserters from many navies, Las-cars, marooners, refugees of a hundred nationalities,—fishers and shrimpers by name, smugglers by opportunity,—wild channel-finders from obscure bayous and unfamiliar chémères, all skilled in the mysteries of these mysterious waters beyond the comprehension of the oldest licensed pilot. . . .

There is plunder for all—birds and men. There are drowned sheep in multitude, heaped carcasses of kine. There are casks of claret and kegs of brandy and legions of bottles bobbing in the surf. There are billiard-tables overturned upon the sand,—there are sofas, pianos, footstools and music-stools, luxurious chairs, lounges of bamboo. There are chests of cedar, and toilet-tables of rosewood, and trunks of fine stamped leather stored with precious apparel. There are objets de luxe innumerable. There are children's playthings, French dolls in marvellous toilets, and toy carts, and wooden horses, and wooden spades, and brave little wooden ships that rode out the gale in which the great Nautilus went down. There is money in notes and in coin—in purses, in pocket-books, and in pockets plenty of it! There are silks, satins, laces, and fine linen to be stripped from the bodies of the drowned,—and necklaces, bracelets, watches, finger-rings and fine chains, brooches and trinkets. 'Chi bidizza!—Oh! chi bedda mughieri! Eccu, la bidizza!'<sup>1</sup> That ball-dress was made in Paris by—But you never heard of him, Sicilian Vicenzu. 'Che bella sposina!'<sup>2</sup> Her betrothal ring will not come off, Giuseppe, but the delicate bone snaps easily your oyster-knife can sever the tendon. . . . 'Guardate! chi bedda picciota!'<sup>3</sup> Over her heart you will find it, Valentuno—the locket held by that fine Swiss chain of woven hair—'Caya man-an!'<sup>4</sup> And it is not your quadroom bondsmaid, sweet lady, who now disrobes you so roughly, those Malay hands are less deft than hers,—but she slumbers very far away from you, and may not be aroused from her sleep. 'No quita mo' dalaga!—na quita maganda!'<sup>5</sup> Juan, the fastenings of those diamond ear-drops are much too complicated for you; peon fingers tear them out!—'Dispense, chulita!'<sup>6</sup> . . .

1 'What a beauty!—Oh, what a beautiful woman! I look at the beauty!'

2 'What a lovely little bride!'

3 'Look! What a beautiful girl!'

4 'The wealth!'

5 'Have you seen it, lady? Have you seen the beauty?'

6 'Excuse me, my love!'

. . . Suddenly a long, mighty silver trilling fills the ears of all there is a wild hurrying and scurrying, swiftly, one after another, the overburdened luggers spread wings and flutter away.

Thrice the great cry rings rippling through the gray air, and over the green sea, and over the far-flooded shell-reefs, where the huge white flashes are,—sheet-lightning of breakers,—and over the weird wash of corpses coming in.

It is the steam-call of the relief-boat, hastening to rescue the living, to gather in the dead

The tremendous tragedy is over!

SARAH ORNE JEWETT

1849-1909

FROM THE COUNTRY OF THE POINTED FIRS

GREEN ISLAND<sup>1</sup>

I

WE were standing where there was a fine view of the harbor and its long stretches of shore all covered by the great army of the pointed firs, darkly cloaked and standing as if they waited to embark. As we looked far seaward among the outer islands, the trees seemed to march seaward still, going steadily over the heights and down to the water's edge.

It had been growing gray and cloudy, like the first evening of autumn, and a shadow had fallen on the darkening shore. Suddenly, as we looked, a gleam of golden sunshine struck the outer islands, and one of them shone out clear in the light, and revealed itself in a compelling way to our eyes. Mrs. Todd was looking off across the bay with a face full of affection and interest. The sunburst upon that outermost island made it seem like a sudden revelation of the world beyond this which some believe to be so near.

"That's where mother lives," said Mrs. Todd. "Can't we see it plain? I was brought up out there on Green Island. I know every rock an' bush on it."

"Your mother?" I exclaimed, with great interest.

"Yes, dear, cert'in, I've got her yet, old's I be. She's one of them spry, light-footed little women, always was, an' lighthearted, too," answered Mrs. Todd, with satisfaction. "She's seen all the trouble folks can see, without it's her last sickness, an' she's 10 got a word of courage for everybody. Life ain't spoilt her a mite. She's eighty-six an' I'm sixty-seven, and I've seen the time I've felt a good sight the oldest. "Land sakes alive!" says she, last time I was out to see her. "How you do lurch about steppin' into a bo't!" I laughed so I liked to have gone right over into the water, an' we pushed off, an' left her laughin' there on the shore."

The light had faded as we watched. Mrs.
20 Todd had mounted a gray rock, and stood there grand and architectural, like a caryatide.
Presently she stepped down, and we continued our way homeward.

"You an' me, we'll take a bo't an' go out some day and see mother," she promised me. "'Twould please her very much, an' there's one or two sca'ce herbs grows better on the island than anywhere else. I ain't seen their like nowhere here on the main."

30 "Now I'm goin' right down to get us each a mug o' my beer," she announced as we entered the house, "an' I believe I'll sneak in a little mite o' camomile. Goin' to the funeral an' all, I feel to have had a very wearin' afternoon."

I heard her going down into the cool little cellar, and then there was considerable delay. When she returned, mug in hand, I noticed the taste of camomile, in 40 spite of my protest, but its flavor was disguised by some other herb that I did not know, and she stood over me until I drank it all and said that I liked it.

"I don't give that to everybody," said Mrs.
Todd kindly; and I felt for a moment as if it were part of a spell and incantation, and as if my enchantress would now begin to look like the cobweb shapes of the arctic town. Nothing happened but a quiet evening and some delightful plans that we made about going to Green Island, and on the morrow there was the clear sunshine and blue sky of another day

II

One morning, very early, I heard Mrs Todd in the garden outside my window By the unusual loudness of her remarks to a passer-by, and the notes of a familiar hymn which she sang as she worked among the herbs, and which came as if directed purposely to the sleepy ears of my consciousness, I knew that she wished I would wake up and come and speak to her

In a few minutes she responded to a morning voice from behind the blinds 'I expect you're goin' up to your schoolhouse to pass all this pleasant day, yes, I expect you're goin' to be dreadful busy,' she said despairingly

'Perhaps not,' said I 'Why, what's going to be the matter with you, Mrs Todd?' For I supposed that she was tempted by the fine weather to take one of her favorite expeditions along the shore pastures to gather herbs and simples, and would like to have me keep the house

'No, I don't want to go nowhere by land,' she answered gayly,—'no, not by land, but I don't know's we shall have a better day all the rest of the summer to go out to Green Island an' see mother I waked up early thinkin' of her The wind's light northeast,—'twill take us right straight out, an' this time o' year it's liable to change round southwest an' fetch us home pretty, 'long late in the afternoon Yes, it's goin' to be a good day'

'Speak to the captain and the Bowden boy, if you see anybody going by toward the landing,' said I 'We'll take the big boat'

'Oh, my sakes! now you let me do things my way,' said Mrs Todd scornfully 'No, dear, we won't take no big bo't I'll just git a handy dory, an' Johnny Bowden an' me, we'll man her ourselves I don't want no abler bo't than a good dory, an' a nice light breeze ain't goin' to make no sea, an' Johnny's my cousin's son,—mother'll like to have him come, an' he'll be down to the herrin' weirs all the time we're there, anyway, we don't want to carry no men folks havin' to be considered every minute an' takin' up all our time No, you let me do, we'll just slip out an' see mother by ourselves I guess what breakfast you'll want's about ready now'

I had become well acquainted with Mrs Todd as landlady, herb-gatherer, and rustic philosopher, we had been discreet fellow-passengers once or twice when I had sailed up the coast to a larger town than Dunnet Landing to do some shopping, but I was yet to become acquainted with her as a mariner An hour later we pushed off from the landing in the desired dory The tide was just on the turn, beginning to fall, and several friends and acquaintances stood along the side of the dilapidated wharf and cheered us by their words and evident interest Johnny Bowden and I were both rowing in haste to get out where we could catch the breeze and put up the small sail which lay clumsily furled along the gunwale Mrs Todd sat aft, a stern and unbending lawgiver

'You better let her drift, we'll get there 'bout as quick, the tide'll take her right out from under these old buildin's, there's plenty wind outside'

'Your bo't ain't trimmed proper, Mis' Todd!' exclaimed a voice from shore 'You're lo'ded so the bo't'll drag, you can't git her before the wind, ma'am You set 'midships, Mis' Todd, an' let the boy hold the sheet 'n' steer after he gits the sail up, you won't never git out to Green Island that way She's lo'ded bad, your bo't is,—she's heavy behind's she is now!'

Mrs Todd turned with some difficulty and regarded the anxious adviser, my right oar flew out of water, and we seemed about to capsize 'That you, Asa? Good-mornin',' she said politely 'I al'ays liked the starn seat best When'd you git back from up country?'

This allusion to Asa's origin was not lost upon the rest of the company We were some little distance from shore, but we could hear a chuckle of laughter, and Asa, a person who was too ready with his criticism and advice on every possible subject, turned and walked indignantly away.

When we caught the wind we were soon on our seaward course, and only stopped to underrun a trawl, for the floats of which Mrs Todd looked earnestly, explaining that her mother might not be prepared for three extra to dinner, it was her brother's trawl, and she meant to just run her eye along for the right sort of a little haddock. I leaned over the boat's side with great interest and excitement, while she skillfully handled the long line of hooks, and made scornful remarks upon worthless, bait-consuming creatures of the sea as she reviewed them and left them on the trawl or shook them off into the waves. At last we came to what she pronounced a proper haddock, and having taken him on board and ended his life resolutely, we went our way.

As we sailed along I listened to an increasingly delightful commentary upon the islands, some of them barren rocks, or at best giving sparse pasturage for sheep in the early summer. On one of these an eager little flock ran to the water's edge and bleated at us so affectingly that I would willingly have stopped, but Mrs. Todd steered away from the rocks, and scolded at the sheep's mean owner, an acquaintance of hers, who grudged the little salt and still less care which the patient creatures needed. The hot midsummer sun makes prisons of these small islands that are a paradise in early June, with their cool springs and short thick-growing grass. On a larger island, farther out to sea, my entertaining companion showed me with glee the small houses of two farmers who shared the island between them, and declared that for three generations the people had not spoken to each other even in times of sickness or death or birth. 'When the news come that the war was over, one of 'em knew it a week, and never stepped across his wall to tell the others,' she said. 'There, they enjoy it they've got to have somethin' to interest 'em in such a place, 'us a good deal more tryin' to be tied to folks you don't like than 'us to be alone. Each of 'em tells the neighbors their wrongs, plenty likes to hear and tell again, them as fetch a bone'll carry one, an' so they keep the fight a-goin'.' I must say I like variety myself, some folks washes Monday an' irons Tuesday the whole year round, even if the circus is goin' by!

A long time before we landed at Green Island we could see the small white house, standing high like a beacon, where Mrs. Todd was born and where her mother lived, on a green slope above the water, with dark spruce woods still higher. There were crops in the fields, which we presently distin-gushed from one another. Mrs. Todd examined them while we were still far at sea. 'Mother's late potatoes looks backward, ain't had rain enough so far,' she pronounced her opinion. 'They look weedier than what they call Front Street down to Cowper Centre. I expect brother William is so occupied with his herrin' weirs an' servin' out bait to the schooners that he don't think once a day of the land.'

'What's the flag for, up above the spruces there behind the house?' I inquired, with eagerness.

'Oh, that's the sign for herrin',' she explained kindly, while Johnny Bowden regarded me with contemptuous surprise. 'When they get enough for schooners they raise that flag, an' when 'tis a poor catch in the weir pocket they just fly a little signal down by the shore, an' then the small bo'ts comes and get enough an' over for their trawls. There, look! there she is, mother sees us, she's wavin' somethin' out o' the fore door! She'll be to the landin'-place quick's we are.'

I looked, and could see a tiny flutter in the doorway, but a quicker signal had made its way from the heart on shore to the heart on the sea.

'How do you suppose she knows it's me?' said Mrs. Todd, with a tender smile on her broad face. 'There, you never get over bein' a child long's you have a mother to go to. Look at the chumney, now, she's gone right in an' brightened up the fire. Well, there, I'm glad mother's well, you'll enjoy seein' her very much.'

Mrs. Todd leaned back into her proper position, and the boat trimmed again. She took a firmer grasp of the sheet, and gave an impatient look up at the gaff and the leech of the little sail, and twitched the sheet as if she urged the wind like a horse. There came at once a fresh gust, and we seemed to have doubled our speed. Soon we were near enough to see a tiny figure with handkerchiefed head come down across the field and stand waiting for us at the cove above a curve of pebble beach.

Presently the dory grated on the pebbles, and Johnny Bowden, who had been kept in abeyance during the voyage, sprang out and used manful exertions to haul us up with the next wave, so that Mrs. Todd could make a dry landing.

'You done that very well,' she said, mounting to her feet, and coming ashore somewhat stiffly, but with great dignity, refusing our outstretched hands, and returning to possess herself of a bag which had lain at her feet

'Well, mother, here I be!' she announced with indifference, but they stood and beamed in each other's faces

'Lookin' pretty well for an old lady, ain't she?' said Mrs Todd's mother, turning away from her daughter to speak to me. She was a delightful little person herself, with bright eyes and an affectionate air of expectation like a child on a holiday. You felt as if Mrs Blackett were an old and dear friend before you let go her cordial hand. We all started together up the hill

'Now don't you haste too fast, mother,' said Mrs Todd warningly, ' 'tis a far reach o' risin' ground to the fore door, and you won't set an' get your breath when you're once there, but go trotting about. Now don't you go a mite faster than we proceed with this bag an' basket. Johnny, there, 'll fetch up the haddock. I just made one stop to underrun William's trawl till I come to jes' such a fish's. I thought you'd want to make one o' your nice chowders of I've brought an onion with me that was layin' about on the window-sill at home '

'That's just what I was wantin',' said the hostess. 'I give a sigh when you spoke o' chowder, knowin' my onions was out. William forgot to replenish us last time he was to the Landin'. Don't you haste so yourself, Almiry, up this risin' ground. I hear you commencin' to wheeze a'ready '

This mild revenge seemed to afford great pleasure to both giver and receiver. They laughed a little, and looked at each other affectionately, and then at me. Mrs Todd considerably paused, and faced about to regard the wide sea view. I was glad to stop, being more out of breath than either of my companions, and I prolonged the halt by asking the names of the neighboring islands. There was a fine breeze blowing, which we felt more there on the high land than when we were running before it in the dory

'Why, this ain't that kitten I saw when I was out last, the one that I said didn't appear likely?' exclaimed Mrs Todd as we went our way

'That's the one, Almiry,' said her mother

'She always had a likely look to me, an' she's right after her business. I never see such a mouser for one of her age. If 't wan't for William, I never should have housed that other dronin' old thing so long, but he sets by her on account of her havin' a bob tail. I don't deem it advisable to maintain cats just on account of their havin' bob tails, they're like all other curiosities, good for them that wants to see 'em twice. This kitten catches mice for both, an' keeps me respectable as I ain't been for a year. She's a real understandin' little help, this kitten is. I picked her from among five Miss Augusta Pennell had over to Burnt Island,' said the old woman, trudging along with the kitten close at her skirts. 'Augusta, she says to me, "Why, Mis' Blackett, you've took the homeliest," an' says I, "I've got the smartest, I'm satisfied "'

'I'd trust nobody sooner 'n you to pick out a kitten, mother,' said the daughter handsomely, and we went on in peace and harmony

The house was just before us now, on a green level that looked as if a huge hand had scooped it out of the long green field we had been ascending. A little way above, the dark spruce woods began to climb the top of the hill and cover the seaward slopes of the island. There was just room for the small farm and the forest, we looked down at the fish-house and its rough sheds, and the weirs stretching far out into the water. As we looked upward, the tops of the firs came sharp against the blue sky. There was a great stretch of rough pasture-land round the shoulder of the island to the eastward, and here were all the thick-scattered gray rocks that kept their places, and the gray backs of many sheep that forever wandered and fed on the thin sweet pasturage that fringed the ledges and made soft hollows and strips of green turf like growing velvet. I could see the rich green of bayberry bushes here and there, where the rocks made room. The air was very sweet, one could not help wishing to be a citizen of such a complete and tiny continent and home of fisherfolk

The house was broad and clean, with a roof that looked heavy on its low walls. It was one of the houses that seem firm-rooted in the ground, as if they were two-thirds below the surface, like icebergs. The front door stood hospitably open in expect-tation of company, and an orderly vine grew at each side, but our path led to the kitchen door at the house-end, and there grew a mass of gay flowers and greenery, as if they had been swept together by some diligent garden broom into a tangled heap there were portulacas all along under the lower step and straggling off into the grass, and clustering mallows that crept as near as they dared, like poor relations I saw the bright eyes and brainless little heads of two half-grown chickens who were snuggled down among the mallows as if they had been chased away from the door more than once, and expected to be again

'It seems kind o' formal comin' in this way,' said Mrs Todd impulsively, as we passed the flowers and came to the front doorstep, but she was mindful of the proprieties, and walked before us into the best room on the left

'Why, mother, if you haven't gone an' turned the carpet!' she exclaimed, with something in her voice that spoke of awe and admiration 'When'd you get to it? I s'pose Mis' Addicks come over an' helped you, from White Island Landing'

'No, she didn't,' answered the old woman, standing proudly erect, and making the most of a great moment 'I done it all myself with William's help He had a spare day, an' took right holt with me, an' 'twas all well beat on the grass, an' turned, an' put down again afore we went to bed I ripped an' sewed over two o' them long breadths I ain't had such a good night's sleep for two years'

'There, what do you think o' havin' such a mother as that for eighty-six year old?' said Mrs Todd, standing before us like a large figure of Victory.

As for the mother, she took on a sudden look of youth, you felt as if she promised a great future, and was beginning, not ending, her summers and their happy toils

'My, my!' exclaimed Mrs Todd. 'I couldn't ha' done it myself, I've got to own it'

'I was much pleased to have it off my mind,' said Mrs Blackett, humbly, 'the more so because along at the first of the next week I wasn't very well I suppose it may have been the change of weather'

Mrs Todd could not resist a significant glance at me, but, with charming sympathy, she forbore to point the lesson or to connect this illness with its apparent cause She loomed larger than ever in the little old-fashioned best room, with its few pieces of good furniture and pictures of national interest The green paper curtains were stamped with conventional landscapes of a foreign order,—castles on inaccessible crags, and lovely lakes with steep wooded shores, under-foot the treasured carpet was covered thick with home-made rugs There were empty glass lamps and crystallized bouquets of grass and some fine shells on the narrow mantelpiece

'I was married in this room,' said Mrs Todd unexpectedly, and I heard her give a sigh after she had spoken, as if she could not help the touch of regret that would forever come with all her thoughts of happiness

'We stood right there between the windows,' she added, 'and the minister stood here William wouldn't come in He was always odd about seem' folks, just's he is now I run to meet 'em from a child, an' William, he'd take an' run away'

'I've been the gainer,' said the old mother cheerfully 'William has been son an' daughter both since you was married off the island He's been 'most too satisfied to stop at home 'long o' his old mother, but I always tell 'em I'm the gainer'

We were all moving toward the kitchen as if by common instinct The best room was too suggestive of serious occasions, and the shades were all pulled down to shut out the summer light and air It was indeed a tribute to Society to find a room set apart for her behests out there on so apparently neighborless and remote an island Afternoon visits and evening festivals must be few in such a bleak situation at certain seasons of the year, but Mrs Blackett was of those who do not live to themselves, and who have long since passed the line that divides mere self-concern from a valued share in whatever Society can give and take There were those of her neighbors who never had taken the trouble to furnish a best room, but Mrs Blackett was one who knew the uses of a parlor

'Yes, do come right out into the old kitchen, I shan't make any stranger of you,' she invited us pleasantly, after we had been properly received in the room appointed to formality 'I expect Almury, here, 'll be drifun' out 'mongst the pasture-weeds quick's she can find a good excuse 'Tis hot now You'd better content yourselves till you get nice an' rested, an' 'long after dinner the sea-breeze'll spring up, an' then you can take your walks, an' go up an' see the prospect from the big ledge Almury'll want to show off everything there is Then I'll get you a good cup o' tea before you start to go home The days are plenty long now'

While we were talking in the best room the selected fish had been mysteriously brought up from the shore, and lay all cleaned and ready in an earthen crock on the table

'I think William might have just stopped an' said a word,' remarked Mrs Todd, pouting with high affront as she caught sight of it 'He's friendly enough when he comes ashore, an' was remarkable social the last time, for him'

'He ain't disposed to be very social with the ladies,' explained William's mother, with a delightful glance at me, as if she counted upon my friendship and tolerance 'He's very particular, and he's all in his old fishin'-clothes to-day He'll want me to tell him everything you said and done, after you've gone William has very deep affections He'll want to see you, Almury Yes, I guess he'll be in by an' by'

'I'll search for him by 'n' by, if he don't,' proclaimed Mrs Todd, with an air of unalterable resolution 'I know all of his burrows down 'long the shore I'll catch him by hand 'fore he knows it I've got some business with William, anyway I brought forty-two cents with me that was due him for them last lobsters he brought in'

'You can leave it with me,' suggested the little old mother, who was already stepping about among her pots and pans in the pantry, and preparing to make the chowder

I became possessed of a sudden unwonted curiosity in regard to William, and felt that half the pleasure of my visit would be lost if I could not make his interesting acquaintance

III

Mrs Todd had taken the onion out of her basket and laid it down upon the kitchen table 'There's Johnny Bowden come with us, you know,' she reminded her mother 'He'll be hungry enough to eat his size'

'I've got new doughnuts, dear,' said the little old lady. 'You don't often catch William 'n' me out o' provisions I expect you might have chose a somewhat larger fish, but I'll try an' make it do. I shall have to have a few extra potatoes, but there's a field full out there, an' the hoe's leanin' against the well-house, in 'mongst the clumbin'-beans' She smiled, and gave her daughter a commanding nod

'Land sakes alive! Le's blow the horn for William,' insisted Mrs Todd, with some excitement 'He needn't break his spirit so far's to come in He'll know you need him for something particular, an' then we can call to him as he comes up the path I won't put him to no pan'

Mrs Blackett's old face, for the first time, wore a look of trouble, and I found it necessary to counteract the teasing spirit of Almura It was too pleasant to stay indoors altogether, even in such rewarding companionship, besides, I might meet William, and straying out presently, I found the hoe by the well-house and an old splint basket at the woodshed door, and also found my way down to the field where there was a great square patch of rough, weedy potato-tops and tall ragweed One corner was already dug, and I chose a fat-looking hill where the tops were well withered There is all the pleasure that one can have in gold-digging in finding one's hopes satisfied in the riches of a good hill of potatoes I longed to go on, but it did not seem frugal to dig any longer after my basket was full, and at last I took my hoe by the middle and lifted the basket to go back up the hill I was sure that Mrs Blackett must be waiting impatiently to slice the potatoes into the chowder, layer after layer, with the fish

'You let me take holt o' that basket, ma'am,' said a pleasant, anxious voice behind me

I turned, startled in the silence of the wide field, and saw an elderly man, bent in the shoulders as fishermen often are, gray-headed and clean-shaven, and with a timid air. It was William He looked just like his mother, and I had been imagining that he was large and stout like his sister, Almura Todd, and, strange to say, my fancy had led me to picture him not far from thirty and a little loutish. It was necessary instead to pay William the respect due to age.

I accustomed myself to plain facts on the instant, and we said good-morning like old friends. The basket was really heavy, and I put the hoe through its handle and offered him one end, then we moved easily toward the house together, speaking of the fine weather and of mackerel which were reported to be striking in all about the bay. William had been out since three o'clock, and had taken an extra fare of fish. I could feel that Mrs. Todd's eyes were upon us as we approached the house, and although I fell behind in the narrow path, and let William take the basket alone and precede me at some little distance the rest of the way, I could plainly hear her greet him.

'Got round to comin' in, didn't you?' she inquired, with amusement. 'Well, now, that's clever. Didn't know's I should see you to-day, William, an' I wanted to settle an account.'

I felt somewhat disturbed and responsible, but when I joined them they were on the most simple and friendly terms. It became evident that, with William, it was the first step that cost, and that, having once joined in social interests, he was able to pursue them with more or less pleasure. He was about sixty, and not young-looking for his years, yet so undying is the spirit of youth, and bashfulness has such a power of survival, that I felt all the time as if one must try to make the occasion easy for some one who was young and new to the affairs of social life. He asked politely if I would like to go up to the great ledge while dinner was getting ready, so, not without a deep sense of pleasure, and a delighted look of surprise from the two hostesses, we started, William and I, as if both of us felt much younger than we looked. Such was the innocence and simplicity of the moment that when I heard Mrs. Todd laughing behind us in the kitchen I laughed too, but William did not even blush. I think he was a little deaf, and he stepped along before me most businesslike and intent upon his errand.

We went from the upper edge of the field above the house into a smooth, brown path among the dark spruces. The hot sun brought out the fragrance of the pitchy bark, and the shade was pleasant as we climbed the hill. William stopped once or twice to show me a great wasps'-nest close by, or some fishhawks'-nest below in a bit of swamp. He picked a few sprigs of late-blooming linnæa as we came out upon an open bit of pasture at the top of the island, and gave them to me without speaking, but he knew as well as I that one could not say half he wished about linnæa. Through this piece of rough pasture ran a huge shape of stone like the great backbone of an enormous creature. At the end, near the woods, we could climb up on it and walk along to the highest point, there above the circle of pointed firs we could look down over all the island, and could see the ocean that circled this and a hundred other bits of island-ground, the mainland shore and all the far horizons. It gave a sudden sense of space, for nothing stopped the eye or hedged one in,—that sense of liberty in space and time which great prospects always give.

'There ain't no such view in the world, I expect,' said William proudly, and I hastened to speak my heartfelt tribute of praise, it was impossible not to feel as if an untraveled boy had spoken, and yet one loved to have him value his native heath.

IV

We were a little late to dinner, but Mrs. Blackett and Mrs. Todd were lenient, and we all took our places after William had paused to wash his hands, like a pious Brahmin, at the well, and put on a neat blue coat which he took from a peg behind the kitchen door. Then he resolutely asked a blessing in words that I could not hear, and we ate the chowder and were thankful. The kitten went round and round the table, quite erect, and, holding on by her fierce young claws, she stopped to mew with pathos at each elbow, or darted off to the open door when a song sparrow forgot himself and lit in the grass too near. William did not talk much, but his sister Todd occupied the time and told all the news there was to tell of Dunnet Landing and its coasts, while the old mother listened with delight. Her hospitality was something exquisite, she had the gift which so many women lack, of being able to make themselves and their houses belong entirely to a guest's pleasure,—that charming surrender for the moment of themselves and whatever belongs to them, so that they make a part of one's own life that can never be forgotten. Tact is after all a kind of mind-reading, and my hostess held the golden gift. Sympathy is of the mind as well as the heart, and Mrs. Blackett's world and mine were one from the moment we met. Besides, she had that final, that highest gift of heaven, a perfect self-forgetfulness. Sometimes, as I watched her eager, sweet old face, I wondered why she had been set to shine on this lonely island of the northern coast. It must have been to keep the balance true, and make up to all her scattered and depending neighbors for other things which they may have lacked.

When we had finished clearing away the old blue plates, and the kitten had taken care of her share of the fresh haddock, just as we were putting back the kitchen chairs in their places, Mrs. Todd said briskly that she must go up into the pasture now to gather the desired herbs.

'You can stop here an' rest, or you can accompany me,' she announced. 'Mother ought to have her nap, and when we come back she an' William'll sing for you. She admires music,' said Mrs. Todd, turning to speak to her mother.

But Mrs. Blackett tried to say that she couldn't sing as she used, and perhaps William wouldn't feel like it. She looked tired, the good old soul, or I should have liked to sit in the peaceful little house while she slept, I had had much pleasant experience of pastures already in her daughter's company. But it seemed best to go with Mrs. Todd, and off we went.

Mrs. Todd carried the gingham bag which she had brought from home, and a small heavy burden in the bottom made it hang straight and slender from her hand. The way was steep, and she soon grew breathless, so that we sat down to rest awhile on a convenient large stone among the bayberry.

'There, I wanted you to see this,—'tis mother's picture,' said Mrs. Todd, 'twas taken once when she was up to Portland, soon after she was married. That's me,' she added, opening another worn case, and displaying the full face of the cheerful child she looked like still in spite of being past sixty. 'And here's William an' father together. I take after father, large and heavy, an' William is like mother's folks, short an'

thin. He ought to have made something o' himself, bein' a man an' so like mother, but though he's been very steady to work, an' kept up the farm, an' done his fishin' too right along, he never had mother's snap an' power o' seein' things just as they be. He's got excellent judgment, too,' meditated William's sister, but she could not arrive at any satisfactory decision upon what she evidently thought his failure in life. 'I think it is well to see any one so happy an' makin' the most of life just as it falls to hand,' she said as she began to put the daguerreotypes away again, but I reached out my hand to see her mother's once more, a most flowerlike face of a lovely young woman in quaint dress. There was in the eyes a look of anticipation and joy, a far-off look that sought the horizon, one often sees it in seafaring families, inherited by girls and boys alike from men who spend their lives at sea, and are always watching for distant sails or the first loom of the land. At sea there is nothing to be seen close by, and this has its counterpart in a sailor's character, in the large and brave and patient traits that are developed, the hopeful pleasantness that one loves so in a seafarer.

When the family pictures were wrapped again in a big handkerchief, we set forward in a narrow footpath and made our way to a lonely place that faced northward, where there was more pasture and fewer bushes, and we went down to the edge of short grass above some rocky cliffs where the deep sea broke with a great noise, though the wind was down and the water looked quiet a little way from shore. Among the grass grew such pennyroyal as the rest of the world could not provide. There was a fine fragrance in the air as we gathered it sprig by sprig and stepped along carefully, and Mrs. Todd pressed her aromatic nose-gay between her hands and offered it to me again and again.

'There's nothin' like it,' she said, 'oh no, there's no such pennyroyal as this in the State of Maine. It's the right pattern of the plant, and all the rest I ever see is but an imitation. Don't it do you good?' And I answered with enthusiasm.

'There, dear, I never showed nobody else but mother where to find this place, 'tis kind of sainted to me. Nathan, my husband, an' I used to love this place when we was courtin', and"—she hesitated, and then spoke softly—"when he was lost, 'twas just off shore tryin' to get in by the short channel out there between Squaw Islands, right in sight o' this headland where we'd set an' made our plans all summer long'

I had never heard her speak of her husband before, but I felt that we were friends now since she had brought me to this place

'Twas but a dream with us,' Mrs Todd said 'I knew it when he was gone I knew it'—and she whispered as if she were at confession—"I knew it afore he started to go to sea My heart was gone out o' my keepin' before I ever saw Nathan, but he loved me well, and he made me real happy, and he died before he ever knew what he'd had to know if we'd lived long together 'Tis very strange about love No, Nathan never found out, but my heart was troubled when I knew him first There's more women likes to be loved than there is of those that loves I spent some happy hours right here I always liked Nathan, and he never knew But this pennyr'al always reminded me, as I'd sit and gather it and hear him talkin'—it always would remind me of—the other one'

She looked away from me, and presently rose and went on by herself. There was something lonely and solitary about her great determined shape She might have been Antigone alone on the Theban plain It is not often given in a noisy world to come to the places of great grief and silence An absolute, archaic grief possessed this country-woman, she seemed like a renewal of some historic soul, with her sorrows and the remoteness of a daily life busied with rustic simplicities and the scents of primeval herbs

I was not incompetent at herb-gathering, and after a while, when I had sat long enough waking myself to new thoughts, and reading a page of remembrance with new pleasure, I gathered some bunches, as I was bound to do, and at last we met again higher up the shore, in the plain every-day world we had left behind when we went down to the pennyroyal plot As we walked together along the high edge of the field we saw a hundred sails about the bay and farther seaward, it was mid-afternoon or after, and the day was coming to an end

'Yes, they're all makin' towards the shore,—the small craft an' the lobster smacks an' all,' said my companion 'We must spend a little time with mother now, just to have our tea, an' then put for home'

'No matter if we lose the wind at sundown, I can row in with Johnny,' said I, and Mrs Todd nodded reassuringly and kept to her steady plod, not quickening her gait even when we saw William come round the corner of the house as if to look for us, and wave his hand and disappear

'Why, William's right on deck, I didn't know's we should see any more of him!' exclaimed Mrs Todd 'Now mother'll put the kettle right on, she's got a good fire goin'' I too could see the blue smoke thicken, and then we both walked a little faster, while Mrs Todd groped in her full bag of herbs to find the daguerreotypes and be ready to put them in their places

William was sitting on the side door step, and the old mother was busy making her tea, she gave into my hand an old flowered-glass tea-caddy

'William thought you'd like to see this, when he was settin' the table My father brought it to my mother from the island of Tobago, an' here's a pair of beautiful mugs that came with it' She opened the glass door of a little cupboard beside the chimney 'These I call my best things, dear,' she said 'You'd laugh to see how we enjoy 'em Sunday nights in winter we have a real company tea 'stead o' livin' right along just the same, an' I make somethin' good for a s'prise an' put on some o' my preserves, an' we get a-talkin' together an' have real pleasant times'

Mrs Todd laughed indulgently, and looked to see what I thought of such childishness.

'I wish I could be here some Sunday evening,' said I

'William an' me'll be talkin' about you an' thinkin' o' this nice day,' said Mrs Blackett affectionately, and she glanced at William, and he looked up bravely and nodded I began to discover that he and his sister could not speak their deeper feelings before each other

'Now I want you an' mother to sing,' said Mrs Todd abruptly, with an air of command, and I gave William much sympathy in his evident distress

'After I've had my cup o' tea, dear,' answered the old hostess cheerfully, and so we sat down and took our cups and made merry while they lasted. It was impossible not to wish to stay on forever at Green Island, and I could not help saying so.

'I'm very happy here, both winter an' summer,' said old Mrs. Blackett. 'William an' I never wish for any other home, do we, William? I'm glad you find it pleasant, I wish you'd come an' stay, dear, whenever you feel inclined. But here's Almiry, I always think Providence was kind to plot an' have her husband leave her a good house where she really belonged. She'd been very restless if she'd had to continue here on Green Island. You wanted more scope, didn't you, Almiry, an' to live in a large place where more things grew? Sometimes folks wonders that we don't live together, perhaps we shall some time,' and a shadow of sadness and apprehension flitted across her face. 'The time o' sickness an' failin' has got to come to all. But Almiry's got an herb that's good for everything.' She smiled as she spoke, and looked bright again.

'There's some herb that's good for everybody, except for them that thinks they're sick when they ain't,' announced Mrs. Todd, with a truly professional air of finality. 'Come, William, let's have Sweet Home, an' then mother'll sing Cupid an' the Bee for us.'

Then followed a most charming surprise. William mastered his timidity and began to sing. His voice was a little faint and frail, like the family daguerreotypes, but it was a tenor voice, and perfectly true and sweet. I have never heard Home, Sweet Home sung as touchingly and seriously as he sang it, he seemed to make it quite new, and when he paused for a moment at the end of the first line and began the next, the old mother joined him and they sang together, she missing only the higher notes, where he seemed to lend his voice to hers for the moment and carry on her very note and air. It was the silent man's real and only means of expression, and one could have listened forever, and have asked for more and more songs of old Scotch and English inheritance and the best that have lived from the ballad music of the war. Mrs. Todd kept time visibly, and sometimes audibly, with her ample foot. I saw the tears in her eyes sometimes, when I could see beyond the tears in mine. But at last the songs ended and the time came to say good-by, it was the end of a great pleasure.

Mrs. Blackett, the dear old lady, opened the door of her bedroom while Mrs. Todd was tying up the herb bag, and William had gone down to get the boat ready and to blow the horn for Johnny Bowden, who had joined a roving boat party who were off the shore lobstering.

I went to the door of the bedroom, and thought how pleasant it looked, with its pink-and-white patchwork quilt and the brown unpainted paneling of its woodwork.

'Come right in, dear,' she said. 'I want you to set down in my old quilted rockin'-chair there by the window, you'll say it's the prettiest view in the house. I set there a good deal to rest me and when I want to read.'

There was a worn red Bible on the light-stand, and Mrs. Blackett's heavy silver-bowed glasses, her thumb was on the narrow window-ledge, and folded carefully on the table was a thick striped-cotton shirt that she was making for her son. Those dear old fingers and their loving stitches, that heart which had made the most of everything that needed love! Here was the real home, the heart of the old house on Green Island! I sat in the rocking-chair, and felt that it was a place of peace, the little brown bedroom, and the quiet outlook upon field and sea and sky.

I looked up, and we understood each other without speaking. 'I shall like to think o' your settin' here to-day,' said Mrs. Blackett. 'I want you to come again. It has been so pleasant for William.'

The wind served us all the way home, and did not fall or let the sail slacken until we were close to the shore. We had a generous freight of lobsters in the boat, and new potatoes which William had put aboard, and what Mrs. Todd proudly called a full 'kag' of prime number one salted mackerel, and when we landed we had to make business arrangements to have these conveyed to her house in a wheelbarrow.

I never shall forget the day at Green Island. The town of Dunnet Landing seemed large and noisy and oppressive as we came ashore. Such is the power of contrast, for the village was so still that I could hear the shy whippoorwills singing that night as I lay awake in my downstairs bedroom, and the scent of Mrs Todd's herb garden under the window blew in again and again with every gentle rising of the sea-breeze

FROM CRITICISM AND FICTION

I

IN General Grant's confession of novel-reading there is a sort of inference that he had wasted his time, or else the guilty conscience of the novelist in me imagines such an inference. But however this may be, there is certainly no question concerning the intention of a correspondent who once wrote to me after reading some rather bragging claims I had made for fiction as a mental and moral means 'I have very grave doubts,' he said, 'as to the whole list of magnificent things that you seem to think novels have done for the race, and can witness in myself many evil things which they have done for me. Whatever in my mental make-up is wild and visionary, whatever is untrue, whatever is injurious, I can trace to the perusal of some work of fiction. Worse than that, they beget such high-strung and supersensitive ideas of life that plain industry and plodding perseverance are despised, and matter-of-fact poverty, or every-day, commonplace distress, meets with no sympathy, if indeed noticed at all, by one who has wept over the impossibly accumulated sufferings of some gaudy hero or heroine.'

I am not sure that I had the controversy with this correspondent that he seemed to suppose, but novels are now so fully accepted by every one pretending to cultivated taste—and they really form the whole intellectual life of such immense numbers of people, without question of their influence, good or bad, upon the mind—that it is refreshing to have them frankly denounced, and to be invited to revise one's ideas and feelings in regard to them. A little honesty, in this quest will do the novel, as we hope yet to have it, and as we have already begun to have it, no harm, and for my own part I will confess that I believe fiction in the past to have been largely injurious, as I believe the stage play to be still almost wholly injurious, through its falsehood, its folly, its wantonness, and its aimlessness. It may be safely assumed that most of the novel-reading which people fancy an intellectual pastime is the emptiest dissipation, hardly more related to thought or the wholesome exercise of the mental faculties than opium-eating, in either case the brain is drugged, and left weaker and crazier for the debauch. If this may be called the negative result of the fiction habit, the positive injury that most novels work is by no means so easily to be measured in the case of young men whose character they help so much to form or deform, and the women of all ages whom they keep so much in ignorance of the world they misrepresent. Grown men have little harm from them, but in the other cases, which are the vast majority, they hurt because they are not true—not because they are malevolent, but because they are idle lies about human nature and the social fabric, which it behooves us to know and to understand, that we may deal justly with ourselves and with one another. One need not go so far as our correspondent, and trace to the fiction habit 'whatever is wild and visionary, whatever is untrue, whatever is injurious,' in one's life, bad as the fiction habit is. It is probably not responsible for the whole sum of evil in its victims, and I believe that if the reader will use care in choosing from this fungus-growth with which the fields of literature teem every day, he may nourish himself as with the true mushroom, at no risk from the poisonous species.

The tests are very plain and simple, and they are perfectly infallible. If a novel flatters the passions, and exalts them above the principles, it is poisonous; it may not kill, but it will certainly injure, and this test will alone exclude an entire class of fiction, of which eminent examples will occur to all. Then the whole spawn of so-called unmoral romances, which imagine a world where the sins of sense are unvisited by the penalties following, swift or slow, but inexorably sure, in the real world, are deadly poison: these do kill. The novels that merely tickle our prejudices and lull our judgment, or that coddle our sensibilities or pamper our gross appetite for the marvellous, are not so fatal, but they are innutritious, and clog the soul with unwholesome vapors of all kinds. No doubt they too help to weaken the moral fibre, and make their readers indifferent to 'plodding perseverance and plain industry,' and to 'matter-of-fact poverty and commonplace distress.'

Without taking them too seriously, it still must be owned that the 'gaudy hero and heroine' are to blame for a great deal of harm in the world. That heroine long taught by example, if not precept, that Love, or the passion or fancy she mistook for it, was the chief interest of a life, which is really concerned with a great many other things, that it was lasting in the way she knew it, that it was worthy of every sacrifice, and was altogether a finer thing than prudence, obedience, reason, that love alone was glorious and beautiful, and these were mean and ugly in comparison with it. More lately she has begun to idolize and illustrate Duty, and she is hardly less mischievous in this new role, opposing duty, as she did love, to prudence, obedience, and reason. The stock hero, whom, if we met him, we could not fail to see was a most deplorable person, has undoubtedly imposed himself upon the victims of the fiction habit as admirable. With him, too, love was and is the great affair, whether in its old romantic phase of chivalrous achievement or manifold suffering for love's sake, or its more recent development of the 'virile,' the bullying, and the brutal, or its still more recent agonies of self-sacrifice, as idle and useless as the moral experiences of the insane asylums. With his vain posturings and his ridiculous splendor he is really a painted barbarian, the prey of his passions and his delusions, full of obsolete ideals, and the motives and ethics of a savage, which the guilty author of his being does his best—or his worst—in spite of his own light and knowledge, to foist upon the reader as something generous and noble. I am not merely bringing this charge against that sort of fiction which is beneath literature and outside of it, 'the shoreless lakes of ditch-water,' whose miasms fill the air below the empyrean where the great ones sit, but I am accusing the work of some of the most famous, who have, in this instance or in that, sinned against the truth, which can alone exalt and purify men. I do not say that they have constantly done so, or even commonly done so, but that they have done so at all marks them as of the past, to be read with the due historical allowance for their epoch and their conditions. For I believe that, while inferior writers will and must continue to imitate them in their foibles and their errors, no one hereafter will be able to achieve greatness who is false to humanity, either in its facts or its duties. The light of civilization has already broken even upon the novel, and no conscientious man can now set about painting an image of life without perpetual question of the verity of his work, and without feeling bound to distinguish so clearly that no reader of his may be misled, between what is right and what is wrong, what is noble and what is base, what is health and what is perdition, in the actions and the characters he portrays.

The fiction that aims merely to entertain—the fiction that is to serious fiction as the opera-bouffe, the ballet, and the pantomime are to the true drama—need not feel the burden of this obligation so deeply, but even such fiction will not be gay or trivial to any reader's hurt, and criticism will hold it to account if it passes from painting to teaching folly.

More and more not only the criticism which prints its opinions, but the infinitely vaster and powerfuler criticism which thinks and feels them merely, will make this demand. I confess that I do not care to judge any work of the imagination without first of all applying this test to it. We must ask ourselves before we ask anything else, Is it true?—true to the motives, the impulses, the principles that shape the life of actual men and women? This truth, which necessarily includes the highest morality and the highest artistry—this truth given, the book cannot be wicked and cannot be weak, and without it all graces of style and feats of invention and cunning of construction are so many superfluities of naughtiness. It is well for the truth to have all these, and shine in them, but for falsehood they are merely meretricious, the bedizement of the wanton, they atone for nothing, they count for nothing. But in fact they come naturally of truth, and grace it without solicitation, they are added unto it. In the whole range of fiction we know of no true picture of life—that is, of human nature—which is not also a masterpiece of literature, full of divine and natural beauty. It may have no touch or tint of this special civilization or of that, it had better have this local color well ascertained, but the truth is deeper and finer than aspects, and if the book is true to what men and women know of one another's souls it will be true enough, and it will be great and beautiful. It is the conception of literature as something apart from life, superfinely aloof, which makes it really unimportant to the great mass of mankind, without a message or a meaning for them, and it is the notion that a novel may be false in its portrayal of causes and effects that makes literary art contemptible even to those whom it amuses, that forbids them to regard the novelist as a serious or right-minded person. If they do not in some moment of indignation cry out against all novels, as my correspondent does, they remain besotted in the fume of the delusions purveyed to them, with no higher feeling for the author than such maudlin affection as the habitué of an opium-joint perhaps knows for the attendant who fills his pipe with the drug.

Or, as in the case of another correspondent who writes that in his youth he 'read a great many novels, but always regarded it as an amusement, like horse-racing and card-playing,' for which he had no time when he entered upon the serious business of life, it renders them merely contemptuous. His view of the matter may be commended to the brotherhood and sisterhood of novelists as full of wholesome if bitter suggestion, and we urge them not to dismiss it with high literary scorn as that of some Bæotian dull to the beauty of art. Refuse it as we may, it is still the feeling of the vast majority of people for whom life is earnest, and who find only a distorted and misleading likeness of it in our books. We may fold ourselves in our scholars' gowns, and close the doors of our studies, and affect to despise this rude voice, but we cannot shut it out. It comes to us from wherever men are at work, from wherever they are truly living, and accuses us of unfaithfulness, of triviality, of mere stage-play, and none of us can escape conviction except he prove himself worthy of his time—a time in which the great masters have brought literature back to life, and filled its ebbing veins with the red tides of reality. We cannot all equal them, we need not copy them, but we can all go to the sources of their inspiration and their power, and to draw from these no one need go far—no one need really go out of himself.

Fifty years ago, Carlyle, in whom the truth was always alive, but in whom it was then unperverted by suffering, by celebrity, and by despair, wrote in his study of Diderot: 'Were it not reasonable to prophesy that this exceeding great multitude of novel-writers and such like must, in a new generation, gradually do one of two things: either retire into the nurseries, and work for children, minors, and semi-fatuous persons of both sexes, or else, what were far better, sweep their novel-fabric into the dust-cart, and betake themselves with such faculty as they have to understand and record what is true, of which surely there is, and will forever be, a whole infinitude unknown to us of infinite importance to us? Poetry, it will more and more come to be understood, is nothing but higher knowledge, and the only genuine Romance (for grown persons), Reality.'

If, after half a century, fiction still mainly works for 'children, minors, and semi-fatuous persons of both sexes,' it is nevertheless one of the hopefulest signs of the world's progress that it has begun to work for 'grown persons,' and if not exactly in the way that Carlyle might have solely intended in urging its writers to compile memoirs instead of building the 'novel-fabric,' still it has, in the highest and widest sense, already made Reality its Romance. I cannot judge it, I do not even care for it, except as it has done this, and I can hardly conceive of a literary self-respect in these days compatible with the old trade of make-believe, with the production of the kind of fiction which is too much honored by classification with card-playing and horse-racing. But let fiction cease to lie about life, let it portray men and women as they are, actuated by the motives and the passions in the measure we all know, let it leave off painting dolls and working them by springs and wires, let it show the different interests in their true proportions, let it forbear to preach pride and revenge, folly and insanity, egotism and prejudice, but frankly own these for what they are, in whatever figures and occasions they appear, let it not put on fine literary airs, let it speak the dialect, the language, that most Americans know—the language of unaffected people everywhere—and there can be no doubt of an unlimited future, not only of delightfulness but of usefulness, for it

II

This is what I say in my severer moods, but at other times I know that, of course, no one is going to hold all fiction to such strict account. There is a great deal of it which may be very well left to amuse us, if it can, when we are sick or when we are silly, and I am not inclined to despise it in the performance of this office. Or, if people find pleasure in having their blood curdled for the sake of having it uncurdled again at the end of the book, I would not interfere with their amusement, though I do not desire it. There is a certain demand in primitive natures for the kind of fiction that does this, and the author of it is usually very proud of it. The kind of novels he likes, and likes to write, are intended to take his reader's mind, or what that reader would probably call his mind, off himself, they make one forget life and all its cares and duties, they are not in the least like the novels which make you think of these, and shame you into at least wishing to be a helper and wholesomer creature than you are. No sordid details of verity here, if you please, no wretched being humbly and weakly struggling to do right and to be true, suffering for his follies and his sins, tasting joy only through the mortification of self, and in the help of others; nothing of all this, but a great, whirling splendor of peril and achievement, a wild scene of heroic adventure and of emotional ground and lofty tumbling, with a stage 'picture' at the fall of the curtain, and all the good characters in a row, their left hands pressed upon their hearts, and kissing their right hands to the audience, in the good old way that has always charmed and always will charm Heaven bless it!

In a world which loves the spectacular drama and the practically bloodless sports of the modern amphitheatre the author of this sort of fiction has his place, and we must not seek to destroy him because he fancies it the first place. In fact, it is a condition of his doing well the kind of work he does that he should think it important, that he should believe in himself, and I would not take away this faith of his, even if I could. As I say, he has his place. The world often likes to forget itself, and he brings on his heroes, his goblins, his feats, his hair-breadth escapes, his imminent deadly breaches, and the poor, foolish, childish old world renews the excitements of its nonage. Perhaps this is a work of beneficence, and perhaps our brave conjurer in his cabalistic robe is a philanthropist in disguise.

Within the last four or five years there has been throughout the whole English-speaking world what Mr. Grant Allen happily calls the 'recrudescence' of taste in fiction. The effect is less noticeable in America than in England, where effete Philistinism, conscious of the dry-rot of its conventionality, is casting about for cure in anything that is wild and strange and unlike itself. But the recrudescence has been evident enough here, too, and a writer in one of our periodicals has put into convenient shape some common errors concerning popularity as a test of merit in a book. He seems to think, for instance, that the love of the marvellous and impossible in fiction, which is shown not only by 'the unthinking multitude clamoring about the book counters' for fiction of that sort, but by the 'literary elect' also, is proof of some principle in human nature which ought to be respected as well as tolerated. He seems to believe that the ebullition of this passion forms a sufficient answer to those who say that art should represent life, and that the art which misrepresents life is feeble art.

and false art. But it appears to me that a little careful reasoning from a little closer inspection of the facts would not have brought him to these conclusions. In the first place, I doubt very much whether the 'literary elect' have been fascinated in great numbers by the fiction in question, but if I supposed them to have really fallen under that spell, I should still be able to account for their fondness and that of the 'unthinking multitude' upon the same grounds, without honoring either very much. It is the habit of hasty casuists to regard civilization as inclusive of all the members of a civilized community, but this is a palpable error. Many persons in every civilized community live in a state of more or less evident savagery with respect to their habits, their morals, and their propensities, and they are held in check only by the law. Many more yet are savage in their tastes, as they show by the decoration of their houses and persons, and by their choice of books and pictures, and these are left to the restraints of public opinion. In fact, no man can be said to be thoroughly civilized or always civilized, the most refined, the most enlightened person has his moods, his moments of barbarism, in which the best, or even the second best, shall not please him. At these times the lettered and the unlettered are alike primitive and their gratifications are of the same simple sort, the highly cultivated person may then like melodrama, impossible fiction, and the trapeze as sincerely and thoroughly as a boy of thirteen or a barbarian of any age.

I do not blame him for these moods; I find something instructive and interesting in them, but if they lastingly established themselves in him, I could not help deploring the state of that person. No one can really think that the 'literary elect,' who are said to have joined the 'unthinking multitude' in clamoring about the book counters for the romances of no-man's land, take the same kind of pleasure in them as they do in a novel of Tolstoi, Tourguéneff, George Eliot, Thackeray, Balzac, Manzoni, Hawthorne, Henry James, Thomas Hardy, Palacio Valdes, or even Walter Scott. They have joined the 'unthinking multitude,' perhaps because they are tired of thinking, and expect to find relaxation in feeling—feeling crudely, grossly, merely. For once in a way there is no great harm in this, perhaps no harm at all. It is perfectly natural, let them have their innocent debauch. But let us distinguish, for our own sake and guidance, between the different kinds of things that please the same kind of people, between the things that please them habitually and those that please them occasionally, between the pleasures that edify them and those that amuse them. Otherwise we shall be in danger of becoming permanently part of the 'unthinking multitude,' and of remaining puerile, primitive, savage. We shall be so in moods and at moments, but let us not fancy that those are high moods or fortunate moments. If they are harmless, that is the most that can be said for them. They are lapses from which we can perhaps go forward more vigorously, but even this is not certain.

My own philosophy of the matter, however, would not bring me to prohibition of such literary amusements as the writer quoted seems to find significant of a growing indifference to truth and sanity in fiction. Once more, I say, these amusements have their place, as the circus has, and the burlesque and negro minstrelsy, and the ballet, and prestidigitation. No one of these is to be despised in its place, but we had better understand that it is not the highest place, and that it is hardly an intellectual delight. The lapse of all the 'literary elect' in the world could not dignify unreality, and their present mood, if it exists, is of no more weight against that beauty in literature which comes from truth alone, and never can come from anything else, than the permanent state of the 'unthinking multitude.'

Yet even as regards the 'unthinking multitude,' I believe I am not able to take the attitude of the writer I have quoted. I am afraid that I respect them more than he would like to have me, though I cannot always respect their taste, any more than that of the 'literary elect.' I respect them for their good sense in most practical matters, for their laborious, honest lives, for their kindness, their good-will, for that aspiration towards something better than themselves which seems to stir, however dumbly, in every human breast not abandoned to literary pride or other forms of self-righteousness. I find every man interesting, whether he thinks or unthinks, whether he is savage or civilized, for this reason I cannot thank the novelist who teaches us not to know but to unknow our kind. Yet I should by no means hold him to such strict account as Emerson, who felt the absence of the best motive, even in the greatest of the masters, when he said of Shakespeare that, after all, he was only master of the revels. The judgment is so severe, even with the praise which precedes it, that one winces under it, and if one is still young, with the world gay before him, and life full of joyous promise, one is apt to ask, defiantly, Well, what is better than being such a master of the revels as Shakespeare was? Let each judge for himself. To the heart again of serious youth uncontaminated and exultant of ideal good, it must always be a grief that the great masters seem so often to have been willing to amuse the leisure and vacancy of meaner men, and leave their mission to the soul but partially fulfilled. This, perhaps, was what Emerson had in mind, and if he had it in mind of Shakespeare, who gave us, with his histories and comedies and problems, such a searching homily as 'Macbeth,' one feels that he scarcely recognized the limitations of the dramatist's art. Few consciences, at times, seem so enlightened as that of this personally unknown person, so withdrawn into his work, and so lost to the intensest curiosity of after-time, at other times he seems merely Elizabethan in his coarseness, his courtliness, his imperfect sympathy

One of the great newspapers the other day invited the prominent American authors to speak their minds upon a point in the theory and practice of fiction which had already vexed some of them. It was the question of how much or how little the American novel ought to deal with certain facts of life which are not usually talked of before young people, and especially young ladies. Of course the question was not decided, and I forget just how far the balance inclined in favor of a larger freedom in the matter. But it certainly inclined that way; one or two writers of the sex which is somehow supposed to have purity in its keeping (as if purity were a thing that did not practically concern the other sex, preoccupied with serious affairs) gave it a rather vigorous tilt to that side. In view of this fact it would not be the part of prudence to make an effort to dress the balance, and indeed I do not know that I was going to make any such effort. But there are some things to say, around and about the subject, which I should like to have some one else say, and which I may myself possibly be safe in suggesting.

One of the first of these is the fact, generally lost sight of by those who censure the Anglo-Saxon novel for its prudishness, that it is really not such a prude after all; and that if it is sometimes apparently anxious to avoid those experiences of life not spoken of before young people, this may be an appearance only. Sometimes a novel which has this shuffling air, this effect of truckling to propriety, might defend itself, if it could speak for itself, by saying that such experiences happened not to come within its scheme, and that, so far from maiming or mutilating itself in ignoring them, it was all the more faithfully representative of the tone of modern life in dealing with love that was chaste, and with passion so honest that it could be openly spoken of before the tenderest society bud at dinner. It might say that the guilty intrigue, the betrayal, the extreme flirtation even, was the exceptional thing in life, and unless the scheme of the story necessarily involved it, that it would be bad art to lug it in, and as bad taste as to introduce such topics in a mixed company. It could say very justly that the novel in our civilization now always addresses a mixed company, and that the vast majority of the company are ladies, and that very many, if not most, of these ladies are young girls. If the novel were written for men and for married women alone, as in continental Europe, it might be altogether different. But the simple fact is that it is not written for them alone among us, and it is a question of writing, under cover of our universal acceptance, things for young girls to read which you would be put out-of-doors for saying to them, or frankly giving notice of your intention, and so cutting yourself off from the pleasure—and it is a very high and sweet one—of appealing to these vivid, responsive intelligences, which are none the less brilliant and admirable because they are innocent.

One day a novelist who liked, after the manner of other men, to repine at his hard fate, complained to his friend, a critic, that he was tired of the restriction he had put upon himself in this regard, for it is a mistake, as can be readily shown, to suppose that others impose it 'See how free those French fellows are!' he rebelled 'Shall we always be shut up to our tradition of decency?'

'Do you think it's much worse than being shut up to their tradition of indecency?' said his friend

Then that novelist began to reflect, and he remembered how sick the invariable motive of the French novel made him. He perceived finally that, convention for convention, ours was not only more tolerable, but on the whole was truer to life, not only to its complexion, but also to its texture. No one will pretend that there is not vicious love beneath the surface of our society, if he did, the fetid explosions of the divorce trials would refute him, but if he pretended that it was in any just sense characteristic of our society, he could be still more easily refuted. Yet it exists, and it is unquestionably the material of tragedy, the stuff from which intense effects are wrought. The question, after owning this fact, is whether these intense effects are not rather cheap effects. I incline to think they are, and I will try to say why I think so, if I may do so without offence. The material itself, the mere mention of it, has an instant fascination, it arrests, it detains, till the last word is said, and while there is anything to be hunted. This is what makes a love intrigue of some sort all but essential to the popularity of any fiction. Without such an intrigue the intellectual equipment of the author must be of the highest, and then he will succeed only with the highest class of readers. But any author who will deal with a guilty love intrigue holds all readers in his hand, the highest with the lowest, as long as he hunts the slightest hope of the smallest potential naughtiness. He need not at all be a great author, he may be a very shabby wretch, if he has but the courage or the trick of that sort of thing. The critics will call him 'virile' and 'passionate,' decent people will be ashamed to have been limed by him, but the low average will only ask another chance of flocking into his net. If he happens to be an able writer, his really fine and costly work will be unheeded, and the lure to the appetite will be chiefly remembered. There may be other qualities which make reputations for other men, but in his case they will count for nothing. He pays this penalty for his success in that kind, and every one pays some such penalty who deals with some such material. It attaches in like manner to the triumphs of the writers who now almost form a school among us, and who may be said to have established themselves in an easy popularity simply by the study of erotic shivers and fervors. They may find their account in the popularity, or they may not, there is no question of the popularity.

But I do not mean to imply that their case covers the whole ground. So far as it goes, though, it ought to stop the mouths of those who complain that fiction is enslaved to propriety among us. It appears that of a certain kind of impropriety it is free to give us all it will, and more. But this is not what serious men and women writing fiction mean when they rebel against the limitations of their art in our civilization. They have no desire to deal with nakedness, as painters and sculptors freely do in the worship of beauty, or with certain facts of life, as the stage does, in the service of sensation. But they ask why, when the conventions of the plastic and histrionic arts liberate their followers to the portrayal of almost any phase of the physical or of the emotional nature, an American novelist may not write a story on the lines of Anna Karenina or Madame Bovary. Sappho they put aside, and from Zola's work they avert their eyes. They do not condemn him or Daudet, necessarily, or accuse their motives, they leave them out of the question, they do not want to do that kind of thing. But they do sometimes wish to do another kind, to touch one of the most serious and sorrowful problems of life in the spirit of Tolstoi and Flaubert, and they ask why they may not. At one time, they remind us, the Anglo-Saxon novelist did deal with such problems—DeFoe in his spirit, Richardson in his, Goldsmith in his. At what moment did our fiction lose this privilege? In what fatal hour did the Young Girl arise and seal the lips of Fiction, with a touch of her finger, to some of the most vital interests of life?

Whether I wished to oppose them in their aspiration for greater freedom, or whether

I wished to encourage them, I should begin to answer them by saying that the Young Girl had never done anything of the kind. The manners of the novel have been improving with those of its readers, that is all. Gentlemen no longer swear or fall drunk under the table, or abduct young ladies and shut them up in lonely country-houses, or so habitually set about the ruin of their neighbors' wives, as they once did. Generally, people now call a spade an agricultural implement, they have not grown decent without having also grown a little squeamish, but they have grown comparatively decent, there is no doubt about that. They require of a novelist whom they respect unquestionable proof of his seriousness, if he proposes to deal with certain phases of life, they require a sort of scientific decorum. He can no longer expect to be received on the ground of entertainment only, he assumes a higher function, something like that of a physician or a priest, and they expect him to be bound by laws as sacred as those of such professions, they hold him solemnly pledged not to betray them or abuse their confidence. If he will accept the conditions, they give him their confidence, and he may then treat to his greater honor, and not at all to his disadvantage, of such experiences, such relations of men and women as George Eliot treats in Adam Bede, in Daniel Deronda, in Romola, in almost all her books, such as Hawthorne treats in The Scarlet Letter, such as Dickens treats in David Copperfield, such as Thackeray treats in Pendennis, and glances at in every one of his fictions, such as most of the masters of English fiction have at some time treated more or less openly. It is quite false or quite mistaken to suppose that our novels have left untouched these most important realities of life. They have only not made them their stock in trade, they have kept a true perspective in regard to them, they have relegated them in their pictures of life to the space and place they occupy in life itself, as we know it in England and America. They have kept a correct proportion, knowing perfectly well that unless the novel is to be a map, with everything scrupulously laid down in it, a faithful record of life in far the greater extent could be made to the exclusion of guilty love and all its circumstances and consequences.

I justify them in this view not only because I hate what is cheap and meretricious, and hold in peculiar loathing the cant of the critics who require 'passion' as something in itself admirable and desirable in a novel, but because I prize fidelity in the historian of feeling and character. Most of these critics who demand 'passion' would seem to have no conception of any passion but one. Yet there are several other passions, the passion of grief, the passion of avarice, the passion of pity, the passion of ambition, the passion of hate, the passion of envy, the passion of devotion, the passion of friendship, and all these have a greater part in the drama of life than the passion of love, and infinitely greater than the passion of guilty love. Wittingly or unwittingly, English fiction and American fiction have recognized this truth, not fully, not in the measure it merits, but in greater degree than most other fiction.

FROM A MODERN INSTANCE

THIS last drop of the local meanness filled Bartley's bitter cup. As he passed the house at the end of the street he seemed to drain it all. He knew that the old lawyer was there sitting by the office stove, drawing his hand across his chin, and Bartley hoped that he was still as miserable as he had looked when he last saw him, but he did not know that by the window in the house, which he would not even look at, Marcia sat self-prisoned in her room, with her eyes upon the road, famishing for the thousandth part of a chance to see him pass. She saw him now for the instant of his coming and going. With eyes trained to take in every point, she saw the preparation which seemed like final departure, and with a gasp of 'Bartley!' as if she were trying to call after him, she sank back into her chair and shut her eyes.

He drove on, plunging into the deep hollow beyond the house, and keeping for several miles the road they had taken on that Sunday together, but he did not make the turn that brought them back to the village again. The pale sunset was slanting over the snow when he reached the Junction, for he had slackened his colt's pace after he had put ten miles behind him, not choosing to reach a prospective purchaser with his horse all blown and bathed with sweat. He wished to be able to say, 'Look at him! He's come fifteen miles since three o'clock, and he's as keen as when he started.'

This was true, when, having left his baggage at the Junction, he drove another mile into the country to see the farmer of the gentleman who had his summer-house here, and who had once bantered Bartley to sell him his colt. The farmer was away, and would not be at home till the up-train from Boston was in. Bartley looked at his watch, and saw that to wait would lose him the six o'clock down-train. There would be no other till eleven o'clock. But it was worth while the gentleman had said, 'When you want the money for that colt, bring him over any time, my farmer will have it ready for you.' He waited for the up-train, but when the farmer arrived, he was full of all sorts of scruples and reluctances. He said he should not like to buy it till he had heard from Mr. Farnham, he ended by offering Bartley eighty dollars for the colt on his own account, he did not want the cutter.

'You write to Mr. Farnham,' said Bartley, 'that you tried that plan with me, and it wouldn't work, he's lost the colt.'

He made this brave show of indifference, but he was disheartened, and, having carried the farmer home from the Junction for the convenience of talking over the trade with him, he drove back again through the early night-fall in sullen desperation.

The weather had softened and was threatening rain or snow, the dark was closing in spiritlessly, the colt, shortening from a trot into a short, springy jolt, dropped into a walk at last as if he were tired, and gave Bartley time enough on his way back to the Junction for reflection upon the disaster into which his life had fallen. These passages of utter despair are commoner to the young than they are to those whom years have experienced in the impermanence of any fate, good, bad, or indifferent, unless, perhaps, the last may seem rather constant. Taken in reference to all that had been ten days ago, the present ruin was incredible, and had nothing reasonable in proof of its existence. Then he was prosperously placed, and in the way to better himself indefinitely. Now, he was here in the dark, with fifteen dollars in his pocket, and an unsalable horse on his hands, outcast, deserted, homeless, hopeless, and by whose fault? He owned even then that he had committed some follies, but in his sense of Marcia's all-giving love he had risen for once in his life to a conception of self-devotion, and in taking herself from him as she did, she had taken from him the highest incentive he had ever known, and had checked him in his first feeble impulse to do and be all in all for another. It was she who had ruined him.

As he jumped out of the cutter at the Junction the station-master stopped with a cluster of party-colored signal-lanterns in his hand and cast their light over the sorrel.

'Nice colt you got there.'

'Yes,' said Bartley, blanketing the horse, 'do you know anybody who wants to buy?'

'Whose is he?' asked the man.

'He's mine!' shouted Bartley. 'Do you think I stole him?'

'I don't know where you got him,' said the man, walking off, and making a soft play of red and green lights on the snow beyond the narrow platform.

Bartley went into the great ugly barn of a station, trembling, and sat down in one of the gouged and whittled arm-chairs near the stove. A pomp of timetables and luminous advertisements of Western railroads and their land-grants decorated the wooden walls of the gentlemen's waiting-room, which had been sanded to keep the gentlemen from writing and sketching upon them. This was the more judicious because the ladies' room, in the absence of tourist travel, was locked in winter, and they were obliged to share the gentlemen's. In summer, the Junction was a busy place, but after the snow fell, and until the snow thawed, it was a desolation relieved only by the arrival of the sparsely peopled through-trains from the north and east, and by such local travellers as wished to take trains not stopping at their own stations. These broke in upon the solitude of the joint station-master and baggage-man and switch-tender with just sufficient frequency to keep him in a state of uncharitable irritation and unrest.

To-night Bartley was the sole intruder, and he sat by the stove wrapped in a cloud of rebellious memories, when one side of a colloquy without made itself heard.

'What?'

Some question was repeated

'No, it went down half an hour ago'

An inaudible question followed

'Next down-train at eleven'

There was now a faintly audible lament 10 or appeal

'Guess you'll have to come earlier next time Most folks does that wants to take it'

Bartley now heard the despairing moan of a woman he had already divined the sex of the futile questioner whom the station-master was bullying, but he had divined it without compassion, and if he had not himself been a sufferer from the man's insolence he might even have felt a ferocious satisfaction in it In a word, he was at his lowest and worst when the door opened and the woman came in, with a movement at once bewildered and daring, which gave him the impression of a despair as complete and final as his own He doggedly kept his place, she did not seem to care for him, but in the uncertain light of the lamp above them she drew near the stove, and, putting one hand to her pocket as if to find her handkerchief, 20 she flung aside her veil with her other, and showed her tear-stained face

He was on his feet somehow 'Marcia!'

'Oh! Bartley—'

He had seized her by the arm to make sure that she was there in verity of flesh and blood, and not by some trick of his own senses, as a cold chill running over him had made him afraid At the touch their passion ignored all that they had made each other suffer, her head was on his breast, his embrace was round her, it was a moment of delirious bliss that intervened between the sorrows that had been and the reasons that must come

'What—what are you doing here, Marcia?' he asked at last

They sank on the benching that ran round the wall, he held her hands fast in one of his, and kept his other arm about her as they sat side by side 30

'I don't know—I—' She seemed to rouse herself by an effort from her rapture 'I was going to see Nettie Spaulding. And I saw you driving past our house, and I thought you were coming here, and I couldn't bear—I couldn't bear to let you go away without telling you that I was wrong, and asking—asking you to forgive me I thought you would do it,—I thought you would know that I had behaved that way because I—I—cared so much for you I thought—I was afraid you had gone on the other train—' She trembled and sank back in his embrace, from which she had lifted herself a little

'How did you get here?' asked Bartley, as if willing to give himself all the proofs he could of the every-day reality of her presence

'Andy Morrison brought me Father sent him from the hotel I didn't care what you would say to me. I wanted to tell you that I was wrong, and not let you go away feeling that—that—you were all to blame I thought when I had done that you might drive me away,—or laugh at me, or anything you pleased, if only you would let me take back—'

'Yes,' he answered dreamily All that wicked hardness was breaking up within him, he felt it melting drop by drop in his heart This poor love-tossed soul, this frantic, unguided, reckless girl, was an angel of mercy to him, and in her folly and error a messenger of heavenly peace and hope 'I am a bad fellow, Marcia,' he faltered 'You ought to know that You did right to give me up I made love to Hannah Morrison, I never promised to marry her, but I made her think that I was fond of her'

'I don't care for that,' replied the girl. 'I told you when we were first engaged that I would never think of anything that had gone before that, and then when I would not listen to a word from you, that day, I broke my promise'

'When I struck Henry Bird because he was jealous of me, I was as guilty as if I had killed him'

'If you had killed him, I was bound to you by my word Your striking him was part of the same thing,—part of what I had promised I never would care for' A gush of tears came into his eyes, and she saw them 'Oh, poor Bartley! Poor Bartley!'

She took his head between her hands and pressed it hard against her heart, and then wrapped her arms tight about him, and softly bemoaned him

They drew a little apart when the man came in with his lantern, and set it down to mend the fire. But as a railroad employee he was far too familiar with the love that vaunts itself on all railroad trains to feel that he was an intruder. He scarcely looked at them, and went out when he had mended the fire, and left it purring.

'Where is Andy Morrison?' asked Bartley. 'Has he gone back?'

'No, he is at the hotel over there. I told him to wait till I found out when the train went north.'

'So you inquired when it went to Boston,' said Bartley, with a touch of his old railery. 'Come,' he added, taking her hand under his arm. He led her out of the room, to where his cutter stood outside. She was astonished to find the colt there.

'I wonder I didn't see it. But if I had, I should have thought that you had sold it and gone away, Andy told me you were coming here to sell the colt. When the man told me the express was gone, I knew you were on it.'

They found the boy stolidly waiting for Marcia on the veranda of the hotel, stamping first upon one foot and then the other, and hugging himself in his great-coat as the coming snow-fall blew its first flakes in his face.

'Is that you, Andy?' asked Bartley.

'Yes, sir,' answered the boy, without surprise at finding him with Marcia.

'Well, here! Just take hold of the colt's head a minute.'

As the boy obeyed, Bartley threw the reins on the dashboard, and leaped out of the cutter, and went within. He returned after a brief absence, followed by the landlord.

'Well, it ain't more'n a mile'n a half, if it's that. You just keep straight along this street, and take your first turn to the left, and you're right at the house, it's the first house on the left-hand side.'

'Thanks,' returned Bartley. 'Andy, you tell the Squire that you left Marcia with me, and I said I would see about her getting back. You needn't hurry.'

'All right,' said the boy, and he disappeared round the corner of the house to get his horse from the barn.

'Well, I'll be all ready by the time you're here,' said the landlord, still holding the hall-door ajar. 'Luck to you!' he shouted, shutting it.

Marcia locked both her hands through Bartley's arm, and leaned her head on his shoulder. Neither spoke for some minutes, then he asked, 'Marcia, do you know where you are?'

'With you,' she answered, in a voice of utter peace.

'Do you know where we are going?' he asked, leaning over to kiss her cold, pure cheek.

'No,' she answered in as perfect content as before.

'We are going to get married.'

He felt her grow tense in her clasp upon his arm, and hold there rigidly for a moment, while the swift thoughts whirled through her mind. Then, as if the struggle had ended, she silently relaxed, and leaned more heavily against him.

'There's still time to go back, Marcia,' he said, 'if you wish. That turn to the right, yonder, will take us to Equity, and you can be at home in two hours.' She quivered. 'I'm a poor man,—I suppose you know that, I've only got fifteen dollars in the world, and the colt here. I know I can get on, I'm not afraid for myself, but if you'd rather wait,—if you're not perfectly certain of yourself,—remember, it's going to be a struggle, we're going to have some hard times—'

'You forgive me?' she huskily asked, for all answer, without moving her head from where it lay.

'Yes, Marcia.'

'Then—hurry.'

The minister was an old man, and he seemed quite dazed at the suddenness of their demand for his services. But he gathered himself together, and contrived to make them man and wife, and to give them his marriage certificate.

'It seems as if there were something else,' he said, absently, as he handed the paper to Bartley.

'Perhaps it's this,' said Bartley, giving him a five-dollar note in return.

'Ah, perhaps,' he replied, in unabated perplexity. He bade them serve God, and let them out into the snowy night, through which they drove back to the hotel.

The landlord had kindled a fire on the hearth of the Franklin stove in his parlor, and the blazing huckory snapped in electrical sympathy with the storm when they shut themselves into the bright room, and Bartley took Marcia fondly into his arms

'Wife!'

'Husband!'

They sat down before the fire, hand in hand, and talked of the light things that swim to the top, and eddy round and round on the surface of our deepest moods. They made merry over the old minister's perturbation, which Bartley found endlessly amusing. Then he noticed that the dress Marcia had on was the one she had worn to the sociable in Lower Equity, and she said, yes, she had put it on because he once said he liked it. He asked her when, and she said, oh, she knew, but if he could not remember, she was not going to tell him. Then she wanted to know if he recognized her by the dress before she lifted her veil in the station.

'No,' he said, with a teasing laugh. 'I wasn't thinking of you.'

'Oh, Bartley!' she joyfully reproached him. 'You must have been!'

'Yes, I was! I was so mad at you, that I was glad to have that brute of a station-master bullying some woman!'

'Bartley!'

He sat holding her hand. 'Marcia,' he said, gravely, 'we must write to your father at once, and tell him I want to begin life in the right way, and I think it's only fair to him.'

She was enraptured at his magnanimity. 'Bartley! That's like you! Poor father! I declare—Bartley, I'm afraid I had forgotten him! It's dreadful, but—you put everything else out of my head. I do believe I've died and come to life somewhere else!'

'Well, I haven't,' said Bartley, 'and I guess you'd better write to your father. You'd better write, at present, he and I are not on speaking terms. Here!' He took out his note-book, and gave her his stylographic pen after striking the fist that held it upon his other fist, in the fashion of the amateurs of that reluctant instrument, in order to bring down the ink.

'Oh, what's that?' she asked.

'It's a new kind of pen. I got it for a notice in the Free Press.'

'Is Henry Bird going to edit the paper?'

'I don't know, and I don't care,' answered Bartley. 'I'll go out and get an envelope, and ask the landlord what's the quickest way to get the letter to your father.'

He took up his hat, but she laid her hand on his arm. 'Oh, send for him!' she said.

'Are you afraid I sha'n't come back?' he demanded, with a laughing kiss. 'I want to see him about something else, too.'

'Well, don't be gone long.'

They parted with an embrace that would have fortified older married people for a year's separation. When Bartley came back, she handed him the leaf she had torn out of his book, and sat down beside him while he read it, with her arm over his shoulder.

'Dear father,' the letter ran, 'Bartley and I are married. We were married an hour ago, just across the New Hampshire line, by the Rev. Mr. Jessup. Bartley wants I should let you know the very first thing. I am going to Boston with Bartley to-night, and, as soon as we get settled there, I will write again. I want you should forgive us both, but if you won't forgive Bartley, you mustn't forgive me. You were mistaken about Bartley, and I was right. Bartley has told me everything, and I am perfectly satisfied. Love to mother.'

'MARCIA.'

'P. S.—I did intend to visit Netty Spaulding. But I saw Bartley driving past on his way to the Junction, and I determined to see him if I could before he started for Boston, and tell him I was all wrong, no matter what he said or did afterwards. I ought to have told you I meant to see Bartley, but then you would not have let me come, and if I had not come, I should have died.'

'There's a good deal of Bartley in it,' said the young man with a laugh.

'You don't like it!'

'Yes, I do, it's all right. Did you use to take the prize for composition at boarding-school?'

'Why, I think it's a very good letter for when I'm in such an excited state.'

'It's beautiful!' cried Bartley, laughing more and more. The tears started to her eyes.

'Marcia,' said her husband fondly, 'what a child you are! If ever I do anything to betray your trust in me—'

There came a shuffling of feet outside the door, a clinking of glass and crockery, and a jarring sort of blow, as if some one were trying to rap on the panel with the edge of a heavy-laden waiter Bartley threw the door open and found the landlord there, red and smiling, with the waiter in his hand

'I thought I'd bring your supper in here, you know,' he explained confidentially, 'so 's't you could have it a little more snug And my wife she kind o' got wind o' what was going on,—women will, you know,' he said with a wink,—'and she's sent ye in some hot biscuit and a little jell, and some of her cake' He set the waiter down on the table, and stood admiring its mystery of napkin'd dishes 'She guessed you wouldn't object to some cold chicken, and she's put a little of that on Sha'n't cost ye any more,' he hastened to assure them 'Now this is your room till the train comes, and there ain't agoin' to anybody come in here So you can make yourselves at home. And I hope you'll enjoy your supper as much as we did 20 oorn the night we was married There! I guess I'll let the lady fix the table, she looks as if she knowed how'

He got himself out of the room again, and then Marcia, who had made him some embarrassed thanks, burst out in praise of his pleasantness

'Well, he ought to be pleasant,' said Bartley, 'he's just beaten me on a horse-trade 30 I've sold him the colt'

'Sold him the colt!' cried Marcia, tragically dropping the napkin she had lifted from the plate of cold chicken

'Well, we couldn't very well have taken him to Boston with us And we couldn't have got there without selling him You know you haven't married a millionaire, Marcia'

'How much did you get for the colt?' 40

'Oh, I didn't do so badly I got a hundred and fifty for him'

'And you had fifteen besides'

'That was before we were married I gave the minister five for you,—I think you are worth it I wanted to give fifteen'

'Well, then, you have a hundred and sixty now Isn't that a great deal?'

'An everlasting lot,' said Bartley, with an impatient laugh 'Don't let the supper cool, 50 Marcia'

She silently set out the feast, but regarded it ruefully 'You oughtn't to have ordered so much, Bartley,' she said 'You couldn't afford it'

'I can afford anything when I'm hungry. Besides, I only ordered the oysters and coffee, all the rest is conscience money—or sentiment—from the landlord Come, come! cheer up, now! We sha'n't starve to-night, anyhow'

'Well, I know father will help us'

'We sha'n't count on him,' said Bartley 'Now drop it!' He put his arm round her shoulders and pressed her against him, till she raised her face for his kiss

'Well, I will!' she said, and the shadow lifted itself from their wedding feast, and they sat down and made merry as if they had all the money in the world to spend They laughed and joked, they praised the things they liked, and made fun of the others

'How strange! How perfectly impossible it all seems! Why, last night I was taking supper at Kinney's logging-camp, and hating you at every mouthful with all my might Everything seemed against me, and I was feeling ugly, and flirting like mad with a fool from Montreal she had come out there from Portland for a frolic with the owners' party You made me do it, Marcia!' he cried jestingly 'And remember that, if you want me to be good, you must be kind The other thing seems to make me worse and worse'

'I will,—I will, Bartley,' she said humbly 'I will try to be kind and patient with you I will indeed'

He threw back his head, and laughed and laughed 'Poor—poor old Kinney! He's the cook, you know, and he thought I'd been making fun of him to that woman, and he behaved so, after they were gone, that I started home in a rage, and he followed me out with his hands all covered with dough, and wanted to stop me, but he couldn't for fear of spoiling my clothes—' He lost himself in another paroxysm

Marcia smiled a little Then, 'What sort of a looking person was she?' she tremulously asked Bartley stopped abruptly 'Not one ten-thousandth part as good-looking, nor one millionth part as bright, as Marcia Hubbard!' He caught her and smothered her against his breast

'I don't care! I don't care!' she cried 'I was to blame more than you, if you flirted with her, and it serves me right Yes, I will never say anything to you for anything that happened after I behaved so to you'

'There wasn't anything else happened,' cried Bartley 'And the Montreal woman snubbed me soundly before she was done with me'

'Snubbed you!' exclaimed Marcia, with illogical indignation 'This delighted Bartley so much that it was long before he left off laughing over her

10

Then they sat down, and were silent till she said, 'And did you leave him in a temper?'

'Who? Kinney? In a perfect devil of a temper. I wouldn't even borrow some money he wanted to lend me'

'Write to him, Bartley,' said his wife, seriously 'I love you so I can't bear to have anybody bad friends with you'

SIX SONNETS<sup>1</sup>

I

As one turned round on some high mountain top Views all things as they are, but out of place, Reversing recognition, so I trace Dimly those dreams of youth and love and stop Blindly, for in such mood landmarks and ways
That we have trodden all our lives and know
We seem not to have known and cannot guess Like one who told his footsteps over to me In the opposite world and where he wandered through Whilst the hot wind blew from the sultry north—Forests that give no shade and bottomless Sands where the plummet sinks as in the sea,
Saw the sky struck by lightning from the earth, Rain salt like blood, and flights of fiery snow

LONG ISLAND! Yes! When first my vision swept Thy far faint shores with inlet and lagoon
Or misty woodflats, where the senses swoon

<sup>1</sup> The sonnets have been selected from sequences written in 1872, and not printed before their appearance in Bynner, ed., The Sonnets of Frederick Goddard Tuckerman (N Y., 1931). They are, respectively, sonnets 8, 11, 12, and 13 from the third sequence, and sonnets 6 and 10 from the fourth

As in that land where Christian sank and slept, I thought of him, and then when in the rain
We reached the Inn, and when I heard them speak Of Fire Place at hand and Devil's Neck
And Good Ground and Mount Sinai west away,
As in a dream I seemed to tread again
The Pilgrim's steps and trace the Heavenly Way
But there sat Happy Jack, with dumb Rejoice, Red Ike the hostler with his whistling voice,
And an old man I called Legality Craftily quaint the tale he told to me

'YOUNG Silas Long a carrier through these woods, Drove home one night in not the best of moods,
Having just seen a drowned man flung ashore
With a strange feather cap And once before,
When he was hauling seine in Southold Bay
About this time of year, a seaman's corse Washed up, with such a cap and such a face,
And it had brought misfortune on the place.
Pondering he drove, when lo, across the way
He saw, too late, that there a body lay,

10

Felt the wheels tilt but could not stop his horse
Or not at once, then—flinging with a slap
The old cloth cover down he called a cap—Ran back, ten steps or more, and nothing found

'Yes, the dead pines and deersfoot on the ground,—
So quick returned again in five or six His cap was gone and in its stead thrown
down
The very loon-skin the twice-drowned had
on,
With bits of seaweed sticking to the flux
So Long rode home, of cap and sense bereft,
But still can show the dead man's that was left,
And the webs crawl, he says, when the sea rolls '
Then he, having told his tale and said his
say,
By way of emphasis or corollary 10
Spat a torpedo in the bed of coals
'And what, what, what,' squealed Ike,
'became of Long's'
But the old man here rose and reached the tongs,
Laid fire to his pipe and phewed away

Showed him Job's Coffin, and the Golden Yard,
Showed the nine moonstars in the moonless
blue,
And the great Circle of the Bestiary, 10
So that the child grew up to love the sky
And, in the woods beyond the hemlock
bark,
To heed the intricate moss that o'er it grew,
The shadowy flower all wet with all-day dew

6

HAST thou seen reversed the prophet's miracle—
The worm that, touched, a twig-like semblance takes?
Or hast thou mused what giveth the craft that makes
The twirling spider at once invisible,
And the spermal odour to the barberry flower,
Or heard the singing sand by the cold coast
foam,
Or late—in inland autumn groves afar—Hast thou ever plucked the little chickwintergreen star
And tasted the sour of its leaf? Then come With me betumes, and I will show thee
more 10
Than these, of nature's secrecies the least
In the first morning, overcast and chill, And in the day's young sunshine, seeking still
For earliest flowers and gathering to the east

TRUTH AT LAST

DOES a man ever give up hope, I wonder,— Face the grim fact, seeing it clear as day?
When Bennen saw the snow slip, heard its thunder

Low, louder, roaring round him, felt the speed
Grow swifter as the avalanche hurled downward,
Did he for just one heart-throb—did he indeed

Know with all certainty, as they swept onward,
 There was the end, where the crag dropped
 away?
 Or did he think, even till they plunged and fell,
 Some miracle would stop them? Nay, they tell 10
 That he turned round, face forward, calm and pale,
 Stretching his arms out toward his native vale
 As if in mute, unspeakable farewell, And so went down — 'Tis something, if at last,
 Though only for a flash, a man may see Clear-eyed the future as he sees the past,
 From doubt, or fear, or hope's illusion free

FIVE LIVES

FIVE mites of monads dwelt in a round drop
 That twinkled on a leaf by a pool in the sun
 To the naked eye they lived invisible, Specks, for a world of whom the empty shell
 Of a mustard-seed had been a hollow sky

 One was a meditative monad, called a sage,
 And, shrinking all his mind within, he thought
 'Tradition, handed down for hours and hours,
 Tells that our globe, this quivering crystal
 world,
 Is slowly dying What if, seconds hence, 10
 When I am very old, yon shimmering
 dome
 Come drawing down and down, till all things end?'
 Then with a weazen smirk he proudly felt
 No other mote of God had ever gained Such giant grasp of universal truth

One was a transcendental monad, thin And long and slim in the mind, and thus he mused
 Oh, vast, unfathomable monad-souls!
 Made in the image'—a hoarse frog croaks from the pool—
 'Hark! 'twas some god, voicing his glorious thought 20

In thunder music! Yea, we hear their voice,
 And we may guess their minds from ours, their work
 Some taste they have like ours, some tendency
 To wriggle about, and munch a trace of scum '
 He floated up on a pin-point bubble of gas
 That burst, pricked by the air, and he was gone.

One was a barren-minded monad, called A positivist, and he knew positively 'There is no world beyond this certain drop
 Prove me another! Let the dreamers dream Of their faint dreams, and noises from without, 31
 And higher and lower, life is life enough '
 Then swaggering half a hair's breadth, hungrily
 He seized upon an atom of bug, and fed

One was a tattered monad, called a poet;
 And with shrill voice ecstatic thus he sang
 'Oh, the little female monad's lips!
 Oh, the little female monad's eyes
 Ah, the little, little, female, female monad!'

The last was a strong-minded monadess,
 Who dashed amid the infusoria, 41 Danced high and low, and wildly spun and dove Till the dizzy others held their breath to see

But while they led their wondrous little lives
 Æonian moments had gone wheeling by,
 The burning drop had shrunk with fearful
 speed,
 A glistening film—'twas gone, the leaf was dry
 The little ghost of an inaudible squeak Was lost to the frog that goggled from his stone,
 Who, at the huge, slow tread of a thoughtful ox 50
 Coming to drink, stirred sideways fatly, plunged,
 Launched backward twice, and all the pool was still

THE FOOL'S PRAYER

THE royal feast was done, the King Sought some new sport to banish care,
And to his jester cried 'Sir Fool,
Kneel now, and make for us a prayer!'

The jester doffed his cap and bells,
And stood the mocking court before,
They could not see the bitter smile
Behind the painted grin he wore

He bowed his head, and bent his knee
Upon the monarch's silken stool, 10
His pleading voice arose 'O Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool!'

'No pity, Lord, could change the heart
From red with wrong to white as wool,
The rod must heal the sin but, Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool!'

' 'Tis not by guilt the onward sweep Of truth and right, O Lord, we stay,
'Tis by our follies that so long 20
We hold the earth from heaven away

'These clumsy feet, still in the mire, Go crushing blossoms without end,
These hard, well-meaning hands we thrust
Among the heart-strings of a friend

'The ill-timed truth we might have kept—Who knows how sharp it pierced and stung?

The word we had not sense to say—
Who knows how grandly it had rung?

'Our faults no tenderness should ask,
The chastening stripes must cleanse them
all, 30
But for our blunders—oh, in shame
Before the eyes of heaven we fall.

'Earth bears no balsam for mistakes, Men crown the knave, and scourge the tool

That did his will, but Thou, O Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool!'

The room was hushed, in silence rose
The King, and sought his gardens
cool,

And walked apart, and murmured low,
'Be merciful to me, a fool!'

OPPORTUNITY

THIS I beheld, or dreamed it in a dream —
There spread a cloud of dust along a
plan,
And underneath the cloud, or in it, raged A furious battle, and men yelled, and swords Shocked upon swords and shields A prince's banner Wavered, then staggered backward, hemmed by foes
A craven hung along the battle's edge,
And thought, 'Had I a sword of keener
steel—
That blue blade that the king's son bears,— but this Blunt thing—!' he snapt and flung it from his hand, 10
And lowering crept away and left the field Then came the king's son, wounded, sore bestead,
And weaponless, and saw the broken
sword,
Hilt-buried in the dry and trodden sand,
And ran and snatched it, and with battle-shout
Lifted afresh he hewed his enemy down,
And saved a great cause that heroic day

OUT of the dusk a shadow,
Then a spark,
Out of the cloud a silence,
Then a lark,

Out of the heart a rapture,
Then a pain,
Out of the dead, cold ashes,
Life again

BLOSSOM

FOR this the fruit, for this the seed,
For this the parent tree,
The least to man, the most to God—
A fragrant mystery
Where love, with beauty glorified, Forgets utility

THE PEAK

As on some solitary height Abides, in summer's fierce despite, Snow-blossom that no sun can blight,
No frost can kill,
So, in my soul—all else below
I change succumbing—stands aglow
One wreath of immemorial snow, Unscattered still

THE WANDER-LOVERS

Down the world with Marna!
That's the life for me!
Wandering with the wandering wind,
Vagabond and unconfined!
Roving with the roving rain
Its unboundaried domain!
Kith and kin of wander-kind,
Children of the sea!

Petrels of the sea-drift!
Swallows of the lea! 10
Arabs of the whole wide girth
Of the wind-encircled earth!
In all climes we pitch our tents,
Cronies of the elements,
With the secret lords of birth Intimate and free

All the seaboard knows us
From Fundy to the Keys,
Every bend and every creek
Of abundant Chesapeake, 20
Ardise hills and Newport coves
And the far-off orange groves, Where Floridian oceans break, Tropic tiger seas

Down the world with Marna, Tarrying there and here!
Just as much at home in Spain
As in Tangier or Touraine!
Shakespeare's Avon knows us well,
And the crags of Neufchâtel, 30
And the ancient Nile is fain
Of our coming near

Down the world with Marna,
Daughter of the air!
Marna of the subtle grace,
And the vision in her face!
Moving in the measures trod
By the angels before God!
With her sky-blue eyes amaze
And her sea-blue hair! 40

Marna with the trees' life
In her veins a-sur!
Marna of the aspen heart
Where the sudden quivers start!

Quick-responsive, subtle, wild!
Artless as an artless child,
Spite of all her reach of art!
Oh, to roam with her!

Marna with the wind's will,
Daughter of the sea! 50
Marna of the quick disdain, Starting at the dream of stain!
At a smile with love aglow,
At a frown a statued woe,
Standing pinnaced in pain
Till a kiss sets free!

Down the world with Marna,
Daughter of the fire!
Marna of the deathless hope,
Still alert to win new scope 60
Where the wings of life may spread
For a flight unhazarded!
Dreaming of the speech to cope With the heart's desire!

Marna of the far quest
After the divine!
Striving ever for some goal
Past the blunder-god's control!
Dreaming of potential years
When no day shall dawn in fears! 70
That's the Marna of my soul,
Wander-bride of mine!

COMRADES

COMRADES, pour the wine to-night
For the parting is with dawn!
Oh, the clink of cups together,
With the daylight coming on!
Greet the morn
With a double horn,
When strong men drink together!

Comrades, gird your swords tonight,
For the battle is with dawn!
Oh, the clash of shields together, 10
With the triumph coming on!
Greet the foe,
And lay him low,
When strong men fight together!

Comrades, watch the tides to-night,
For the sailing is with dawn!
Oh, to face the spray together,
With the tempest coming on!
Greet the sea
With a shout of glee, 20
When strong men roam together!

Comrades, give a cheer to-night,
For the dying is with dawn!
Oh, to meet the stars together,
With the silence coming on!
Greet the end
As a friend a friend,
When strong men die together! 1894

THE SEA GYPSY

I AM fevered with the sunset,
I am fretful with the bay,
For the wander-thirst is on me
And my soul is in Cathay

There's a schooner in the offing,
With her topsails shot with fire,
And my heart has gone aboard her For the Islands of Desire

I must forth again to-morrow!
With the sunset I must be 10
Hull down on the trail of rapture
In the wonder of the sea 1896

A STEIN SONG

GIVE a rouse, then, in the Maytime
For a life that knows no fear!
Turn night-time into day-time
With the sunlight of good cheer!
For it's always fair weather
When good fellows get together, With a stein on the table and a good song ringing clear

When the wind comes up from Cuba
And the birds are on the wing,
And our hearts are patting juba 10
To the banjo of the spring, Then it's no wonder whether
The boys will get together, With a stein on the table and a cheer for everything

For we're all frank-and-twenty
When the spring is in the air,
And we've faith and hope a-plenty,
And we've life and love to spare,
And it's birds of a feather
When we all get together, 20
With a stein on the table and a heart without a care

For we know the world is glorious,
And the goal a golden thing,
And that God is not censorious
When his children have their fling,
And life slips its tether
When the boys get together,
With a stein on the table in the fellowship of spring

UNMANIFEST DESTINY

1896

To what new fates, my country, far
And unforeseen of foe or friend,
Beneath what unexpected star,
Compelled to what unchosen end,

Across the sea that knows no beach
The Admiral of Nations guides Thy blind obedient keels to reach
The harbor where thy future rides!

The guns that spoke at Lexington Knew not that God was planning then 10
The trumpet word of Jefferson
To bugle forth the rights of men

To them that wept and cursed Bull Run,
What was it but despair and shame?
Who saw behind the cloud the sun?
Who knew that God was in the flame?

Had not defeat upon defeat,
Disaster on disaster come,
The slave's emancipated feet
Had never marched behind the drum. 20

There is a Hand that bends our deeds
To mightier issues than we planned,
Each son that triumphs, each that bleeds,
My country, serves Its dark command.

I do not know beneath what sky
Nor on what seas shall be thy fate,
I only know it shall be high,
I only know it shall be great

AT THE CROSSROADS

You to the left and I to the right,
 For the ways of men must sever—
 And it well may be for a day and a night,
 And it well may be forever
 But whether we meet or whether we part (For our ways are past our knowing),
 A pledge from the heart to its fellow heart
 On the ways we all are going!
 Here's luck!
 For we know not where we are going 10

We have striven fair in love and war,
 But the wheel was always weighted;
 We have lost the prize that we struggled
 for,
 We have won the prize that was fated
 We have met our loss with a smile and a song,
 And our gains with a wink and a whistle,— For, whether we're right or whether we're
 wrong,
 There's a rose for every thistle
 Here's luck—
 And a drop to wet your whistle! 20

Whether we win or whether we lose
 With the hands that life is dealing,
 It is not we nor the ways we choose
 But the fall of the cards that's sealing

There's a fate in love and a fate in fight,
 And the best of us all go under—
 And whether we're wrong or whether we're
 right,
 We win, sometimes, to our wonder
 Here's luck—
 That we may not yet go under! 30

With a steady swing and an open brow
 We have tramped the ways together, But we're clasping hands at the crossroads
 now
 In the Fiend's own night for weather,
 And whether we bleed or whether we smile
 In the leagues that lie before us,
 The ways of life are many a mile
 And the dark of Fate is o'er us
 Here's luck!
 And a cheer for the dark before us! 40

You to the left and I to the right,
 For the ways of men must sever,
 And it well may be for a day and a night,
 And it well may be forever!
 But whether we live or whether we die (For the end is past our knowing),
 Here's two frank hearts and the open sky,
 Be a fair or an ill wind blowing!
 Here's luck!
 In the teeth of all winds blowing 50

THE WILD RIDE

I HEAR in my heart, I hear in its ominous pulses
 All day, on the road, the hoofs of invisible horses,
 All night, from their stalls, the importunate
 pawing and neighing
 Let cowards and laggards fall back! but alert to the saddle Weather-worn and abreast, go men of our galloping legion,
 With a stirrup-cup each to the lily of women that loves him
 The trail is through dolour and dread, over crags and morasses,

There are shapes by the way, there are things that appal or entice us What odds? We are Knights of the Grail, we are vowed to the riding

Thought's self is a vanishing wing, and joy is a cobweb, 10
 And friendship a flower in the dust, and glory a sunbeam
 Not here is our prize, nor, alas! after these our pursuing

A dipping of plumes, a tear, a shake of the bridle,
 A passing salute to this world and her pitiful beauty
 We hurry with never a word in the track of our fathers

(I hear in my heart, I hear in its ominous
pulses
All day, on the road, the hoofs of invisible
horses,
All night, from their stalls, the importunate
pawing and neighing )

We spur to a land of no name, out-racing the storm-wind,
We leap to the infinite dark like sparks from the anvil <sup>20</sup> Thou ledest, O God! All's well with Thy troopers that follow

A FRIEND'S SONG FOR SIMOISIUS <sup>1</sup>

THE breath of dew and twilight's grace
Be on the lonely battle-place,
And to so young, so kind a face,
The long protecting grasses cling!
(Alas, alas,
That one inexorable thing!)

In rocky hollows cool and deep,
The honey-bees unrifled sleep,
The early moon from Ida steep Comes to the empty wrestling-ring, <sup>10</sup>

Upon the widowed wind recede
No echoes of the shepherd's reed,
And children without laughter lead
The war-horse to the watering;

With footstep separate and slow
The father and the mother go,
Not now upon an urn they know
To mingle tears for comfortung.

Thou stranger Ajax Telamon!
What to the lovely hast thou done, <sup>20</sup>
That nevermore a maid may run
With him across the flowery Spring?

The world to me has nothing dear
Beyond the namesake river here:
Oh, Simios is wild and clear!
And to his brink my heart I bring;

My heart, if only this might be,
Would stay his waters from the
sea,
To cover Troy, to cover me,
To haste the hour of perishing <sup>30</sup> (Alas, alas,
That one inexorable thing!)

Therefore they called him Simoeisios, but he repaid not his dear parents the recompense of his nurture, scanty was his span of life by reason of the spear of great-hearted Aias that laid him low. WHEN I consider Life and its few years—
 A wisp of fog betwixt us and the sun,
 A call to battle, and the battle done Ere the last echo dies within our
 ears,
 A rose choked in the grass, an hour of fears,
 The gusts that past a darkening shore do
 beat,
 The burst of music down an unlistening
 street—
 I wonder at the idleness of tears Ye old, old dead, and ye of yester-
 night,
 Chieftains, and bards, and keepers of the sheep, 10
 By every cup of sorrow that you had,
 Loose me from tears, and make me see

A PURITAN LADY

WILD Carthage held her, Rome, Sidon She stared to tears Tall, golden Helen, wearying
 Behind the Trojan spears Towered Antwerp knew her well,
 She wore her quiet gown
 In some hushed house in Oxford grass,
 Or lane in Salem town
 Humble and high in one,
 Cool, certain, different, 10
 She lasts, scarce saint, yet half a child,
 As hard, as innocent
 What grave, long afternoons,
 What caged airs round her blown,
 Stripped her of humor, left her bare
 As cloud, or wayside stone?
 Made her as clear a thing,
 In this slack world as plain
 As a white flower on a grave,
 Or sleet sharp at a pane? 20

ALDEBARAN AT DUSK

THOU art the star for which all evening waits—
 O star of peace, come tenderly and soon, Nor heed the drowsy and enchanted moon,

Who dreams in silver at the eastern gates Ere yet she brim with light the blue estates Abandoned by the eagles of the noon
But shine thou swiftly on the darkling dune

And woodlands where the twilight hesitates

Above that wide and ruby lake to-West, Wherein the sunset waits reluctantly, 10
Stir silently the purple wings of Night.
She stands afar, upholding to her breast, As mighty murmurs reach her from the
sea,
Thy lone and everlasting rose of light

THE BLACK VULTURE

ALOOF within the day's enormous dome, He holds unshared the silence of the sky
Far down his bleak, relentless eyes descry
The eagle's empire and the falcon's home—
Far down, the galleons of sunset roam,
His hazards on the sea of morning lie, Serene, he hears the broken tempest sigh
Where cold sierras gleam like scattered
foam

And least of all he holds the human swarm—Unwitting now that envious men prepare 10
To make their dream and its fulfillment one,
When, poised above the caldrons of the storm,
Their hearts, contemptuous of death, shall dare
His roads between the thunder and the sun

THE YOUNG WITCH<sup>1</sup>

1698

(ELDER DAVENPORT SPEAKS)

CRY bravely, O town-crier,
(And ye, young men, beware!)
How Yale Ratchford, the strong smuth, Is gone God knoweth where.

<sup>1</sup> Printed in The Century Magazine, CVI, iv, 588-91, and not included in any volume by Sterling

Yea, the tall smuth is gone,
And comes not home again.
Though he had a shrewish wife,
He was man among men.

He shall drink no more ale,
Nor smoke at the tavern door, 10
Nor sing old songs at his forge,
And wrestle young men no more.

Thus he got for being so strong,
And this for being so bold
As to have in scorn the white witch
Who slept in her hair of gold

By the dark pond in the hills
She lived when her dam died,
With a black cat which minded
her,
And a black dog at her side 20

In pine-wood and marshy places
Her low song was sung,
Where long moss is, and toadstools
The hue of a goblin's tongue.

Where got she her sullen mouth
And where her swaying form?
Would she live on eggs and apples
When the blood of men is warm?

All the town people went shy of her
When the Ratchford baby died. 30 Folk tell how she laughed that day,
And no folk say she cried

Yale Ratchford cut him a switch
From a hickory at his door,
And he went up among the hills
To see she laughed no more.

There were whispers of a hanging
The day that he went forth,
As had been done by holy men
At Salem in the north 40

A bear was shot at Hadlyme
With fur as soft as silk,
And Goodman Ames of Saybrook
Found minnows in the milk.

That night the geese went over,
A-belling for the pole
Some say it was the dark hounds
That bay a loosened soul

But saved, or damned forever,
 He comes back home no more,
 And we who searched at the witch's house
 Found grass against the door.

It was not wise to go hillward
 With hand shut on a switch;
 It is not given to young men
 To rid the land of a witch—

Not with eyes so wide apart,
 And in a face so white

50

Not if she wander naked
 By a shrunk moon's light

60

What shall he do her of service,
 As the strong do for the fair?
 Shall he forge her an iron marriage-ring,
 Or shoes for the devil's mare?

For they ha' gone forever—
 Vanished, as men say true,
 In blue sky or blue water
 Or the wind between the two.

1842-1914?

AN OCCURRENCE AT OWL CREEK BRIDGE

I

A MAN stood upon a railroad bridge in northern Alabama, looking down into the swift water twenty feet below. The man's hands were behind his back, the wrists bound with a cord. A rope closely encircled his neck. It was attached to a stout cross-timber above his head and the slack fell to the level of his knees. Some loose boards laid upon the sleepers supporting the metals of the railway supplied a footing for him and his executioners—two private soldiers of the Federal army, directed by a sergeant who in civil life may have been a deputy sheriff. At a short remove upon the same temporary platform was an officer in the uniform of his rank, armed. He was a captain. A sentinel at each end of the bridge stood with his rifle in the position known as 'support,' that is to say, vertical in front of the left shoulder, the hammer resting on the forearm thrown straight across the chest—a formal and unnatural position, enforcing an erect carriage of the body. It did not appear to be the duty of these two men to know what was occurring at the centre of the bridge, they merely blockaded the two ends of the foot planking that traversed it.

10

30

the stream was open ground—a gentle acclivity topped with a stockade of vertical tree trunks, loop-holed for rifles, with a single embrasure through which protruded the muzzle of a brass cannon commanding the bridge. Midway of the slope between bridge and fort were the spectators—a single company of infantry in line, at 'parade rest,' the butts of the rifles on the ground, the barrels inclining slightly backward against the right shoulder, the hands crossed upon the stock. A lieutenant stood at the right of the line, the point of his sword upon the ground, his left hand resting upon his right. Excepting the group of four at the centre of the bridge, not a man moved. The company faced the bridge, staring stonily, motionless. The sentinels, facing the banks of the stream, might have been statues to adorn the bridge. The captain stood with folded arms, silent, observing the work of his subordinates, but making no sign. Death is a dignitary who when he comes announced is to be received with formal manifestations of respect, even by those most familiar with him. In the code of military etiquette silence and fixity are forms of deference.

The man who was engaged in being hanged was apparently about thirty-five years of age. He was a civilian, if one might judge from his habit, which was that of a planter. His features were good—a straight nose, firm mouth, broad forehead, from which his long, dark hair was combed straight back, falling behind his ears to the collar of his well-fitting frock-coat. He wore a mustache and pointed beard, but no whiskers, his eyes were large and dark gray, and had a kindly expression which one would hardly have expected in one whose neck was in the hemp. Evidently this was no vulgar assassin. The liberal military code makes provision for hanging many kinds of persons, and gentlemen are not excluded.

The preparations being complete, the two private soldiers stepped aside and each drew away the plank upon which he had been standing. The sergeant turned to the captain, saluted and placed himself immediately behind that officer, who in turn moved apart one pace. These movements left the condemned man and the sergeant standing on the two ends of the same plank, which spanned three of the cross-ties of the bridge. The end upon which the civilian stood almost, but not quite, reached a fourth. This plank had been held in place by the weight of the captain, it was now held by that of the sergeant. At a signal from the former the latter would step aside, the plank would tilt and the condemned man go down between two ties. The arrangement commended itself to his judgment as simple and effective. His face had not been covered nor his eyes bandaged. He looked a moment at his 'unsteadfast footing,' then let his gaze wander to the swirling water of the stream racing madly beneath his feet. A piece of dancing driftwood caught his attention and his eyes followed it down the current. How slowly it appeared to move! What a sluggish stream!

He closed his eyes in order to fix his last thoughts upon his wife and children. The water, touched to gold by the early sun, the brooding mists under the banks at some distance down the stream, the fort, the soldiers, the piece of drift—all had distracted him. And now he became conscious of a new disturbance. Striking through the thought of his dear ones was a sound which he could neither ignore nor understand, a sharp, distinct, metallic percussion like the stroke of a blacksmith's hammer upon the anvil, it had the same ringing quality. He wondered what it was, and whether immeasurably distant or near by—it seemed both. Its recurrence was regular, but as slow as the tolling of a death knell. He awaited each stroke with impatience and—he knew not why—apprehension. The intervals of silence grew progressively longer; the delays became maddening. With their greater infrequency the sounds increased in strength and sharpness. They hurt his ear like the thrust of a knife; he feared he would shriek. What he heard was the ticking of his watch.

10 He unclosed his eyes and saw again the water below him. 'If I could free my hands,' he thought, 'I might throw off the noose and spring into the stream. By diving I could evade the bullets and, swimming vigorously, reach the bank, take to the woods and get away home. My home, thank God, is as yet outside their lines, my wife and little ones are still beyond the invader's farthest advance.'

20 As these thoughts, which have here to be set down in words, were flashed into the doomed man's brain rather than evolved from it, the captain nodded to the sergeant. The sergeant stepped aside.

II

Peyton Farquhar was a well-to-do planter, of an old and highly respected Alabama family. Being a slave owner and, like other slave owners, a politician he was naturally an original secessionist and ardently devoted to the Southern cause. Circumstances of an imperious nature, which it is unnecessary to relate here, had prevented him from taking service with the gallant army that had fought the disastrous campaigns ending with the fall of Corinth, and he chafed under the inglorious restraint, longing for the release of his energies, the larger life of the soldier, the opportunity for distinction. That opportunity, he felt, would come, as it comes to all in war time. Meanwhile he did what he could. No service was too humble for him to perform in aid of the South, no adventure too perilous for him to undertake if consistent with the character of a civilian who was at heart a soldier, and who in good faith and without too much qualification assented to at least a part of the frankly villainous dictum that all is fair in love and war.

50 One evening while Farquhar and his wife were sitting on a rustic bench near the entrance to his grounds, a gray-clad soldier rode up to the gate and asked for a drink of water. Mrs Farquhar was only too happy to serve him with her own white hands. While she was fetching the water her husband approached the dusty horseman and inquired eagerly for news from the front.

'The Yanks are repairing the railroads,' said the man, 'and are getting ready for another advance. They have reached the Owl Creek bridge, put it in order and built a stockade on the north bank. The commandant has issued an order, which is posted everywhere, declaring that any civilian caught interfering with the railroad, its bridges, tunnels or trains will be summarily hanged. I saw the order.'

'How far is it to the Owl Creek bridge?' Farquhar asked.

'About thirty miles.'

'Is there no force on this side the creek?'

'Only a picket post half a mile out, on the railroad, and a single sentinel at this end of the bridge.'

'Suppose a man—a civilian and student of hanging—should elude the picket post and perhaps get the better of the sentinel,' said Farquhar, smiling, 'what could he accomplish?'

The soldier reflected. 'I was there a month ago,' he replied. 'I observed that the flood of last winter had lodged a great quantity of driftwood against the wooden pier at this end of the bridge. It is now dry and would burn like tow.'

The lady had now brought the water, which the soldier drank. He thanked her ceremoniously, bowed to her husband and rode away. An hour later, after nightfall, he repressed the plantation, going northward in the direction from which he had come. He was a Federal scout.

III

As Peyton Farquhar fell straight downward through the bridge he lost consciousness and was as one already dead. From this state he was awakened—ages later, it seemed to him—by the pain of a sharp pressure upon his throat, followed by a sense of suffocation. Keen, poignant agonies seemed to shoot from his neck downward through every fibre of his body and limbs. These pains appeared to flash along well-defined lines of ramification and to beat with an inconceivably rapid perio-dicity. They seemed like streams of pulsating fire heating him to an intolerable temperature. As to his head, he was conscious of nothing but a feeling of fulness—of congestion. These sensations were unaccompanied by thought. The intellectual part of his nature was already effaced; he had power only to feel, and feeling was torment. He was conscious of motion, encompassed in a luminous cloud, of which he was now merely the fiery heart, without material substance, he swung through unthinkable arcs of oscillation, like a vast pendulum.

Then all at once, with terrible suddenness, the light about him shot upward with the noise of a loud plash, a frightful roaring was in his ears, and all was cold and dark. The power of thought was restored; he knew that the rope had broken and he had fallen into the stream. There was no additional strangulation, the noose about his neck was already suffocating him and kept the water from his lungs. To die of hanging at the bottom of a river!—the idea seemed to him ludicrous. He opened his eyes in the darkness and saw above him a gleam of light, but how distant, how inaccessible! He was still sinking, for the light became fainter and fainter until it was a mere glimmer. Then it began to grow and brighten, and he knew that he was rising toward the surface—knew it with reluctance, for he was now very comfortable. 'To be hanged and drowned,' he thought, 'that is not so bad, but I do not wish to be shot. No, I will not be shot, that is not fair.'

He was not conscious of an effort, but a sharp pain in his wrist apprised him that he was trying to free his hands. He gave the struggle his attention, as an idler might observe the feat of a juggler, without interest in the outcome. What splendid effort! What magnificent, what superhuman strength! Ah, that was a fine endeavor! Bravo! The cord fell away, his arms parted and floated upward, the hands dimly seen on each side in the growing light. He watched them with a new interest as first one and then the other pounced upon the noose at his neck. They tore it away and thrust it fiercely aside, its undulations resembling those of a water-snake. 'Put it back, put it back!' He thought he shouted these words to his hands, for the undoing of the noose had been succeeded by the direst pang that he had yet experienced. His neck ached horribly, his brain was on fire, his heart, which had been fluttering faintly, gave a great leap, trying to force itself out at his mouth. His whole body was racked and wrenched with an insupportable anguish! But his disobedient hands gave no heed to the command. They beat the water vigorously with quick, downward strokes, forcing him to the surface. He felt his head emerge; his eyes were blinded by the sunlight, his chest expanded convulsively, and with a supreme and crowning agony his lungs engulfed a great draught of air, which instantly he expelled in a shriek!

He was now in full possession of his physical senses. They were, indeed, preternaturally keen and alert. Something in the awful disturbance of his organic system had so exalted and refined them that they made record of things never before perceived. He felt the ripples upon his face and heard their separate sounds as they struck. He looked at the forest on the bank of the stream, saw the individual trees, the leaves and the veining of each leaf—saw the very insects upon them: the locusts, the brilliant-bodied flies, the gray spiders stretching their webs from twig to twig. He noted the prismatic colors in all the dewdrops upon a million blades of grass. The humming of the gnats that danced above the eddies of the stream, the beating of the dragon-flies' wings, the strokes of the water-spiders' legs, like oars which had lifted their boat—all these made audible music. A fish slid along beneath his eyes and he heard the rush of its body parting the water.

He had come to the surface facing down the stream; in a moment the visible world seemed to wheel slowly round, himself the pivotal point, and he saw the bridge, the fort, the soldiers upon the bridge, the captain, the sergeant, the two privates, his executioners. They were in silhouette against the blue sky. They shouted and gesticulated, pointing at him. The captain had drawn his pistol, but did not fire, the others were unarmed. Their movements were grotesque and horrible, their forms gigantic.

Suddenly he heard a sharp report and something struck the water smartly within a few inches of his head, splattering his face with spray. He heard a second report, and saw one of the sentinels with his rifle at his shoulder, a light cloud of blue smoke rising from the muzzle. The man in the water saw the eye of the man on the bridge gazing into his own through the sights of the rifle. He observed that it was a gray eye and remembered having read that gray eyes were keenest, and that all famous marksmen had them. Nevertheless, this one had missed.

A counter-swirl had caught Farquhar and turned him half round, he was again looking into the forest on the bank opposite the fort. The sound of a clear, high voice in a monotonous singsong now rang out behind him and came across the water with a distinctness that pierced and subdued all other sounds, even the beating of the ripples in his ears. Although no soldier, he had frequented camps enough to know the dread significance of that deliberate, drawling, aspirated chant, the lieutenant on shore was taking a part in the morning's work. How coldly and pitilessly—with what an even, calm intonation, presaging and enforcing tranquility in the men—with what accurately measured intervals fell those cruel words:

'Attention, company! . . . Shoulder arms! Ready! . . . Aim! . . . Fire!'

Farquhar dived—dived as deeply as he could. The water roared in his ears like the voice of Niagara, yet he heard the dulled thunder of the volley and, rising again toward the surface, met shining bits of metal, singularly flattened, oscillating slowly downward. Some of them touched him on the face and hands, then fell away, continuing their descent. One lodged between his collar and neck, it was uncomfortably warm and he snatched it out.

As he rose to the surface, gasping for breath, he saw that he had been a long time under water, he was perceptibly farther down stream—nearer to safety. The soldiers had almost finished reloading, the metal ramrods flashed all at once in the sunshine as they were drawn from the barrels, turned in the air, and thrust into their sockets. The two sentinels fired again, independently and ineffectually.

The hunted man saw all this over his shoulder, he was now swimming vigorously with the current. His brain was as energetic as his arms and legs, he thought with the rapidity of lightning.

'The officer,' he reasoned, 'will not make that martinet's error a second time. It is as easy to dodge a volley as a single shot. He has probably already given the command to fire at will. God help me, I cannot dodge them all!'

An appalling plash within two yards of him was followed by a loud, rushing sound, diminuendo, which seemed to travel back through the air to the fort and died in an explosion which stirred the very river to its depths! A rising sheet of water curved over him, fell down upon him, blinded him, strangled him! The cannon had taken a hand in the game. As he shook his head free from the commotion of the smitten water he heard the deflected shot humming through the air ahead, and in an instant it was cracking and smashing the branches in the forest beyond.

'They will not do that again,' he thought, 'the next time they will use a charge of grape. I must keep my eye upon the gun, the smoke will apprise me—the report arrives too late, it lags behind the missile. That is a good gun.'

Suddenly he felt himself whirled round and round—spinning like a top. The water, the banks, the forests, the now distant bridge, fort and men—all were commingled and blurred. Objects were represented by their colors only, circular horizontal streaks of color—that was all he saw. He had been caught in a vortex and was being whirled on with a velocity of advance and gyration that made him giddy and sick. In a few moments he was flung upon the gravel at the foot of the left bank of the stream—the southern bank—and behind a projecting point which concealed him from his enemies. The sudden arrest of his motion, the abrasion of one of his hands on the gravel, restored him, and he wept with delight. He dug his fingers into the sand, threw it over himself in handfuls and audibly blessed it. It looked like diamonds, rubies, emeralds, he could think of nothing beautiful which it did not resemble. The trees upon the bank were giant garden plants, he noted a definite order in their arrangement, inhaled the fragrance of their blooms. A strange, roseate light shone through the spaces among their trunks and the wind made in their branches the music of æolian harps. He had no wish to perfect his escape—was content to remain in that enchanting spot until retaken.

A whiz and rattle of grapeshot among the branches high above his head roused him from his dream. The baffled cannoneer had fired him a random farewell. He sprang to his feet, rushed up the sloping bank, and plunged into the forest.

All that day he traveled, laying his course by the rounding sun. The forest seemed interminable, nowhere did he discover a break in it, not even a woodman's road. He had not known that he lived in so wild a region. There was something uncanny in the revelation.

By nightfall he was fatigued, footsore, famishing. The thought of his wife and children urged him on. At last he found a road which led him in what he knew to be the right direction. It was as wide and straight as a city street, yet it seemed untraveled. No fields bordered it, no dwelling anywhere. Not so much as the barking of a dog suggested human habitation. The black bodies of the trees formed a straight wall on both sides, terminating on the horizon in a point, like a diagram in a lesson in perspective. Overhead, as he looked up through this rift in the wood, shone great golden stars looking unfamiliar and grouped in strange constellations. He was sure they were arranged in some order which had a secret and malign significance. The wood on either side was full of singular noises, among which—once, twice, and again—he distinctly heard whispers in an unknown tongue.

His neck was in pain and lifting his hand to it he found it horribly swollen. He knew that it had a circle of black where the rope had bruised it. His eyes felt congested, he could no longer close them. His tongue was swollen with thirst, he relieved its fever by thrusting it forward from between his teeth into the cold air. How softly the turf had carpeted the untraveled avenue—he could no longer feel the roadway beneath his feet!

Doubtless, despite his suffering, he had fallen asleep while walking, for now he sees another scene—perhaps he has merely recovered from a delirium. He stands at the gate of his own home. All is as he left it, and all bright and beautiful in the morning sunshine. He must have traveled the entire night. As he pushes open the gate and passes up the wide white walk, he sees a flutter of female garments, his wife, looking fresh and cool and sweet, steps down from the veranda to meet him. At the bottom of the steps she stands waiting, with a smile of ineffable joy, an attitude of matchless grace and dignity. Ah, how beautiful she is! He springs forward with extended arms. As he is about to clasp her he feels a stunning 10 blow upon the back of the neck, a blinding white light blazes all about him with a sound like the shock of a cannon—then all is darkness and silence!

Peyton Farquhar was dead, his body, with a broken neck, swung gently from side to side beneath the timbers of the Owl Creek bridge.

PHILOSOPHERS THREE

A BEAR, a Fox and an Opossum were attacked by an inundation.

'Death loves a coward,' said the Bear, and went forward to fight the flood.

'What a fool!' said the Fox. 'I know a trick worth two of that.' And he slipped into a hollow stump.

'There are malevolent forces,' said the 30 Opossum, 'which the wise will neither confront nor avoid. The thing is to know the nature of your antagonist.'

So saying the Opossum lay down and pretended to be dead.

TWO SONS

A MAN had Two Sons. The elder was virtuous and dutiful, the younger wicked and crafty. When the father was about to die, he called them before him and said: 'I have 40 only two things of value—my herd of camels and my blessing. How shall I allot them?'

'Give to me,' said the Younger Son, 'thy blessing, for it may reform me. The camels I should be sure to sell and squander the money.'

The Elder Son, disguising his joy, said that he would try to be content with the camels and a pious mind.

It was so arranged and the Man died. 50 Then the wicked Younger Son went before the Cadi and said: 'Behold, my brother has defrauded me of my lawful heritage. He is so bad that our father, as is well known, denied him his blessing, is it likely that he gave him the camels?'

So the Elder Son was compelled to give up the herd and was soundly bastinadoed for his rapacity.

THE ELIGIBLE SON-IN-LAW

A TRULY Clever Person who conducted a savings bank and lent money to his sisters and his cousins and his aunts was approached by a Tatterdemalion who applied for a loan of one hundred thousand dollars.

'What security have you to offer?' asked the Truly Clever Person.

20 'The best in the world,' the applicant replied, confidentially, 'I am about to become your son-in-law.'

'That would indeed be gilt-edged,' said the Banker, gravely, 'but what claim have you to the hand of my daughter?'

'One that cannot be lightly denied,' said the Tatterdemalion. 'I am about to become worth one hundred thousand dollars.'

Unable to detect a weak point in this scheme of mutual advantage, the Financier gave the Promoter in Disguise an order for the money and wrote a note to his wife directing her to count out the girl.

MORAL PRINCIPLE AND MATERIAL INTEREST

A MORAL Principle met a Material Interest on a bridge wide enough for but one.

'Down, you base thing!' thundered the Moral Principle, 'and let me pass over you!'

40 The Material Interest merely looked in the other's eyes without saying anything.

'Ah,' said the Moral Principle, hesitatingly, 'let us draw lots to see which one of us shall retire till the other has crossed.'

The Material Interest maintained an unbroken silence and an unwavering stare.

'In order to avoid a conflict,' the Moral Principle resumed, somewhat uneasily, 'I shall myself lie down and let you walk over me.'

50 Then the Material Interest found his tongue. 'I don't think you are very good walking,' he said 'I am a little particular about what I have underfoot Suppose you get off into the water'

It occurred that way

FROM THE CYNIC'S WORD BOOK

DEFINITIONS

ABSURDITY, n A statement or belief manifestly inconsistent with one's own opinion

AIR, n A nutritious substance supplied by a bountiful Providence for the fattening of the poor

CIRCUS, n A place where horses, ponies and elephants are permitted to see men, women and children acting the fool

COMFORT, n A state of mind produced by contemplation of a neighbor's uneasiness

CYNIC, n A blackguard whose faulty vision sees things as they are, not as they ought to be Hence the custom among the Scythians of plucking out a cynic's eyes to improve his vision

DELUSION, n The father of a most respectable family, comprising Enthusiasm, Affection, Self-denial, Faith, Hope, Charity and many other goodly sons and daughters

All hail, Delusion! Were it not for thee
The world turned topsy-turvy we should see,

For Vice, respectable with cleanly fancies,
Would fly abandoned Virtue's gross advances

Mumfry Mappel

DUTY, n That which sternly impels us in the direction of profit, along the line of desire

Sir Lavender Portwine, in favor at court,
Was wroth at his master, who'd kissed Lady Port
His anger provoked him to take the king's head, But duty prevailed, and he took the king's bread, Instead

G.J.

ELEGY, n A composition in verse, in which, without employing any of the methods of humor, the writer aims to produce in the reader's mind the dampest kind of dejection The most famous English example begins somewhat like this

The cur foretells the knell of parting day,
The loafing herd winds slowly o'er the lea,

The wise man homeward plods, I only stay
To fiddle-faddle in a minor key.

ERUDITION, n. Dust shaken out of a book into an empty skull

So wide his erudition's mighty span,
He knew Creation's origin and plan
And only came by accident to grief—
He thought, poor man, 'twas right to be a thief.

Romach Pute

FUTURE, n That period of time in which our affairs prosper, our friends are true, and our happiness is assured

HISTORIAN, n A broad-gauge gossip
I is the first letter of the alphabet, the first word of the language, the first thought of the mind, the first object of affection In grammar it is a pronoun of the first person and singular number Its plural is said to be We, but how there can be more than one myself is doubtless clearer to the grammarians than it is to the author of this incomparable dictionary Conception of two myselfs is difficult, but fine The frank yet graceful use of 'I' distinguishes a good writer from a bad, the latter carries it with the manner of a thief trying to cloak his loot

IMPUNITY, n Wealth

KLEPTOMANIAC, n A rich thief

NOVEL, n A short story padded. A species of composition bearing the same relation to literature that the panorama bears to art As it is too long to be read at a sitting the impressions made by its successive parts are successively effaced, as in the panorama Unity, totality of effect, is impossible, for besides the few pages last read all that is carried in mind is the mere plot of what has gone before To the romance the novel is what photography is to painting. Its distinguishing principle, probability, corresponds to the literal actuality of the photograph and puts it distinctly into the category of reporting, whereas the free wing of the romancer enables him to mount to such altitudes of imagination as he may be fitted to attain, and the first three essentials of the literary art are imagination, imagination and imagination The art of writing novels, such as it was, is long dead everywhere except in Russia, where it is new Peace to its ashes—some of which have a large sale

OCEAN, n A body of water occupying about two-thirds of a world made for man—who has no gills

PAINTING, n The art of protecting flat surfaces from the weather and exposing them to the critic

Formerly, painting and sculpture were combined in the same work the ancients painted their statues The only present alliance between the two arts is that the modern painter chisels his patrons

PLATITUDE, n The fundamental element and special glory of popular literature A thought that snores in words that smoke The wisdom of a million fools in the diction of a dullard A fossil sentiment in artificial rock A moral without the fable. All that is mortal of a departed truth A demi-tasse of milk-and-morality The Pope's-nose of a featherless peacock A jelly-fish withering on the shore of the sea of thought The cackle surviving the egg A desiccated epigram

POSITIVE, adj Mistaken at the top of one's voice

PRAY, v To ask that the laws of the universe be annulled in behalf of a single petitioner confessedly unworthy

RADICALISM, n The conservatism of to-morrow injected into the affairs of to-day

REASON, v To weigh probabilities in the scales of desire

REFLECTION, n An action of the mind whereby we obtain a clearer view of our relation to the things of yesterday and are able to avoid the perils that we shall not again encounter RESTITUTION, n The founding or endowing of universities and public libraries by gift or bequest.

SAW, n A trite popular saying, or proverb (Figurative and colloquial) So called because it makes its way into a wooden head Following are examples of old saws fitted with new teeth

A penny saved is a penny to squander.

A man is known by the company that he organizes

A bad workman quarrels with the man who calls him that

A bird in the hand is worth what it will bring

Better late than before anybody has invited you.

Example is better than following it

Half a loaf is better than a whole one if there is much else

Think twice before you speak to a friend in need

What is worth doing is worth the trouble of asking somebody to do it

Least said is soonest disavowed

He laughs best who laughs least

Speak of the Devil and he will hear about it

Of two evils choose to be the least

Strike while your employer has a big contract

Where there's a will there's a won't.

SELF-EVIDENT, adj Evident to one's self and to nobody else

SLANG, n The grunt of the human hog (Pignoramus intolerabilis) with an audible memory The speech of one who utters with his tongue what he thinks with his ear, and feels the pride of a creator in accomplishing the feat of a parrot A means (under Providence) of setting up as a wit without a capital of sense

ZIGZAG, v To move forward uncertainly, from side to side, as one carrying the white man's burden (From zed, z, and jag, an Icelandic word of unknown meaning)

He zedjagged so uncomen wyde Thet non coude pas on eyder syde,

THE OPEN BOAT

A Tale intended to be after the Fact Being the Experience of Four Men from the Sunk Steamer 'Commodore'

I

NONE of them knew the colour of the sky. Their eyes glanced level, and were fastened upon the waves that swept toward them. These waves were of the hue of slate, save for the tops, which were of foaming white, and all of the men knew the colours of the sea. The horizon narrowed and widened, and dipped and rose, and at all times its edge was jagged with waves that seemed thrust up in points like rocks.

Many a man ought to have a bath-tub larger than the boat which here rode upon the sea. These waves were most wrongfully and barbarously abrupt and tall, and each froth-top was a problem in small boat navigation.

The cook squatted in the bottom and looked with both eyes at the six inches of gunwale which separated him from the ocean. His sleeves were rolled over his fat forearms, and the two flaps of his unbuttoned vest dangled as he bent to bail out the boat. Often he said 'Gawd! That was a narrow clip.' As he remarked it he invariably gazed eastward over the broken sea.

The oiler, steering with one of the two oars in the boat, sometimes raised himself suddenly to keep clear of water that swirled in over the stern. It was a thin little oar and it seemed often ready to snap.

The correspondent, pulling at the other oar, watched the waves and wondered why he was there.

The injured captain, lying in the bow, was at this time buried in that profound dejection and indifference which comes, temporarily at least, to even the bravest and most enduring when, willy nilly, the firm fails, the army loses, the ship goes down. The mind of the master of a vessel is rooted deep in the timbers of her, though he command for a day or a decade, and this captain had on him the stern impression of a scene in the greys of dawn of seven turned faces, and later a stump of a top-mast with a white ball on it that slashed to and fro at the waves, went low and lower, and down. Thereafter there was something strange in his voice. Although steady, it was deep with mourning, and of a quality beyond oration or tears.

'Keep 'er a little more south, Billie,' said he.

'A little more south, sir,' said the oiler in the stern.

A seat in this boat was not unlike a seat upon a bucking broncho, and, by the same token, a broncho is not much smaller. The craft pranced and reared, and plunged like an animal. As each wave came, and she rose for it, she seemed like a horse making at a fence outrageously high. The manner of her scramble over these walls of water is a mystic thing, and, moreover, at the top of them were ordinarily these problems in white water, the foam racing down from the summit of each wave, requiring a new leap, and a leap from the air. Then, after scornfully bumping a crest, she would slide, and race, and splash down a long incline, and arrive bobbing and nodding in front of the next menace.

A singular disadvantage of the sea lies in the fact that after successfully surmounting one wave you discover that there is another behind it just as important and just as nervously anxious to do something effective in the way of swamping boats. In a ten-foot dingey one can get an idea of the resources of the sea in the line of waves that is not probable to the average experience which is never at sea in a dingey. As each slaty wall of water approached, it shut all else from the view of the men in the boat, and it was not difficult to imagine that this particular wave was the final outburst of the ocean, the last effort of the grim water. There was a terrible grace in the move of the waves, and they came in silence, save for the snarling of the crests.

In the wan light, the faces of the men must have been grey. Their eyes must have glinted in strange ways as they gazed steadily astern. Viewed from a balcony, the whole thing would doubtlessly have been weirdly picturesque But the men in the boat had no time to see it, and if they had had leisure there were other things to occupy their minds The sun swung steadily up the sky, and they knew it was broad day because the colour of the sea changed from slate to emerald-green, streaked with amber lights, and the foam was like tumbling snow The process of the breaking day was unknown to them They were aware only of this effect upon the colour of the waves that rolled toward them

In disjointed sentences the cook and the correspondent argued as to the difference between a life-saving station and a house of refuge The cook had said 'There's a house of refuge just north of the Mosquito Inlet Light, and as soon as they see us, they'll come off in their boat and pick us up'

'As soon as who see us?' said the correspondent

'The crew,' said the cook

'Houses of refuge don't have crews,' said the correspondent 'As I understand them, they are only places where clothes and grub are stored for the benefit of shipwrecked people They don't carry crews'

'Oh, yes, they do,' said the cook

'No, they don't,' said the correspondent.

'Well, we're not there yet, anyhow,' said the oiler, in the stern

'Well,' said the cook, 'perhaps it's not a house of refuge that I'm thinking of as being near Mosquito Inlet Light Perhaps it's a life-saving station'

'We're not there yet,' said the oiler, in the stern

II

As the boat bounced from the top of each wave, the wind tore through the hair of the hatless men, and as the craft plopped her stern down again the spray slashed past them The crest of each of these waves was a hill, from the top of which the men surveyed, for a moment, a broad tumultuous expanse, shining and wind-riven It was probably splendid It was probably glorious, this play of the free sea, wild with lights of emerald and white and amber

'Bully good thing it's an on-shore wind,' said the cook 'If not, where would we be? Wouldn't have a show'

'That's right,' said the correspondent

The busy oiler nodded his assent

Then the captain, in the bow, chuckled in a way that expressed humour, contempt, tragedy, all in one. 'Do you think we've got much of a show now, boys?' said he

Whereupon the three were silent, save for a trifle of hemming and hawing. To express any particular optimism at this time they felt to be childish and stupid, but they all doubtless possessed this sense of the situation in their mind A young man thinks doggedly at such times On the other hand, the ethics of their condition was decidedly against any open suggestion of hopelessness So they were silent

'Oh, well,' said the captain, soothing his children, 'we'll get ashore all right.'

But there was that in his tone which made them think, so the oiler quoth 'Yes! If this wind holds!'

The cook was bailing 'Yes! If we don't catch hell in the surf'

Canton flannel gulls flew near and far Sometimes they sat down on the sea, near patches of brown seaweed that rolled over the waves with a movement like carpets on a line in a gale The birds sat comfortably in groups, and they were envied by some in the dingey, for the wrath of the sea was no more to them than it was to a covey of prairie chickens a thousand miles inland Often they came very close and stared at the men with black bead-like eyes At these times they were uncanny and sinister in their unblinking scrutiny, and the men hooted angrily at them, telling them to be gone One came, and evidently decided to alight on the top of the captain's head The bird flew parallel to the boat and did not circle, but made short sidelong jumps in the air in chicken-fashion His black eyes were wistfully fixed upon the captain's head 'Ugly brute,' said the oiler to the bird 'You look as if you were made with a jack-knife' The cook and the correspondent swore darkly at the creature The captain naturally wished to knock it away with the end of the heavy painter, but he did not dare do it, because anything resembling an emphatic gesture would have capsized this freighted boat, and so with his open hand, the captain gently and carefully waved the gull away After it had been discouraged from the pursuit the captain breathed easier on account of his hair, and others breathed easier because the bird struck their minds at this time as being somehow gruesome and ominous

In the meantime the oiler and the correspondent rowed. And also they rowed

They sat together in the same seat, and each rowed an oar. Then the oiler took both oars, then the correspondent took both oars, then the oiler, then the correspondent. They rowed and they rowed. The very ticklish part of the business was when the time came for the reclining one in the stern to take his turn at the oars. By the very last star of truth, it is easier to steal eggs from under a hen than it was to change seats in the dingy. First the man in the stern slid his hand along the thwart and moved with care, as if he were of Sèvres. Then the man in the rowing seat slid his hand along the other thwart. It was all done with the most extraordinary care. As the two sidled past each other, the whole party kept watchful eyes on the coming wave, and the captain cried 'Look out now! Steady there!'

The brown mats of seaweed that appeared from time to time were like islands, bits of earth. They were travelling, apparently, neither one way nor the other. They were, to all intents, stationary. They informed the men in the boat that it was making progress slowly toward the land.

The captain, rearing cautiously in the bow, after the dingy soared on a great swell, said that he had seen the lighthouse at Mosquito Inlet. Presently the cook remarked that he had seen it. The correspondent was at the oars then, and for some reason he too wished to look at the lighthouse, but his back was toward the far shore and the waves were important, and for some time he could not seize an opportunity to turn his head. But at last there came a wave more gentle than the others, and when at the crest of it he swiftly scoured the western horizon.

'See it?' said the captain.

'No,' said the correspondent slowly, 'I didn't see anything.'

'Look again,' said the captain. He pointed 'It's exactly in that direction.'

At the top of another wave, the correspondent did as he was bid, and this time his eyes chanced on a small still thing on the edge of the swaying horizon. It was precisely like the point of a pin. It took an anxious eye to find a lighthouse so tiny 'Think we'll make it, captain?'

'If this wind holds and the boat don't swamp, we can't do much else,' said the captain.

The little boat, lifted by each towering sea, and splashed viciously by the crests, made progress that in the absence of seaweed was not apparent to those in her. She seemed just a wee thing wallowing, miraculously top up, at the mercy of five oceans. Occasionally, a great spread of water, like white flames, swarmed into her.

'Bail her, cook,' said the captain serenely.

'All right, captain,' said the cheerful cook.

III

It would be difficult to describe the subtle brotherhood of men that was here established on the seas. No one said that it was so. No one mentioned it. But it dwelt in the boat, and each man felt it warm him. They were a captain, an oiler, a cook, and a correspondent, and they were friends, friends in a more curiously iron-bound degree than may be common. The hurt captain, lying against the water-jar in the bow, spoke always in a low voice and calmly, but he could never command a more ready and swiftly obedient crew than the motley three of the dingy. It was more than a mere recognition of what was best for the common safety. There was surely in it a quality that was personal and heartfelt. And after this devotion to the commander of the boat there was this comradeship that the correspondent, for instance, who had been taught to be cynical of men, knew even at the time was the best experience of his life. But no one said that it was so. No one mentioned it.

'I wish we had a sail,' remarked the captain. 'We might try my overcoat on the end of an oar and give you two boys a chance to rest.' So the cook and the correspondent held the mast and spread wide the overcoat. The oiler steered, and the little boat made good way with her new rig. Sometimes the oiler had to scull sharply to keep a sea from breaking into the boat, but otherwise sailing was a success.

Meanwhile the lighthouse had been growing slowly larger. It had now almost assumed colour, and appeared like a little grey shadow on the sky. The man at the oars could not be prevented from turning his head rather often to try for a glimpse of this little grey shadow

At last, from the top of each wave the men in the tossing boat could see land. Even as the lighthouse was an upright shadow on the sky, this land seemed but a long black shadow on the sea. It certainly was thinner than paper. 'We must be about opposite New Smyrna,' said the cook, who had coasted this shore often in schooners. 'Captain, by the way, I believe they abandoned that life-saving station there about a year ago.'

'Did they?' said the captain.

The wind slowly died away. The cook and the correspondent were not now obliged to slave in order to hold high the oar. But the waves continued their old impetuous swooping at the dingey, and the little craft, no longer under way, struggled woundily over them. The oiler or the correspondent took the oars again.

Shipwrecks are apropos of nothing. If men could only train for them and have them occur when the men had reached pink condition, there would be less drowning at sea. Of the four in the dingey none had slept any time worth mentioning for two days and two nights previous to embarking in the dingey, and in the excitement of clambering about the deck of a foundering ship they had also forgotten to eat heartily.

For these reasons, and for others, neither the oiler nor the correspondent was fond of rowing at this time. The correspondent wondered ingenuously how in the name of all that was sane could there be people who thought it amusing to row a boat. It was not an amusement, it was a diabolical punishment, and even a genius of mental aberrations could never conclude that it was anything but a horror to the muscles and a crime against the back. He mentioned to the boat in general how the amusement of rowing struck him, and the weary-faced oiler smiled in full sympathy. Previously to the foundering, by the way, the oiler had worked double-watch in the engine-room of the ship.

'Take her easy, now, boys,' said the captain. 'Don't spend yourselves. If we have to run a surf you'll need all your strength, because we'll sure have to swim for it. Take your time.'

Slowly the land arose from the sea. From a black line it became a line of black and a line of white, trees and sand. Finally, the captain said that he could make out a house on the shore. 'That's the house of refuge, sure,' said the cook. 'They'll see us before long, and come out after us.'

The distant lighthouse reared high. 'The keeper ought to be able to make us out now, if he's looking through a glass,' said the captain. 'He'll notify the life-saving people.'

'None of those other boats could have got ashore to give word of the wreck,' said the oiler, in a low voice. 'Else the lifeboat would be out hunting us.'

Slowly and beautifully the land loomed out of the sea. The wind came again. It had veered from the north-east to the south-east. Finally, a new sound struck the ears of the men in the boat. It was the low thunder of the surf on the shore. 'We'll never be able to make the lighthouse now,' said the captain. 'Swing her head a little more north, Billie.'

'A little more north, sir,' said the oiler.

Whereupon the little boat turned her nose once more down the wind, and all but the oarsmen watched the shore grow. Under the influence of this expansion doubt and direful apprehension was leaving the minds of the men. The management of the boat was still most absorbing, but it could not prevent a quiet cheerfulness. In an hour, perhaps, they would be ashore.

Their backbones had become thoroughly used to balancing in the boat, and they now rode this wild colt of a dingey like circus men. The correspondent thought that he had been drenched to the skin, but happening to feel in the top pocket of his coat, he found therein eight cigars. Four of them were soaked with sea-water, four were perfectly scatheless. After a search, somebody produced three dry matches, and thereupon the four waifs rode impudently in their little boat, and with an assurance of an impending rescue shining in their eyes, puffed at the big cigars and judged well and ill of all men. Everybody took a drink of water.

IV

'Cook,' remarked the captain, 'there don't seem to be any signs of life about your house of refuge.'

'No,' replied the cook. 'Funny they don't see us.'

A broad stretch of lowly coast lay before the eyes of the men. It was of low dunes topped with dark vegetation. The roar of the surf was plain, and sometimes they could see the white lip of a wave as it spun up the beach. A tiny house was blocked out black upon the sky. Southward, the slim lighthouse lifted its little grey length.

Tide, wind, and waves were swinging the dingey northward. 'Funny they don't see us,' said the men.

The surf's roar was here dulled, but its tone was, nevertheless, thunderous and mighty. As the boat swam over the great rollers, the men sat listening to this roar. 'We'll swamp sure,' said everybody.

It is fair to say here that there was not a life-saving station within twenty miles in either direction, but the men did not know this fact, and in consequence they made dark and opprobrious remarks concerning the eyesight of the nation's life-savers. Four scowling men sat in the dingey and surpassed records in the invention of epithets.

'Funny they don't see us.'

The light-heartedness of a former time had completely faded. To their sharpened minds it was easy to conjure pictures of all kinds of incompetency and blindness and, indeed, cowardice. There was the shore of the populous land, and it was bitter and bitter to them that from it came no sign.

'Well,' said the captain, ultimately, 'I suppose we'll have to make a try for ourselves. If we stay out here too long, we'll none of us have strength left to swim after the boat swamps.'

And so the oiler, who was at the oars, turned the boat straight for the shore. There was a sudden tightening of muscles. There was some thinking.

'If we don't all get ashore—' said the captain. 'If we don't all get ashore, I suppose you fellows know where to send news of my finish.'

They then briefly exchanged some addresses and admonitions. As for the reflections of the men, there was a great deal of rage in them. Perchance they might be formulated thus: 'If I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods who rule the sea, was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees? Was I brought here merely to have my nose dragged away as I was about to nibble the sacred cheese of life? It is preposterous. If this old nunny-woman, Fate, cannot do better than this, she should be deprived of the management of men's fortunes. She is an old hen who knows not her intention. If she has decided to drown me, why did she not do it in the beginning and save me all this trouble? The whole affair is absurd. . . . But no, she cannot mean to drown me. She dare not drown me. She cannot drown me. Not after all this work.' Afterward the man might have had an impulse to shake his fist at the clouds. 'Just you drown me, now, and then hear what I call you!'

The billows that came at this time were more formidable. They seemed always just about to break and roll over the little boat in a turmoil of foam. There was a preparatory and long growl in the speech of them. No mind unused to the sea would have concluded that the dingey could ascend these sheer heights in time. The shore was still afar. The oiler was a wily surferman. 'Boys,' he said swiftly, 'she won't live three minutes more, and we're too far out to swim. Shall I take her to sea again, captain?'

'Yes! Go ahead!' said the captain.

This oiler, by a series of quick miracles, and fast and steady oarsmanship, turned the boat in the middle of the surf and took her safely to sea again.

There was a considerable silence as the boat bumped over the furrowed sea to deeper water. Then somebody in gloom spoke. 'Well, anyhow, they must have seen us from the shore by now.'

The gulls went in slanting flight up the wind toward the grey desolate east. A squall, marked by dingy clouds, and clouds brick-red, like smoke from a burning building, appeared from the south-east.

'What do you think of those life-saving people? Ain't they peaches?'

'Funny they haven't seen us.'

'Maybe they think we're out here for sport! Maybe they think we're fishin'! Maybe they think we're damned fools.'

It was a long afternoon. A changed tide tried to force them southward, but wind and wave said northward. Far ahead, where coastline, sea, and sky formed their mighty angle, there were little dots which seemed to indicate a city on the shore.

'St Augustine?'

The captain shook his head. 'Too near Mosquito Inlet'

And the oiler rowed, and then the correspondent rowed. Then the oiler rowed. It was a weary business. The human back can become the seat of more aches and pains than are registered in books for the composite anatomy of a regiment. It is a limited area, but it can become the theatre of innumerable muscular conflicts, tangles, wrenches, knots, and other comforts.

'Did you ever like to row, Billie?' asked the correspondent

'No,' said the oiler. 'Hang it.'

When one exchanged the rowing-seat for a place in the bottom of the boat, he suffered a bodily depression that caused him to be careless of everything save an obligation to wiggle one finger. There was cold sea-water swashing to and fro in the boat, and he lay in it. His head, pillowed on a thwart, was within an inch of the swirl of a wave crest, and sometimes a particularly obstreperous sea came in-board and drenched him once more. But these matters did not annoy him. It is almost certain that if the boat had capsized he would have tumbled comfortably out upon the ocean as if he felt sure that it was a great soft mattress.

'Look! There's a man on the shore!'

'Where?'

'There! See 'im? See 'im?'

'Yes, sure! He's walking along.'

'Now he's stopped. Look! He's facing us!'

'He's waving at us!'

'So he is! By thunder!'

'Ah, now we're all right! Now we're all right! There'll be a boat out here for us in half an hour.'

'He's going on. He's running. He's going up to that house there.'

The remote beach seemed lower than the sea, and it required a searching glance to discern the little black figure. The captain saw a floating stick and they rowed to it. A bath-towel was by some weird chance in the boat, and, tying this on the stick, the captain waved it. The oarsman did not dare turn his head, so he was obliged to ask questions.

'What's he doing now?'

'He's standing still again. He's looking, I think . . . There he goes again. Toward the house . . . Now he's stopped again.'

'Is he waving at us?'

'No, not now! he was, though.'

'Look! There comes another man!'

'He's running.'

'Look at him go, would you?'

'Why, he's on a bicycle. Now he's met the other man. They're both waving at us. Look!'

'There comes something up the beach.'

'What the devil is that thing?'

'Why, it looks like a boat.'

'Why, certainly it's a boat.'

'No, it's on wheels.'

'Yes, so it is. Well, that must be the life-boat. They drag them along shore on a wagon.'

'That's the life-boat, sure.'

'No, by—, it's—it's an omnibus.'

'I tell you it's a life-boat.'

20 'It is not! It's an omnibus. I can see it plain. See? One of these big hotel omnibuses.'

'By thunder, you're right. It's an omnibus, sure as fate. What do you suppose they are doing with an omnibus? Maybe they are going around collecting the life-crew, hey?'

30 'That's it, likely. Look! There's a fellow waving a little black flag. He's standing on the steps of the omnibus. There come those other two fellows. Now they're all talking together. Look at the fellow with the flag. Maybe he ain't waving it.'

'That ain't a flag, is it? That's his coat. Why, certainly, that's his coat.'

'So it is. It's his coat. He's taken it off and is waving it around his head. But would you look at him swing it?'

40 'Oh, say, there isn't any life-saving station there. That's just a winter resort hotel omnibus that has brought over some of the boarders to see us drown.'

'What's that idiot with the coat mean? What's he signaling, anyhow?'

'It looks as if he were trying to tell us to go north. There must be a life-saving station up there.'

'No! He thinks we're fishing. Just giving us a merry hand. See? Ah, there, Willie.'

50 'Well, I wish I could make something out of those signals. What do you suppose he means?'

'He don't mean anything. He's just playing.'

'Well, if he'd just signal us to try the surf again, or to go to sea and wait, or go north, or go south, or go to hell—there would be some reason in it. But look at him. He just stands there and keeps his coat revolving like a wheel. The ass!”

“There come more people.”

“Now there’s quite a mob. Look! Isn’t that a boat?”

“Where? Oh, I see where you mean. No, that’s no boat.”

“That fellow is still waving his coat.”

“He must think we like to see him do that. Why don’t he quit it? It don’t mean anything.”

“I don’t know. I think he is trying to make us go north. It must be that there’s a life-saving station there somewhere.”

“Say, he ain’t tired yet. Look at ’im wave.”

“Wonder how long he can keep that up. He’s been revolving his coat ever since he caught sight of us. He’s an idiot. Why aren’t they getting men to bring a boat out? A fishing boat—one of those big yawls—could come out here all right. Why don’t he do something?”

“Oh, it’s all right, now.”

“They’ll have a boat out here for us in less than no time, now that they’ve seen us.”

A faint yellow tone came into the sky over the low land. The shadows on the sea slowly deepened. The wind bore coldness with it, and the men began to shiver.

“Holy smoke!” said one, allowing his voice to express his impious mood, “if we keep on monkeying out here! If we’ve got to flounder out here all night!”

“Oh, we’ll never have to stay here all night! Don’t you worry. They’ve seen us now, and it won’t be long before they’ll come chasing out after us.”

The shore grew dusky. The man waving a coat blended gradually into this gloom, and it swallowed in the same manner the omnibus and the group of people. The spray, when it dashed uproariously over the side, made the voyagers shrink and swear like men who were being branded.

“I’d like to catch the chump who waved the coat. I feel like soaking him one, just for luck.”

“Why? What did he do?”

“Oh, nothing, but then he seemed so damned cheerful.”

In the meantime the oiler rowed, and then the correspondent rowed, and then the oiler rowed. Grey-faced and bowed forward, they mechanically, turn by turn, plied the leaden oars. The form of the lighthouse had vanished from the southern horizon, but finally a pale star appeared, just lifting from the sea. The streaked saffron in the west passed before the all-merging darkness, and the sea to the east was black. The land had vanished, and was expressed only by the low and drear thunder of the surf.

“If I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods who rule the sea, was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees? Was I brought here merely to have my nose dragged away as I was about to nibble the sacred cheese of life?”

The patient captain, drooped over the water-jar, was sometimes obliged to speak to the oarsman.

“Keep her head up! Keep her head up!”

““Keep her head up,” sir.” The voices were weary and low.

This was surely a quiet evening. All save the oarsman lay heavily and listlessly in the boat’s bottom. As for him, his eyes were just capable of noting the tall black waves that swept forward in a most sinister silence, save for an occasional subdued growl of a crest.

The cook’s head was on a thwart, and he looked without interest at the water under his nose. He was deep in other scenes. Finally he spoke. “Billie,” he murmured, dreamfully, “what kind of pie do you like best?”

V

“Pie,” said the oiler and the correspondent, agitatedly. “Don’t talk about those things, blast you!”

“Well,” said the cook, “I was just thinking about ham sandwiches, and—”

A night on the sea in an open boat is a long night. As darkness settled finally, the shine of the light, lifting from the sea in the south, changed to full gold. On the northern horizon a new light appeared, a small bluish gleam on the edge of the waters. These two lights were the furniture of the world. Otherwise there was nothing but waves.

Two men huddled in the stern, and distances were so magnificent in the dingey that the rower was enabled to keep his feet partly warmed by thrusting them under his companions. Their legs indeed extended far under the rowing-seat until they touched the feet of the captain forward. Sometimes, despite the efforts of the tired oarsman, a wave came piling into the boat, an icy wave of the night, and the chilling water soaked them anew. They would twist their bodies for a moment and groan, and sleep the dead sleep once more, while the water in the boat gurgled about them as the craft rocked.

The plan of the oiler and the correspondent was for one to row until he lost the ability, and then arouse the other from his sea-water couch in the bottom of the boat.

The oiler plied the oars until his head drooped forward, and the overpowering sleep blinded him. And he rowed yet afterward. Then he touched a man in the bottom of the boat, and called his name. "Will you spell me for a little while?" he said, meekly.

"Sure, Billie," said the correspondent, awakening and dragging himself to a sitting position. They exchanged places carefully, and the oiler, cuddling down in the sea-water at the cook's side, seemed to go to sleep instantly.

The particular violence of the sea had ceased. The waves came without snarling. The obligation of the man at the oars was to keep the boat headed so that the tilt of the rollers would not capsize her, and to preserve her from filling when the crests rushed past. The black waves were silent and hard to be seen in the darkness. Often one was almost upon the boat before the oarsman was aware.

In a low voice the correspondent addressed the captain. He was not sure that the captain was awake, although this iron man seemed to be always awake. "Captain, shall I keep her making for that light north, sir?"

The same steady voice answered him. "Yes. Keep it about two points off the port bow."

The cook had tied a life-belt around himself in order to get even the warmth which this clumsy cork contrivance could donate, and he seemed almost stove-like when a rower, whose teeth invariably chattered wildly as soon as he ceased his labour, dropped down to sleep.

The correspondent, as he rowed, looked down at the two men sleeping underfoot. The cook's arm was around the oiler's shoulders, and, with their fragmentary clothing and haggard faces, they were the babes of the sea, a grotesque rendering of the old babes in the wood.

Later he must have grown stupid at his work, for suddenly there was a growling of water, and a crest came with a roar and a swash into the boat, and it was a wonder that it did not set the cook afloat in his life-belt. The cook continued to sleep, but the oiler sat up, blinking his eyes and shaking with the new cold.

"Oh, I'm awful sorry, Billie," said the correspondent, contritely.

"That's all right, old boy," said the oiler, and lay down again and was asleep.

Presently it seemed that even the captain dozed, and the correspondent thought that he was the one man afloat on all the oceans. The wind had a voice as it came over the waves, and it was sadder than the end.

There was a long, loud swishing astern of the boat, and a gleaming trail of phosphorescence, like blue flame, was furrowed on the black waters. It might have been made by a monstrous knife.

Then there came a stillness, while the correspondent breathed with the open mouth and looked at the sea.

Suddenly there was another swish and another long flash of bluish light, and this time it was alongside the boat, and might almost have been reached with an oar. The correspondent saw an enormous fin speed like a shadow through the water, hurling the crystalline spray and leaving the long glowing trail.

The correspondent looked over his shoulder at the captain. His face was hidden, and he seemed to be asleep. He looked at the babes of the sea. They certainly were asleep. So, being bereft of sympathy, he leaned a little way to one side and swore softly into the sea.

But the thing did not then leave the vicinity of the boat. Ahead or astern, on one side or the other, at intervals long or short, fled the long sparkling streak, and there was to be heard the whuroo of the dark fin. The speed and power of the thing was greatly to be admired. It cut the water like a gigantic and keen projectile.

The presence of this biding thing did not affect the man with the same horror that it would if he had been a picnicker. He simply looked at the sea dully and swore in an undertone.

Nevertheless, it is true that he did not wish to be alone with the thing. He wished one of his companions to awaken by chance and keep him company with it. But the captain hung motionless over the water-jar, and the oiler and the cook in the bottom of the boat were plunged in slumber.

'If I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned—if I am going to be drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods who rule the sea, was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees?'

During this dismal night, it may be remarked that a man would conclude that it was really the intention of the seven mad gods to drown him, despite the abominable injustice of it. For it was certainly an abominable injustice to drown a man who had worked so hard, so hard. The man felt it would be a crime most unnatural. Other people had drowned at sea since galleys swarmed with painted sails, but still—

When it occurs to a man that nature does not regard him as important, and that she feels she would not maim the universe by disposing of him, he at first wishes to throw bricks at the temple, and he hates deeply the fact that there are no bricks and no temples. Any visible expression of nature would surely be pelleted with his jeers.

Then, if there be no tangible thing to hoot he feels, perhaps, the desire to confront a personification and indulge in pleas, bowed to one knee, and with hands suppliant, saying 'Yes, but I love myself.'

A high cold star on a winter's night is the word he feels that she says to him. Thereafter he knows the pathos of his situation.

The men in the dingy had not discussed these matters, but each had, no doubt, reflected upon them in silence and according to his mind. There was seldom any expression upon their faces save the general one of complete weariness. Speech was devoted to the business of the boat.

To chime the notes of his emotion, a verse mysteriously entered the correspondent's head. He had even forgotten that he had forgotten this verse, but it suddenly was in his mind.

'A soldier of the Legion lay dying in Algiers,

There was lack of woman's nursing,
there was dearth of woman's tears;

But a comrade stood beside him, and he took that comrade's hand,

And he said "I shall never see my own, my native land."

In his childhood, the correspondent had been made acquainted with the fact that a soldier of the Legion lay dying in Algiers, but he had never regarded the fact as important. Myriads of his school-fellows had informed him of the soldier's plight, but the dunning had naturally ended by making him perfectly indifferent. He had never considered it his affair that a soldier of the Legion lay dying in Algiers, nor had it appeared to him as a matter for sorrow. It was less to him than the breaking of a pencil's point.

Now, however, it quaintly came to him as a human, living thing. It was no longer merely a picture of a few throes in the breast of a poet, meanwhile drinking tea and warming his feet at the grate, it was an actuality—stern, mournful, and fine.

The correspondent plainly saw the soldier. He lay on the sand with his feet out straight and still. While his pale left hand was upon his chest in an attempt to thwart the going of his life, the blood came between his fingers. In the far Algerian distance, a city of low square forms was set against a sky that was faint with the last sunset hues. The correspondent, plying the oars and dreaming of the slow and slower movements of the lips of the soldier, was moved by a profound and perfectly impersonal comprehension. He was sorry for the soldier of the Legion who lay dying in Algiers.

The thing which had followed the boat and waited had evidently grown bored at the delay. There was no longer to be heard the slash of the cut-water, and there was no longer the flame of the long trail. The light in the north still glimmered, but it was apparently no nearer to the boat. Sometimes the boom of the surf rang in the correspondent's ears, and he turned the craft seaward then and rowed harder Southward, someone had evidently built a watch-fire on the beach. It was too low and too far to be seen, but it made a shimmering, roseate reflection upon the bluff back of it, and this could be discerned from the boat. The wind came stronger, and sometimes a wave suddenly raged out like a mountain-cat, and there was to be seen the sheen and sparkle of a broken crest.

The captain, in the bow, moved on his water-jar and sat erect 'Pretty long night,' he observed to the correspondent. He looked at the shore 'Those life-saving people take their time.'

'Did you see that shark playing around?'

'Yes, I saw him. He was a big fellow, all right.'

'Wish I had known you were awake.'

Later the correspondent spoke into the bottom of the boat.

'Billie!' There was a slow and gradual disentanglement. 'Billie, will you spell me?'

'Sure,' said the oiler.

As soon as the correspondent touched the cold comfortable sea-water in the bottom of the boat, and had huddled close to the cook's life-belt he was deep in sleep, despite the fact that his teeth played all the popular airs. This sleep was so good to him that it was but a moment before he heard a voice call his name in a tone that demonstrated the last stages of exhaustion. 'Will you spell me?'

'Sure, Billie.'

The light in the north had mysteriously vanished, but the correspondent took his course from the wide-awake captain.

Later in the night they took the boat farther out to sea, and the captain directed the cook to take one oar at the stern and keep the boat facing the seas. He was to call out if he should hear the thunder of the surf. This plan enabled the oiler and the correspondent to get respite together. 'We'll give those boys a chance to get into shape again,' said the captain. They curled down and, after a few preliminary chattering and trembles, slept once more the dead sleep. Neither knew they had bequeathed to the cook the company of another shark, or perhaps the same shark.

As the boat caroused on the waves, spray occasionally bumped over the side and gave them a fresh soaking, but this had no power to break their repose. The ominous slash of the wind and the water affected them as it would have affected mummies.

'Boys,' said the cook, with the notes of every reluctance in his voice, 'she's drifted in pretty close. I guess one of you had better take her to sea again.' The correspondent, aroused, heard the crash of the toppled crests.

As he was rowing, the captain gave him some whisky-and-water, and this steadied the chills out of him. 'If I ever get ashore and anybody shows me even a photograph of an oar—'

At last there was a short conversation. 'Billie. Billie, will you spell me?'

'Sure,' said the oiler.

VII

When the correspondent again opened his eyes, the sea and the sky were each of the grey hue of the dawning. Later, carmine and gold was painted upon the waters. The morning appeared finally, in its splendour, with a sky of pure blue, and the sunlight flamed on the tips of the waves.

On the distant dunes were set many little black cottages, and a tall white windmill reared above them. No man, nor dog, nor bicycle appeared on the beach. The cottages might have formed a deserted village.

The voyagers scanned the shore. A conference was held in the boat. 'Well,' said the captain, 'if no help is coming, we might better try a run through the surf right away. If we stay out here much longer we will be too weak to do anything for ourselves at all.' The others silently acquiesced in this reasoning. The boat was headed for the beach. The correspondent wondered if none ever ascended the tall wind-tower, and if then they never looked seaward. This tower was a giant, standing with its back to the plight of the ants. It represented in a degree, to the correspondent, the serenity of nature amid the struggles of the individual—nature in the wind, and nature in the vision of men. She did not seem cruel to him then, nor beneficent, nor treacherous, nor wise. But she was indifferent, flatly indifferent. It is, perhaps, plausible that a man in this situation, impressed with the unconcern of the universe, should see the innumerable flaws of his life, and have them taste wickedly in his mind and wish for another chance. A distinction between right and wrong seems absurdly clear to him, then, in this new ignorance of the grave-edge, and he understands that if he were given another opportunity he would mend his conduct and his words, and be better and brighter during an introduction or at a tea.

'Now, boys,' said the captain, 'she is going to swamp sure. All we can do is to work her in as far as possible, and then when she swamps, pile out and scramble for the beach. Keep cool now, and don't jump until she swamps sure.'

The oiler took the oars. Over his shoulders he scanned the surf. 'Captain,' he said, 'I think I'd better bring her about, and keep her head-on to the seas and back her in.'

'All right, Billie,' said the captain. 'Back her in.' The oiler swung the boat then and, seated in the stern, the cook and the correspondent were obliged to look over their shoulders to contemplate the lonely and indifferent shore.

The monstrous in-shore rollers heaved the boat high until the men were again enabled to see the white sheets of water scudding up the slanted beach. 'We won't get in very close,' said the captain. Each time a man could wrest his attention from the rollers, he turned his glance toward the shore, and in the expression of the eyes during this contemplation there was a singular quality. The correspondent, observing the others, knew that they were not afraid, but the full meaning of their glances was shrouded.

As for himself, he was too tired to grapple fundamentally with the fact. He tried to coerce his mind into thinking of it, but the mind was dominated at this time by the muscles, and the muscles said they did not care. It merely occurred to him that if he should drown it would be a shame.

There were no hurried words, no pallor, no plain agitation. The men simply looked at the shore. 'Now, remember to get well clear of the boat when you jump,' said the captain.

Seaward the crest of a roller suddenly fell with a thunderous crash, and the long white comber came roaring down upon the boat.

'Steady now,' said the captain. The men were silent. They turned their eyes from the shore to the comber and waited. The boat slid up the incline, leaped at the furious top, bounced over it, and swung down the long back of the waves. Some water had been shipped and the cook bailed it out.

But the next crest crashed also. The tumbling boiling flood of white water caught the boat and whirled it almost perpendicular. Water swarmed in from all sides. The correspondent had his hands on the gunwale at this time, and when the water entered at that place he swiftly withdrew his fingers, as if he objected to wetting them.

The little boat, drunken with this weight of water, reeled and snuggled deeper into the sea.

'Bail her out, cook! Bail her out,' said the captain.

'All right, captain,' said the cook.

'Now, boys, the next one will do for us, sure,' said the oiler. 'Mind to jump clear of the boat.'

The third wave moved forward, huge, furious, implacable. It fairly swallowed the dingey, and almost simultaneously the men tumbled into the sea. A piece of life-belt had lain in the bottom of the boat, and as the correspondent went overboard he held this to his chest with his left hand.

The January water was icy, and he reflected immediately that it was colder than he had expected to find it off the coast of Florida. This appeared to his dazed mind as a fact important enough to be noted at the time. The coldness of the water was sad, it was tragic. This fact was somehow mixed and confused with his opinion of his own situation that it seemed almost a proper reason for tears. The water was cold.

When he came to the surface he was conscious of little but the noisy water. Afterward he saw his companions in the sea. The oiler was ahead in the race. He was swimming strongly and rapidly. Off to the correspondent's left, the cook's great white and corked back bulged out of the water, and in the rear the captain was hanging with his one good hand to the keel of the overturned dingey.

There is a certain immovable quality to a shore, and the correspondent wondered at it amid the confusion of the sea.

It seemed also very attractive, but the correspondent knew that it was a long journey, and he paddled leisurely. The piece of life-preserver lay under him, and sometime he whirled down the incline of a wave as if he were on a hand-sled

But finally he arrived at a place in the sea where travel was beset with difficulty. He did not pause swimming to inquire what manner of current had caught him, but there his progress ceased. The shore was set before him like a bit of scenery on a stage, and he looked at it and understood with his eyes each detail of it

As the cook passed, much farther to the left, the captain was calling to him, 'Turn over on your back, cook! Turn over on your back and use the oar'

'All right, sir' The cook turned on his back, and, paddling with an oar, went ahead as if he were a canoe

Presently the boat also passed to the left of the correspondent with the captain clinging with one hand to the keel. He would have appeared like a man raising himself to look over a board fence, if it were not for the extraordinary gymnastics of the boat. The correspondent marvelled that the captain could still hold to it

They passed on, nearer to shore—the oiler, the cook, the captain—and following them went the water-jar, bouncing gaily over the seas

The correspondent remained in the grip of this strange new enemy—a current. The shore, with its white slope of sand and its green bluff, topped with little silent cottages, was spread like a picture before him. It was very near to him then, but he was impressed as one who in a gallery looks at a scene from Brittany or Algiers

He thought 'I am going to drown? Can it be possible? Can it be possible? Can it be possible?' Perhaps an individual must consider his own death to be the final phenomenon of nature

But later a wave perhaps whirled him out of this small deadly current, for he found suddenly that he could again make progress toward the shore. Later still, he was aware that the captain, clinging with one hand to the keel of the dingey, had his face turned away from the shore and toward him, and was calling his name. 'Come to the boat! Come to the boat!'

In his struggle to reach the captain and the boat, he reflected that when one gets properly wearied, drowning must really be a comfortable arrangement, a cessation of hostilities accompanied by a large degree of relief, and he was glad of it, for the main thing in his mind for some moments had been horror of the temporary agony. He did not wish to be hurt.

Presently he saw a man running along the shore. He was undressing with most remarkable speed. Coat, trousers, shirt, everything flew magically off him

10 'Come to the boat,' called the captain

'All right, captain' As the correspondent paddled, he saw the captain let himself down to bottom and leave the boat. Then the correspondent performed his one little marvel of the voyage. A large wave caught him and flung him with ease and supreme speed completely over the boat and far beyond it. It struck him even then as an event in gymnastics, and a true miracle of the sea. An overturned boat in the surf is not a play-thing to a swimming man

The correspondent arrived in water that reached only to his waist, but his condition did not enable him to stand for more than a moment. Each wave knocked him into a heap, and the under-tow pulled at him

Then he saw the man who had been running and undressing, and undressing and running, come bounding into the water. He dragged ashore the cook, and then waded toward the captain, but the captain waved him away, and sent him to the correspondent. He was naked, naked as a tree in winter, but a halo was about his head, and he shone like a saint. He gave a strong pull, and a long drag, and a bully heave at the correspondent's hand. The correspondent, schooled in the minor formulæ, said 'Thanks, old man' But suddenly the man cried 'What's that?' He pointed a swift finger. The correspondent said 'Go'

In the shallows, face downward, lay the oiler. His forehead touched sand that was periodically, between each wave, clear of the sea

The correspondent did not know all that transpired afterward. When he achieved safe ground he fell, striking the sand with each particular part of his body. It was as if he had dropped from a roof, but the thud was grateful to him.

It seems that instantly the beach was populated with men with blankets, clothes, and flasks, and women with coffee-pots and all the remedies sacred to their minds. The welcome of the land to the men from the sea was warm and generous, but a still and dripping shape was carried slowly up the beach, and the land's welcome for it could only be the different and sinister hospitality of the grave

When it came night, the white waves paced to and fro in the moonlight, and the wind brought the sound of the great sea's voice to the men on shore, and they felt that they could then be interpreters

THE UPTURNED FACE

'WHAT will we do now?' said the adjutant, troubled and excited

'Bury him,' said Timothy Lean

The two officers looked down close to their toes where lay the body of their comrade. The face was chalk-blue, gleaming eyes stared at the sky. Over the two upright figures was a windy sound of bullets, and on the top of the hill Lean's prostrate company of Spitzbergen infantry was firing measured volleys

'Don't you think it would be better—' began the adjutant. 'We might leave him until to-morrow.'

'No,' said Lean. 'I can't hold that post an hour longer. I've got to fall back, and we've got to bury old Bill.'

'Of course,' said the adjutant, at once. 'Your men got intrenching tools?'

Lean shouted back to his little line, and two men came slowly, one with a pick, one with a shovel. They started in the direction of the Rostuna sharpshooters. Bullets cracked near their ears. 'Dig here,' said Lean gruffly. The men, thus caused to lower their glances to the turf, became hurried and frightened, merely because they could not look to see whence the bullets came. The dull beat of the pick striking the earth sounded amid the swift snap of close bullets. Presently the other private began to shovel

'I suppose,' said the adjutant, slowly, 'we'd better search his clothes for—things.'

Lean nodded. Together in curious abstraction they looked at the body. Then Lean stirred his shoulders suddenly, arousing himself

'Yes,' he said, 'we'd better see what he's got.' He dropped to his knees, and his hands approached the body of the dead officer. But his hands wavered over the buttons of the tunic. The first button was brick-red with drying blood, and he did not seem to dare touch it.

'Go on,' said the adjutant, hoarsely.

Lean stretched his wooden hand, and his fingers fumbled the blood-stained buttons. At last he rose with ghastly face. He had gathered a watch, a whistle, a pipe, a tobacco-pouch, a handkerchief, a little case of cards and papers. He looked at the adjutant. There was a silence. The adjutant was feeling that he had been a coward to make Lean do all the grisly business.

'Well,' said Lean, 'that's all, I think. You have his sword and revolver?'

'Yes,' said the adjutant, his face working, and then he burst out in a sudden strange fury at the two privates. 'Why don't you hurry up with that grave? What are you doing, anyhow? Hurry, do you hear? I never saw such stupid—'

Even as he cried out in his passion the two men were labouring for their lives. Ever overhead the bullets were spitting.

The grave was finished. It was not a masterpiece—a poor little shallow thing. Lean and the adjutant again looked at each other in a curious silent communication.

Suddenly the adjutant croaked out a weird laugh. It was a terrible laugh, which had its origin in that part of the mind which is first moved by the singing of the nerves. 'Well,' he said, humorously to Lean, 'I suppose we had best tumble him in.'

'Yes,' said Lean. The two privates stood waiting, bent over their implements. 'I suppose,' said Lean, 'it would be better if we laid him in ourselves.'

'Yes,' said the adjutant. Then, apparently remembering that he had made Lean search the body, he stooped with great fortitude and took hold of the dead officer's clothing. Lean joined him. Both were particular that their fingers should not feel the corpse. They tugged away, the corpse lifted, heaved, toppled, flopped into the grave, and the two officers, straightening, looked again at each other—they were always looking at each other. They sighed with relief.

The adjutant said, 'I suppose we should—we should say something. Do you know the service, Tim?'

'They don't read the service until the grave is filled in,' said Lean, pressing his lips to an academic expression.

'Don't they?' said the adjutant, shocked that he had made the mistake.

'Oh, well,' he cried, suddenly, 'let us—let us say something—while he can hear us.'

'All right,' said Lean. 'Do you know the service?'

'I can't remember a line of it,' said the adjutant Lean was extremely dubious. 'I can repeat two lines, but—'

'Well, do it,' said the adjutant. 'Go as far as you can. That's better than nothing. And the beasts have got our range exactly.'

Lean looked at his two men. 'Attention,' he barked. The privates came to attention with a click, looking much aggrieved. The adjutant lowered his helmet to his knee. Lean, bareheaded, stood over the grave. The Rostina sharpshooters fired briskly.

'O Father, our friend has sunk in the deep waters of death, but his spirit has leaped toward Thee as the bubble arises from the lips of the drowning. Perceive, we beseech, O Father, the little flying bubble, and—'

Lean, although husky and ashamed, had suffered no hesitation up to this point, but he stopped with a hopeless feeling and looked at the corpse.

The adjutant moved uneasily. 'And from Thy superb heights—' he began, and then he too came to an end.

'And from Thy superb heights,' said Lean.

The adjutant suddenly remembered a phrase in the back part of the Spitzbergen burial service, and he exploited it with the triumphant manner of a man who has recalled everything, and can go on.

'O God, have mercy—'

'O God, have mercy—' said Lean.

'Mercy,' repeated the adjutant, in quick failure.

'Mercy,' said Lean. And then he was moved by some violence of feeling, for he turned suddenly upon his two men and ugerishly said, 'Throw the dirt in.'

The fire of the Rostina sharpshooters was accurate and continuous.

One of the aggrieved privates came forward with his shovel. He lifted his first shovel-load of earth, and for a moment of inexplicable hesitation it was held poised above this corpse, which from its chalk-blue face looked keenly out from the grave. Then the soldier emptied his shovel on—on the feet.

Timothy Lean felt as if tons had been swiftly lifted from off his forehead. He had felt that perhaps the private might empty the shovel on—on the face. It had been emptied on the feet. There was a great point gained there—ha, ha!—the first shovelful had been emptied on the feet. How satisfactory!

The adjutant began to babble. 'Well, of course—a man we've messed with all these years—impossible—you can't, you know, leave your intimate friends rotting on the field. Go on, for God's sake, and shovel, you!'

The man with the shovel suddenly ducked, grabbed his left arm with his right hand, and looked at his officer for orders. Lean picked the shovel from the ground. 'Go to the rear,' he said to the wounded man. He also addressed the other private. 'You get under cover, too, I'll finish this business.'

The wounded man scrambled hard still for the top of the ridge without devoting any glances to the direction from whence the bullets came, and the other man followed at an equal pace, but he was different, in that he looked back anxiously three times.

This is merely the way—often—of the hit and unhit.

Timothy Lean filled the shovel, hesitated, and then, in a movement which was like a gesture of abhorrence, he flung the dirt into the grave, and as it landed it made a sound—plop! Lean suddenly stopped and mopped his brow—a tired labourer.

'Perhaps we have been wrong,' said the adjutant. His glance wavered stupidly. 'It might have been better if we hadn't buried him just at this time. Of course, if we advance to-morrow the body would have been—'

'Damn you,' said Lean, 'shut your mouth!' He was not the senior officer.

He again filled the shovel and flung the earth. Always the earth made that sound—plop! For a space Lean worked frantically, like a man digging himself out of danger.

Soon there was nothing to be seen but the chalk-blue face Lean filled the shovel

 'Good God,' he cried to the adjutant 'Why didn't you turn him somehow when you put him in? This—' Then Lean began to stutter

The adjutant understood He was pale to the lips 'Go on, man,' he cried, beseechingly, almost in a shout Lean swung back the shovel It went forward in a pendulum curve When the earth landed it made a 10 sound—plop!

Do not weep, maiden, for war is kind Because your lover threw wild hands toward the sky
 And the affrighted steed ran on alone,
 Do not weep
 War is kind

Hoarse, booming drums of the regiment,
 Little souls who thirst for fight, These men were born to drill and
 die
 The unexplained glory flies above
 them,
 Great is the battle-god, great, and his

 A field where a thousand corpses lie

Do not weep, babe, for war is kind Because your father tumbled in the yellow

 Raged at his breast, gulped and died,
 Do not weep
 War is kind

Swift blazing flag of the regiment,
 Eagle with crest of red and gold,
 These men were born to drill and

 Point for them the virtue of slaughter, Make plain to them the excellence of

A SLANT of sun on dull brown walls,
A forgotten sky of bashful blue Toward God a mighty hymn,
A song of collisions and cries,
Rumbling wheels, hoof-beats, bells, Welcomes, farewells, love-calls, final moans,
Voices of joy, idiocy, warning, despair,
The unknown appeals of brutes,
The chanting of flowers,
The screams of cut trees. 10

The senseless babble of hens and wise
men—
A cluttered incoherency that says at the stars
'O God, save us!'

IN the night
Grey heavy clouds muffled the valleys,
And the peaks looked toward God alone
'O Master, that movest the wind with a finger,
Humble, idle, futile peaks are we.
Grant that we may run swiftly across the world
To huddle in worship at Thy feet'

In the morning
A noise of men at work came the clear blue mules,
And the little black cities were apparent 10
'O Master, that knowest the meaning of raindrops,
Humble, idle, futile peaks are we Give voice to us, we pray, O Lord, That we may sing Thy goodness to the sun'

In the evening
The far valleys were sprinkled with tiny lights
'O Master,
Thou that knowest the value of kings and birds,
Thou hast made us humble, idle, futile
peaks
Thou only needst eternal patience, 20
We bow to Thy wisdom, O Lord—Humble, idle, futile peaks'

In the night
Grey heavy clouds muffled the valleys,
And the peaks looked toward God

THE trees in the garden rained flowers.
 Children ran there joyously
 They gathered the flowers
 Each to himself
 Now there were some Who gathered great heaps—Having opportunity and skill—Until, behold, only chance blossoms Remained for the feeble
 Then a little spindling tutor 10 Ran importantly to the father, crying
 'Pray, come hither!
 See this unjust thing in your garden!
 But when the father had surveyed,

He admonished the tutor
 'Not so, small sage!
 This thing is just.
 For, look you,
 Are not they who possess the flowers
 Stronger, bolder, shrewder 20
 Than they who have none?
 Why should the strong—
 The beautiful strong—
 Why should they not have the flowers?'
 Upon reflection, the tutor bowed to the ground,
 'My lord,' he said,
 'The stars are displaced
 By this towering wisdom ' 1899

I

THE evening before, when the foreman had blown his whistle at six o'clock, the long line of ploughs had halted upon the instant, and the drivers, unharnessing their teams, had taken them back to the division barns—leaving the ploughs as they were in the furrows. But an hour after daylight the next morning the work was resumed. After breakfast, Vanamee, riding one horse and leading the others, had returned to the line of ploughs together with the other drivers. Now he was busy harnessing the team. At the division blacksmith shop—temporarily put up—he had been obliged to wait while one of his lead horses was shod, and he had thus been delayed quite five minutes. Nearly all the other teams were harnessed, the drivers on their seats, waiting for the foreman's signal.

'All ready here?' inquired the foreman, driving up to Vanamee's team in his buggy.

'All ready, sir,' answered Vanamee, buck- 10 ling the last strap.

He climbed to his seat, shaking out the reins, and turning about, looked back along the line, then all around him at the landscape inundated with the brilliant glow of the early morning.

The day was fine. Since the first rain of the season, there had been no other. Now the sky was without a cloud, pale blue, delicate, luminous, scintillating with morning. The great brown earth turned a huge flank to it, exhaling the moisture of the early dew. The atmosphere, washed clean of dust and mist, was translucent as crystal. Far off to the east, the hills on the other side of Broderson Creek stood out against the pallid saffron of the horizon as flat and as sharply outlined as if pasted on the sky. The campanile of the ancient Mission of San Juan seemed as fine as frost work. All about between the horizons, the carpet of the land unrolled itself to infinity. But now it was no longer parched with heat, cracked and warped by a merciless sun, powdered <sup>1</sup> These selections, to which the title has been given by the editors, are, respectively, from The Octopus (N Y, 1901), 126-33, and The Pit (N Y, 1903), 380-96. They are keystones from Norris' trilogy on wheat, which, in his brother's words, 'stood to him as a great world-force.' Of Norris' projected conclusion to the trilogy, his brother wrote: 'He told me of the last novel of the trilogy of "The Wheat," to which The Octopus and The Pit belonged. Not one word of this was ever written. It was not to be called The Wolf, however, as was announced. Its pivotal episode was to deal with a famine-stricken country of Europe, and the timely appearance, from across the sea, of three huge American schooners,—wheat-ships,—loaded to their capacity with the great crop that, in spite of the quarrels of farmers and railroads, and in spite of the manipulations of the bulls and bears on the stock market, was to fulfill its destiny as "the nourisher of nations."' with dust. The rain had done its work, not a clod that was not swollen with fertility, not a fissure that did not exhale the sense of fecundity. One could not take a dozen steps upon the ranches without the brusque sensation that underfoot the land was alive, aroused at last from its sleep, palpitating with the desire of reproduction. Deep down there in the recesses of the soil, the great heart throbbed once more, thrilling with passion, vibrating with desire, offering itself to the caress of the plough, insistent, eager, imperious. Dimly one felt the deep-seated trouble of the earth, the uneasy agitation of its members, the hidden tumult of its womb, demanding to be made fruitful, to reproduce, to disengage the eternal re-nascent germ of life that stirred and struggled in its loins.

The ploughs, thirty-five in number, each drawn by its team of ten, stretched in an interminable line, nearly a quarter of a mile in length, behind and ahead of Vanamee. They were arranged, as it were, en échelon, not in file—not one directly behind the other, but each succeeding plough its own width farther in the field than the one in front of it. Each of these ploughs held five shears, so that when the entire company was in motion, one hundred and seventy-five furrows were made at the same instant. At a distance, the ploughs resembled a great column of field artillery. Each driver was in his place, his glance alternating between his horses and the foreman nearest at hand. Other foremen, in their buggies or buckboards, were at intervals along the line, like battery lieutenants. Annixter himself, on horseback, in boots and campaign hat, a cigar in his teeth, overlooked the scene.

The division superintendent, on the opposite side of the line, galloped past to a position at the head. For a long moment there was a silence. A sense of preparedness ran from end to end of the column. All things were ready, each man in his place. The day's work was about to begin.

Suddenly, from a distance at the head of the line came the shrill trilling of a whistle. At once the foreman nearest Vanamee repeated it, at the same time turning down the line, and waving one arm. The signal was repeated, whistle answering whistle, till the sounds lost themselves in the distance. At once the line of ploughs lost its immobility, moving forward, getting slowly under way, the horses straining in the traces. A prolonged movement rippled from team to team, disengaging in its passage a multitude of sounds—the click of buckles, the creak of straining leather, the subdued clash of machinery, the cracking of whips, the deep breathing of nearly four hundred horses, the abrupt commands and cries of the drivers, and, last of all, the prolonged, soothing murmur of the thick brown earth turning steadily from the multitude of advancing shears.

The ploughing thus commenced, continued. The sun rose higher. Steadily the hundred iron hands kneaded and furrowed and stroked the brown, humid earth, the hundred iron teeth bit deep into the Titan's flesh. Perched on his seat, the moist living reins slipping and tugging in his hands, Vanamee, in the midst of this steady confusion of constantly varying sensation, sight interrupted by sound, sound mingling with sight, on this swaying, vibrating seat, quivering with the prolonged thrill of the earth, lapsed to a sort of pleasing numbness, in a sense, hypnotised by the weaving maze of things in which he found himself involved. To keep his team at an even, regular gait, maintaining the precise interval, to run his furrows as closely as possible to those already made by the plough in front—thus for the moment was the entire sum of his duties. But while one part of his brain, alert and watchful, took cognisance of these matters, all the greater part was lulled and stupefied with the long monotony of the affair.

The ploughing, now in full swing, enveloped him in a vague, slow-moving whirl of things. Underneath him was the jarring, jolting, trembling machine, not a clod was turned, not an obstacle encountered, that he did not receive the swift impression of it through all his body, the very friction of the damp soil, sliding incessantly from the shiny surface of the shears, seemed to reproduce itself in his finger-tips and along the back of his head. He heard the horse-hoofs by the myriads crushing down easily, deeply, into the loam, the prolonged clinking of trace-chains, the working of the smooth brown flanks in the harness, the clatter of wooden hames, the champing of bits, the click of iron shoes against pebbles, the brittle stubble of the surface ground crackling and snapping as the furrows turned, the sonorous, steady breaths wrenched from the deep, labouring chests, strap-bound, shining with sweat, and all along the line the voices of the men talking to the horses. Everywhere there were visions of glossy brown backs, straining, heaving, swollen with muscle, harness streaked with specks of froth, broad, cup-shaped hoofs, heavy with brown loam, men's faces red with tan, blue overalls spotted with axle-grease, muscled hands, the knuckles whitened in their grip on the reins, and through it all the ammoniacal smell of the horses, the bitter reek of perspiration of beasts and men, the aroma of warm leather, the scent of dead stubble—20 and stronger and more penetrating than everything else, the heavy, enervating odour of the upturned, living earth

At intervals, from the tops of one of the rare, low swells of the land, Vanamee over-looked a wider horizon. On the other divisions of Quen Sabe the same work was in progress. Occasionally he could see another column of ploughs in the adjoining division—sometimes so close at hand that the subdued murmur of its movements 30 reached his ear, sometimes so distant that it resolved itself into a long, brown streak upon the grey of the ground. Farther off to the west on the Osterman ranch other columns came and went, and, once, from the crest of the highest swell on his division, Vanamee caught a distant glimpse of the Broderson ranch. There, too, moving specks indicated that the ploughing was under way. And farther away still, far off 40 there beyond the fine line of the horizons, over the curve of the globe, the shoulder of the earth, he knew were other ranches, and beyond these others, and beyond these still others, the immensities multiplying to infinity.

Everywhere throughout the great San Joaquin, unseen and unheard, a thousand ploughs up-stirred the land, tens of thousands of shears clutched deep into the 50 warm, moist soil.

It was the long stroking caress, vigorous, male, powerful, for which the Earth seemed panting. The heroic embrace of a multitude of iron hands, gripping deep into the brown, warm flesh of the land that quivered responsive and passionate under this rude advance, so robust as to be almost an assault, so violent as to be veritably brutal. There, under the sun and under the speckless sheen of the sky, the wooing of the Titan began, the vast primal passion, the two world-forces, the elemental Male and Female, locked in a colossal embrace, at 10 grapples in the throes of an infinite desire, at once terrible and divine, knowing no law, untamed, savage, natural, sublime.

From time to time the gang in which Vanamee worked halted on the signal from foreman or overseer. The horses came to a standstill, the vague clamour of the work lapsed away. Then the minutes passed. The whole work hung suspended. All up and down the line one demanded what had 20 happened. The division superintendent galloped past, perplexed and anxious. For the moment, one of the ploughs was out of order, a bolt had slipped, a lever refused to work, or a machine had become immobilised in heavy ground, or a horse had lamed himself. Once, even, toward noon, an entire plough was taken out of the line, so out of gear that a messenger had to be sent to the division forge to summon the machin-30 ist.

Annixter had disappeared. He had ridden farther on to the other divisions of his ranch, to watch the work in progress there. At twelve o'clock, according to his orders, all the division superintendents put themselves in communication with him by means of the telephone wires that connected each of the division houses, reporting the condition of the work, the number 40 of acres covered, the prospects of each plough traversing its daily average of twenty miles.

At half-past twelve, Vanamee and the rest of the drivers ate their lunch in the field, the tin buckets having been distributed to them that morning after breakfast. But in the evening, the routine of the previous day was repeated, and Vanamee, unharnessing his team, riding one horse and leading the others, returned to the division 50 barns and bunk-house.

It was between six and seven o'clock. The half hundred men of the gang threw themselves upon the supper the Chinese cooks had set out in the shed of the eating-house, long as a bowling alley, unpainted, crude, the seats benches, the table covered with oil cloth. Overhead a half-dozen kerosene lamps flared and smoked.

The table was taken as if by assault, the clatter of iron knives upon the tin plates was as the reverberation of hail upon a metal roof. The ploughmen rinsed their throats with great draughts of wine, and, their elbows wide, their foreheads flushed, resumed the attack upon the beef and bread, eating as though they would never have enough. All up and down the long table, where the kerosene lamps reflected themselves deep in the oil cloth cover, one heard the incessant sounds of mastication, and saw the uninterrupted movement of great jaws. At every moment one or another of the men demanded a fresh portion of beef, another pint of wine, another half-loaf of bread. For upwards of an hour the gang ate. It was no longer a supper. It was a veritable barbecue, a crude and primitive feasting, barbaric, homeric.

But in all this scene Vanamee saw nothing repulsive. Presley would have abhorred it—this feeding of the People, this gorging of the human animal, eager for its meat. Vanamee, simple, uncomplicated, living so close to nature and the rudimentary life, understood its significance. He knew very well that within a short half-hour after this meal the men would throw themselves down in their bunks to sleep without moving, inert and stupefied with fatigue, till the morning. Work, food, and sleep, all life reduced to its bare essentials, uncomplex, honest, healthy. They were strong, these men, with the strength of the soil they worked, in touch with the essential things, back again to the starting point of civilisation, coarse, vital, real, and sane.

For a brief moment immediately after the meal, pipes were lit, and the air grew thick with fragrant tobacco smoke. On a corner of the dining-room table, a game of poker was begun. One of the drivers, a Swede, produced an accordion, a group on the steps of the bunk-house listened, with alternate gravity and shouts of laughter, to the acknowledged story-teller of the gang. But soon the men began to turn in, stretching themselves at full length on the horse blankets in the racklike bunks. The sounds of heavy breathing increased steadily, lights were put out, and before the afterglow had faded from the sky, the gang was asleep.

II

FOR on this morning of the thirteenth of June, the Board of Trade, its halls, corridors, offices, and stairways were already thrilling with a vague and terrible sound. It was only a little after nine o'clock. The trading would not begin for another half hour, but, even now, the mutter of the whirlpool, the growl of the Pit was making itself felt. The eddies were gathering, the thousands of subsidiary torrents that fed the cloaca were moving. From all over the immediate neighbourhood they came, from the offices of hundreds of commission houses, from brokers' offices, from banks, from the tall, grey buildings of LaSalle Street, from the street itself. And even from greater distances they came, auxiliary currents set in from all the reach of the Great Northwest, from Minneapolis, Duluth, and Milwaukee. From the Southwest, St. Louis, Omaha, and Kansas City contributed to the volume. The Atlantic Seaboard, New York, and Boston and Philadelphia sent out their tributary streams, London, Liverpool, Paris, and Odessa merged their influences with the vast world-wide flowing that bore down upon Chicago, and that now began slowly, slowly to centre and circle about the Wheat Pit of the Board of Trade.

Small wonder that the building to Page's ears vibrated to a strange and ominous humming. She heard it in the distant clicking of telegraph keys, in the echo of hurried whispered conversations held in dark corners, in the noise of rapid footsteps, in the trilling of telephone bells. These sounds came from all around her, they issued from the offices of the building below her, above her, and on either side. She was surrounded with them, and they mingled together to form one prolonged and muffled roar, that from moment to moment increased in volume.

The Pit was getting under way, the whirlpool was forming, and the sound of its courses was like the sound of the ocean in storm, heard at a distance.

Page and Landry were still halfway up the last stairway. Above and below, the throng was packed dense and immobilised.

But, little by little, Landry wormed a way for them, winning one step at a time. But he was very anxious, again and again he looked at his watch. At last he said

'I've got to go. It's just madness for me to stay another minute. I'll give you my card.'

'Well, leave me here,' Page urged. 'It can't be helped. I'm all right. Give me your card. I'll tell the guide in the gallery that you kept the seat for me—if I ever can get there. You must go. Don't stay another minute. If you can, come for me here in the gallery, when it's over. I'll wait for you. But if you can't come, all right. I can take care of myself.'

He could but assent to this. This was no time to think of small things. He left her and bore back with all his might through the crowd, gained the landing at the turn of the balustrade, waved his hat to her and disappeared.

A quarter of an hour went by. Page, caught in the crowd, could neither advance nor retreat. Ahead of her, some twenty steps away, she could see the back rows of seats in the gallery. But they were already occupied. It seemed hopeless to expect to see anything of the floor that day. But she could no longer extricate herself from the press, there was nothing to do but stay where she was.

On every side of her she caught odds and ends of dialogues and scraps of discussions, and while she waited she found an interest in listening to these, as they reached her from time to time.

'Well,' observed the man in the tall white hat, who had discouraged Landry from attempting to reach the gallery, 'well, he's shaken 'em up pretty well. Whether he downs 'em or they down him, he's made a good fight.'

His companion, a young man with eyeglasses, who wore a wonderful white waistcoat with queer glass buttons, assented, and Page heard him add

'Big operator, that Jadwin.'

'They're doing for him now, though.'

'I ain't so sure. He's got another fight in him. You'll see.'

'Ever see him?'

'No, no, he don't come into the Pit—these big men never do.'

Directly in front of Page two women kept up an interminable discourse.

'Well,' said the one, 'that's all very well, but Mr. Jadwin made my sister-in-law—she lives in Dubuque, you know—a rich woman. She bought some wheat, just for fun, you know, a long time ago, and held on till Mr. Jadwin put the price up to four times what she paid for it. Then she sold out. My, you ought to see the lovely house she's building, and her son's gone to Europe, to study art, if you please, and a year ago, my dear, they didn't have a cent, not a cent, but her husband's salary.'

'There's the other side, too, though,' answered her companion, adding in a hoarse whisper 'If Mr. Jadwin fails to-day—well, honestly, Julia, I don't know what Philip will do.'

But, from another group at Page's elbow, a man's bass voice cut across the subdued chatter of the two women.

'Guess we'll pull through, somehow. Burbank & Co., though—by George! I'm not sure about them. They are pretty well involved in this thing, and there's two or three smaller firms that are dependent on them. If Gretry-Converse & Co. should suspend, Burbank would go with a crash sure. And there's that bank in Keokuk, they can't stand much more. Their depositors would run 'em quick as how-do-you-do, if there was a smash here in Chicago.'

'Oh, Jadwin will pull through.'

'Well, I hope so—by Jingo! I hope so. Say, by the way, how did you come out?'

'Me! Hoh! Say my boy, the next time I get into a wheat trade you'll know it. I was one of the merry paretics who believed that Crookes was the Great Lumtum. I tailed on to his clique. Lord love you! Jadwin put the knife into me to the tune of twelve thousand dollars. But, say, look here, aren't we ever going to get up to that blame gallery? We ain't going to see any of this, and I—hark!—by God! there goes the gong. They've begun. Say, say, hear 'em, will you! Holy Moses! say—listen to that! Did you ever hear—Lord! I wish we could see—could get somewhere where we could see something.'

His friend turned to him and spoke a sentence that was drowned in the sudden vast volume of sound that all at once shook the building.

'Hey—what?'

The other shouted into his ear. But even then his friend could not hear. Nor did he listen. The crowd upon the staircases had surged irresistibly forward and upward. There was a sudden outburst of cries. Women's voices were raised in exostulation, and even fear.

'Oh, oh—don't push so!'

'My arm! oh!—oh, I shall faint . . . please.'

But the men, their escorts, held back furiously, their faces purple, they shouted imprecations over their shoulders.

'Here, here, you damn fools, what you doing?'

'Don't crowd so!'

'Get back, back!'

'There's a lady fainted here. Get back you! We'll all have a chance to see. Good Lord! ain't there a policeman anywheres?'

'Say, say! It's going down—the price. It broke three cents, just then, at the opening, they say.'

'This is the worst I ever saw or heard of.'

'My God! if Jadwin can only hold 'em.'

'You bet he'll hold 'em.'

'Hold nothing!—Oh! say my friend, it don't do you any good to crowd like that.'

'It's the people behind. I'm not doing it. Say, do you know where they're at on the floor? The wheat, I mean, is it going up or down?'

'Up, they tell me. There was a rally, I don't know. How can we tell here? We—Hi! there they go again. Lord! that must have been a smash. I guess the Board of Trade won't forget this day in a hurry. Heavens, you can't hear yourself think!'

'Glad I ain't down there in the Pit.'

But, at last, a group of policemen appeared. By main strength they shouldered their way to the top of the stairs, and then began pushing the crowd back. At every instant they shouted.

'Move on now, clear the stairway. No seats left!'

But at this Page, who, by the rush of the crowd, had been carried almost to the top of the stairs, managed to extricate an arm from the press, and hold Landry's card in the air. She even hazarded a little deception.

'I have a pass. Will you let me through, please?'

Luckily one of the officers heard her. He bore down heavily with all the mass of his two hundred pounds and the majesty of the law he represented, to the rescue and succour of this very pretty girl.

'Let the lady through,' he roared, forcing a passage with both elbows. 'Come right along, Miss. Stand back you, now. Can't you see the lady has a pass? Now then, Miss, and be quick about it, I can't keep 'em back forever.'

Jostled and hustled, her dress crumpled, her hat awry, Page made her way forward, till the officer caught her by the arm, and pulled her out of the press. With a long breath she gained the landing of the gallery.

The guide, an old fellow in a uniform of blue, with brass buttons and a visored cap, stood near by, and to him she presented Landry's card.

'Oh, yes, oh, yes,' he shouted in her ear, after he had glanced it over. 'You are the party Mr. Court spoke about. You just came in time. I wouldn't 'a dared hold your seat a minute longer.'

He led her down the crowded aisle between rows of theatre chairs, all of which were occupied, to one vacant seat in the very front row.

'You can see everything now,' he cried, making a trumpet of his palm. 'You're Mister Jadwin's niece. I know, I know. Ah, it's a wild day, Miss. They ain't done much yet, and Mr. Jadwin's holding his own, just now. But I thought for a moment they had him on the run. You see that—my, my, there was a sharp rally. But he's holding on strong yet.'

Page took her seat, and leaning forward looked down into the Wheat Pit.

Once free of the crowd after leaving Page, Landry ran with all the swiftness of his long legs down the stair, and through the corridors till, all out of breath, he gained Gretry's private office. The other Pit traders for the house, some eight or ten men, were already assembled, and just as Landry entered by one door, the broker himself came in from the customers' room. Jadwin was nowhere to be seen.

'What are the orders for to-day, sir?'

Gretry was very pale. Despite his long experience on the Board of Trade, Landry could see anxiety in every change of his expression, in every motion of his hands. The broker before answering the question crossed the room to the water cooler and drank a brief swallow Then emptying the glass he refilled it, moistened his lips again, and again emptied and filled the goblet He put it down, caught it up once more, filled it, emptied it, drinking now in long draughts, now in little sips He was quite unconscious of his actions, and Landry as he watched, felt his heart sink. Things must, indeed, be at a desperate pass when Gretry, the calm, the clear-headed, the placid, was thus upset.

'Your orders?' said the broker, at last 'The same as yesterday, keep the market up—that's all It must not go below a dollar fifteen But act on the defensive Don't be aggressive, unless I send word There will probably be very heavy selling the first few moments You can buy, each of you, up to half a million bushels apiece If that don't keep the price up, if they still are selling after that . . . well', Gretry paused a moment, irresolutely, 'well,' he added suddenly, 'if they are still selling freely after you've each bought half a million, I'll let you know what to do And, look here,' he continued, facing the group, 'look here—keep your heads cool . . . I guess to-day will decide things Watch the Crookes crowd pretty closely I understand they're up to something again That's all, I guess'

Landry and the other Gretry traders hurried from the office up to the floor Landry's heart was beating thick and slow and hard, his teeth were shut tight. Every nerve, every fibre of him braced itself with the rigidity of drawn wire, to meet the issue of the impending hours Now was to come the last grapple He had never lived through a crisis such as this before Would he prevail, would he keep his head? Would he avoid or balk the thousand and one little subterfuges, tricks, and traps that the hostile traders would prepare for him—prepare with a quickness, a suddenness that all but defied the sharpest, keenest watchfulness?

Was the gong never going to strike? He found himself, all at once, on the edge of the Wheat Pit It was jammed tight with the crowd of traders, and the excitement that disengaged itself from that tense, vehement crowd of white faces and glittering eyes was veritably sickening, veritably weakening Men on either side of him were shouting mere incoherencies, to which nobody, not even themselves, were listening. Others, silent, gnawed their nails to the quick, breathing rapidly, audibly even, their nostrils expanding and contracting. All around roared the vague thunder that since early morning had shaken the building In the Pit the bids leaped to and fro, though the time of opening had not yet come, the very planks under foot seemed spinning about in the first huge warning swirl of the Pit's centripetal convulsion. There was dizziness in the air Something, some infinite immeasurable power, on-rushing in its eternal courses, shook the Pit in its grasp Something deafened the ears, blinded the eyes, dulled and numbed the mind, with its roar, with the chaff and dust of its whirlwind passage, with the stupefying sense of its power, coeval with the earthquake and glacier, merciless, all-powerful, a primal basic throes of creation itself, unassailable, inviolate, and untamed.

Had the trading begun? Had the gong struck? Landry never knew, never so much as heard the clang of the great bell All at once he was fighting, all at once he was caught, as it were, from off the stable earth, and flung headlong into the heart and centre of the Pit What he did, he could not say, what went on about him, he could not distinguish He only knew that roar was succeeding roar, that there was crashing through his ears, through his very brain, the combined bellow of a hundred Niagaras Hands clutched and tore at him, his own tore and clutched in turn The Pit was mad, was drunk and frenzied, not a man of all those who fought and scrambled and shouted who knew what he or his neighbour did They only knew that a support long thought to be secure was giving way, not gradually, not evenly, but by horrible collapses, and equally horrible upward leaps. Now it held, now it broke, now it reformed again, rose again, then again in hideous cataclysms fell from beneath their feet to lower depths than before The official reporter leaned back in his place, helpless On the wall overhead, the indicator on the dial was rocking back and forth, like the mast of a ship caught in a monsoon The price of July wheat no man could so much as approximate The fluctuations were no longer by fractions of a cent, but by ten cents, fifteen cents, twenty-five cents at a time On one side of the Pit wheat sold at ninety cents, on the other at a dollar and a quarter

And all the while above the din upon the floor, above the tramlings and the shoutings in the Pit, there seemed to thrill and swell that appalling roar of the Wheat itself coming in, coming on like a tidal wave, bursting through, dashing barriers aside, rolling like a measureless, almighty river, from the farms of Iowa and the ranches of California, on to the East—to the bake-shops and hungry mouths of Europe

Landry caught one of the Gretry traders by the arm

'What shall we do?' he shouted 'I've bought up to my limit No more orders have come in The market has gone from under us What's to be done?'

'I don't know,' the other shouted back 'I don't know We're all gone to hell, looks like the last smash There are no more supporting orders—something's gone wrong Gretry hasn't sent any word'

Then, Landry, beside himself with excitement and with actual terror, hardly knowing even yet what he did, turned sharply about He fought his way out of the Pit, he ran hatless and panting across the floor, in and out between the groups of spectators, down the stairs to the corridor below, and into the Gretry-Converse offices

In the outer office a group of reporters and the representatives of a great commercial agency were besieging one of the heads of the firm They assaulted him with questions

'Just tell us where you are at—that's all we want to know'

'Just what is the price of July wheat?'

'Is Jadwin winning or losing?'

But the other threw out an arm in a wild gesture of helplessness.

'We don't know, ourselves,' he cried 'The market has run clean away from everybody You know as much about it as I do It's simply hell broken loose, that's all We can't tell where we are at for days to come'

Landry rushed on He swung open the door of the private office and entered, slamming it behind him and crying out

'Mr Gretry, what are we to do? We've had no orders'

But no one listened to him Of the group that gathered around Gretry's desk, no one so much as turned a head

Jadwin stood there in the centre of the others, hatless, his face pale, his eyes congested with blood Gretry fronted him, one hand upon his arm In the remainder of the group Landry recognised the senior clerk of the office, one of the heads of a great banking house, and a couple of other men—confidential agents, who had helped to manipulate the great corner.

'But you can't,' Gretry was exclaiming 'You can't, don't you see we can't meet our margin calls? It's the end of the game You've got no more money'

'It's a lie' Never so long as he lived did Landry forget the voice in which Jadwin cried the words 'It's a lie! Keep on buying, I tell you Take all they'll offer I tell you we'll touch the two-dollar mark before noon'

'Not another order goes up to that floor,' retorted Gretry 'Why, J, ask any of these gentlemen here They'll tell you.'

'It's useless, Mr Jadwin,' said the banker, quietly 'You were practically beaten two days ago'

'Mr Jadwin,' pleaded the senior clerk, 'for God's sake listen to reason Our firm—'

But Jadwin was beyond all appeal He threw off Gretry's hand

'Your firm, your firm—you've been cowards from the start I know you, I know you You have sold me out Crookes has bought you Get out of my way!' he shouted 'Get out of my way! Do you hear? I'll play my hand alone from now on'

'J, old man—why—see here, man,' Gretry implored, still holding him by the arm, 'here, where are you going?'

Jadwin's voice rang like a trumpet call

'Into the Pit'

'Look here—wait—here Hold him back, gentlemen He don't know what he's about'

'If you won't execute my orders, I'll act myself I'm going into the Pit, I tell you'

'J, you're mad, old fellow. You're ruined—don't you understand?—you're ruined'

'Then God curse you, Sam Gretry, for the man who failed me in a crisis' And as he spoke Curtis Jadwin struck the broker full in the face Gretry staggered back from the blow, catching at the edge of his desk. His pale face flashed to crimson for an instant, his fists clunched, then his hands fell to his sides

'No,' he said, 'let him go, let him go. The man is merely mad'

But Jadwin, struggling for a second in the midst of the group that tried to hold him, suddenly flung off the restraining clasps, thrust the men to one side, and rushed from the room

Gretry dropped into his chair before his desk

'It's the end,' he said, simply

He drew a sheet of note paper to him, and in a shaking hand wrote a couple of lines

'Take that,' he said, handing the note to the senior clerk, 'take that to the secretary of the Board at once'

And straight into the turmoil and confusion of the Pit, to the scene of so many of his victories, the battleground whereon again and again, his enemies routed, he had remained the victor undisputed, undisputed came the 'Great Bull' No sooner had he set foot within the entrance to the Floor, than the news went flashing and flying from lip to lip The galleries knew it, the public room and the Western Union knew it, the telephone booths knew it, and lastly even the Wheat Pit, torn and tossed and rent asunder by the force this man himself had unchained, knew it, and knowing, stood dismayed

For even then, so great had been his power, so complete his dominion, and so well-rooted the fear which he had inspired, that this last move in the great game he had been playing, this unexpected, direct, personal assumption of control struck a sense of consternation into the heart of the hardiest of his enemies

Jadwin himself, the great man, the 'Great Bull,' in the Pit! What was about to happen? Had they been too premature in their hope of his defeat? Had he been preparing some secret, unexpected manoeuvre? For a second they hesitated, then moved by a common impulse, feeling the push of the wonderful new harvest behind them, they gathered themselves together for the final assault, and again offered the wheat for sale, offered it by thousands upon thousands of bushels, poured, as it were, the reappings of entire principalities out upon the floor of the Board of Trade

Jadwin was in the thick of the confusion by now And the avalanche, the undiked Ocean of the Wheat, leaping to the lash of the hurricane, struck him fairly in the face

He heard it now, he heard nothing else.

The Wheat had broken from his control For months, he had, by the might of his single arm, held it back, but now it rose like the upbuilding of a colossal billow It towered, towered, hung poised for an instant, and then, with a thunder as of the grind and crash of chaotic worlds, broke upon him, burst through the Pit and raced past him, on and on to the eastward and to the hungry nations

And then, under the stress and violence of the hour, something snapped in his brain The murk behind his eyes had been suddenly pierced by a white flash The strange qualms and tiny nervous paroxysms of the last few months all at once culminated in some indefinite, indefinable crisis, and the wheels and cogs of all activities save one lapsed away and ceased Only one function of the complicated machine persisted, but it moved with a rapidity of vibration that seemed to be tearing the tissues of being to shreds, while its rhythm beat out the old and terrible cadence

'Wheat—wheat—wheat, wheat—wheat—wheat'

Blind and insensate, Jadwin strove against the torrent of the Wheat There in the middle of the Pit, surrounded and assaulted by herd after herd of wolves yelping for his destruction, he stood braced, rigid upon his feet, his head up, his hand, the great bony hand that once had held the whole Pit in its grip, flung high in the air in a gesture of defiance, while his voice like the clangour of bugles sounding to the charge of the forlorn hope, rang out again and again, over the din of his enemies

'Give a dollar for July—give a dollar for July'

With one accord they leaped upon him The little group of his traders was swept aside Landry alone, Landry who had never left his side since his rush from out Gretry's office, Landry Court, loyal to the last, his one remaining soldier, white, shaking, the sobs strangling in his throat, clung to him desperately. Another billow of wheat was preparing. They two—the beaten general and his young armour bearer—heard it coming, hussing, raging, bellowing, it swept down upon them. Landry uttered a cry. Flesh and blood could not stand this strain. He cowered at his chief's side, his shoulders bent, one arm above his head, as if to ward off an actual physical force.

But Jadwin, iron to the end, stood erect. All unknowing what he did, he had taken Landry's hand in his and the boy felt the grip on his fingers like the contracting of a vise of steel. The other hand, as though holding up a standard, was still in the air, and his great deep-toned voice went out across the tumult, proclaiming to the end his battle cry.

'Give a dollar for July—give a dollar for July!'

But, little by little, Landry became aware that the tumult of the Pit was intermitting. There were sudden lapses in the shouting, and in these lapses he could hear from somewhere out upon the floor voices that were crying 'Order—order, order, gentlemen.'

But again and again the clamour broke out. It would die down for an instant, in response to these appeals, only to burst out afresh as certain groups of traders started the pandemonium again, by the wild out-crying of their offers. At last, however, the older men in the Pit, regaining some measure of self-control, took up the word, going to and fro in the press, repeating 'Order, order.'

And then, all at once, the Pit, the entire floor of the Board of Trade was struck dumb. All at once the tension was relaxed, the furious struggling and stamping was stilled. Landry, bewildered, still holding his chief by the hand, looked about him. On the floor, near at hand, stood the President of the Board of Trade himself, and with him the vice-president and a group of the directors. Evidently it had been these who had called the traders to order. But it was not toward them now that the hundreds of men in the Pit and on the floor were looking.

In the little balcony on the south wall opposite the visitors' gallery a figure had appeared, a tall grave man, in a long black coat—the secretary of the Board of Trade.

Landry with the others saw him, saw him advance to the edge of the railing, and fix his glance upon the Wheat Pit. In his hand he carried a slip of paper.

And then in the midst of that profound silence the secretary announced:

'All trades with Gretry, Converse & Co. must be closed at once.'

The words had not ceased to echo in the high vaultings of the roof before they were greeted with a wild, shrill yell of exultation and triumph, that burst from the crowding masses in the Wheat Pit.

Beaten, beaten at last, the 'Great Bull' Smashed! The great corner smashed! Jadwin busted! They themselves saved, saved, saved! Cheer followed upon cheer, yell after yell. Hats went into the air. In a frenzy of delight men danced and leaped and capered upon the edge of the Pit, clasping their arms about each other, shaking each others' hands, cheering and hurrahing till their strained voices became hoarse and faint.

Some few of the older men protested.

There were cries of 'Shame, shame!'

'Order—let him alone.'

'Let him be, he's down now. Shame, shame!'

But the jubilee was irrepressible, they had been too cruelly pressed, these others, they had felt the weight of the Bull's hoof, the rip of his horn. Now they had beaten him, had pulled him down.

'Yah-h-h, whoop, y1, y1, y1. Busted, busted, busted. Hip, hip, hip, and a tiger!'

'Come away, sir. For God's sake, Mr. Jadwin, come away.'

Landry was pleading with Jadwin, clutching his arm in both his hands, his lips to his chief's ear to make himself heard above the yelping of the mob.

Jadwin was silent now. He seemed no longer to see or hear, heavily, painfully he leaned upon the young man's shoulder.

'Come away, sir—for God's sake!'

The group of traders parted before them, cheering even while they gave place, cheering with eyes averted, unwilling to see the ruin that meant for them salvation.

'Yah-h-h. Yah-h-h, busted, busted!'

Landry had put his arm about Jadwin, and gripped him close as he led him from the Pit. The sobs were in his throat again, and tears of excitement, of grief, of anger and impotence were running down his face

'Yah-h-h Yah-h-h, he's done for, busted, busted!'

'Damn you all,' cried Landry, throwing out a furious fist, 'damn you all, you brutes, you beasts! If he'd so much as raised a finger a week ago, you'd have run for your lives'

But the cheering drowned his voice, and as the two passed out of the Pit upon the floor, the gong that closed the trading struck and, as it seemed, put a period, definite and final to the conclusion of Curtis Jadwin's career as speculator

Across the floor towards the doorway Landry led his defeated captain Jadwin was in a daze, he saw nothing, heard nothing. Quietly he submitted to Landry's guiding arm. The visitors in the galleries bent far over to see him pass, and from all over the floor, spectators, hangers-on, corn-and-provision traders, messenger boys, clerks and reporters came hurrying to watch the final exit of the 'Great Bull,' from the scene of his many victories and his one overwhelming defeat.

In silence they watched him go by. Only in the distance from the direction of the Pit itself came the sound of dying cheers. But at the doorway stood a figure that

Landry recognised at once—a small man, lean-faced, trimly dressed, his clean-shaven lips pursed like the mouth of a shut money bag, imperturbable as ever, cold, unexcited—Calvin Crookes himself

And as Jadwin passed, Landry heard the Bear leader say

'They can cheer now, all they want. They didn't do it. It was the wheat itself that beat him, no combination of men could have done it—go on, cheer, you damn fools! He was a bigger man than the best of us.'

THE MAN WITH THE HOE<sup>1</sup>

WRITTEN AFTER SEEING MILLET'S WORLD-FAMOUS PAINTING

God made man in His own image, in the image of God made He him GENESIS

BOWED by the weight of centuries he leans
Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
The emptiness of ages in his face,
And on his back the burden of the world
Who made him dead to rapture and despair, A thing that grieves not and that never hopes,
Stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox?
Who loosened and let down this brutal jaw?

<sup>1</sup> Markham wrote 'The theme of the Hoe-Man is as old as the world and as deep as the world's injustice. The tragic plight has touched my heart from earliest boyhood. I have cried his cause in many of my poems.

The Hoe-Man, of course, is not the intelligent working man. He is not the savage of the wilderness, who has at times a step of dignity and a tongue of eloquence. The Hoe-Man is the savage of civilization.' Benet, ed., Fifty Poets (N.Y., 1933), 4.

Whose was the hand that slanted back this brow?

Whose breath blew out the light within this brain?

10

Is this the Thing the Lord God made and gave

To have dominion over sea and land,
To trace the stars and search the heavens for power,

To feel the passion of Eternity?

Is this the Dream He dreamed who shaped the suns

And pillared the blue firmament with light?
Down all the stretch of Hell to its last gulf
There is no shape more terrible than this—More tongued with censure of the world's blind greed—

More filled with signs and portents for the soul—

2.

More fraught with menace to the universe

What gulfs between him and the seraphim!
Slave of the wheel of labor, what to him
Are Plato and the swing of Pleiades?
What the long reaches of the peaks of song,

The rift of dawn, the reddening of the rose?
Through this dread shape the suffering ages look,

Time's tragedy is in that aching stoop, Through this dread shape humanity betrayed,
Plundered, profaned and disinherited, 30 Cries protest to the Judges of the World,
A protest that is also prophecy.

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands,
Is this the handiwork you give to God,
This monstrous thing distorted and soulquenched?
How will you ever straighten up this shape,
Touch it again with immortality,
Give back the upward looking and the light,

Rebuild in it the music and the dream,
Make right the immemorial infamies, 40
Perfidious wrongs, immedicable woes?

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands,
How will the Future reckon with this Man?
How answer his brute question in that hour
When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the
world?

How will it be with kingdoms and with kings—
With those who shaped him to the thing he
is—
When this dumb Terror shall reply to God,
After the silence of the centuries?

FIRST SNOW

THE cows are bawling in the mountains,
The snowflakes fall
They are leaving the pools and pebbled fountains,
Troubled they bawl
They are winding down the mountains'
shoulders
Through the open pines,
The wild rose thickets and the granite boulders,
In broken lines
Each calf trots close beside its mother,
And so they go, 10
Bawling and calling to one another
About the snow

FROM THE POET IN THE DESERT<sup>1</sup>

15

BEHOLD silver-kirtled Dawn, the liferenewer,
The comforter, bringer of a new hope.
The skies are listening to Earth's silence
The Desert is asleep, cool, grey, silent.

<sup>1</sup> 'The Poet in the Desert' had its origin in the experience of my life as a young army officer, lying down amid the majesty of the desert and looking up into the eternity above, contrasting the inexorable justice, beauty and wisdom of Nature with the relentless injustice, ugliness and folly of Man. The theme, as a whole, was not

A shy little breeze runs across her face And presently her fretful babies stir upon her bosom
The comforter casts abroad her gossamer mantle
A lean coyote, prowler of the night,
Slips to his rocky fastness
And noiselessly, through the grey sage, 10
Jack-rabbits shuttle
From castellated cliffs rock ravens launch deliberately selected with the purpose aforethought, but was rather compelled little by little by the desert itself, that brooding place of the soul, with its vivid concrete evidence of Nature's universal beauty. Under its influence the vast inequality between Nature's ways and Man's are inventoried and defined, and the way of Freedom (Nature's way) through revolution indicated as man's only salvation.

'The particular problem arising from the expression of such a theme was the transmutation of the propagandistic, didactic and statistical elements involved into what is felt to be poetry, and, where this was not entirely possible, an effort was made to produce a poetic effect through deliberate contrast, after the manner of the Bible, with passages of pure poetry thrown into high light by contrast with the shadow-content of less poetic lines.

'The first version of The Poet in the Desert was composed between the years 1911 and 1915, and was published in 1915. The first revised edition was being written off and on, as the opportunity in a busy lawyer's life came, during the years 1916 to 1918, and was published in 1918. The edition of 1929 contains revisions made in that year.' Author's note.

The version used here is, with the exception of section 52, that of 1929. Section 52 is as printed in Benet, ed., Fifty Poets (N.Y., 1933).

On broad black sails Wild horses, neighing and tossing their manes, Having drunk their fill, troop back to pasture,
 A sage-brush thrasher warbles a varied ecstasy
 And the waking Desert watches breathlessly The thin, white skirts of Dawn, Dancer of
     the sky,
 Tripping daintily down the sunrise-molten
     mountain,
 Emptying a golden basin, filled with roses Now along the irrigation ditch, from      21 cottonwoods,
 Tremulous with caress of unseen fingers,
 Orioles begin a rivalry of joy,
 And from a pointed poplar top
 A red bird, dipped in sunrise, Cracks an exultant whip above a silver world.

29

THIS is the pedigree of degradation Authority, father of laws made by the masters,
 Laws, father of Privilege, snatched by the masters,
 Privilege for the few, father of Poverty, to the many,
 Poverty, the black bitch spawning—ignorance—crime—degradation
 I am a reaper in disordered fields
 And the sheaves which I gather are Drunkenness, crime, hate, ugliness, despair
 Palaces of the idle rich
 And filthy nest of the debased poor,      10 Jails and churches hugging each other in a filthy incest
 A killing hunger of the body,
 The hunger of the soul denied.

Shall I pity the debased ones and not pity
 Those who have wrought the debasement?
 Shall I forgive the criminals, haughtily,
 And go my way and forget their fashioners?
 What trick of the great wheel, invisible,
 Gave to them their places, and to me mine?
 I have not wrought myself in any part,      20 Nor have they wrought themselves in any part

We are thrown off, as bubbles of the sea.
 We are thrust down which voyages upon
 The unseen air,

Or the globed gossamer of the dandelion
 Which the wind seedeth
 There is not one who would not rather rejoice
 To walk erect, knowing man's nobility,
 Leading his soul up to tranquil heights,
 To sit a little while beyond the clouds      30
 There is none who does not prefer To walk in the fields, psalm with the birds,
 And in the vastness of the morning
 Drink the air of grandeur Even the makers of poverty shrink from its ugliness,
 But they have not the courage to set aside the lesser law for the greater They do not know they, too, will be happier when all are happy

38

THE desert murmurs to the sun a strange murmur
 As a whisper of a bride to the bridegroom Larks are telling a triumph, Magpies are screaming their summons,
 And finches in wild-rose thicket recite delicate poems
 Brooks commune with their pebbled floors,
 Tricking the May-flies to a gauzy dance,
 And warbling to mouth-dripping kine
 Music of pastures,
 Of minty beds and purple bergamot      10
 I will go where the little rivers Are calling almost impatiently,
 'Lie down by our hurrying
 'Rest ye beside us
 'Let us whisper to you of our eternity,
 'Soothing your ears with our legends
 'You are for a moment, but we are forever
 'Chattering, laughing, brawling,
 'Intoning our invocation
 'We are of the Past and of the Future      20
 'You creep back into Earth and are gone,
 'But we will soothe the ears of your children forever'

My ears are awake to the music of the morning
 I hear the pied yellow hammer beating on the barn gable,
 Drumming to drowsy Summer
 Hid marsh-wrens trill restlessly in the tules, Making a gay noise, chirping and twittering From somewhere the voice of a white-crowned sparrow
 And, further off, near the irrigation-ditch,

Where the top of a poplar is lighted as a candle, 30
An oriole empties his heart, lest it break.

52

FROM my minaret the level desert widened To the far pale mountains a sheet of burnished gold,
Beaten by the hammers of the Sun.
Cattle grazed emblems of contented peace.

I saw

Far off against the distant mountains, A storm marching across the Desert an army of Titans flaunting dark banners, rolling reverberant drums
And flailing the back of the Desert with flails of lightning
So she trembled and drew the sky about her Steadily marched the Storm, walking on water-spouts, 10

And slowly drawing away to its purple tents in the mountains

The drums muttered—a sleepy child—fretful—

The mountains came forth as gladiators and the Sun threw them

Their shields of gold
The thunder-throated bull called his people and led

Them to drink at the small river which, impatient as

A schoolboy, released, burst from under my lava citadel

Dreamy-eyed with motherhood, the cows submitted to

The plundering calves, and the bull lifted his massive head,

Dripping with crystal water, and gazed upon his flock, 20

Well-satisfied He did not know that they were by the Masters

Bred for beef he and the mothers and their little ones,

All bred for slaughter Their brains only bits of pulp

Quickened for procreation

Sunset dipped the world in amethyst, and as the purple tide

Welled slowly up, the lordly bull, the patient cows,

The querulous and greedy calves, intoned a deep recessional

Suddenly Night flung wide the sapphire gate, and the breastplate

Of the Infinite leaped forth ablaze, so I covered my eyes

That I be not made blind Worlds on worlds— 30

Universe on universe, infinity upon infinity

Among the golden swarm, I saw a bit of luminous mist, a mote:

The necklace of Andromeda—three hundred million billion miles

Its span A wanderer in that same dark where we too are lost,

Questioning, questioning—never a question answered.

And we enter the narrow corridor
To forget all—nor ever know we have found
peace

I looked into the jeweled cup which I shall never drink

I looked toward my cold bedfellows of the sky whom I Shall never know nor one of them shall know another and 40

I whispered to Andromeda—'Yet Man makes War'

O heavenly solitudes, you are not more unguessed

Than the vast and lonely spaces of Man's soul

We know Canopus, giant of the sky, could swallow our

Whole universe as would a goat a thistle, and the feet

Of Light grow weary in their race to us, but who

Has ever caught his neighbor's soul within his own?

Or the soul of one, the best-beloved, or who Shall ever know that soul which is himself—

A lone bird, lost in night a weary wanderer, Hopeless of rest until the Dark Hunter casts his net 51

O who can know the Soul of Man?—Part of The Primal Harmony, that has put on

wings

And refusing all arbitrations of force

Soars high above the jungle—more, above all peaks

Terrestrial, and more, beyond the lantern of the Lyre,

Arcturus or Orion, on, forever endless—Knowing itself to be part of the Whole as these are part

Part of the Creator, itself a creator

Which has brought down from the skies the Primal Harmony 60
 Love—from which all else immortal comes—
 The Soul continually whispering eternal verities,
 And Thought, the Gleaner, continually listening,
 Carefully selecting the immortal forces of the Soul,
 Justice, Equality, Freedom, Mercy, Stronger than armies or armored fleets, stronger than

Navies of the air which strangle cities in their claws,
 As a hawk a sparrow—stronger than every force or power
 The body can possess the Soul of Man, Which flies above this shadowy world as a wild swan 70
 Flies through the night above a darkened
 Earth
 Until at dawn, high in the coming blue The heavenly breast is lighted by the sunrise

FROM A DRAMATIC SCENE<sup>1</sup>

IN Campo Santo is a grave
 Where I and the moon together Go linger oft and cannot leave Tho' dawn be in the weather.
 Oh, let me hold her in my arms
 Cold tho' she be, there let her languish
 Only her kiss of death can warm

MT LYKAION

ALONE on Lykaion since man hath been Stand on the height two columns, where at rest
 Two eagles hewn of gold sit looking East Forever, and the sun goes up between Far down around the mountain's oval green
 And order keeps the falling stones abreast.
 Below within the chaos last and least A river like a curl of light is seen Beyond the river lies the even sea,
 Beyond the sea another ghost of sky,— 10
 O God, support the sickness of my eye
 Lest the far space and long antiquity Suck out my heart, and on this awful
 ground
 The great wind kill my little shell with sound

 drama on Benvenuto Cellini, and is sung by him

THE SOUL OF TIME

TIME's a circumference Whereof the segment of our station
 seems
 A long straight line from nothing into naught
 Therefore we say 'progress,' 'infinity'—
 Dull words whose object Hangs in the air of error and delights
 Our boyish minds ahunt for butterflies
 For aspiration studies not the sky
 But looks for stars, the victories of faith Are soldiered none the less with certainties, 10
 And all the multitudinous armies decked With banners blown ahead and flute
 before March not to the desert or th' Elysian
 fields,
 But in the track of some discovery,
 The grip and cognizance of something
 true,
 Which won resolves a better distribution Between the dreaming mind and real truth

I cannot understand you

'Tis because You lean over my meaning's edge and feel
 A dizziness of the things I have not said 20

GLOUCESTER MOORS

A MILE behind is Gloucester town Where the fishing fleets put in,
A mile ahead the land dips down
And the woods and farms begin Here, where the moors stretch free
In the high blue afternoon,
Are the marching sun and talking sea,
And the racing winds that wheel and flee
On the flying heels of June

Jill-o'er-the-ground is purple blue, 10
Blue is the quaker-maid,
The wild geranium holds its dew Long in the boulder's shade
Wax-red hangs the cup
From the huckleberry boughs,
In barberry bells the grey moths sup,
Or where the choke-cherry lifts high up Sweet bowls for their carouse

Over the shelf of the sandy cove
Beach-peas blossom late 20
By copse and cliff the swallows rove
Each calling to his mate
Seaward the sea-gulls go,
And the land-birds all are here,
That green-gold flash was a vireo,
And yonder flame where the marsh-flags grow
Was a scarlet tanager

This earth is not the steadfast place
We landsmen build upon,
From deep to deep she varies pace, 30
And while she comes is gone Beneath my feet I feel
Her smooth bulk heave and dip,
With velvet plunge and soft upreel
She swings and steadies to her keel
Like a gallant, gallant ship

These summer clouds she sets for sail,
The sun is her masthead light,
She tows the moon like a pinnacle frail
Where her phosphor wake churns bright 40
Now hid, now looming clear,
On the face of the dangerous blue
The star fleets tack and wheel and veer,

But on, but on does the old earth steer
As if her port she knew.

God, dear God! Does she know her port,
Though she goes so far about?
Or blind astray, does she make her sport
To brazen and chance it out?
I watched when her captains passed. 50
She were better captainless
Men in the cabin, before the mast,
But some were reckless and some aghast,
And some sat gorged at mess

By her battened hatch I leaned and caught Sounds from the noisome hold,— Cursing and sighing of souls distraught
And cries too sad to be told Then I strove to go down and see,
But they said, 'Thou art not of us!' 60
I turned to those on the deck with me And cried, 'Give help!' But they said, 'Let be
Our ship sails faster thus.'

Jill-o'er-the-ground is purple blue,
Blue is the quaker-maid,
The alder-clump where the brook comes through Breeds cresses in its shade
To be out of the moiling street
With its swelter and its sin! 70
Who has given to me this sweet,
And given my brother dust to eat?
And when will his wage come in?

Scattering wide or blown in ranks,
Yellow and white and brown,
Boats and boats from the fishing banks
Come home to Gloucester town
There is cash to purse and spend,
There are wives to be embraced,
